PREFACE.

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA was undertaken with the conviction that such a thesaurus of intelligence is not only a need, but also the desire of the Church which it represents. It is the fruit of much labor. The preparation of it has involved more toil and patience than any one, perhaps, can adequately estimate, who has not had experience in such work. After thorough reflection, it was, for reasons deemed satisfactory, determined by the publishers to make it consist of but one volume. The only regret felt in reaching this decision was that the book, though designed to be large, would not be sufficiently so to embrace full notices of many ministers and elders well deserving a place on its pages. This regret, however, finally yielded to a sense of necessity, which seemed to be imperative, unless the work should be made so voluminous as to be inconvenient for ready reference, and so expensive as to prevent its general circulation. It was, also, greatly mitigated by the consideration that, although distinct sketches of persons and places would have to be to some extent limited in their range, yet the incidental notices in the narratives, of those not thus formally delineated, would be so numerous as to fill up the measure of general comprehensiveness.

The strictest accuracy has been steadily kept in view in the construction of the volume, and the highest degree of this, it is trusted, has been attained, which could be expected, in view of the loss or faded condition of some important records, the vagueness of traditions, and the difficult legibility of not a few of the manuscripts in which material for the work was communicated. In regard to the precise date and locality of the origin of Presbyterianism in our country, the editor has preferred not to assume the responsibility of deciding, and has, therefore, presented such evidence touching the several aspects of this question as his own research supplied or his contributors furnished, leaving his readers to draw such conclusions from it as, in their judgment, may be warranted.

A grateful acknowledgment is here made of very kind and valuable aid received from our Assistants, and from many brethren in the ministry and in the eldership, in every section of the country. Special obligation is also felt, in this respect, to the Rev. Dr. B. B. Warfield, the Rev. S. J. M. Eaton, D. D., Pennsylvania; Prof. J. F. Baird, Indiana; the Rev. A. L. Lindsley, D. D., Oregon; the Rev. C. A. Stillman, D. D., Alabama; the Rev. Dr. W. A. Scott and the Rev. Dr. S. P. Sprecher, California; the Rev. Dr. James C. Moffat and the Rev. A. A. Hodge, D. D., LL. D., New Jersey; the Rev. W. E. Moore, D. D., and the Rev. Anson Smyth, D. D., Ohio; Sheldon Jackson, D. D., Henry J. Van Dyke, Sr., D. D., and C. W. Baird, D. D., New York; the Rev. Samuel Hodge, D. D., and the Rev. A. T. Norton, D. D., Illinois; the Rev. J. Aspinwall Hodge, D. D., Connecticut, and the Rev. Stephen Yerkes, D. D., Kentucky.

In order to add to the completeness of the ENCYCLOPEDIA, the editor availed himself freely of all appropriate material within his reach, without feeling it to be necessary to give specific credit, in every instance, to the sources of information thus laid under tribute. Notwithstanding imperfections, from which it does not claim to be exempt, he will be more than satisfied if its acceptableness and usefulness but correspond with his design and desire. With its absolute silence on ecclesiastical severances, from whatever cause, few, if any, he cannot but think, will, after due consideration, feel like finding fault. The work has, he feels assured, this great advantage, that its interest as a record of the past, instead of being abated, will be augmented by the flight of years. The preparation of it, though requiring long and earnest effort, has given him great pleasure; and he most heartily hopes that, under God's blessing, it may serve to attract the branches of the Church which the two Assemblies represent into the closer fellowship which their common Faith and Government, ancestry and aim, demand, and to make every Presbyterian into whose hands it may come, not only more grateful for the Church's grand history, but more prayerful and active that her future may be signalized with ever-growing success, both at home and abroad, in securing the triumph of the Redeemer's kingdom.

ALFRED NEVIN.

PHILADELPHIA, April 1, 1881.

JOHN CALVIN.

THE ILLUSTRIOUS REFORMER was born at Noyon, in Picardy, on the 10th of July, 1509, and died at Geneva on the 27th of May, 1564. His father, Gerhard, whose name was Chaurin, but was afterwards Latinized by his son into the more euphonious shape of Calvinus, or Calvin, was Procureur Fiscal, of the lordship of Noyon, and Secretary of the diocese. He was a man of powerful understanding, and by his judicious, prudent and upright conduct, won the regard of the nobility of the district. His mother was Anna Franke, of Cambray, of whom it is said, that "her feelings were colored by the age in which she lived, and that she was animated by an anxious piety. Faith was early awakened in her heart. She had been taught to pray under the open sky, a blessed means of impressing upon young minds a feeling of the presence of God."

Of the outward appearance of young Calvin, destitute as we are of information, we can say little. Beza, who knew best how to describe him correctly, says, "He was of middle stature, somewhat pale, his skin was rather brown, and his clear, sparkling eyes gave token of his keen, lively spirit, and this even till his death. In his dress he was very neat, but without ornament, as became his great simplicity." He was educated with the children of the noble family of Mommoir, the most honorable in the district. In his twelfth year, his father, who was not rich, procured for him an appointment in the Chapelle de la Grésine. He destined him to the study of theology, because, in his tender years, he had manifested extraordinary piety, and was a sharp reprovee of the follies of his schoolfellows, but afterwards changed his intentions.

Calvin was sent by his father, with the younger members of the Mommoir family, to the high school at Paris. Here he found Maturinus Cordier, who afterwards abjured popery, and for whose learned and pious instructions he entertained the most sincere and grateful recollection. From the Collège de la Marche he passed to the Collège Montaigu, where he met with a Spaniard, who taught the scholastic philosophy, and greatly improved his excellent capacity. The extraordinary gifts of the young man were here strikingly displayed. His mind was so active that he soon left all his fellow-students behind, and was able to pass from the language classes to those of dialectics and the higher sciences. At this time he became first acquainted with a Bible. It was that, perhaps, of Faber Stapulensis, or the still unprinted translation of Robert Olivetanus, his relation. He at that time understood neither Greek nor Hebrew, although he had preached. But no sooner did he discover the errors of the Catholic Church, than he resigned his benefice.

Calvin then, at the suggestion of his father, studied law at the Universities of Orleans and Bourges, and in 1532 returned to Paris, a decided convert to the Reformed faith. Compelled to fly from Paris in 1533, after various wanderings he found a protector in Margaret, Queen of Navarre. In the following year he went to Basel, and there completed and published his great work, the "Institutes of the Christian Religion." After a short stay at Ferrara he went, in 1536, to Geneva, where reform had just been established, and there, on the pressing entreaties of Farel and his friends, he remained. In 1538 Calvin and Farel were expelled from Geneva, in consequence of some changes introduced by them, and Calvin went first to Berne and then to Strasburg. In 1540, he was invited to return to Geneva. He at first declined, but, at length, solicited by the councils, and by the ministers and inhabitants of the city, he left Strasburg, in the Spring of 1541, with an understanding that he should speedily return, and was received with transport at Geneva. Active and energetic, zealous and persevering, Calvin instantly commenced the work of reformation. The ecclesiastical laws he assisted in re-vising, the ordinances he altered, and before the year had closed, this work of usefulness was accomplished, and approved by a general council. Those laws were as efficient and salutary as they were wise and equitable. At this time he wrote a catechism, which was translated into various languages, and met with general approbation. He also published a "Commentary on the Epistle to Titus," and dedicated it to his old friends Viret and Farel. His labors now rapidly increased. He preached nearly every day, he lectured very frequently in theology, presided at meetings, instructed churches, and defended the Protestant faith in works celebrated for their perspicuity and genius. Nor was he less active in his duties as a citizen than as a theologian, or a minister of Jesus Christ. In 1543 he composed a liturgy for the Church at Geneva. He also wrote a work on the necessity of a reformation in the Church, and exposed the absurdities of a frivolous translation of the Bible, by Castalio, in the compilation of which fancy had been consulted at the expense of truth, and sound instead of sense. The enemies to the Reformation were numerous and potent when combined, but singly they were nothing. The truth of this remark was felt by Calvin, and he, therefore, refuted the various works of the enemies as they appeared. Thus he answered Albert Pighius.

But his efforts were not all controversial. He established at Geneva a seminary for the education of pious young men in the Protestant faith, who, by their future ministrations, should extend the borders of the true Church, and in that great work of usefulness he was assisted by the celebrated Beza. At that time also, the Waldenses, inhabiting the Cabriers and other places, who were persecuted by order of the Parliament of Aquitaine, and who fled to Geneva, found in Calvin a sincere and zealous friend. He vindicated in public their cause and in private their necessities. In the year 1546, the efforts of Calvin were various, though painful. Charles V., who was a determined enemy to the Protestant religion, had alarmed some by his threats, and corrupted others by his promises. Calvin exerted himself to counteract all his efforts. But this was not all. Whilst some were lukewarm at Geneva, others were additionally profligate. To convert and convince them, he labored with incessant anxiety, though with but inadequate success. In 1547, whilst Germany was the scene of war and France the theatre of persecution, Calvin wrote his "L'Antidote," being a controversial work on the doctrine of the first seven sections of the council of Trent, and also "A Warning Letter to the Church of Rouen," against the doctrines of a Monk who taught the Gnostic and Antinomian heresies. In the same year, he also continued his pastoral duties, and proceeded in the composition of his "Commentaries on Paul's Epistles." In 1548, Beza retired to Geneva, and, with Calvin, formed future plans of yet more extended and important usefulness. Calvin, accompanied by Farel, in the following year visited the Swiss churches, and wrote two very able and learned letters to Socinius, the founder of the sect called Socinians. In 1550 he assisted yet further in the work of reformation, by obtaining the direction of the Consistory at Geneva, for the communication of private as well as public religious instruction to its inhabitants, and for a total disregard by every one of all feast and saint days. The next year was less favorable to the peace of Calvin. A controversy on the doctrine of predestination agitated the Church, the enemies of Calvin misrepresented his sentiments, and endeavored to excite a general antipathy, not merely to his doctrines, but also to his person. But Providence rendered their attempts abortive.

Calvin is accused by his enemies of having at this time acted with a tyrannical and persecuting spirit towards the heretical Servetus. In regard to this period of his history, it has well been observed, that Papistical pamphleteers, swallowing the entire history of the Inquisition, and straining at this one execution for heresy, present a ludicrous instance of hypocrisy, as they come forth, with pious mien, to declaim and rave against the cruelty of Calvin. But the case may be far more satisfactorily vindicated than by contrasting it with worse and numerous instances in which the very cruelty complained of was displayed. "The execution of Servetus, so often made a stigma upon our noble Reformer," says Dr. Paul Henry, of Berlin, "shows chiefly that Calvin stood above his contemporaries. He had done everything, trying to rescue that restless company of spirits who would destroy the Reformation. Let us approach this error of Calvin's life. We stand before the council with him and Servetus, he seeking to expose error. For, as Servetus exclaims, 'Everything is God!' Calvin replies, 'What, do you mean to say that the floor on which we tread is God? And what if I ask if Satan is also really God?' Servetus rejoins with a mocking laugh, 'Well, do you not believe that?' Servetus addressed the triune God with horrible names of blasphemy, calling Him a hell-hound. Nor to the last did he cease to revile what was holy. Calvin continued in his patient endeavor to refute and admonish him. While Calvin was of the opinion that the council acted rightly, yet it is certain that he did not influence their procedure in sentencing Servetus. He challenged Servetus to come forward openly and establish his assertions. He also entreated the council not to put Servetus to death by fire. Yet it was Calvin upon whom Servetus had vented his fury.

The gentle Melancthon, on the other hand, loudly said that the council's way of sentencing the blasphemer was correct. Calvin afterwards evidently was in doubt about the whole affair in which he, years before, had taken part, following the sentiment of his age. His judgment grew lenient beyond what was usual among even cultivated minds in that century. The spirit of toleration, the natural result of gospel principles and liberty of conscience, rose in the Reformed Church sooner than in any other.

"On the 27th of October, 1853, Servetus had been dead three hundred years. The people of Geneva went up to Chappel, the hill-side where the ashes of Servetus had been strewn, and observed the day before the Lord, honoring Christian toleration and liberty of conscience, and begging forgiveness, in the name of the old council, respecting Servetus, even though he was guilty of transgression. 'But to Calvin, who has been censured unjustly, and made to bear the burden of others' errors, was decreed a statue before the Cathedral of St. Peter's.* For from Calvin proceeded a free, sublime and sanctified Christian culture, which will work beneficially upon mankind as long as the stupendous Alps stand in all their splendor."

About this time Calvin was much affected by the persecution of his friend and fellow-laborer, Farel, for having condemned the immorality of the Genevese, and was almost incessantly occupied in acts of kindness to the persecuted Protestants, who, on the death of Edward, king of England, had been compelled to quit the country. He was also engaged in writing his "Commentary on the Gospel of John." Nor could the spirit of bigotry and persecution, which prevailed in England fail of attracting his attention. He communicated with the sufferers, both in England and France, and was indefatigable in rooting up all heresies which then disturbed the peace of the Church. Towards the close of the year Calvin visited Frankfort, for the purpose of terminating the controversy as to the Lord's Supper, which had been so long agitated. He returned to Geneva, much indisposed, but devoted his time to writing his "Commentary on the Psalms," and to active, energetic and successful exertions, through the medium of German ambassadors, on behalf of the Protestants at Paris, who in that year (1555) were unjustly and inhumanly persecuted. At this time, a sect called the Tritheists, headed by Gentilis, who believed that God consisted not merely of three distinct persons, but also of three distinct essences, was revived, and Calvin directed his attention to a refutation of the system. In the succeeding year he proposed the establishment of a college at Geneva, for the education of youth, and in three years his wishes were accomplished, and himself was elected to the situation of Professor of Divinity, jointly with Claudius Pontius. This college afterwards became eminently useful, and was much distinguished for the learned and pious men who emanated from it. In the same and the following year Calvin was presented with the freedom of the city of Geneva, reprinted his "Christian Institutes," as well in French as Latin, prepared for the press his "Commentary on Isaiah," and combated, with success, a new heresy which had arisen, as to the mediatorial character of Christ. In 1561 Calvin was summoned before the Council of Geneva, at the desire of Charles IX, as being an enemy to France and her king. But on examination it appeared that the only charge which could be established against him was that of having sent Protestant missionaries to that kingdom. Soon afterwards he published his "Commentary on Daniel," and much interested himself on behalf of the Protestants in France, who were then persecuted by the Duke of Guise. In 1562 his health rapidly declined, and he was compelled to restrict his labors to Geneva and his study. But in this and the following year he lectured on the doctrine of the Trinity, completed his "Commentaries on the Books of Moses and Joshua," and published his celebrated "Answers to the Deputies of the Synod of Lyons."

* It was finally decided by Geneva, at Calvin's Ter-centenary, to erect, instead of the statue, a memorial hall. This has been built a spacious edifice, capable of accommodating two thousand persons.

In 1564 Calvin's health became gradually worse, but yet he insisted on performing as many of his duties as his strength would possibly allow. On the 6th of February he preached his last sermon, already much affected by a cough. March 27th, though his feeble frame was much exhausted, he desired to be carried to the door of the council chamber. He ascended the steps leading to the hall, supported by two attendants, and there, having proposed to the Senate a new rector for the school, he took off his skull-cap and thanked the assembly for the kindness which he had experienced at its hands, and especially for the friendship which had been shown him during his last illness. "For I feel," he said, "that this is the last time that I shall stand here." These words were uttered in a voice scarcely audible, and he immediately took his leave of the council, the members of which were moved to tears. On the 2d of April, which was Easter-day, he was carried to church in a chair. He remained during the whole sermon, and received the sacrament from the hand of Beza. He even joined, though with a trembling voice, the congregation in the last hymn, "Lord, let Thy servant depart in peace," his countenance beaming with the smile of Christian joyfulness. April 25th he made his will, in which, after declaring his belief, and commending himself to the mercy of God, he disposed, in the whole, of $225. On April 30th the Senators, whom he desired to see, proceeded in solemn procession from the council chamber to his house, where they assembled around him, and, after collecting all his strength, he delivered to them a most impressive address. On the 28th of April, when all the ministers of the Genevese territory were assembled at his house, according to his wish, he also addressed them in tender and solemn terms. He then extended his right hand to each, "and we went from him," says Beza, "with very heavy hearts and wet eyes." Having learned on the 2d of May, by a letter from Farel, that that now aged man, thinking more of his sick friend than of himself, proposed making a journey to Geneva, Calvin wrote to him the following letter, in Latin: "Farewell, my best and most faithful brother. Since it is God's will that you should survive me, live in the constant recollection of our union, which, in so far as it was useful to the Church of God, will still bear for us abiding fruit in heaven. I wish you not to fatigue yourself on my account. My breath is weak, and I continually expect it to leave me. It is enough for me that I live and die in Christ, who is gain to His people, both in life and in death. Once more farewell, with the brethren."

"The few remaining days of his life," says Beza, "Calvin spent in almost constant prayer. So weak, however, was his voice, through the shortness of his breath, that for the most part his sighs only were audible. But his eyes shone bright to the last, and he raised them to heaven with such an expression that it was easy to learn from them the fervor of his prayer. He frequently repeated, in his agony, with profound sighs, the words of David, 'Lord, I opened not my mouth, for it was Thy doing': and from time to time those of Isaiah, 'I mourn as a dove.' I have also heard that he said, 'Thou dost sorely afflict me, O Lord: but it is consolation enough for me, and I suffer it willingly, since it is Thine hand.'

"The day," continues Beza, "on which he died, namely May 27th, he seemed to suffer less, and even to speak with greater ease, but this was the last effort of nature. In the evening, about eight o'clock, the sure signs of death became suddenly apparent. As soon as this was made known to me, and to one of the brethren, by the servants, I hastened to the bedside, and found him as he quietly expired; neither feet nor hands were convulsed; he had not even breathed hard. He had retained his consciousness and reason to the end. Even his voice was preserved till his last breath, and he looked rather like one sleeping than one dead. Thus on this day, with the setting sun, the brightest light in the world, and he who had been the strength of the Church, was taken back to heaven.

"During the night and on the following day great was the mourning throughout the city. The entire State wept for the prophet of the Lord; the Church lamented the departure of its faithful pastor; the Academy the loss of so great a teacher; all exclaimed, in their grief, that they had lost a father, who, after God, was their truest friend and comforter. Many inhabitants of the city desired to see him after he was dead, and could hardly be induced to leave his remains." He was, according to his own expressed desire, buried without the slightest pomp.

To this brief sketch we can only add the following just and beautiful eulogy of Calvin's character from the miscellaneous works of George Bancroft, Esq., the distinguished historian. Such a testimony from such a man, who never speaks at random, must outweigh, in the minds of the discriminating, the many spiteful outbursts of those who, taking offence at Calvin's theology, scriptural as it is, refuse to give him credit as a scholar, a man of unblemished integrity, and a great reformer.

"We may, as republicans, remember that Calvin was not only the founder of a sect, but foremost among the most efficient of modern republican legislators. More truly benevolent to the human race than Solon, more self-denying than Lyeurgus, the genius of Calvin infused enduring elements into the institutions of Geneva, and made it, for the modern world, the impregnable fortress of popular liberty, the fertile seed-plot of democracy.

"We boast of our common schools; Calvin was the father of popular education, the inventor of the system of free schools. He that will not honor the memory, and respect the influence of Calvin, knows but little of the origin of American liberty.

"If personal considerations chiefly win applause, then no one merits our sympathy and admiration more than Calvin, the young exile from France, who achieved an immortality of fame before he was twenty-eight years of age; now boldly reasoning with the King of France for religious liberty; now venturing as the apostle of truth to carry the new doctrines into the heart of Italy, and hardly escaping from the fury of Papal persecution; the purest writer, the keenest dialectician of his century; pushing free inquiry to its utmost verge, and yet valuing inquiry solely as a means of arriving at fixed conclusions. The light of his genius scattered the mask of darkness which superstition had held for centuries before the brow of religion. His probity was unquestioned, his morals spotless. His only happiness consisted in his 'task of glory and of good,' for sorrow found its way into all his private relations. He was an exile from his country; he became for a season an exile from his place of exile. As a husband, he was doomed to mourn the premature loss of his wife; as a father, he felt the bitter pang of burying his only child.

"Alone in the world, alone in a strange land, he went forward in his career with serene resignation and inflexible firmness; no love of ease turned him aside from his vigils; no fear of danger relaxed the nerve of his eloquence; no bodily infirmities checked the incredible activity of his mind; and so he continued, year after year, solitary and feeble, yet toiling for humanity, till, after a life of glory, he bequeathed to his personal heirs a fortune in books and furniture, stocks and money, not exceeding two hundred dollars, and to the world a purer reformation, a republican spirit in religion with the kindred principles of republican liberty." (See Calvinism, in the Supplement.)

Abeel, John Nelson, D. D., graduated at Princeton College in 1787, and was Tutor in it for two years. He entered upon the study of theology under Dr. Livingston, and was licensed to preach in April, 1793. He first became pastor of a Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, but in 1795 was installed as pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church in the City of New York. With a discriminating mind, a sweet and melodious voice, and his soul inflamed with pious zeal, Dr. Abeel was pre-eminent among extemporaneous orators. He was a man of unassuming manners, and a truly eloquent preacher. He died January 20th, 1812.

Abington Church, Pa. This church was organized in the year 1714, by Rev. Malachi Jones. The first Session book, still in existence, gives the original membership as exactly threescore and ten. These were chiefly "Scotch-Irish," although the names indicate a small commingling of the Low Dutch element. For the first fifteen years succeeding the formation of the congregation, Mr. Jones performed the duties of their pastor. He had come to the colony of Pennsylvania from Wales, and joining the Presbytery of Philadelphia (which had been in existence eight years, and had eleven names on its roll), immediately began work at Abington. He seems to have possessed marked energy and decision of character, and is referred to by one of his contemporaries as "a good man, who did good." By a deed dated August 15th, 1719, Mr. Jones transferred to the properly constituted representatives of the congregation one-half acre of land, that they might erect thereon a church edifice, and at the same time have a burying place for the dead. The only definite information of the original building is that it was constructed of logs, and stood until April, 1793, when it was superseded by a more slightly and substantial structure. Thirty marriages and one hundred and sixty-six baptisms are mentioned in the record of this pastorate. It is not stated how many were received on profession of faith. Mr. Jones died January 28th, 1729. For two years after his decease Rev. Jedediah Andrews occasionally officiated; but it was not until 1731 that Mr. Richard Treat was formally called. For forty-seven years his connection with Abington was continued. In 1778, having arrived at the seventy-first year of his age, this faithful servant of God "fell on sleep." During the period covered by his pastorate George Whitefield and David Brainerd, "the Apostle to the Indians," visited Abington a number of times, and were greatly blessed in their labors.

The memorable schism between the Synods of New York and Philadelphia occurred in 1741; Abington sided with New York. It was not until 1758 that the Synods were reunited. Seven years previously the Presbytery of Abington had, for convenience' sake, been constituted, but this was merged in the Philadelphia Presbytery on the union. An interregnum of three years followed Mr. Treat's decease, various ministers officiating. In 1781 Rev. William Mackey Tennent, D. D., was chosen pastor and installed. Before coming to Abington Dr. Tennent had been settled at Greenfield, Conn., where he was succeeded by Dr. Dwight, afterwards President of Yale College. While here he gave part of his time to the congregations of Norriton and Providence. In 1797 Dr. Tennent was chosen Moderator of the General Assembly. For years he was a member of the Board of Trustees of Princeton College. During his ministry a new stone church was built on the west side of the turnpike. This building was first occupied in 1793. Five years subsequently Isaac Boileau conveyed to the corporation the parsonage farm of one hundred acres. Dr. Tennent was called home December 2d, 1810, after a painful but patiently endured illness; he rests in the old graveyard, near to his uncle, Gilbert Tennent, and close, also, to President Finley, of Princeton College. After an interval of two years Rev. Wm. Dunlap, a son of the President of Jefferson College, was called to Abington; he had begun his ministerial career as a missionary in Canada, and was installed at Abington July 23d, 1812. His service was brief. Six years after his installation he was summoned to go up higher. He died in his thirty-sixth year. For about twelve months Presbytery supplied the pulpit. On September 9th, 1819, Rev. Robert Steel was called to the pastorate. He had pursued his studies with Dr. Wylie, of Philadelphia; subsequently going to Nassau Hall, where he was graduated in 1813. His theological course was pursued under the supervision of Dr. Mason. At first Mr. Steel engaged in city missionary work in New York and Philadelphia, but at Abington he found his first and last regular charge. At a congregational meeting held March 12th, 1833, it was decided to enlarge and entirely remodel the church edifice. This was subsequently done. In 1856 the parsonage farm was sold, with the exception of two acres, which are yet retained.

After this thirteen acres were purchased, and on this property the present parsonage stands. Mr. Steel was a Trustee of the General Assembly, of the Board of Domestic Missions, and of Lafayette College. In 1846 he received the degree of D. D. from Jefferson College. Huntingdon Valley Church was organized under Dr. Steel's ministry—an offshoot from Abington—December 27th, 1860. Dr. Steel died September 2d, 1862.

In May, 1863, Rev. John Linn Withrow was ordained and installed as pastor here, coming direct from Princeton Seminary. Great success attended his efforts. He threw his whole soul into the project of erecting a new church edifice, and finally accomplished that desired end. The structure is of brown stone, very attractive architecturally, and its tall spire is a landmark for the entire neighborhood. Dr. Withrow resigned in November, 1868, to take charge of Arch Street Church, Philadelphia. Lafayette College bestowed on him the degree of D. D. The Rev. Samuel F. Lowrie succeeded Dr. Withrow, and in May, 1869, was installed as pastor. He had previously preached at Alexandria, Pa., and the Bethany Mission, Philadelphia. During his stay at Abington Mr. Moody gave a week of his time to work there, a service which will be long and gratefully remembered.

Mr. Lowrie received the degree of D. D. from Washington and Jefferson College. He left Abington July, 1871, to accept a professorship in the Western Theological Seminary. The present pastor, Rev. L. W. Eckard, was called January 1st, 1875, and installed on the 25th of the following May. He was graduated from Lafayette College in 1866, and Princeton Seminary in 1869. The first five years of his ministry were spent as a missionary to China. Two mission chapels have become self-supporting churches during the present pastorate, and the membership has been largely increased. Such is, briefly, the story of Abington. The early records were imperfectly kept, and much that it would have been pleasant to know about is altogether omitted. But on high the record is complete, and, in souls saved, in Christ's name glorified, in God's glory enhanced, all shall presently know what divine grace hath done for this portion of Zion.

Academies, Presbyterian.

The early educational institutions of our Church reflect great credit on those by whom they were established and sustained, and contributed largely to its prosperity and usefulness.

While the Synod of New York was engaged in laying the foundation of the College of Nassau Hall, the Synod of Philadelphia was not idle. In 1739, ABINGTON CHURCH, ABINGTON, PA.

John Thompson, a man of prominence, proposed to the Presbytery of Donegal the erection of a school to be placed under the care of the Synod. The design was approved by the latter body in May of the same year. Messrs. Pemberton, Dickinson, Cross and Anderson were nominated to prosecute the design and secure subscriptions in New England and in Europe. In 1741 the Synod took the school at New London, Pa., which had started the previous year, under its care. It was to be supported by annual contributions from the congregations, and "all persons who please, may send their children and have them instructed gratis in languages, philosophy, and divinity." The Rev. Francis Alison, the finest scholar in the two Synods, was appointed master, and authorized to appoint his own usher. He was to be allowed by the Synod twenty pounds per annum, and his Assistant fifteen pounds. Several ministers and other gentlemen contributed books to begin a library, in this respect imitating the example of Yale.

In 1749 the plan of the school was modified. Mr. Alison's salary was increased, and tuition was allowed. In 1752 he removed to Philadelphia, to take charge of the Academy there, but the school continued in operation under the care of Alexander McDowell, to whom, in 1751, Matthew Wilson was added as Assistant. The latter was to teach the languages, while Mr. McDowell continued, "from a sense of the public good," to teach logic, mathematics, natural and moral philosophy, etc. This school became justly celebrated, and served to aid in furnishing the State with able civilians, and the Church with well-qualified ministers. Among those who were wholly or partially educated here were Charles Thomson, Secretary of the Continental Congress; Dr. John Ewing, Provost of the University of Pennsylvania; Dr. David Ramsay, the historian; the celebrated Dr. Hugh Williamson, one of the framers of the Constitution of the United States and historian of North Carolina; and three signers of the Declaration of Independence, Governor Thomas McKean, George Read and James Smith.

The school of the Rev. Samuel Finley, at Nottingham, had a high reputation. It sent out a large number of eminent men. Among them were Governor Martin, of North Carolina; Dr. Benjamin Rush, Colonel John Bayard, Governor Henry, of Maryland; Rev. Dr. McWhorter, the celebrated James Waddell; and the Rev. William M. Tennent, of Abington. Mr. Finley was an accomplished scholar and a skillful teacher; and to such eminence had he attained, that on the death of Mr. Davies he was called to succeed him in the presidency at Princeton.

Soon after his settlement as pastor at Fagg's Manor, Pa., the Rev. Samuel Blair instituted a classical school, in which some of the ablest ministers of the Presbyterian Church received either the whole or the more substantial parts of their education. Among these were the Rev. Samuel Davies, the Rev. Alexander Cummings, the Rev. John Rodgers, D.D.; the Rev. James Finley, the Rev. Hugh Henry, and the Rev. Robert Smith, D.D., the father of Samuel Stanhope Smith and John Blair Smith; all eminent as scholars and divines.

Soon after his settlement as pastor at the church of Poquea, Lancaster Co., Pa., the Rev. Robert Smith, D.D., founded a school, designed chiefly for the instruction of youth in the Latin, Greek and Hebrew languages. In this school he employed the most respectable teachers, and it was soon resorted to by a large number of young men from different parts of Pennsylvania and Maryland, some of whom were afterwards greatly distinguished in the different professions. He exerted a strong religious influence on the minds of his pupils, and a large part of those intrusted to his care became exemplary professors of religion.

Shortly before the Revolutionary War, some men in Virginia, whose sons were growing up, felt a desire for having them, or part of them, educated liberally, chiefly with a view to the ministry of the gospel. Accordingly a small Grammar School was formed in the neighborhood of Old Providence, which greatly increased, and drew youths from distant neighborhoods. This school was moved to a place called Mount Pleasant, near to the little town of Fairfield. Here the Rev. William Graham, a native of the township of Paxton, near Harrisburg, in Lancaster county (now Dauphin), Pa., at the request of Hanover Presbytery, commenced his labors as a teacher, and here we find the germ whence sprung Washington College. In 1776 the school was established at Timber Ridge Meeting-house. As Mr. Graham's income from the Academy was small, and his salary for preaching to the two congregations of Timber Ridge and Hall's Meeting-house (now Monmouth) was paid in depreciated currency, it was impossible for him to support his family, and he purchased a small farm on the North river, within a mile or two of the present site of Washington College. For some time after retiring to his farm he endeavored to perform the duties of a Rector, by visiting the school and giving instruction, several times in each week. But this being found very inconvenient to himself, and disadvantageous to the school, he relinquished the establishment at Timber Ridge, and opened a school in his own house. After some time a frame edifice was erected; on ground given for the purpose, and the school was continued until, in the year 1782, application was made to the Legislature for an Act of Incorporation, and, accordingly, a number of trustees were formed into a body corporate, to have full charge of the Academy, which received the name of LIBERTY HALL, which name it retained until it was endowed by General Washington, when his name was substituted for that which it had before borne. In this Academy, notwithstanding the adversities it had to encounter during the Revolutionary War, many were educated who afterwards attained great eminence. Among them were Samuel Doak, John Montgomery, Archibald Alexander, James Houston, William Tate, Samuel Greenlee, and William Wilson.

At an early period after he became pastor of the churches of Chartiers and Pigeon Creek, in Western Pennsylvania, Dr. John McMillan directed his attention towards the preparation of suitable young men of piety and talents for the gospel ministry. He was selected by the Synod of Virginia to manage and take charge of the institution, which, by their appointment, was entrusted to the superintendence of the Presbytery of Redstone. This institution, with his consent, and the concurrence of the Presbytery of Redstone, was located, within a year after it was thus originated, in Canonsburg, and became merged into the Academy of that place in 1791-2. The first students in this "Log Cabin" were James Hughes, John Brier, James McGready, Samuel Porter, and Thomas Marquis. Many others who also became prominent in the Church here received their education. The Academy, in 1802, was merged into Jefferson College, and when it at length became a chartered college, Dr. McMillan was its most steady and effectual friend, through his long life. "Jefferson College," says Dr. Joseph Smith, "owes an immeasurable debt of gratitude to Dr. McMillan, and, of course, the cause of science and literature must ever regard him as one of its earliest and most valuable patrons and supporters."

Adair, Rev. Robert, was born in Belfast, Ireland, March 16th, 1802, and was ordained by the Presbytery of New Castle, November 19th, 1829. Mr. Adair was pastor of the Second Church, Wilmington, Del., 1829-34; of the church at Norristown, Pa., 1834-8; stated supply of the Franklin Street Church, Philadelphia, 1838-9; pastor of the First Church, Southwark, Philadelphia, 1839-45; Corresponding Secretary of the Philadelphia Home Missionary Society, 1848-62; pastor of the Central Church, Norristown, 1862-5; Secretary of the Home Mission Committee, 1865-71; pastor of the Tabor Church, Philadelphia, 1871-80; and on resigning the charge in 1880, was made Pastor Emeritus. Mr. Adair still resides in Philadelphia, and preaches, as there is opportunity, for his brethren, by whom he is held in high regard. He is an earnest and impressive preacher, and is always listened to with interest. As a member of Presbytery he is very faithful and useful. His long ministry, and service in important spheres, have been crowned with the divine blessing, and in his advanced age he is still ready to aid every work which aims at the glory of his Master and the good of mankind.

Adams, John Watson, D. D., a son of the Rev. Roger Adams, was born in Simsbury, Conn., December 6th, 1796. He graduated at Hamilton College in 1822, having during his collegiate course developed a character, both intellectual and moral, of rare excellence. On leaving college he became the teacher of a select school in Manlius, New York. At the close of this engagement, he went to the city of New York, and commenced his professional studies, availing himself of the instruction of Dr. Spring, and two or three other Presbyterian clergymen of the city. A short time afterward he joined the Middle Class in the Theological Seminary at Auburn, where he took the first rank for talents, and diligent and successful study. He was ordained and installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Syracuse, July 28th, 1826, and continued in this relation till the close of his life. In 1841 he was chosen a member of the Board of Overseers of Hamilton College, and continued to hold the office until his death, which occurred April, 6th, 1850. "Dr. Adams," says Dr. R. W. Goudit, "was one of the most unambitious men whom I have ever known in the ministry; he was indeed ambitious to do good and promote the honor of his Master, but for the applause of men I never could see that he cared a rush. As a preacher, he had a deservedly high reputation. He could not be considered as eminently popular, but his sermons were always rich in evangelical truth, and written in a style of great perspicuity and precision, so that it was the fault of the hearer if he was not profited." After Dr. Adams' death there was published a duodecimo volume of his discourses, which is highly creditable, not only to his talents as a preacher, but to the American pulpit.

Adams, Rev. William Hooper, the son of the Rev. Dr. Schemiah and Martha Hooper Adams, was born in Boston, Mass., January 5th, 1838. He entered Harvard University in 1856, and was honorably graduated in 1860, after which he became a student of the Theological Seminary at Andover. In January, 1861, he entered the Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C. He was licensed to preach the gospel September 27th, 1862, by the Presbytery of Hopewell, and on November 21st, 1863, he was ordained as an Evangelist by the same Presbytery. Immediately after his ordination he ministered, as an Evangelist, to the churches of Danielsville, Sandy Creek, and to the people of Paolia and Beth Haven, Ga.

Mr. Adams began his ministry at Enfauia, Ala., where he labored with great fidelity and acceptance. In the summer of 1865 he returned to Boston. February 20th, 1867, he visited Charleston, S. C., accepting an invitation to the pastorate of the Circular Church in that city, where he remained twelve years. In the Spring of 1880 he was in attendance at the meeting of Charleston Presbytery, and a few days after the adjournment of that body his spirit passed tranquilly from time to eternity.

During his absence from his church, in 1877, to be near his father during his remaining days, Mr. Adams was laboriously engaged in ministerial and literary work. He supplied the vacant pulpit of Vine Street Church, Roxbury, Mass., the Church of Middleboro, Mass., and afterwards the Hancock Church, of Lexington, in the same State. At the same time he prepared his "Seven Words from the Cross," a work of great tenderness and merit. He was an eminently holy, self-sacrificing and devoted man. He was a general favorite with the colored people, in whom he had always manifested a kind, considerate interest, and they were largely represented at his funeral, where their expressions of love and grief were deeply affecting. As a preacher, he "determined to know nothing but Jesus Christ and him crucified." His pulpit preparations were elaborate and scholarly. As a pastor he will be remembered with peculiar affection. He was deeply interested in everything that interested his flock. Condescending to men of low estate, he had a kind and encouraging word for all—for the chimney sweep and the scavenger that removed the rubbish from his door. "Brother Adams," said his Presbytery, in a paper adopted in view of his death, "was a heavenly-minded, cheerful and loving

Christian, and as a minister of the gospel, was able, earnest and zealous. It can truly be said of him, as it was said of another preacher of Christ, after his decease, "There was no taint of bigotry in his nature. All followers of Christ were Christians to him, and in every sinner he saw a possible saint, and hoped and prayed that the possibility might be realized."

Adams, William, D.D., LL.D., son of John Adams, was born at Colchester, Conn., in 1813. When an infant he was taken to Andover, Mass., where his father, who was one of the most celebrated teachers of his day, became the Principal of an academy. Trained by his father, and a protégé of Professor Stuart, he had also the advantage of constant association with such men as Judson, Gordon Hall, Newell, and many others. He settled at

WILLIAM ADAMS, D.D., LL.D.

Brighton, near Boston, where his ministry was successful. In 1840 he accepted a call to the Broome street or Central Presbyterian Church of New York, and for many years was its most efficient and beloved pastor. A large portion of this congregation, who thought it advisable to remove to the upper part of the city, withdrew, with Dr. Adams, in 1853, and erected an elegant church edifice on the corner of Madison avenue and Twenty-fourth street, and became known as the Madison Square Presbyterian Church. In this edifice, for twenty years, Dr. Adams preached to large and intelligent audiences, and with marked indications of the Divine blessing upon his ministry. Having been elected President of the Union Theological Seminary, New York, he preached his farewell sermon as pastor of the Madison Square Church, on Sunday, April 19th, 1874, and his inauguration as President took place May 11th, 1874.

Dr. Adams was a finished gentleman, dignified, yet affable and approachable. In public and private his bearing was marked by an entire self-possession, and a happy adaptability to circumstances and persons. He had a genial, companionable disposition, and none but ennobling qualities of heart. He was a very superior preacher. All his sermons were able, and indicated great theological as well as literary culture. His voice was mellow, though full of compass, and his delivery and gestures were appropriate and impressive. He excelled as an extemporaneous speaker, showing a remarkable fluency of chaste, effective language. As a pastor he was greatly beloved by his people. Dr. Adams took high rank as an author. He wrote with much gracefulness and vigor, and his works reached a large circulation. Prominent among his books were "The Three Gardens—Eden, Gethsemane, and Paradise," and "Thanksgiving." In 1852 he was Moderator of the General Assembly which met in Washington, D. C. He exerted a commanding and widespread influence in the Church, by his Christian excellence, well-balanced character, intellectual force, and official fidelity.

Addison, Hon. Alexander, was born in Scotland, and received a thorough English and classical education in the College of Aberdeen, in his native land. He first adopted the ministerial profession, and emigrated to America in 1758, bearing the commission of a preacher in the Presbyterian Church. He officiated in that capacity for some time, at Washington, Pa., when he turned his attention to the law, and, after pursuing the required course of study, commenced practice and was eminently successful, attaining to wealth and honor. He was the first person to receive an appointment as President Law Judge in Western Pennsylvania, his commission to that office dating 1791. He remained in this position until 1802, and died, in Pittsburg, in 1807. He was the author of Addison's Reports, at one time a high authority.

Adger, John Bailey, D.D., was born December 13th, 1810, in Charleston, S. C., and is the eldest son of James Adger, who was a wealthy and pious merchant in that city. He graduated at Union College, N. Y., in 1828, and was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Charleston Union, April 15th, 1834. In that year he was sent out as a missionary to the Armenians in Asia Minor, by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. He labored there zealously nearly twelve years, but was compelled, by impaired vision and failing health, to resign. Soon after his return to his native State, viz., in 1847 he proposed to the Second Presbyterian Church in Charleston, to build a separate church for the benefit of the colored people, which was done in 1849. This colored congregation afterwards became the Zion Church. In 1857 he accepted the appointment of Professor of Ecclesiastical History and Church Polity in the Seminary of Columbia, S. C., and retained the position, ably fulfilling its duties, until 1871. Subsequently he was stated supply of Mount Zion, 1875-77, pastor of Roberts Church in 1878, and since 1879 has been pastor of Hopewell Church. Dr. Adger resides at Pendleton. He is a gentleman of scholarly acquirements and a faithful laborer in the vineyard of the Lord.

Adopting Act. The most prominent event in the period of our Church's history, from 1729 to 1741, was the passing of the Adopting Act, by which assent to the Westminster Confession of Faith was required of all members of the Synod, and of all candidates for admission to the Presbyteries. The Presbytery of Newcastle had begun, at least as early as 1721, to require the adoption of the Westminster Confession by their candidates for the ministry. No one will be surprised, therefore, to learn that the overture which led to the Adopting Act had its origin in this Presbytery. The Rev. John Thompson, of Lewes, Del., was its author. Under the date of March 25th, 1728, it is recorded that "an overture formerly read before Synod, but which was dropped, being now, at the desire of the Presbytery, produced by Mr. Thompson and read, the Presbytery defer their judgment concerning it until next meeting." When the overture was introduced a second time into Synod, in 1728, "the Synod, judging this to be a very important affair, unanimously concluded to defer the consideration of it till the next Synod, withal recommending it to the members of each Presbytery present to give timely notice thereof to the absent members." In 1729 the subject was taken up by the Synod, and referred to a committee consisting of Messrs. Andrews, Dickinson, Pierson, Thompson (the author of the overture), Craighead, and Anderson, who brought in a report which, after long debate upon it, was agreed to in hac verba:—

"Although the Synod do not claim or pretend to any authority of imposing our faith upon other men's consciences, nor do profess our just dissatisfaction with, and abhorrence of, such impositions, and utterly disclaim all legislative power and authority in the Church, being willing to receive one another as Christ has received us, to the glory of God, and admit to fellowship in sacred ordinances all such as we have grounds to believe Christ will at last admit to the Kingdom of Heaven; yet we are undoubtedly obliged to take care that the faith once delivered to the saints be kept pure and uncorrupt among us, and so handed down to our posterity. And do therefore agree that all the ministers of this Synod, or that shall hereafter be admitted into this Synod, shall declare their agreement in, and approbation of the Confession of Faith, with the Larger and Shorter Catechisms of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, as being, in all the essential and necessary articles, good forms of sound words and systems of Christian doctrine; and do, also, adopt the said Confession and Catechisms as the confession of our faith. And we do also agree that all the Presbyteries within our bounds shall always take care not to admit any candidate of the ministry into the exercise of the sacred functions but what declare his agreement in opinion with all the essential and necessary articles of said Confession, either by subscribing the said Confession of Faith and Catechisms, or by a verbal declaration of the assent thereto, as such Minister or candidate shall think best. And in case any minister of this Synod, or any candidate for the ministry, shall have any scruple with respect to any article or articles of said Confession or Catechisms, he shall, at the time of his making said declaration, declare his sentiments to the Presbytery or Synod, who shall, notwithstanding, admit him to the exercise of the ministry in their own bounds, and to ministerial communion, if the Synod or Presbytery shall judge his scruple or mistake to be only about articles not essential and necessary in doctrine, worship or government. But if the Synod or Presbytery shall judge such Ministers or Candidates erroneous in essential and necessary articles of faith, the Synod or Presbytery shall declare them incapable of communion with them. And the Synod do solemnly agree, that none of us will traduce or use any opprobrious terms of those that differ from us in these extra essential and not necessary points of doctrine, but treat them with the same friendship, kindness, and brotherly love, as if they had not differed from us in such sentiments."

The foregoing paper was adopted in the morning. In the afternoon took place "The Adopting Act."

The ministers of the Synod then present, with the exception of Mr. Elmer, who declared himself not prepared (but gave in his assent at the next meeting of the Synod), after proposing all the scruples that any of them had against any articles and expressions in the Confession and Catechisms, unanimously agreed in the solution of those scruples, and in declaring the Confession and Catechisms to be their confession of faith. The only exception made was to those articles of the Form of Government which related to the duties of the civil magistrate. In view of the "unanimity, peace and unity" which appeared in these consultations and deliberations of the Synod, they "unanimously agreed in giving thanks to God in solemn prayer and praises." The ministers who were present at this meeting of Synod were Messrs. Andrews, Craighead, Thompson, Anderson, Pierson, Gelston, Houston, Tennent, Boyd, Dickinson, Bradner, T. Evans, Hutchinson, Elmer, Stevenson, William Tennent, Com, Orme, Gillespie, and Wilson.

A motion being made to know the Synod's judgment about the Directory, they gave their sense of the matter in the following words:—

"The Synod do unanimously acknowledge and declare, that they judge the Directory for worship, discipline and government of the Church, commonly annexed to the Westminster Confession, to be agreeable in substance to the Word of God, and founded thereupon, and therefore do earnestly recommend the same to all their members, to be by them observed, as near as circumstances will allow and Christian prudence direct."

After action upon the Adopting Act, the question immediately arose, what do the Synod mean by "essential and necessary articles?" May the new members object to any and all articles not essential to Christianity? This ambiguity in the Act excited immediate dissatisfaction, and the Synod were called upon to say explicitly how these expressions were to be understood. This they did at their meeting in 1730, as follows: "Overture, That the Synod do now declare, that they understand these clauses that respect the admission of intrants or candidates, in such a sense as to oblige them to receive and adopt the Confession and Catechisms at their admission, in the same manner, and as fully, as the members of Synod did that were then present."

Many persons having been offended with some expressions or distinctions in the first or preliminary act of Synod for adopting the Westminster Confession, Catechisms, etc., in order to remove said offence and all jealousies that had arisen, or might arise, on occasion of said distinctions and expressions, the following action was taken in 1736: "The Synod doth declare, that the Synod have adopted and still do adhere to the Westminster Confession, Catechisms, and Directory, without the least variation or alteration, and without any regard to said distinctions." The ministers present at this meeting of Synod were Messrs. Thomas Craighead, J. Andrews, J. Thompson, J. Anderson, Richard Treat, J. Honston, Robert Cathcart, A. Boyd, Robert Cross, Robert Jamison, Ebenezer Gould, H. Stevenson, H. Carlisle, James Martin, William Bertram, Alexander Craighead, John Paul, William Tennent, Sen., William Tennent, Jun., and David Evans. If to these be added those members who, though absent this year, were present when the explanatory declaration of 1730 was passed, viz.: Messrs. John Pierson, Samuel Gelston, Gilbert Tennent, Alexander Hutchinson, Joseph Morgan, Daniel Elmer, Thomas Evans, and Ebenezer Pemberton, we have a sufficient list of witnesses as to what were the true meaning and intent of the Adopting Act.

Agnew, Benjamin Lashells, D.D., son of Smith and Maria Mayes Agnew, was born October 20, 1833, in what was then called Warren, now Apollo, Armstrong County, Pa. He graduated at Washington College in 1851, and entered the Western Theological Seminary in the Fall of the same year. At the close of his second year in the Seminary he was licensed by the Presbytery of Allegheny, April 8th, 1856, and spent his Summer vacation, of four months, in Somerset, where he laid the foundation of a new Presbyterian church. In the Fall he returned to the Seminary, and graduated May 13th, 1857. He then went back to Somerset, completed the church commenced the previous Summer, and raised the money to free it from all indebtedness, but declined the pastorate, which he was urged to accept. February 18th, 1858, he was ordained and installed pastor of the church at Johnstown, Pa. While here he was successful in securing the erection of two buildings within the bounds of his congregation; one, a small building at Conemaugh Station, chiefly for the accommodation of men employed by the Pennsylvania Railroad, and their families; the other, a large building in Johnstown, for the use of the main congregation. On October 18th, 1867, he resigned the pastorate at Johnstown, to accept a call to the Westminster Church, Philadelphia, over which he was installed, January 19th, 1868. Whilst he had charge of this church a heavy indebtedness was lifted, through his persistent personal efforts, and the church became very prosperous. He was installed pastor of the North Church, Philadelphia, May 22d, 1870, and during his connection with it the congregation was prosperous and progressive. All respected him for his ability, honored him for his purity of character, and loved him for his kindness and sympathy. On December 17th, 1882, he was installed pastor of East Liberty Church, Pittsburg, Pa.

Throughout his ministerial career, Dr. Agnew has been an earnest, diligent and useful laborer. Over 200 persons have united with the communion of the churches under his care. He was for three years a member of the Board of Publication, when he declined re-election. For ten years he was a member of the Board of Education, was vice-president for some years, and was afterwards President of the Board. He was the efficient stated clerk of the

BENJAMIN LASHELLS AGNEW, D.D.

Presbytery of Philadelphia Central, from the time of its organization until 1880, when he declined further service in that capacity. He was Moderator of the Synod of Philadelphia. He read a paper on "Ministerial Support," before the General Presbyterian Council, in 1880. In all the positions he has occupied he has discharged his duties with fidelity, acceptableness and success.

Agnew, D. Hayes, M. D., LL. D., was born in Lancaster County, Pa., in 1818, and is the son of Dr. Agnew, formerly an eminent physician of that section. His classical education was commenced at the Moscow Academy, Chester County. He next studied at Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa., and finally completed his education at Newark College, Del., where one of his relatives, the Rev. John Holmes Agnew, was Professor of Languages. His medical training was obtained at the University of Pennsylvania, and he entered upon the practice of his profession in the rural districts. After some years he removed to Philadelphia, where he continued his practice, and commenced to deliver a course of lectures in the Philadelphia School of Anatomy, in College Avenue. In 1860 his class in this time-honored institution numbered 265 students, representing every State in the Union. He also established, at the same place, the Philadelphia School of Operative Surgery. He was elected, in 1851, one of the Surgeons of the Philadelphia Hospital, and in that institution he founded the present Pathological Museum, and for some time acted as its Curator.

DR. JAMES AGNEW, M. D., U. S. D.

In 1863 Dr. Agnew was appointed Demonstrator of Anatomy, and Assistant Lecturer on Clinical Surgery in the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania; about the same time he was elected one of the Surgeons of Wills Ophthalmic Hospital. In 1865 he was elected to a similar position in the Pennsylvania Hospital, and likewise in the Orthopaedic Hospital. In 1870 he was chosen to fill the chair of Operative Surgery in the University of Pennsylvania, and in the year that followed he became Professor of the Principles and Practice of Surgery in the same institution. He is a most skillful, rapid and efficient operator in every department of general surgery, which is his speciality, and his reputation is world-wide in this respect. He has published a large and exhaustive work on Operative Surgery, which indicates the highest type of professional ability. During the illness of President Garfield he was summoned as one of his attending physicians, and rendered most valuable service.

Dr. Agnew is a gentleman of fine personal and social qualities. He combines amiableness of disposition, a winning address, and firmness of purpose with an unaffected modesty which sheds its lustre over his dignified and symmetrical character. He is an active, exemplary, honored and useful member of the Second Presbyterian Church, and, notwithstanding the great pressure of his professional claims, is regular in his observance of the public and social ordinances of worship.

Agnew, Rev. John Holmes, D.D., was born in Gettysburg, Pa., May 9th, 1801. He graduated at Dickinson College, under the presidency of the distinguished Dr. John Mason, and taught the Grammar School in Carlisle for some time after leaving the college.

Mr. Agnew pursued his theological studies in the seminary at Princeton, and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Carlisle, April 11th, 1827. That same year he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Uniontown, Pa. In 1831 he was elected Professor of Languages in Washington College, Pa., which position he resigned in 1832. By this institution the degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him in 1852. After leaving Washington he became connected with the German Reformed Institution at York, Pa., then a Professor in Marion College, Missouri, then he filled a similar position in Newark College, Delaware. Subsequently he was Professor of Ancient Languages in the University of Michigan, and after leaving this position took charge of Maplewood Female Seminary, Pittsfield, Mass. Dr. Agnew was editor of the Echoic Magazine, the Biblical Epitaphy, a quarterly in the interest of the (then) New School branch of the Presbyterian Church, also of The Knickerbocker. He was the author of a small and valuable work on "The Sabbath," from the press of the Presbyterian Board of Publication, and assisted in the translation of Winer's Grammar of the New Testament. Dr. Agnew died October 12th, 1865. One who knew him thoroughly thus succinctly delineated his character: "He was generous, benevolent, social, genial, gentlemanly, scholarly."

Agnew, Samuel, M. D., was born at Millers-town, Adams County, Pa., August 10th, 1777. He graduated at Dickinson College in 1798, and took his degree of Doctor of Medicine in the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania. During the War of 1812 he served as a surgeon, and after its termination commenced the practice of Medicine in Gettysburg, but afterwards located at Harrisburg, where he rapidly rose to deserved eminence, establishing a large and lucrative practice. He was an elder of the First Presbyterian Church of that place for fifteen years. His death occurred November 23d, 1849. Dr. Agnew was a devoted and exemplary Christian. Few men have been better fitted in natural talents, in education, in personal character and in public position, than he, for a wide and permanent influence of the best and highest kind over their fellow-men. He was a man of notable qualities. In the eye of the world he was one of the marked men of society, and, both in social and professional life, as well as in the Church, he was promptly accorded a place as a leader.

Aiken, Charles A., D.D., is the son of the Hon. John and H. R. (Adams) Aiken, and was born at Manchester, Vt., October 30th, 1827. He graduated at Dartmouth College, New Hampshire, in 1846, and after studying theology at Andover and in Germany, completed the course at Andover in 1853. On the 19th of October 1851 he was ordained and installed pastor of the Congregational Church at Yarmouth, Maine, and continued in the charge till 1859, when he was elected Professor of the Latin Language and Literature in Dartmouth College. In 1866 he was appointed Professor in the same department in the College of New Jersey, which he held till 1869, when he was elected President of Union College, Schenectady, N. Y. In consequence of the unfavorable influence of the climate upon the health of his family he resigned this office after two years, and the same season (1871) was chosen to the newly constituted Archibald Alexander Professorship of Christian Ethics and Apologetics, in Princeton Theological Seminary. In 1882, in a readjustment of departments he became Professor of Oriental and Old Testament Literature and Christian Ethics. In 1872 he had been chosen a member of the Old Testament Company in the American Bible Revision Committee. Dr. Aiken is the editor and translator of "Lange's Commentary on the Book of Proverbs." He has also contributed articles to the Princeton Review.

Aiken, Samuel Clark, D.D., was born in Windham, Vt., September 21st, 1790. He died in the first hour of the first day of the first month of 1879, aged 88 years. The voice at midnight came. While the bells of Cleveland were ringing out a joyful welcome to the new year, this beloved father in Israel was welcomed into the joy of his Lord.

His parents were of Scotch-Irish descent, godly people in daily practice as well as in public profession. The Bible, the Shorter Catechism, Watts' Psalms and Hymns, and Doddridge's Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul, composed the reading matter of the child Samuel, and in his childhood he knew the Lord. He graduated at Middlebury College, having there for his classmates Silas Wright, Governor and Senator; Samuel Nelson, Judge of the Supreme Court; Carlos

SAMUEL CLARK AIKEN, D.D.

Wilcox, preacher and poet; Pliny Fisk and Levi Parsons, and, greatest of all, Sylvester Larned, the "American Whitefield," who gathered the first Presbyterian church in New Orleans, and died there at the age of 24 years. He studied theology at Andover, and in 1817 was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Londonderry, and in 1818 was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Utica, N. Y., where his ministry of seventeen years was greatly successful.

In 1835 he was installed the first pastor of the only Presbyterian church in Cleveland; he found the church weak in numbers, but under his vigorous, though conservative ministry, it became prosperous and strong. When he had been sole pastor of this church for twenty-three years, Rev. Dr. William H. Goodrich became his Associate Pastor, Dr. Aiken remaining Pastor Emeritus, and receiving from the church a liberal annuity for the twenty remaining years of his life. It is not easy to sum up the results of Dr. Aiken's labors in Cleveland, for they flowed into all the other Evangelical congregations in the city. "The Old Stone Church" has a numerous family of daughters, all of whom rise up and call her blessed. Dr. Aiken's spirit and example will long live in the churches of Cleveland, and thousands speak his name with reverence and love. In person he was tall, well proportioned and of pleasing and impressive countenance. Socially he was a model gentleman. His mental powers were of a high order, and as a preacher and pastor he stood in the first rank.

Alden, Joseph, D. D., LL. D., was born in Cairo, New York, in 1807, and graduated at Union College in 1828; after which he studied theology in Princeton Seminary, and was two years a Tutor in the College. He was then successively Professor of Rhetoric in Williams College, Massachusetts; Professor of Moral Philosophy in Lafayette College, Pennsylvania; President of Jefferson College, Pennsylvania, and Principal of the State Normal School, Albany, New York, 1867-80. Dr. Alden is the author of several instructive works for the young, and has been a constant and popular contributor to the periodical literature of the country. In the volume of the Princeton Review for 1830, he reviewed Payne's Elements of Mental and Moral Science, and Dugald Stewart's works.

Alden, Rev. Timothy, was of Puritan ancestry. He was born at Yarmouth, Mass., August 28th, 1771. He entered Harvard in 1790, and graduated in 1794. He seems to have engaged somewhat in the study of theology during his collegiate course. Whilst teaching at Marblehead, Mass., he was licensed to preach the gospel. November 20th, 1799, he was ordained as co-pastor with Dr. Haven, over the church of Portsmouth, N. H. He resigned his charge, July 31st, 1805, but continued his labors there until 1808, when he opened a ladies' school in Boston. In 1810 he took charge of the young ladies' department in the Academy at Newark, N. J., and after a few years opened a school for young ladies in the city of New York. July 28th, 1817, he was inaugurated President and Professor in the Faculty of Allegheny College, Meadville, Pa. He became a member of the Presbytery of Erie, April 2d, 1816. He delighted in missionary work, and for many successive years labored for a time among the Seneca and Munsee Indians, who had reservations in northwestern Pennsylvania and southwestern New York. Mr. Alden's connection with Allegheny College terminated in November 1831. He opened a boarding school in Cincinnati in 1832, and in 1831 took charge of the Academy at East Liberty, Pa., becoming also stated supply to the congregation of Pine Creek, in that region. He died, July 5th, 1839. Besides many occasional sermons and addresses, Mr. Alden published, in 1814, "A collection of American Epitaphs," in five volumes, 18mo, and in 1827, a "History of Sundry Missions," and in 1821, a "Hebrew Catechism."

Alexander, Archibald, D. D., LL. D. No other name on the records of the Presbyterian Church carries with it a greater charm than this, to the denomination of which he whom it designates was so distinguished and beloved a representative. It is blended with the most endearing and enduring associations, and invested with an admiration and an honor which are imperishable.

Dr. Alexander was born near Lexington, Va., April 17th, 1772. His classical and theological studies were pursued under the direction of the Rev. William Graham, of Liberty Hall, afterward Washington College. He was licensed at the early age of nineteen, and on expressing his diffidence, Presbytery assigned him for a text, "Say not I am a child" (Jer. i, 7). After spending a year or more in missionary labor, according to the rules of the Synod, he was ordained, and installed pastor of Briery Church, November 7th, 1794. In 1796 he was chosen President of Hampden-Sidney College, at the age of twenty-four. May 20th, 1807, he was installed over Pine Street Church, Philadelphia. In the same year, being thirty-five, he was elected Moderator of the General Assembly, and in his sermon made the suggestion of a Theological Seminary. In 1812 he was appointed Professor in the Theological Seminary just established at Princeton. Here he remained for the rest of his life, moulding, during forty years, the studies and characters of two generations of ministers. His name was widely known in other lands, as well as our own. When the late Dr. Thomas Smythe, of Charleston, S. C., was a student in Highbury, England, and thought of coming to America, he asked his Professors to what seminary he should direct his steps. They told him, by all means, to go where Drs. Alexander and Miller were.

When in the prime of life, Dr. Alexander was thin, though he afterwards grew more stout, with an inclination to corpulence; his complexion was clear, and his soft brown hair already beginning to be silvered, albeit, it never became altogether white; his countenance was wonderfully mobile and animated, and his eye like that of an eagle. Latterly he had a stoop of the shoulder and a characteristic swaying, irregular gait. A broad cloak hung at an angle on one side, and he would dart sudden downward glances to the right or left. He was of mercurial spirits, and in the social circle and at the home fireside often full of vivacity, affectionate gaiety, and humor. In his best moods it would be hard to find his equal as a raconteur. He was, however, subject to fits of silence and depression. Few men were ever more deeply revered or widely loved. His life was "hid with Christ in God." For an hour, at twilight, every evening, he suffered no interruption of his privacy, and was believed to be then engaged in devotional or serious meditation. His face came to show unmistakable traces of a mellowed Christian experience. His very appearance was that of a holy as well as aged and benevolent man. When preaching the funeral sermon of his colleague, Dr. Miller, he announced his own departure as near at hand, and made his preparations for the great journey as calmly and methodically as if he had been going back to Rockbridge, among his native mountains in old Virginia.

Dr. Alexander was seized with his final illness in the summer of 1851. When Dr. Hodge visited him for the last time, he expressed his desire that Dr. John McDowell should preach his funeral sermon, but with the injunction that he should not utter one word of eulogy. He then, with a smile, handed Dr. Hodge a white bone walking-stick, which had been presented to him by one of the chiefs of the Sandwich Islands, saying, "You must leave this to your successor in office, that it may be handed down as a kind of symbol of orthodoxy." In his illness, his early days seemed to pass in review before him, and during one of those nights in which his devoted wife was watching by his side, he broke out into a solilo-quy, rehearsing God's gracious dealings with his soul. "He was especially thankful," says his son, "that our dear mother was permitted to wait on him to the last, and when approaching his end, he said, with great tenderness, 'my dear, one of my last prayers will be that you may have as serene and painless a departure as mine.'" He died October 23d, of that year. The Rev. William E. Schenck, D.D., who was at that time pastor of the church with which Dr. Alexander's family was connected, thus refers to the closing scene: "There was nothing excited, nothing exultant, and yet it seemed to be thoroughly triumphant, a calm, believing, cheerful looking through the gloomy grave into the glories of the eternal world. It was the steady, unflinching step of a genuine Christian philosopher, as well as an eminent saint, evincing his own thorough, heartfelt and practical belief in the doctrines he had so long and so ably preached, as he descended into the dark valley of the shadow of death."

On Friday, October 24th, Dr. Alexander's precious remains were deposited in the cemetery at Princeton, in the presence of a group such as had seldom been gathered in one spot in any part of our land. There were the students and Faculty of the College of New Jersey, and those of the Theological Seminary, the entire Synod of New Jersey, and many members of the Synods of New York and Philadelphia, besides a crowd of other spectators, a numerous company of God's ministers and people, all feeling that a great man in Israel had fallen.

As a preacher, Dr. Alexander was equaled by few and surpassed by none. There was a charm in his ministrations that no one who ever heard him can forget. His unique and inimitable manner, so simple, so vivacious, so earnest, was sure to rivet the attention. His discourses were replete with instruction drawn fresh from the fountain of wisdom. He had the rare faculty of making didactic and familiar topics interesting, even to persons of no religion, for his sermons partook of the vitality and freshness of his mind, which was like a perennial fountain sending off its sparkling waters. He also possessed the capacity of exciting religious emotion in a most remarkable degree. He could set forth the gospel in its adaptation to the endlessly diversified states of human feeling, with a skill and effect truly wonderful. And the facility with which he could awaken emotions of gratitude, praise, contrition, joy, and the like, gave him a rare control over any Christian auditory. Another element of his power in the pulpit was his earnest sympathy with his kind. He never sank the man in the philosopher, nor the citizen and patriot in the divine. His sterling common sense formed a bond of union between himself and his fellow men, which neither his scholastic pursuits nor his high spiritual attainments ever weakened or tarnished; but, above all, his eminent piety was the source of his great power as a preacher, and in all the spheres he occupied, it was to his character what the soul is to the body—the pervading, life-giving, governing principle, and it would be difficult to speak of him in any of his relations or pursuits without recognizing the fact of his singular attainments in holiness. It was his rare fortune to maintain an unsullied reputation for superior piety, wisdom, benevolence and consistency, throughout a ministry of nearly sixty years.

Of American divines, the names of Edwards and Alexander take the first place, and between the lives of Brown, of Haddington, and Dr. Alexander, there is a striking resemblance; they both, in early life, were educated under difficulties, with irrepressible desires for knowledge; they not only overcame their disadvantages, but became distinguished for their learning. Their studies and their works were to advance the practical and the useful. They both became the educators of numerous ministers who treasured their instructions and revered their virtues. They were both happy in their domestic circumstances, and left behind them a numerous family of children and grandchildren, who, trained under happier auspices, built on the foundation they had laid, and made the names more illustrious. They were respected by the men of their own time, and their names, and their writings will descend as the heirlooms of the golly to all generations.

Dr. Alexander's published writings are too numerous to recite here. We may only mention "History of the Colonization Society," "Evidences of the Christian Religion," "Thoughts on Religion," "Counsels to the Aged," "Practical Sermons," all of which are works of much interest and value. He also published numerous tracts, and was a frequent contributor to the Princeton Review.

Alexander, Rev. Caleb, was born in Northfield, Mass., on the 23d of July, 1755. He graduated at Yale in 1777, and took his second degree at Brown University in 1789; on the 14th of October 1778, he was licensed to preach the gospel by the Eastern Association of New London county. February 28th, 1781, he became pastor of the church in New Marlborough, and on April 12th, 1786, was installed over the church in Mendon, Mass. In 1801, he was appointed by the Massachusetts Missionary Society to visit the churches and Indians in the western part of New York. He resigned the charge of his church, December 7th, 1802, to go west. On his return to the State of New York, he divided his ministerial labors among the three churches of Salisbury, Norway and Fairfield. When Hamilton Academy, at Clinton, was advanced to the dignity of a college, he was, July 22d, 1812, unanimously elected its President, but did not accept the position. The same year he became Principal of an academy at Onondaga Hollow. After resigning the place, he engaged with great zeal and energy in the founding of the Theological Seminary at Auburn. He died at Onondaga, April 12th, 1828, in the seventy-third year of his age.

Alexander, Rev. David, was a native of Ireland. He may have been educated at the Log College, and licensed by Newcastle Presbytery. He was ordained and installed pastor of Pequoa Church, in the Presbytery of Donegal, October 18th, 1738. The West End (Leacock) petitioned that a portion of his time might be given to them. In 1741 Leacock was declared by the Synod entitled to all the privileges of any vacant congregation. Mr. Alexander let no man outstrip him in his violation of all rules in his treatment of those whom he esteemed "opposers of the work." He was suspended by his Presbytery till "satisfaction was given for his disregardful conduct to them, and his refusal to submit to the government of Christ's Church in their hands." The conjunct Presbyteries of New Brunswick and Newcastle appointed him, on account of "the necessity in the Great Valley," to supply there. From that time his history cannot be traced.

Alexander, Rev. James Calvin, was born of Scotch-Irish parents, in Lincolnton, North Carolina, October the 2d, 1831, but spent the most of his childhood and youth in Statesville and Iredell county, North Carolina. He completed his education at Davidson College, North Carolina, with the class of 1853, and was prepared for the ministry at the Theological Seminary in Columbia, South Carolina, graduating, after the full course, in 1859. In April of the same year he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Concord, and in April, 1861, was ordained and installed pastor of Buffalo and Bethel churches, Guilford county, in Orange Presbytery, in which charge, venerable for age, he has continued to the present time (1883).

Mr. Alexander has taken rank as one of the most useful ministers and acceptable pastors in the Synod of North Carolina. As a preacher, he has not cultivated, nor is he remarkable for, the graces of oratory; but he is, by reason of the strength of his convictions and the earnestness of delivery, a very effective speaker. His sermons are characterized by the simplicity of their style, scripturalness, clearness of exposition, and vigor in the application of truth. He possesses the gift of sound judgment and practical common sense in a high degree. His Presbytery (Orange) has for years entrusted to him the management of missionary and evangelistic operations within its bounds, the delicate and onerous duties of which important post he has continued to discharge with entire acceptance to the Church. The people of his charge are warmly attached to him, and the feeling is reciprocated in the continuance of a pastoral connection formed upwards of twenty-two years ago.

Alexander, Rev. James H., was the oldest child of Josiah Pinckney Alexander, and Margaret Amina (Steele) Alexander, and was born in Pulaski, Giles County, Tenn., July 16th, 1826. Having graduated at Oglethorpe University, July, 1849, he entered the Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C., and graduated 1852. He was licensed by Maury (now Columbia) Presbytery, September, 1852; was ordained by the Presbytery of Tuscaloosa, October 26th, 1851, and at once installed pastor of Payneville and Elizabeth churches, in Alabama. In 1856 he was installed pastor of Kosciusko Church, where he is still laboring. For three years he labored also as stated supply in the churches of Poplar Creek and French Camp. After this, in 1860 and 1861, he supplied Carthage Church. In 1869 he organized Durant Church, and preached there four years, after which he gave his whole time to his pastoral charge, laboring also in mission fields near. For three years he was Principal of the Kosciusko Female College, and for five years was Superintendent of Public Education of his county. He has been the efficient chairman of the Committee of Home Missions in his Presbytery (Central Mississippi) for about twenty years.

Mr. Alexander is reserved, but polite and agreeable in his manners. He is not demonstrative, but the kindest and truest of husbands, and a most affectionate father. He is an exemplary and influential citizen. His preaching is plain, earnest and Scriptural, and has been greatly blessed of God. But it is especially in his pastoral work, and in his influence in winning young men to the ministry, that he has rendered his best and most permanent services to the cause of the Master. No one was ever more punctual as a presbyter, and his words among his brethren are always courteous, judicious and safe. He has been a member of three General Assemblies.

Alexander, James Waddel, D.D., the eldest son of Rev. Archibald and Janet (Waddel), Alexander, was born in Louisa county, Va., March 13th, 1804. Surrounded by the happiest influences, his active mind developed freely and rapidly; he was a frank, open-hearted, generous boy. At college, though the most youthful of his class, the attractive simplicity and loveliness of his character won for him the affection of all. He graduated at the College of New Jersey, in 1820, was appointed Tutor in the same Institution in 1824, and was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery the same year; he resigned his tutorship in 1825, and became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Charlotte C. H., Va.; here he labored two years, when he received a call to the First Presbyterian Church, Trenton, N. J., which he accepted. In 1830 he resigned his charge, and became editor of the Presbyterian, published in Philadelphia. In 1833, he accepted the appointment of Professor of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres in the College of New Jersey, and discharged the duties of this office until 1844, when he became pastor of the Duane Street Presbyterian Church, New York. In 1849 he was appointed Professor of Ecclesiastical History and Church Government in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J.

In 1851 Dr. Alexander accepted a call to become pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church,

New York, where he continued until his death, which took place at the Red Sweet Springs, Va. His health had been somewhat feeble, and he had visited the Springs in hope of restoration, but in this he was disappointed. He died July 31st, 1859. His body was taken to Princeton, N. J., where it was buried by the side of his sainted father. Dr. Alexander was eminent as a Christian, gifted as a writer, and successful as a preacher and pastor. His excellent talents, fine scholarship and large influence were all consecrated to the cause of Christ. Among his numerous and valuable publications were: "The American Mechanic and Working Man," "Good, Better, Best, or, the Three Ways of Making a Happy World," "The Scripture Guide, a Familiar Introduction to the Study of the Bible," "Thoughts on Family Worship," "Poverty and Crime in Cities," "Forty Years' Letters," "Plain Words to a Young Communicant," "Consolation, in discourses on select topics addressed to the suffering people of God," and "Discourses on Common Topics of Christian Faith and Practice."

Alexander, Rev. Joseph, D. D., graduated at Princeton College in 1760; was licensed by the New Castle Presbytery in 1767; the same year was installed pastor of the Sugar Creek Presbyterian Church, in North Carolina, where he established a classical school which soon attained a high reputation. In a few years he became pastor of Union Church, South Carolina, where he remained until 1773, when he was installed pastor of Bullock's Creek Church, and continued to be so until 1801. Dr. Alexander was as active in the cause of education in South Carolina as he had been in North Carolina. He was endowed with fine talents, and was an uncommonly animated and popular preacher. He was an ardent patriot throughout the Revolution. He died July 30th, 1809.

Alexander, Joseph Addison, D. D., the third son of Rev. Archibald and Janet (Waddel) Alexander, was born in Philadelphia, April 21th, 1809. His early education was obtained under the immediate supervision of his parents, and owing to an intellectual vigor rare indeed, his powers of acquiring knowledge were amazing, especially in the department of languages. In 1825 he graduated at the College of New Jersey, with the highest honors of his class. He was elected Tutor, but declined the appointment, and, with Mr. Patton, founded Edgehill School, at Princeton. He studied theology at home and at the University of Halle and Berlin, in Europe. He was licensed and ordained by New Brunswick Presbytery in 1832, and became assistant instructor of the Hebrew and the Greek text of the Bible, in the Princeton Theological Seminary; in 1835 he was appointed Associate Professor, and in 1840 sole Professor of Biblical and Oriental Literature; in 1851 he was transferred to the chair of Biblical and Ecclesiastical History; and in 1859, at his own request, he was assigned the department of Hellenistic Greek and New Testament Literature. The main business of his life was with the Holy Bible, giving to theological research and instruction all the energies of his massive intellect.

Dr. Alexander's gigantic mind was in full vigor until the day before his death. On the morning of that day he was occupied with his usual course of polyglot reading in the Bible, being accustomed to read the Scriptures in some six different languages, as part of his daily devotions. He seems also to have entertained himself, during some part of the day, with one of the Greek classics, Herodotus, as a pencil mark on the margin, "January 27th, 1860," is said to show. In the afternoon of that day he rode out in the open air for the first time since his attack of hemorrhage. During that ride, however, which was not continued more than forty-five minutes, a sudden sinking of life came on him, so much so that he was borne almost entirely by the help of others from the carriage. The sinking continued all Friday night, and on Saturday he was hardly conscious of anything until he died. His death was perfectly calm, without a struggle, without one heaving breath. His death occurred in his study, January, 27th, 1860.

Dr. Alexander's preaching was attractive through the beauty, and often the eloquence, of the composition, though not accompanied with any of the arts of elocution, unless such as are found in a melodious voice and earnest manner. His sermons were sure to be original, evangelic, forcible, elegant and tending to practical effect upon the conscience. He was a frequent contributor to the Princeton Review, and for a time served with Professor Dod as its editor. As an author he took high rank. A volume of his fragmentary "Notes on New Testament Literature and Ecclesiastical History" was posthumously published in 1861. In 1851 appeared his "Psalms Translated and Explained," in three volumes. In 1857 "The Acts of the Apostles Explained," in two volumes. In 1858 "The Gospel, According to Mark, Explained," in one volume. The Commentary on Matthew was unfinished at his death, but so much as he had prepared was published in 1861, as the last work on which his pen was engaged.

Alexander, Samuel Davies, D.D., the fifth son of Dr. Archibald Alexander, was born at Princeton, N. J., May 3d, 1819, and graduated at the College of New Jersey, in 1838. At first he studied civil engineering, but afterwards decided to devote himself to the ministry, and entered the Princeton Theological Seminary. He was licensed to preach in 1847, and in 1848 was pastor of the church at Port Richmond, Philadelphia. He accepted a call to the Village Church at Freehold, New Jersey, in 1850, and continued in that charge till 1855, when he removed to the City of New York, and became pastor of the Fifteenth Street Church, now the Phillips Church, where he has ever since remained, laboring with faithfulness and success. Dr. Alexander is the author of the article on the "Editions of the Pilgrim's Progress," in the volume of the Princeton Review for 1859.

Alexander, Stephen, LL.D., was born in Schenectady, N. Y., September 1st, 1806. He was graduated at Union College in 1821, and subsequently at Princeton Theological Seminary, where he received license to preach. He became a Tutor in Princeton College in 1833, and was connected with that institution until his decease. In the year following his appointment as Tutor he was made adjunct Professor of Mathematics, and in 1840 was made Professor of Astronomy, a position created in that year. On the death of Dr. Albert D. Dod, in 1845, he was made Professor of Mathematics, and in 1851 he was appointed Professor of Mechanical Philosophy and Astronomy. In 1862 he was made Professor of Natural Philosophy and Astronomy; and in 1873, astronomy having become so important a factor in the course, he was relieved from philosophical work and made Professor of Astronomy, a position he held until 1877, when he retired from the active exercise of his duties, being appointed Professor Emeritus, and was succeeded by Professor Charles A. Young, who was called to the chair from Dartmouth College. In 1860 he went to the coast of Labrador at the head of a Government Astronomical Expedition to observe the eclipse of July 18th. Nine years later he was with an expedition to the Rocky Mountains to observe the solar eclipse of August of that year.

He was the author of numerous papers on astronomy, mathematics, and kindred subjects, which attracted much attention both in this country and in Europe. Among the best known of these were "Physical Phenomena Attendant upon Solar Eclipses;" "Fundamental Principles of Mathematics;" "Origin of the Forms and the Present Condition (1850) of some of the Clusters of the Stars and Several of the Nebulae, Form and Equatorial Diameters of the Asteroid Planets;" "Harmonies in the Arrangement of the Solar System which seem to be Confirmatory of the Nebular Hypothesis of La Place." He received the degree of LL.D., from Columbia College. He was one of the founders of the National Academy of Science, and a member of the American Philosophical Society, of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, and of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, of which he was president in 1859. He was the possessor of remarkable oratorical and rhetorical powers in middle life, and full of the true poetic spirit. The present advanced position of Princeton in astronomical science and research is due in great measure to his enthusiasm and energy. For several years the aged astronomer had devoted his leisure hours to the study of the heavens, from a small observatory in the rear of his residence, and there he observed the recent transit of Venus.

Professor Alexander died at his residence in Princeton, June 25th, 1883. He was a secluded student, unworldly in the tone of his character, pure minded, gentle, always influential for good. He was a sincere and thoroughly devout Christian man, and for this reason was a power among the students with whom he came in contact. For many years he was an elder in the Presbyterian Church.

Alexander, William, D.D., was born near Shirkleysburg, Huntingdon county, Pa., December 18th, 1831. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1858, at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1861, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Huntingdon, in April, 1860, after which he supplied the church in Hollidaysburg for five months, during the temporary absence of the pastor, Rev. D. X. Junkin, D.D. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Northumberland, and installed over the church of Lycoming, in the west end of Williamsport, Pa., June 10th, 1862. In 1863, he accepted the Presidency of Carroll College, Waukesha, Wis., and during his incumbency supplied the church at that place. He was pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Beloit, Wis., 1865-9, and in this position he exercised large influence over the whole Presbyterian Church of that section. He was pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in San Jose, Cal., 1869-71. In June, 1871, he took charge of "The City College" in San Francisco. In October of that year he took a leading part in founding the San Francisco Theological Seminary, in which he was chosen Professor of New Testament Literature and Exegesis. In 1876 he was transferred to the chair of Ecclesiastical History and Church Government, which he still retains.

Dr. Alexander has published several sermons, and written largely, and with great force, for the secular and religious press. He is justly regarded as one of the ablest men in the Presbyterian Church, and for accurate and profound scholarship occupies the highest rank upon the Pacific coast. As a preacher he is plain and practical, with the rare faculty of handling profound themes in an easy and simple manner. As a teacher he is sociable and pleasant with the students, always commanding their respect, confidence, and good will. As a controversialist he is strong in argument and master of logic. As a writer his peculiar characteristic is vigor, with a fine adaptation of style to the subject under discussion.

Alexander, Rev. Samuel Carothers, was born in Huntingdon County, Pa., April 7th, 1833, and is the second son of Randall and Sarah (Carothers) Alexander. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pennsylvania, in 1858, and entered the Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C., the same year, completing his professional studies in 1861. In December, of the same year, he was ordained and installed pastor of the Steele Creek Church in North Carolina, by the Presbytery of Concord. He subsequently entered upon missionary work for the freedmen at Charlotte, N. C., becoming one of the first and principal actors in founding Biddle Memorial University. He continued his work there until June, 1871, when he returned to his native State, and for the last ten years has been pastor of the Upper Path Valley Presbyterian Church, in the Presbytery of Carlisle. Mr. Alexander possesses a dignity of bearing, combined with a frankness of manner, that win for him the respect and fellowship of all the members of his community. He is unassuming, never seeking the praise of men, and yet, by his sincerity, generosity and kindness, he receives, without bidding, the encomiums of all who know him. In the pulpit he is strong, vigorous and fearless. His discourses contain wholesome and substantial food, and awaken thought and reflection. His style is animated and forcible, and his manner modest and dignified.

Alison, Francis, D.D., was born in the parish of Lae, County of Donegal, Ireland, in the year 1705. He came as a probationer to this country, in 1734 or '35. On the recommendation of Franklin, he was employed by John Dickinson, of Delaware, the author of the "Farmer's Letters," as the tutor of his son. Leave to take a few other pupils was granted, and he is said to have had an academy at Thunder Hill, Maryland. He was ordained pastor of New London, by New Castle Presbytery, before May, 1737. In 1749 he was invited to take charge of the Philadelphia Academy. This institution was incorporated in 1750, endowed in 1753, and erected into a college in 1755, at which time Mr. Alison was appointed its Vice Provost and Professor of Moral Philosophy.

He was also assistant minister of the First Presbyterian Church. Both these positions he filled with acknowledged fidelity and success. In 1758 he received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from the University of Glasgow. He was the first of our ministers who received that honor, and the Synod of Philadelphia returned their thanks, for the favor, to the University.

On the union of the Synods, May 24th, 1758, Dr. Alison preached from Ephesians iv, 4-7, and the sermon was published, with the title, "Peace and Union Recommended." He went with Colonel Burd, as chaplain to the expedition to Fort Cumberland, and remained from August to November. Together with Gilbert Tennent and the Presbyterians generally, who were headed by Chief Justice Allen (father-in-law of Governor John Penn), he opposed the throwing off the Proprietary Government, and, as a reward for his services in that matter, Richard Penn gave him the splendid tract of one thousand acres at the confluence of the Bald Eagle with the West Branch of the Susquehanna. He was the efficient agent in the establishment of the Widows' Fund in our Church, and was wisely active in the convention with the Connecticut ministers to withstand the gradual but determined innovations of Churchmen and the Crown on our liberties as citizens and Christians. He died, November 28th, 1779, aged seventy-four, and set free his slaves by his will.

Bishop White, who was a student in the College of Philadelphia while Dr. Alison was a Professor in it, says of him in his Memoirs: "He was a man of unquestionable ability in his department, of real and rational piety, of a liberal mind; his failing was a proneness to anger, but it was soon forgotten, for he was placable and affable." President Stiles pronounced him "the greatest classical scholar in America, especially in Greek," and "in Ethics, History and general reading, a great literary character." And Dr. Ewing, in his funeral sermon, said: "He was truly a scribe well instructed unto the Kingdom of Heaven, a workman that needed not to be ashamed, for he rightly divided the Word of Truth, and was peculiarly skillful in giving to every one his portion in due season."

Alison, Rev. Hector, was ordained by New Castle Presbytery, in 1746, probably at White Clay. In 1750 he was sent for eight Sabbaths to Western Virginia, and seems to have labored in that region for some time. He was settled at Drawyers from 1753 to 1758. In 1760 he went as Chaplain to the Pennsylvania forces, and in answer to a very pressing application made to the Synod in May, of that year, by the English Presbyterian gentlemen in Albany, he was directed to act as a supply in that place till July. He joined New Castle Presbytery after the union in 1761, and was released in a little time from his charge at Appoquiniminy. A call was received by him from Baltimore, but the proposal was so unsatisfactory that it was not accepted. In December, 1761, he was dismissed from the Presbytery, probably with a view to join South Carolina Presbytery, and settled at Williamsburg, South Carolina.

Allen, Diarca Howe, D. D., was born in Lebanon, N. H., July 8th, 1808. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1829, and studied theology at Andover Seminary in 1829-1830 and 1832-1833. He was teacher in Charleston, S. C., 1830-1832. He was Professor in Marietta College, in 1833-1840; Professor of Sacred Rhetoric in Lane Seminary, 1840-1851; Professor of Systematic Theology, 1851-1867, and Emeritus Professor till his death, which occurred at Granville, O., November 9th, 1870. Dr. Allen was an eminent scholar, and filled all the positions he occupied with great advantage to the Church and credit to himself.

Allen, David Oliver, D. D., the son of Moses and Mehitable Allen, was born in Barre, Mass., September 11th, 1799; graduated at Amherst College in 1823; studied theology at Andover Seminary, and was ordained May 21st, 1827. On the 6th of June he embarked for Calcutta, where he arrived September 21st. In a month he proceeded to Bombay, where he labored several years in preaching and establishing schools. He was the first American Missionary to establish a station at Ahmednuggur, in 1831, where he spent several years. After this he was engaged in making extensive tours in Western India, preaching, distributing Bibles, Tracts, &c. In 1843 he took charge of the printing establishment at Bombay. This constituted for some ten years a very important agency in Missionary operations in Western India. It employed, part of this time, one hundred persons, mostly natives, and the number of pages printed increased from one million and a half, in 1843, to near twelve millions in 1852. The works printed were portions of Scripture translated, religious tracts, school books, &c. Dr. Allen was the Author of several very useful tracts in the Mahratta language. He also translated portions of the Old Testament, and superintended a revised and corrected edition of the whole Scripture into Mahratta, which was a great work.

Dr. Allen's physicians, in view of his impaired health, advised him to return to America, which he did, in 1853. After a year's rest, he prepared the History of India, Ancient and Modern, a work which was very favorably received by the press, both in this country and in England. From 1856 to 1860 he preached in different places; one year at Westport, Mass., and nearly two years at Wendham. His style of preaching was plain and practical—more instructive than rhetorical. He died July 17th, 1863.

Allen, Rev. Moses, was born in Northampton, Mass.; was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick February 1st, 1771, and on March 10th, 1775, he was ordained at Charleston, S. C., and installed pastor of an Independent Church at Wappetaw. In 1777 he resigned his charge and removed to Liberty County, Ga., where he took charge of the Midway Presbyterian Church; but the next year his congregation was dispersed and his church burned. He entered the army as chaplain; was taken prisoner, and in attempting to escape, by swimming from the prison-ship in which he was confined, was drowned, February 8th, 1779. The friends of independence admired Mr. Allen for his popular talents, his courage, and his many virtues. He was an eminently pious man.

Allen, Richard H., D. D., was born in Greensburg, Ky., May 11th, 1821. He was educated at Centre College, Danville, Ky.; graduated at the Law School, and was admitted to the bar in St. Louis, Mo., in 1844. In September, 1847, he was licensed by the Presbytery of Upper Missouri to preach the gospel; was called to succeed Dr. Hiram P. Goodrich in the church at Jefferson City, Mo., the capital of the State, and was ordained the following November as pastor of that church. In this position he remained only two years. Having an earnest desire to enter the great and destitute field around him, as an evangelist, for which he was peculiarly fitted, he devoted himself to home missionary work in the counties of Upper Missouri. He stopped not to consult with flesh and blood, nor to ask aid of any Missionary Board, but purchased a horse, filled one side of his saddlebags with Bibles and tracts, and started out as an evangelist, preaching wherever God in His providence opened the way. In this new and important field of operation his labors were signally blessed. On Castile Creek, in DeKalb County, some twenty miles east of the now flourishing city of St. Joseph, were a few Presbyterians in the midst of a godless community. Dr. Allen went and preached to them, in the log house of a pious widow woman, for two weeks. From this visit the Castile Church grew, and stands now a power for good in that community.

Dr. Allen was settled in Jeffersonville and Lafayette, Ind., nine years. In 1861 he went to New Orleans, and commenced a new enterprise, the success of which was cut short by the war. He was then called to the Second Presbyterian Church of Nashville, Tenn., in connection with the Old School Assembly, North. In 1867 he was called to the pastorate of the old Pine Street Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, in which his success, for some thirteen years, was marked and gratifying. He resigned this charge in order to become Secretary of the Assembly's Board for Freedmen, and is devoting his best energies to this cause with an ardor which is greatly promotive of its prosperity.

Allen, Robert Welch, D. D., son of James and Elizabeth (Logan) Allen, was born in Shelby county, Kentucky, March 25th, 1817. He received his collegiate instruction in Wabash College, from which he was graduated in 1839. In November, 1839, he entered Princeton Seminary, with the intention of going through the full course, but his health failing, he was compelled to leave at the end of the second year. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Crawfordsville, Indiana, August 15th, 1841, and ordained by the same Presbytery, September 30th, 1843, having spent the intervening time as stated supply of several churches. He was installed pastor of the churches of Jefferson and Frankford, Indiana, June, 1844, and remained in that charge for nine years, until September, 1853, when the pastoral relation was dissolved. Receiving a call from the Pisgah Church, near Lexington, Kentucky, he entered that field, and labored there with great acceptance until April, 1857, when he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church of Jacksonville, Illinois. This pastorate he held for more than eleven years, until September, 1868. He then spent a year (1868-'69) in missionary labor in the vicinity of Decatur, Illinois; was stated supply of the Church of St. Charles, Missouri, from September, 1869, to December, 1870. Returning to Jacksonville, he supplied the churches of Union and Murrayville for two years, until the Union Church and part of the Pisgah Church were organized into a new church called "Unity," over which he was installed November 2d, 1873. This relation continued until his death.

His health attended Mr. Allen's labors through his ministerial life, yet the Lord owned his service in such a manner that he did not run in vain nor labor in vain. Frequent revivals attended his efforts, and he was often called upon to aid his brethren in protracted meetings. Having a fine personal presence, a dignified manner, and a clear, commanding voice, he seldom failed to produce a deep impression. His mind was strong, vigorous and analytic. As an expositor of divine truth he was especially clear, able and forcible, always holding forth the word of life, and presenting Christ crucified as the only hope of a perishing world. He died of nervous prostration, at Jacksonville, Illinois, July 29th, 1882, in his sixty-sixth year.

Allison, James, D. D., was born in Pittsburg, September 27th, 1823, and reared near Bakerstown, in the northern part of Allegheny County, Pa. He graduated at Jefferson College in the Fall of 1845, at the Western Theological Seminary in the Spring of 1848, and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Allegheny, October 6th, 1847. After serving as stated supply, for some months, of the Church of Sewickley, twelve miles below Pittsburg, he was ordained and installed its pastor, October 16th, 1849, and continued in this relation until February, 1861, when he resigned, to become one of the editors and proprietors of the Presbyterian Banner. During his pastorate the finest church edifice outside of Pittsburgh, in Allegheny County, was erected, and two hundred and seventy-seven were added on confession of faith, and two hundred and thirty-one by letter.

While yet a student in College he began to write for the newspaper press. In 1853 he became the Pittsburg correspondent of the Presbyterian Banner, then published in Philadelphia, and became associate editor after its removal to Pittsburg, in 1855, and was one of its proprietors, having the late David McKinney, D. D., and Stephen Little for his partners, from 1856 to 1863. In January, 1864, he purchased the Banner for himself and Robert Patterson, Esq.,

JAMES ALLISON, D. D.

and assumed control February 3d, of that year. He participated largely in the Declaration and Testimony controversy; was among the first signers of the paper prepared at the meeting of the Old School General Assembly at Newark, N. J., in 1864, asking for reunion between the Old and New School Churches on the basis of the "Standards," and proposed, after the meeting of the Old School General Assembly in Albany, and of the New School General Assembly in Harrisburg, when negotiations seemed about to fail, that the friends of reunion should unite in a declaration for reunion simply on the basis of the "Standards." This led to the issuing of the "Pittsburg Circular," which was mostly written by him, and which was followed by reunion the next year. Dr. Allison has been a member of the Presbyterian Board for Freedmen, from its organization in 1865, and its Treasurer, without charge, from 1870. He is a gentleman of much energy of character, genial in spirit, a vigorous writer, an excellent preacher, and an influential member of the Church judicatories.

Allison, Joseph, LL D., furnishes in his career, remarkably successful as he has been, an instance of what may be accomplished by well directed efforts. Judge Allison was born at Harrisburg, Pa., August 31st, 1819, his parents being connected with the Presbyterian Church of that place, of which the Rev. William R. DeWitt was then pastor. After the study of the law at the State Capital, he was in due time admitted to the Bar. From his earliest entrance upon the active duties of the legal profession he gave ample evidence of future promise and distinction. He soon removed to Philadelphia, settling down in the old district of Spring Garden. Though naturally of very modest deportment, he soon rose in public estimation. Before he had resided three years within their municipality the Commissioners appointed him to the office of Solicitor of the District. He continued to serve in this capacity with credit to himself and satisfaction to the people, until, by the partiality of the voters of the city and county of Philadelphia, he was elected an Associate Judge. This occurred in 1851. After serving the full term in this position, he was thrice successively elected a Judge of the Court of Common Pleas. He has thus served thirty-three years on the bench, during which he has made for himself a reputation for purity of motives, faithful and fearless discharge of duty and thoroughness of legal erudition, that ranks him among the foremost jurists of the Commonwealth.

JOSEPH ALLISON, LL.D.

In private and social life Judge Allison is courteous, affable and entirely free from affectation. Possessed of a high order of intellect, shrewd and keen witted, his society is much sought, especially by the legal fraternity. As a judge he is conscientious and incorruptible, yet his tact and natural kind-heartedness are so admirably blended in the discharge of his official duties, that the most incorrigible criminal, whilst smarting under the rod of public justice administered by his hand, is forced to revere the power by which it is wielded.

Judge Allison has long been an exemplary, honored and useful elder of the Walnut Street Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, and gives the influence of his name and presence to great moral movements on behalf of the human race. Liberal in his Christian spirit, he is yet specially active in promoting the prosperity of the Church in which he was born and reared, and in which he is held in the highest esteem. He is a member of the Board of Publication and a Trustee of the General Assembly. He was a member of the Assembly in Cleveland in 1856, of the Assembly in Syracuse in 1861, and of the Assembly in Chicago in 1877. In all the boards and judicatories of the Church in which he appears he exerts a strong influence. As one of the fraternal delegates from the New School Assembly to the Old School Assembly, which met in Newark, N. J., in 1864, he urged the union of the two branches of the severed Church, with an ardor and eloquence which gave one of the earliest and most effective impulses toward the consummation not long afterward so happily reached.

Allison, Patrick, D. D., was born in Franklin, (or what was then known as Lancaster) county, Pa., in the year 1740. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, in 1760. Shortly after he left the University he commenced his theological studies, but in 1761 was appointed Professor in the Academy at Newark, Delaware, which office he accepted. He was licensed to preach by the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia, in March, 1763. In August of that year, he was invited to a church in Baltimore, and in 1765 was ordained its pastor, in which relation he continued for thirty-five years, till his death, which took place August 21st, 1802.

Dr. Allison was noted for his ardent patriotism, his blameless character, his dignified deportment, and his fine scholarship. He was especially eminent in the judicatories of the Church, and in all public bodies, being possessed of great penetration, the utmost self-control, and an admirable command of thought and language, the most appropriate and elegant. As a preacher, though his manner was not very attractive, his discourses were marked with much ability, being generally didactic, often profoundly argumentative. He published little, but that little, which was of a polemical nature, was weighty and trenchant. It was one of his dying injunctions, that all his manuscript sermons should be committed to the flames; otherwise, doubtless, there might have been a selection made from them for the press, which would have done honor to our American pulpit.

> Alrichs, Rev. William Picclees, was born in Wilmington, Del., in August, 1799. He graduated at the College of New Jersey, in 1824. He was stated supply at New Castle, Del., 1828-29, and at Pigeon Creek. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Washington, in 1831. He was stated supply at East Buffalo, Pa., 1830-1861, and Professor of Mathematics, Mechanics and Astronomy in Washington College, Pa., 1830-1860. He died at Winterset, Ia., December 31st, 1869. Prof. Alrichs was an able and faithful preacher, and stood high in the departments of science which he taught.

Anderson, Rev. Isaac, was born in Rockbridge County, Va., March 26th, 1780. Having prepared himself for the ministry, he was licensed to preach the gospel by Union Presbytery, in May, 1802, and in the Autumn following was installed pastor of Washington Church, Knox County, Tenn. Here he labored for about nine years, during which time he also performed much missionary service, which was attended with signal success. In the Spring of 1811 he was called to the New Providence Church, Maryville, took charge of it the next autumn, and there performed the principal part of the labors of his life. The Southwest Theological Seminary, at Maryville, was established chiefly through his instrumentality, and for many years enjoyed the benefit of his labors as a teacher. He died, January 28th, 1857. Mr. Anderson was a man of commanding powers, of glowing zeal, and untiring and successful industry.

Anderson, Rev. James, was born in Scotland, November 17th, 1678, and was ordained by Irvine Presbytery, November 17th, 1708, with a view to his settlement in Virginia. He arrived in the Rappahannock, April 23d, 1709, but the state of things not warranting his stay, he came northward, and was received by the Presbytery, September 20th. He settled at New Castle, Del. In 1717 he accepted a call to a congregation in New York, which, at the time, was worshiping in the City Hall. September 24th, 1726, he received a call to Donegal, on the Susquehanna, and accepted it. He was installed the last Wednesday in August, 1727. In September, 1729, he began to give every fifth Sabbath to the people on Swatara, and joined the congregation of Derry. In April, 1738, the Presbytery decided to ask the Synod to send a deputation to wait on the Virginia Government, and solicit its favor in behalf of Presbyterianism there. The Synod wrote to the Governor, and sent Mr. Anderson to bear the letter, providing supplies for his pulpit, and allowing for his expenses "in a manner suitable to his design." This mission he performed satisfactorily. He died July 16th, 1744.

Anderson, John, D. D., was born in Guilford county, North Carolina, on the 10th of April, 1767. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Orange, North Carolina, in the year 1791, and shortly afterwards was ordained as an evangelist. After laboring two years in the southern part of North Carolina, and the northern part of South Carolina; from 1793 to 1798 or '99, he itinerated, amid many privations and dangers, through the States of Tennessee and Kentucky, sometimes crossing the Ohio, and preaching to the settlements in what is now Ohio and Indiana. In 1801 he began his labors in Upper Buffalo Church, Washington county, Pennsylvania, and was installed as its pastor the next year, a relation which he held with great acceptance and usefulness, until it was dissolved by his own request, on account of declining health, January 15th, 1833.

Dr. Anderson conducted the theological education of a large number of young men, some of whom rose to eminence in the Church. He was one, if not of the originators, at least of the most active members of the old Board of Trustees of the Western Missionary Society, and under its direction he made several tours to the Wyandotte Indians, on the Sandusky river. He was also largely instrumental in founding the mission on the Maumee, and visited it once, in company with the Rev. E. Maerdy, with a view to settle some existing difficulties. After the transfer of that station to the United Foreign Missionary Society he became one of the most efficient supporters of that Society, and subsequently of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions into which it was merged. In forming the present General Assembly's Board of Foreign Missions, at Pittsburg, in 1831, he took a most lively interest, and extended to it his cordial, and active support till the close of his life, which occurred January 5th, 1855.

Anderson, Samuel, C., Esq., was a ruling elder in the "College" Church at Hampden Sidney, Va., in which village are located both Hampden Sidney College and Union Theological Seminary, the two institutions existing under separate corporations. He was elected an elder in August, 1831, and continued in this office till his death, in April, 1865. The inscription on his tomb is a brief epitome of his honorable life, and is as follows: "IN MEMORY OF Sam'l C. Anderson. Born in Cumberland County, Va., 23d July, 1788. Died 15th April, 1865. In 1812 a soldier of his country. From 1813 an eloquent advocate. And from 1828 a devout Christian. He was four years thereafter a legislator for his State; thirty-eight years a trustee of Hampden Sidney College, and for thirty-three years an elder of the College Church, and a faithful defender of Christ's truth. In the highest as in the lowest courts of his Church he filled every station honorably."

Anderson, Samuel James Pierce, D.D., was born in Prince Edward county, Va., Dec. 5, 1811. The early years of his life were spent in the country, on the farm of his father, where, at a village school, and with the aid of a tutor at home, he was prepared for college. In 1831 he went to the University of Ohio, at Athens, and afterwards to Hanover College, Indiana, where he graduated in 1835. His theological course was pursued at Union Theological Seminary, Va., where, under the training of the excellent men who were then in charge of that institution, he was fitted for the ministry. The first charge of Dr. Anderson was at Danville, Va., where he remained five years, the pastor of a large and constantly increasing congregation. From Danville he removed to Norfolk, Va., where he soon took rank as one of the ablest and most effective preachers in that State—so famous for its preachers. After remaining five years at Norfolk, he was called to St. Louis, and in 1851 was engaged as the pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church in that city. At the time that Dr. Anderson took charge of the church it was far from being in a prosperous condition. It was yet in its infancy, few in numbers, embarrassed with debt, and greatly afflicted by the death of its first pastor, Rev. Alexander Van Court, of precious memory! The task before him was a difficult one; but, by faithful preaching and earnest work, and the blessing of God, he was enabled to accomplish it with success. Under his ministry the church grew steadily, was increased by considerable accessions from time to time, until it became, at length, one of the largest and most influential churches in the city. It is not too much to say of Dr. Anderson that he was, in his day, a man of eminent usefulness and power in the ministry. He was a preacher of marked ability—earnest, evangelical and eloquent. He was a man of fine scholarship, large reading, and almost faultless taste; his mind was richly stored, not only with Biblical, but also with historical and classical learning, and the whole was laid under contribution to the pulpit. His sermons were not only sound and able, as expositions of gospel truth, but they were usually finished productions as they came from his hand, abounding in happy illustration, delivered in a pleasing, captivating style, and with a voice the richness and sweetness of whose tones lent a charm to every word that he uttered. Dr. Anderson died September 10th, 1873. His death was one of peace and resignation. The last enemy was disarmed of its terrors to him. Nay, rather, he was waiting for death, waiting for it more than they that wait for the morning.

Anderson, Samuel McCulloch, D.D., was born December 18th, 1823, in Butler county, Pa., and graduated at Washington College in 1846. He studied theology at the Western Theological Seminary, and was licensed to preach the gospel April 8th, 1851. In the same year he took charge of the church at Fredericksburg, O., where he continued till compelled by ill health to resign, in April, 1859. The Summer of that year he spent on a farm; and feeling himself able to resume pastoral duty in the Autumn, he accepted a call to the church of Davenport, Ia. In this charge he continued till the winter of 1869, when he took charge of the church in Hamilton, O. Dr. Anderson is at present pastor of the church at El Dorado, Kan. He is the author of an essay on "Miracles" which appeared in the Princeton Review in 1863.

Anderson, William C., D. D., son of the Rev. John Anderson, D. D., was born August 18th, 1804, in Washington county, Pa. He graduated from Washington College, in the Class of 1821, pursued his theological studies under the instruction of his father, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Washington, December 13th, 1827. The first year of his ministry was spent in the bounds of what became the Presbyteries of Washington, Steubenville, Wooster and Richland. From October, 1828, until July, 1829, he was missionary of the General Assembly's Board in North Carolina, and preached at Wilksborough, Forks of Yadkin, and the Mountain. September 1st, as agent of that Board, he entered on the work of visiting the churches in the bounds of the Synod of Pittsburg. In the same capacity he again visited the South, laboring in North and South Carolina, Alabama and Mississippi. Resigning this agency, he commenced preaching at Pigeon Creek, Pa., November 1st, 1831. In June, 1836, he accepted the General Agency of the Western Foreign Missionary Society for the Mississippi Valley.

In the Spring of 1837 Dr. Anderson preached for a time to the Fourth Church, Pittsburg, Pa., and in February, 1839, became pastor of the First Church, New Albany, Ind. After spending some time abroad, for his health, in April, 1843, he accepted the Professorship of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres in Hanover College. In 1844 he preached for a time at Fort Wayne, Ind., afterwards supplied the pulpit of the Church at Washington, Pa., and in November, 1845, accepted a call to the Church at Dayton, Ohio. On his return from another visit abroad, he became President of Miami University, from 1849 to 1854. Subsequently he preached at Chillicothe, Ohio, and in 1855 accepted a call from the First Church of San Francisco, Cal., retaining the pastorate until 1863, when he returned east, and preached for a time to the First Church of Cincinnati, then to the Church of New Albany, and then, occasionally, at Abilene, Manhattan, etc., Kansas. He died August 28th, 1870, at Junction City, Kansas. Dr. Anderson was a gentleman of very pleasing address, able and popular as a preacher, successful in his ministry, and highly esteemed in the communities in which he labored.

Andrews, Rev. Jedediah, was born at Hingham, Mass., July 7th, 1674. He graduated at Harvard in 1695. In 1698 he came to Philadelphia, and preached in a building which had been used as a storeroom by the "Barbadoes Company," on the northwest corner of Chestnut and Second streets, in this city. He was probably ordained in the Fall of 1701, for his "Record of Baptisms and Marriages" begins 1701, tenth month, fourteenth day. In 1704 his congregation left their first place of worship, and erected a frame building on the south side of Market (then Buttonwood) street, between Second and Third streets, the first, and for many years the only Presbyterian Church in the city. The church is said to have been, in some sense, Congregational, but it was represented by elders in Presbytery from the first.

In September, 1733, Mr. Andrews preferred a request to the Synod that he should be allowed an assistant in the ministry. The congregation could not agree in the choice of an assistant, the preference of some being for Jonathan Dickinson, and of others for Robert Cross; but, while the matter was in debate, the friends of the latter asked of the Synod that they might be erected into a new congregation, and authorized to call a minister for themselves. Their request was granted, by a large majority, with the understanding that they were not obliged to form a distinct society, but might do so, if, upon mature reflection, they thought best. The commission met in June, 1736. The endeavors to effect a re-union of the congregation having been unsuccessful, they persuaded the friends of Robert Cross to make a further effort, and Mr. Andrews heartily approved of the design, but his friends would not consent to it. The new congregation had various supplies until 1737, when Robert Cross accepted their call. The two congregations were then united, and were allowed fifty pounds out of the funds of the Synod, to buy a burying ground. Mr. Andrews was recording clerk of the Presbytery and of the Synod as long as he lived. He died in 1747.

Andrews, Silas Milton, D. D., son of George and Catharine (Barr) Andrews, was born March 11th, 1805, in Back Creek Congregation, Rowan County, N. C. He was graduated from the University of North Carolina, at Chapel Hill, A. D. 1826; taught a classical school in his native place one and a half years; was for another one and a half years Tutor in the University of North Carolina; entered Princeton Seminary in the Fall of 1828; and was regularly graduated in the Fall of 1831. He was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery, February 2d, 1831; ordained by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, at Doylestown, Pa., November 16th, 1831, and on the same day installed pastor of the Church of Doylestown and Deep Run. This was his one, uninterrupted, and only charge from that day until his death, a period of forty-nine years and four months. Here he labored steadily, industriously, with marked ability, sound judgment and rare devotion to his one work, concentrating all his efforts on his charge, and taking very little part in outside affairs, gathering in from time to time large numbers of converts, and training and edifying his people in the way of truth, holiness and duty. For the first seventeen years of his pastorate he also conducted a private classical school, in addition to performing his ministerial duties. He died March 7th, 1881.

Dr. Andrews was a quiet, unassuming man, averse to all pretension and ostentation. He possessed excellent scholarship, a well-balanced mind, rare good judgment, and was a Scriptural and impressive preacher. From October 15th, 1848, until the Re-union in 1870, when he declined a re-election, he was Stated Clerk of the Synod of Philadelphia, the duties of which office he was admirably qualified to fulfill by his accuracy, his methodical carefulness, and his fine penmanship. He was held in high respect and warm regard by all who knew him.

Andrus, Rev. Alpheus Newell, was born in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., July 17th, 1843, and graduated at Williams College in 1861. After graduating at the Union Theological Seminary, New York city, in 1867, he remained almost a year as a resident graduate. He was ordained February 23d, 1868. On April 25th of that year Mr. Andrus sailed for Turkey, as a missionary of the A. B. C. F. M. He was assigned to the Eastern Turkey mission, and to the Mardin Station of the field, which, after a brief stay at Kharpoat Station, he reached November 29th. His home is still there, although in the meantime he has resided for a time in other places, as circumstances have required. Mardin is the central station of a large field, and since Mr. Andrus has been connected with the station, the work has grown to double the amount that was being done in it in 1868. The larger portion of his time has been devoted to the preparation of young men for the gospel ministry. Amidst many trials and difficulties, he is very zealous and faithful in his efforts to turn the thoughts and desires of the oppressed ones among whom he labors toward the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ. In writing to a friend in this country, in 1882, he says: "I hope to live at least twenty years longer in these parts, for I believe they will be full of change, and hope, and progress."

Annan, Rev. William, a member of the Presbytery of Allegheny, was born in 1805. He was a graduate of Dickinson College and of Princeton Seminary; was pastor of the churches of Kishacoquillas and Little Valley, Pennsylvania, from 1831 to 1835, and of the church of Sewickley, Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania, from 1836 to 1838, and was editor of the Presbyterian Advocate, of which the Presbyterian Banner is the continuance, from 1838 to 1855. He was a keen controversialist, always ready to utter his convictions, and resolute in his defence of them. He was the author of some books in which topics of interest at the time were discussed, and he treated every subject he took in hand with great vigor and thoroughness. He was an ardent Presbyterian and Calvinist, and was always ready to give a reason for the faith that was in him. A bold defender of the truth, a devout Christian as well; he loved the Church he served, but loved Christ supremely, and strove to live for the higher interests of men. His last years were spent in retirement. He died at his home in Allegheny, Pennsylvania, June 26th, 1882, going down to the grave in a firm and blessed hope of eternal life through Christ Jesus his Lord.

Antrim (N. H.) Presbyterian Church. For many years there was no religious meeting of any kind in Antrim. The first sermon in the town was preached September, 1775, in Deacon Aiken's barn, which stood about half way between the old Aiken house and the barn, now Mr. Gove's. The speaker, Rev. William Davidson, of Londonderry, was a gray old divine, a dull preacher, but an affectionate and holy man. He was personally acquainted with those whom he was addressing, for they were the children that had grown up about him in his long ministry at home. The rough-clad settlers, the hardy wives in their homespun, ribbonless as Eve was in Eden, and barefooted children, made up the group, seated on rough planks and bits of logs, or leaning against the hay-mow, listening, hushed and reverent, to the words of life. Fittingly they worshiped Him who was born in a manger "where the horned oxen fed."

In the two next years, 1776 and 1777, nothing was paid for preaching, as far as is known, but two or three times each Summer they met to listen to some neighboring minister that came among them; yet in these and preceding years they were not negligent of religious things. They taught their children at home. The Bible and the Catechism were the chief literature in every house. They kept the Sabbath with great reverence. Nobody could even walk the rough paths of the forest without being liable to be called in question for breaking the day of God. Having no trash to read, or for their children to read, they studied over and over the Holy Book, and came to hold its great doctrines rigidly and intelligently; yet they longed for a stated preaching of the Word, and at their first March meeting, 1778, voted thirty-two dollars for that purpose, and in July of the same year voted one hundred dollars more. This, considering their feebleness and their poverty, was a very generous outlay. It would be about like nine thousand a year for Antrim now.

From this time till 1800, twenty-two years, they had no settled minister, but such supplies for a part of each year as they could get here and there; yet it seems that when they had no minister they went on with the service without him, inasmuch as the town voted, 1782, that Daniel Nichols, a smart young man of the place, should "read the Psalm on Sabbath days, and all other days when public service is attended." In 1780, eight years before there was any church organization, and five years before there was any church building, the town voted a call to Rev. James Miltimore, which he declined, though he preached here part of each summer for five years. Services were held in the settlers' houses, in barns and in the open air. In the Spring of 1785 the town voted that public worship for that year should be at Daniel Miltimore's, now Mr. Whiteley's; and there it was that, when the little dwelling was crowded full, the flooring gave way and dropped them, furniture, minister and all, into the cellar! In 1781 a committee was appointed to make the necessary arrangements for building a meeting house, and on June 28th, 1785, the frame was raised, and the house was completed near the close of 1792, it taking nearly eight years to struggle through to this result.

The church in Antrim was organized August 2d, 1788. The old records call it the "Church of Christ in Antrim." Rev. William Morrison came here by Direction of the Presbytery of Londonderry, organized the church, and ordained James Aiken, Isaac Cochran and Jonathan Nesmith as "ruling elders and deacons." The original members of the church were seventy-two. Mr. Morrison came here every year, baptized children, received members and preached. He exercised a loving, fatherly care over the church and was greatly endeared to it. The people flocked together with great zeal to hear the Word from his lips. He held "protracted meetings," and they were of great interest. This noble man died March 9th, 1818. His last words were, "Come, come, Lord Jesus!"

The first minister of this church was Rev. Walter Little, who was born in 1766, graduated at Dartmouth College in 1796, settled at Antrim in 1800, left in 1804, and died in Maryland in 1815. The next minister was Rev. John M. Whiton, D.D. He was born in Winchendon, Mass., August 1st, 1785, graduated at Yale College in 1805, came to Antrim in 1807, was pastor forty-five years, and died in Bennington, September 27th, 1856. Dr. Whiton sustained a high Christian character, and was universally beloved. The next minister was Rev. John H. Bates, who was born in Colchester, Vt., 1811, graduated at the University of Vermont, 1840, came to Antrim, 1853, resigned the pastorate July 1st, 1866, and died in Charleston, S. C., May 10th, 1870. Mr. Bates was a man of more than ordinary scholarship and ability, and did much for the church. The next pastor was the present one, Rev. W. R. Cochran. He was born in New Boston, 1835, graduated at Dartmouth College in 1859, was tutor there, 1861, came to Antrim 1867, and has been pastor in actual service since January 1st, 1868, though not ordained till 1869. In this, his first and only charge, the divine blessing has largely attended his ministry.

The present house of worship was dedicated to God on Wednesday, November 15th, 1826, and on that occasion Mr. Whiton preached to a large assembly, on the text, "This is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of Heaven" (Gen. xxviii, 17). The first Sabbath of the following December the congregation met for the last service in the old house on the hill. It was cold and desolate—nature's mournfullest hour—but the company was large, and Mr. Whiton preached an able sermon from John iv, 20, "Our fathers worshiped in this mountain;" closing with the words of Jesus at the Supper, "Arise, let us go hence." Then they all marched down the hill to the new edifice, filling it full, and Mr. Whiton preached again, from Psalm cxxxii, 8, 9, "Arise, O Lord, into Thy rest, Thon, and the ark of Thy strength; let Thy priests be clothed with righteousness, and let Thy saints shout for joy." In that edifice, through many changes, the truth has continued to be ably and lovingly spoken; many have been comforted and many saved. "Surely," says the pastor, in his Memorial Sermon (1876), "We have reason to bless God for His care, to keep His word in our hearts, to teach our children the sureness of His love, and to talk of all His mercies by the way. He has been true to His promises to the fathers through all these years and changes; He has kept this people in peace, and to-day we are stronger in numbers and wealth than ever before, and I trust, not less strong in that personal consecration which is the real index of the power of a church."

Archibald, George D., D.D., was born in Washington county, Pa., February 15th, 1820. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1847; at the Associate Reformed Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa., in 1849, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Monongahela (Associate Reformed), March 28th, 1849. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Monongahela, June 25th, 1850, pastor of the Manchester Church, Allegheny, Pa.; was pastor of the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati, O., 1855-60; pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Madison, Ind., 1861-6, and pastor of Westminster Church, New York city, 1866-8. He was President of Hanover College, 1868-70; Professor of Homiletics, Polity and Pastoral Theology, in Danville Theological Seminary, 1870-82. He was President of Wilson Female Seminary, Chambersburg, Pa., one year, while Danville Seminary was suspended, 1873-4. He was Professor of Mental and Moral Sciences, in Wooster University, 1882. Dr. Archibald is a ripe scholar, and preaches with ability and fidelity. His life has been one of great usefulness.

Arch Street Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. The first regular service was held in this church on Saturday, June 7th, 1823. The first congregation was known as the Fifth Presbyterian Church. They formerly occupied a somewhat dilapidated chapel on Locust Street, which stood on the ground now occupied by Musical Fund Hall. The first pastor of the flock was Rev. George Cox. He was installed on the 21st of April, 1813. The next pastor was James K. Birch, who was installed July 19th, 1813. He was released November 5th, 1816. The present church was founded by a committee of the Philadelphia Presbytery, on February 6th, 1850. The committee held its first meeting in the Tabernacle Church, on Broad Street. Two of the members of that committee were Rev. Drs. Boardman and Lord. On the first day of December Dr. Thomas H. Skinner was called. Shortly after he went to Locust street he was called to New Orleans. The call, however, he refused to accept.

Upon the occasion of taking possession of the present building, Dr. Skinner preached on the subject, "Prejudice against doctrinal preaching."

He preached every evening that week, and on the seventh night took as his subject "Original Sin." It was for this discourse that he was threatened with a church trial for heresy, which, however, never took place. The sermon created widespread attention. Dr. Skinner almost surpassed Richard Baxter in the abundance of his preaching. His pastorate was characterized by a series of powerful revivals, especially that of February, 1827. On March 5th, 1828, Dr. Skinner was called to Boston and Dr. Lyman Beecher was requested to fill his place. This offer was declined, and on October 26th of that same year Dr. Skinner was prevailed upon to return. He was finally released in 1832, to accept the chair of Sacred Rhetoric at Andover Seminary. He died on February 1st, 1871.

Of the three hundred and forty-eight members of the congregation during the first year of Dr. Skinner's pastorate only two are now living. Out of this congregation two hundred and forty-eight had Christian names taken from the Bible. Of the early state of the church Joseph H. Dulles, Esq., wrote, in 1871, saying, "There never was a church existing in a more perfect state of holiness. We sat face to face at communion without impinging upon the social relations of the members of the congregation. Then communion was held on the first Sabbath of January, April, July and October. The congregation was divided into five sections or classes, each class under the spiritual charge of two elders."

In 1825 the Sunday School had 227 scholars and twenty-six teachers. When Dr. Skinner retired the congregation numbered 600 persons. A great contest sprang up over the choosing of Dr. Skinner's successor. As a result, the larger part of the congregation seceded and formed Whitefield Chapel. Those that remained, ninety-two in number, chose as their pastor Rev. George Duffield, of Carlisle. He was installed April 5th, 1835, remained but a short time, and took charge of the First Church, Detroit, Mich., where he died in 1868, at the age of sixty-eight. He was succeeded by Rev. Thomas T. Waterbury, who was installed in December, 1837, and was released in March, 1843. The next pastor was the Rev. M. P. Thompson, who was installed in 1844, and released on February 15th, 1848. He left over 350 members. The Fifth Presbyterian Church was then disbanded, and the present church formed as an Old School church. The first pastor after the reorganization was Rev. Charles Wadsworth, of Troy, N. Y. He was installed in March, 1850. The Sunday School was organized February 24th, 1850. Dr. Wadsworth, on April 3d, was called to San Francisco, but returned to this city in 1868, and became the pastor of the Clinton Street Church. He died April 1st, 1882. The Rev. Nathaniel W. Conkling was installed pastor of the church in 1863, and continued in this relation five years. The Rev. John Lindsay Withrow filled the pastorate from 1868 to 1873. The term of the present pastor, Rev. John

S. Sands, began on September 19th, 1880. The congregation now number over 300. The average annual cost of maintaining the church has been over $15,000. The church is free from debt. The present edifice originally cost $27,000, and the ground upon which it stands $14,000.

Arkansas College.—This institution, located at Batesville, Ark., was founded and organized, under its charter, in September, 1872. It was founded, and is maintained, as a Christian School, under control of trustees, nominated by the Presbyteries of Arkansas and Ouchita. Buildings and grounds, etc., secured by voluntary donations. It lays no claim to be a University, but simply aspires to the position of a good college, where can be obtained a sound, thorough Christian education. So far as it has distinctive features they may be summarily stated as including the following, viz.:—1. It has as yet no permanent endowment. Outside of very moderate tuition fees, all the financial support it receives comes from voluntary contributions from individuals, in the form of annual endowment subscriptions. 2. The teachers, while having burdens to bear, have been, and must be, such as earnestly fulfill the duties of their calling, animated chiefly by the prospect of eminent usefulness in their work. 3. No student desirous of enjoying its advantages has ever been turned away, from inability to pay fees; consequently the College has done, and still is doing, a large amount of work either wholly or partially gratuitous. 4. Students of both sexes are admitted on equal terms, to all the privileges of the Institution. It has ever been found a mutual restraint and stimulus to both to recite in the same classes—thus following the order of nature, as both are born and reared in the same families. 5. The Bible is made a regular text-book of instruction. Classes recite in it as regularly as in arithmetic or history. A fair knowledge of its contents is an indispensable part of the literary course of study. None can secure either certificates of proficiency, or diploma, without good average attainments in this department of study. 6. A course of Church History forms a part of the regular curriculum, necessary to secure the diploma conferring the degree of A. B. 7. The plan of strict class division is discarded. A certain course has to be completed, with commendable thoroughness, in order to secure a diploma or certificate. If this be done by a student in one year the degree will be awarded him; if it require two years it will be exacted. 8. No class honors are bestowed, save the diploma, believing these to be a source of trouble, often engendered, by appealing to motives that need to be repressed, rather than stimulated. 9. The discipline is directed to the great end of training the students to self-government, rather than to accustom them to be governed by the enforcement of certain rules. The system of espionage is, for the most part, discarded—the only rule attempted to be enforced as the standard of conduct is the golden rule. Nearly one-half of the male graduates, thus far, have entered the ministry, or are in preparation for that profession. The Institution has had the same President during the twelve years it has been in operation (Rev. Isaac J. Long, D. D.), by whom it was originally founded, who, in addition to the Presidency, has filled the Professorship of Ancient Languages and Moral Science.

Armistead, Jesse H., D. D., was one of the princes of the Virginia pulpit of his day. He received his college education at Hampden Sidney, and his theological education at the Union Seminary. He was licensed to preach at Old Concord Church, in 1826, at 28 years of age, as is believed. His first places of stated preaching were Cartersville (near his father's residence), and the Brick Church in Fluvanna. In the fall of 1828 he was called to be the pastor of the then recently planted church at Buckingham Court House. About that time occurred one of the visits of Rev. Asahel Nettleton to Virginia, and no man in the State, probably, more clearly caught the simple and godly skill of that wonderful evangelist, "in so speaking" that many might believe, than the young pastor at Buckingham Court House. Mr. Armistead was deeply engaged in the revival of 1831-2, and his ministry was signally owned by the Spirit of God. During his pastorate of fourteen years at Buckingham, many of the most influential people of the county were brought to Christ, and the church to which he ministered, instead of the feeble attitude which it had held, assumed a commanding position in the county.

In 1842 Dr. Armistead succeeded that eloquent man, the Rev. John Kirkpatrick, in the pastorate of the Cumberland Church. The erection of the two church edifices, Brown's and Centre, marks his connection with that church. In many other respects the divine blessing attended his ministry there. He departed this life, at his residence, Woodville, Cumberland County, Va., in the 71st year of his age, according to his repeatedly expressed desire, "during the holy quiet of the Sabbath," on the 30th of May, 1869, sealing the life of a valiant and faithful standard-bearer of Christ, by a death in which faith and hope had complete triumph, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Armstrong, Amzi, D. D., was born in Florida, Orange county, N. Y., on the 1st of December, 1771. He commenced the study of the languages when he was quite young, under the tuition of the Rev. Amzi Lewis, then pastor of the Church at Florida. Subsequently to this he spent two years as a member of Dr. Dwight's school at Greenfield, Conn. He was never connected as a student with any college. After studying theology under the direction of the Rev. Jedediah Chapman, he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New York, October 23d, 1795. He was installed pastor of the church in Mendham, N. J., November 29th, 1796, and continued laboriously and zealously in this relation for twenty years. October 2d, 1816, he took charge of an academy in Bloomfield, and remained its Principal till about a year previous to his death, which occurred at Perth Amboy, March 4th, 1827. As a man, a citizen, and a pastor, Dr. Armstrong was very highly esteemed in his congregation. In intellect he was much above mediocrity, and as a preacher he was superior to most of his brethren. In the judicatories of the Church he exerted great influence and commanded high respect.

Armstrong, Chester Solon, D. D., was born in Parishville, N. Y., September 4th, 1826. His parents were Chester and Eunice Armstrong, of Addison county, Vt. He emigrated with his father's family to Jackson county, Mich., in 1839. He graduated at Michigan University in 1852, teaching all the way betimes. He was superintendent of public schools in Jackson, Mich., one year following. As a teacher he achieved a rather flattering success. In 1856 he graduated at Union Theological Seminary, and was licensed by the Third Presbytery of New York, April of the same year. For three years he was superintendent of Seamen's Missions for the Brooklyn City Bible and Tract Society. He was pastor of the First Church, Lansing, Mich., 1856-65, in which his labors were greatly blessed. He subsequently organized the Second Church, Lansing, and assisted in organizing four other churches at outlying preaching points. He was pastor of the Second Church, 1865-9, and was very successful in his work. For six years he was Stated Clerk of his Presbytery. In 1869 he was called to the Presbyterian Church, Alton, Ill., the church prospering greatly, both spiritually and temporally, under his ministry. From a very early time Dr. Armstrong has had an earnest sympathy with evangelistic labor and organizing pioneer enterprises. In view of this tendency he was once commissioned (in 1868) by the Home Board, Secretary of Home Missions for the Synod of Michigan, and has been more recently nominated by his own Synod (Illinois South) to the like position. His efforts aiding brethren, and at pioneer points, are believed to have resulted in conversions scarcely less in number than those that have occurred under his pastoral labors.

Armstrong, George Dodd, D. D., son of Amzi Armstrong, D. D., was born at Mendham, Morris county, New Jersey, in 1813. Was graduated at Princeton in 1832. Immediately after went to Richmond, Va., where his brother, William J. Armstrong, D. D., was then pastor of the First Presbyterian Church. After teaching some years, he entered Union Theological Seminary, Virginia, in 1836. In January, 1838, became Professor of Chemistry and Mechanics in Washington College (now Washington and Lee University), Lexington, Va. Was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Lexington, in September of the same year. In 1851 resigned his Professorship to accept the pastoral charge of the First Presbyterian Church, Norfolk, Va., in which charge he has continued to the present time, 1883. During his residence in Lexington his ministry was eminently acceptable wherever exercised, especially as stated supply in the Church of Timber Ridge.

Dr. Armstrong has been an active, though not a voluminous, writer, from the time he entered the ministry. His first publication in a book form was "The Summer of the Pestilence"—a history, with the author's personal observations, of the terrible epidemic of yellow fever which visited Norfolk in 1855. Under this scourge, which brought a fearful desolation upon his household, he himself suffered severely, but was spared, and his faithful labors endeared him greatly to the whole community. Since then he has published, "The Christian Doctrine of Slavery," in 1858; "The Theology of Christian Experience," an exposition of the common faith, in 1860, and "The Sacraments of the New Testament," in 1881. All of these are productions of unusual excellence.

Dr. Armstrong's preaching is distinguished for simplicity, both as to matter and manner, for clear, vigorous discussion, and for its evangelical character. His work as a pastor has been greatly blessed, and the church under his care has had a steady, healthful growth. A long life of threescore years and ten, marked by a thoroughly amiable, friendly temper, by earnest, consistent piety, zealous and successful labors, entitles him to the confidence, honor and affection which are amply bestowed wherever he is known.

Armstrong, Rev. James Francis, was of Irish extraction, and was born at West Nottingham, Md., April 3d, 1750. He graduated at Princeton in 1773, studied theology under Dr. Witherspoon's direction, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Castle, in January, 1777. He was ordained by the same Presbytery, in January, 1778, and on the 17th of July following was appointed by Congress "Chaplain of the Second Brigade of the Maryland Forces." In June, 1782, he commenced preaching to the Church in Elizabethtown, N. J., and he supplied that pulpit for nearly a year, when he was compelled to discontinue his labors, on account of an enfeebled state of health. In April, 1787, Mr. Armstrong accepted a call to Trenton. The charge included, besides the church in town, one a few miles distant in the country, known in later years as "Trenton First Church." In April, 1787, the former church found a separate supply. He then served the town church alone, until September, 1790, from which date, until 1806, he was the joint pastor of the Trenton and Lawrenceville congregations. Mr. Armstrong died January 19th, 1816. He was a man of much ardor, activity and decision. He had a princely, generous spirit, which always answered quickly to the claims of human wretchedness. The interests of letters and of religion were, more than anything else, impressive and absorbing with him. He was a highly acceptable preacher, and was constant and untiring in his attendance on the judicatories of the Church.

Armstrong, John, D. D., son of Andrew and Maria (Thomas) Armstrong, was born at Oxford, Chester county, Pa., March 11th, 1825; graduated at Washington College, Virginia, in 1850; at Princeton Seminary in 1853, and was licensed by New Castle Presbytery, April 14th, 1852. He labored at Platte City, Mo., as a missionary, from June, 1853, to May, 1854. His next field was at Hazleton, Beaver Meadow and Weatherly, Pa., where he was stated supply from October, 1854, to October, 1861. Next he preached as stated supply at Muscatine, Iowa, from October 16th, 1861, until he was installed as pastor, June 11th, 1865, and labored with great fidelity, acceptance and success until he was released, July 23d, 1871. October 17th, 1871, he was appointed by the Synod of Iowa South, as Financial Agent to establish a College; an object in behalf of which his sympathies had for some time previously been warmly enlisted. To this he thenceforth gave, not only his gratuitous labors, but repented donations from his own resources. As the result of his efforts, Parsons College was founded, and located at Fairfield, Iowa. June 16th, 1875, he was elected Professor of History and Moral Philosophy in this institution, and June 20th, 1877, was elected its President. He died August 13th, 1879. Dr. Armstrong was an honest, earnest, intelligent, frank man, a decided Christian from the time of his early profession. He possessed rare self-reliance and perseverance, was always a diligent student, and made large and varied attainments.

Armstrong, General John. Probably no one among the early settlers of Cumberland Valley, Pa., had more influence in directing its institutions and destinies than John Armstrong. He came from the north of Ireland, and settled in Carlisle, in 1748. He was a surveyor under the Proprietary Government; in 1775 he was a Colonel, and subsequently he was a Justice of the Peace. The Indians, who often made merciless incursions, by which the peaceable inhabitants were despoiled, captured and massacred, had for a rendezvous a town called Kittaning, about two hundred miles westward from Carlisle. About two hundred and eighty provincials were mustered, under the command of Colonel Armstrong, and sent (1755), to surprise and destroy this stronghold. They succeeded in their scheme, burned the buildings of the Indians, and put to death the chiefs and most of the warriors. It was a terrible vengeance, but indispensable, even in the interest of humanity. For this brilliant success the Corporation of Philadelphia presented Colonel Armstrong with a piece of plate and a silver medal, with a medal for each of the officers under him, and a sum of money for the widows and children of such as had been killed. In 1758 he marched with the advanced division of three thousand Pennsylvanians, under Colonel Bouquet, belonging to the expedition under Brigadier-General Forbes against Fort Du Quesne. During this campaign he formed an acquaintance with Colonel Washington, which subsequently ripened into intimacy and warm personal friendship. His commission as a Brigadier General in the Continental Army bears date March 1st, 1776. In 1777 he was Major General in command of the Pennsylvania troops during the battle of Brandywine, and in the military operations of that year in the eastern part of the State. He was also a member of Congress in 1778-80, and 1787-88.

General Armstrong was a well educated man, was endowed with much practical wisdom, and was much consulted and trusted by the Proprietary of the Government, and subsequently by the authorities of the State and nation. He was an elder in the first church organized in Carlisle, and of which Rev. George Duffield, D. D., was first pastor. He was much interested in opposing the infidelity which became prevalent in this country soon after the American and the French Revolutions. The epitaph on his tombstone, in the Old Cemetery of Carlisle, informs us that he was "eminently distinguished for patriotism, valor and piety, and departed this life March 9th, 1795, aged seventy-five years."

Armstrong, William Jessup, D. D., was born October 29th, 1796, at Mendham, N. J., where his father, the Rev. Anzi Armstrong, D. D., was pastor of the Presbyterian Church. In the autumn of 1816 he completed his college course at Princeton, having sustained throughout a highly respectable standing as a scholar. He acted, for a time, as assistant teacher in a school of which his father then had charge, in Bloomfield N. J., and studied theology under his direction, occasionally availing himself of the aid of Dr. Richards, then minister at Newark. After being licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Jersey, October 8th, 1818, he spent a year in the Theological Seminary at Princeton. He then went as a missionary to Albemarle county, in the central part of Virginia, where his labors were attended with much success.

In 1821 Mr. Armstrong became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Trenton, and continued laboring there, with great fidelity and success, nearly three years. In 1824 he accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church in Richmond, Virginia. Here he labored with untiring assiduity for ten years, during which time his influence was constantly increasing throughout the State. He was Secretary of the Home Missionary Society of his Presbytery, trustee of the Union Theological Seminary, manager in Temperance, Sabbath school, Colonization, and other societies, besides being a most efficient member of the different ecclesiastical bodies with which he was connected. In March, 1834, he was unanimously elected Secretary of the "Central Board of Foreign Missions," which had been organized by the East Hanover Presbytery. He accepted the appointment, and his church, though devotedly attached to him, recognized the higher claims of the missionary cause, and cheerfully consented to give him up. His connection with his congregation was dissolved on the 6th of May. He was immediately appointed General Agent of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, for the States of Virginia and North Carolina, and fulfilled the duties of this agency with great success.

In September, 1834, at the annual meeting of the Board, Dr. Armstrong was appointed one of its secretaries for correspondence. In this position he labored earnestly and successfully. In returning to New York, where he then resided, from Boston, which he had visited officially, he was drowned, in the wreck of the steamer Atlantic, November 27th, 1846, but his remains were recovered from the water. "Dr. Armstrong's qualifications, both mental and moral, for efficient service in the cause of Christ," says Dr. David Magie, "were of a high order. Still, the chief beauty of his character was, unquestionably, the beauty of holiness. No one could be acquainted with him at all without receiving the impression that he was a man who had really tasted of the good Word of God and felt the powers of the world to come."

Arnell, Rev. James Morrison, was born in Goshen, Orange county, N. Y., September 25th, 1808. As a student of Williams College, he evinced a high order of talent, and took rank among the best scholars in his class. He graduated in September, 1827, on which occasion he delivered a Greek oration. Subsequently he pursued his theological studies, under the direction of the Rev. Dr. Ezra Fisk, the minister of his native place, and in April, 1830, he was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Hudson. He labored for six months at Tusculum, Ala.; then went to Tennessee, in 1831, where he was ordained to the work of the ministry, and installed as pastor of Zion Church, near Columbia, March 31st, 1832. Here he continued, a devoted, useful and most acceptable pastor, till the close of his life, March 4th, 1850. Mr. Arnell was an earnest friend to the cause of education, and was untiring in his efforts to promote it in the comparatively new country in which his lot was cast. He contributed many articles to the literary and religious periodicals of the day, and, among others, a series, under the title of "Pulpit Sketches," to the Christian Record, which are rare specimens of beautiful composition. As a preacher, he always commanded attention. As he was distinguished for the imaginative, this feature of his mind was generally prominent in his sermons. They startled or they delighted; yet the solemnity, the sincerity, the faithfulness of the preacher showed that he had some higher end to gain than merely to present a beautiful picture. The native genius kindled and glowed, while he ardently sought to point his hearers to heaven.

Arthur, Rev. Thomas, graduated at Yale, in 1743, and was, on being licensed, employed for a time at Stratfield, Conn. He was ordained and installed, by New York Presbytery, pastor at New Brunswick, in 1746. He was one of the original trustees of New Jersey College. He died, February 2d, 1750-1, aged twenty-seven. Mr. Arthur was a good scholar, a graceful orator, a finished preacher, an excellent Christian, and greatly beloved by his people.

Ashmead, Isaac, was born in Germantown, Pa., December 23d, 1790. After the usual course of education customary in those days he was apprenticed to Mr. Bradford, of Philadelphia, to learn the trade of printer. Whilst learning his trade he enjoyed many facilities for the study of classic literature, and being endowed with a good memory, ready wit and quick perception, he soon became a well-read man. About the year 1821 he established himself in that business, which he carried on till his death, founding what is now the oldest printing establishment in Philadelphia. As a business man he was intelligent and enterprising, and many important improvements in presswork are due to his energy. He set up the first power presses ever used in Philadelphia, and introduced the composition roller. He was also the first to make use of the hydraulic press for pressing printed sheets, and was generally deeply interested in all mechanical contrivances tending to lessen the necessity of employing manual labor. When about twenty years of age Mr. Ashmead became a member of the Second Presbyterian Church, subsequently joining the Fifth Presbyterian Church, where he was respected as a consistent Christian. He was also for many years an elder in the Coates Street Church, and afterwards was connected with the Greenhill Presbyterian Church, of which he was a member until the day of his death. He was one of the originators of the movement which resulted in the formation of the American Sunday-school Union, and evinced his zeal in behalf of his fellow citizens by many other good works. Amongst these may be mentioned the Auxiliary Evangelical Society, and the Institute for the Improvement of Apprentices, which, in connection with others, he established. Of a generous disposition, he was yet scrupulously exact in his dealings. He died March 1st, 1870, leaving the record of an upright, useful man.

Ashmead, Rev. William, was born in Philadelphia in 1798. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1818, and studied theology with Dr. James P. Wilson. He was settled in Lancaster, Pa., in 1820. After eight years of labor his health gave way, and he sought a southern climate, but after only a month's pastorate in Charleston, S. C., he was prostrated by bilious fever, and died, December 2d, 1829, in the thirty-second year of his age.

Mr. Ashmead was an accomplished scholar, with a fine taste for poetry, and skilled in linguistic and metaphysical pursuits. His style was remarkable for beauty, concinnity and a felicitous choice of epithets. He left a quantity of MSS. behind him, and at the time of his death was engaged on a translation of Saurin's "Discourses." His only published writings were a sermon, an essay on pauperism, and a posthumous volume of sermons.

Assembly General, Deliverances of:—

THEATRE AND DANCING.

"On the fashionable, though, as we believe, dangerous amusements of theatrical exhibitions and dancing, we deem it necessary to make a few observations. The theatre we have always considered as a school of immorality. If any person wishes for honest conviction on this subject, let him attend to the character of that mass of matter which is generally exhibited on the stage. We believe all will agree that comedies, at least, with a few exceptions, are of such a description that a virtuous and modest person cannot attend the representation of them without the most painful and embarrassing sensations. If, indeed, custom has familiarized the scene, and these painful sensations are no longer felt, it only proves that the person in question has lost some of the best sensibilities of our nature, that the strongest safeguard of virtue has been taken down, and that the moral character has undergone a serious depreciation.

"With respect to dancing, we think it necessary to observe that, however plausible it may appear to some, it is perhaps not the less dangerous on account of that plausibility. It is not from those things which the world acknowledges to be most wrong that the greatest danger is to be apprehended to religion, especially as it relates to the young. When the practice is carried to its highest extremes, all admit the consequences to be fatal, and why not, then, apprehend danger even from its incipient stages? It is certainly, in all its stages, a fascinating and an infatuating practice. Let it once be introduced, and it is difficult to give it limits. It steals away our precious time, dissipates religious impressions, and hardens the heart. To guard you, beloved brethren, against its wiles and its fascinations, we earnestly recommend that you will consult that sobriety which the sacred pages require. We also trust that you will attend, with the meekness and docility becoming the Christian character, to the admonitions on this subject of those whom you have chosen to watch for your souls. And now, beloved brethren, that you may be guarded from the dangers we have pointed out, and from all other dangers which beset the path of life, and obstruct our common salvation, and that the great Head of the Church may have you in His holy keeping, is our sincere and affectionate prayer. Amen."—Minutes, 1818, p. 690.

"But we are called to notice evils of another kind. In some of the Northern and Southern, and in the greater part of the Middle and Western sections of our Church we hear complaints of the prevalence of lukewarmness, and a great want of evangelical zeal among the professed disciples of the Lord Jesus. The 'spirit of slumber' seems to have deadened all their energies, and they are resting contented with the forms of religion, without feeling its vivifying power. As an effect of this, they are found conforming to the world, in its fashionable amusements, frequenting the theatre and the ball-room, and yielding to the spirit of strife, whose deadly influence resists the impulses of the Holy Ghost, and is calculated to banish Him forever from their hearts. Over such we mourn, and our prayer is that the Spirit of the Lord would breathe upon them, and cause them to live again. 'Awake! O north wind, and come, thou south, and blow upon these parts of thy garden, that the spices thereof may flow out.'"—Minutes, 1827, p. 136.

"In the principal cities of our country the theatre, under the pretence of a laudable aim to cultivate a taste for literature, and provide a recreation calculated to improve the public manners, is doing much, not only to blunt the delicate sensibilities of the female mind, and generate a dislike to all solid improvement and wholesome instruction, but to subvert the foundations of virtue and religion, and feel and cherish every description of immorality. In view of the rapid increase of these fashionable schools of iniquity, and the increasing ardor with which the affections of the young are enlisted in them, Christian parents and active benefactors of society should be constrained, by every consideration of interest, duty, and compassion, to apply their strenuous endeavors to the counteraction of the baneful influences of this fascinating source of vice and ruin. As an interesting sign of the present time, and for the encouragement of similar measures, the Assembly here notice with great pleasure the refusal, in the Legislature of Massachusetts, to incorporate the proprietors of a theatre in one of the principal towns of the State."—Minutes, 1828, p. 256.

DUELLING.

"The General Assembly having taken into serious consideration the unhappy prevalence of the practice of duelling in the United States, and being anxiously desirous to contribute what may be in their power, consistently with their character and situation, to discountenance and abolish this practice—

"Resolved, unanimously, That they do, in the most unequivocal manner, declare their utter abhorrence of the practice of duelling, and of all measures tending thereto, as originating from the malevolent dispositions of the human heart, and a false sense of honor; as a remnant of Gothic barbarism; as implying a presumptuous and highly criminal appeal to God as the Sovereign Judge; as utterly inconsistent with every just principle of moral conduct; as a direct violation of the Sixth Commandment, and destructive of the peace and happiness of families; and the Assembly do hereby recommend it to the ministers in their connection to discountenance, by all proper means in their power, this scandalous practice.

"Resolved, also, That it be, and it is hereby recommended to all the ministers under the care of the Assembly, that they scrupulously refuse to attend the funeral of any person who shall have fallen in a duel, and that they admit no person who shall have fought a duel, given or accepted a challenge, or been accessory thereto, unto the distinguishing privileges of the Church, until he manifest a just sense of his guilt, and give satisfactory evidence of his repentance."—Minutes, 1805, p. 339.

SPIRIT OF SPECULATION AND EXTRAVAGANCE.

"The General Assembly, viewing with deep interest the present state of our country, and more especially the commercial embarrassments which press upon every part of the United States, and the spirit of corrupt and mischievous speculation, which is probably to be regarded as both a cause and effect of these embarrassments, feel it to be their duty to take this notice of this unhappy state of things, and to express their opinion of the proper remedy.

"The Assembly, then, are persuaded that the evils so general in their prevalence, and so severe in their pressure, primarily on the commercial and manufacturing portions of the community, but in a considerable degree upon all, owe their origin, in a great measure, to that spirit of cupidity, of adventurous and unjustifiable speculation, of extravagance and luxury, which so unhappily prevail in our country; and also, in no small degree, to the want of that kind of education which is calculated to prepare a youth for solid usefulness in the Church, and in civil society. The Assembly, therefore, are firmly persuaded that the effectual remedy for these evils, under God, is to be found only in a recurrence to those principles and duties of our holy religion which are not less conducive to the temporal welfare of men, than to their eternal happiness; and they have no hope that general prosperity can be restored to our country until there is a return to those habits of industry, temperance, moderation, economy, and general virtue, which our common Christianity inculcates. Under these impressions the Assembly would earnestly exhort the churches under their care to take into due consideration the opinions above expressed, to cultivate in themselves, and to endeavor to promote in others, those simple, frugal, and regular pursuits which cannot fail to exert a benign influence on the best interests of society, and to train up their children in those principles and habits which will prepare them at once to be useful members of the Church and useful citizens. They would especially entreat those individuals and families belonging to their communion whom God has been pleased to favor with temporal wealth, to consider the peculiar importance of their setting an edifying example, so that their whole influence may be employed to discourage fashionable vices and amusements, and to promote the simplicity and purity of Christian practice. And the Assembly would also earnestly exhort all the ministers in their communion to make these sentiments a subject of frequent and serious address to the people of their respective pastoral charges, and to endeavor, by all the means in their power, to impress on the minds of their hearers the all-important truth, that the religion of Jesus Christ, in its vital power and practical influence, is the best friend of civil society, as well as essential to the eternal well-being of man."—Minutes, 1819, p. 715.

TOTAL ABSTINENCE.

"Resolved, That they (the Assembly) cordially approve and rejoice in the formation of temperance societies, on the principle of entire abstinence from the use of ardent spirits, as expressing disapprobation of intemperance in the strongest and most efficient manner, and making the most available resistance to this destructive and wide-spreading evil.

"That they earnestly recommend, as far as practicable, the forming of temperance societies in the congregations under their care, and that all the members of the churches adopt the principle of entire abstinence from the use of ardent spirits.

"That, as friends of the cause of temperance, this Assembly rejoice to lend the force of their example to the cause, as an ecclesiastical body, by an entire abstinence themselves from the use of ardent spirits." (Unanimously adopted).—Minutes, 1829, pp. 375, 376.

MANUFACTURE AND SALE OF ARDENT SPIRITS.

"Resolved, That while this Assembly would by no means encroach upon the rights of private judgment, it cannot but express its very deep regret, that any members of the Church of Christ should at the present day, and under existing circumstances, feel themselves at liberty to manufacture, vend, or use ardent spirits; and thus, as far as their influence extends, counteract the efforts now making for the promotion of temperance."—Minutes, 1830, p. 21.

"Resolved, That the traffic in ardent spirits to be used as a drink, by any people, is, in our judgment, morally wrong, and ought to be viewed as such by the churches of Jesus Christ universally."—Minutes, 1831, p. 31.

"It is with the utmost surprise and pain that we learn from the reports of two or three Presbyteries, that some of their members, and even ruling elders, still manufacture and sell ardent spirits. These things ought not so to be. They are a stumbling block to many, and have a manifest tendency to bring overwhelming calamities, both temporal and spiritual, on society at large. No church can shine as a light in the world, while she openly sanctions and sustains any practices which are so evidently destructive of the best interests of society."—Minutes, 1837, p. 510.

FAMILY RELIGION AND THE SABBATH SCHOOL.

"Some of the Presbyteries which tell us of the flourishing condition of their Sabbath Schools, and many others, which speak not so favorably on the subject, report to us that there exists among their church members an alarming delinquency in the proper instruction of the young at the domestic hearth, under parental oversight. There is, we are assured, no necessary conflict between the Sabbath School and the family, as institutions in which this class may be trained in the knowledge of God's Word. They may be made and ought to be made mutual helps, one to the other. Yet it is not to be disguised that the effect of the privileges offered by the Sabbath School may be, in some cases, to relieve the minds of parents from the sense of the personal responsibility resting upon them. Hence, they are led to consign the religious instruction of their children chiefly, if not wholly, to the Sabbath-school teacher. If such a result were inevitable, or even general, then should the Sabbath-school institution be condemned as a curse to the Church. God has laid upon parents the command to bring up their children 'in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.' The obligation is recognized as one personal to themselves, in the covenant into which they enter when presenting their children to God in the ordinance of baptism. In this matter there can be no transfer of responsibilities, no substitute in the discharge of duties. The Sabbath-school teacher cannot answer for the parent in the day of final reckoning; neither should the parent's work be committed to his hands in this life. The instruction of the children is so important an element of all domestic religion, that when it is neglected it is to be feared that family worship and other kindred duties are also but slightly regarded. As on various occasions heretofore, we would now exhort you, brethren, to all diligence and fidelity in the whole duty of family religion, not omitting the regular instruction of your children in the Word of God and the Catechisms of the Church."—Minutes, 1854, p. 183.

FASTING.

"When our Lord was yet with us, he said that when he should be taken away his disciples should fast. Pious men in every age have united fasting with prayer in times of distress, even if speedy deliverance was hoped for. So did Daniel (Dan. ix. 3). So did Ezra, and all the Jews at the river Ahava, on their return from Babylon, and just before the great revival of God's work among them. Like prayer, fasting has been a part of every system of religion known among men. Some, indeed, even in Christian countries, have carried it to the length of superstition, and have thereby impaired their health. Others, who pretend to fast, only exchange one kind of sumptuous eating for another, and thus mock God. We commend not, but rather reprove all such practices. Yet we fear that some among us seldom, if ever, fast at all. We trust this matter will be inquired into, and if there has been a departure from divine teachings, there will be a speedy return to this scriptural duty. The nature of an acceptable fast, and the blessings attending it, are clearly stated in the Scriptures, and especially in the fifty-eighth chapter of Isaiah."—Pastoral Letter, Minutes, 1849, p. 424.

ALMSGIVING.

"The poor ye have always with you, and whosoever ye will, ye may do them good.' If they need not shelter they may need fuel, or food, or clothing, or medicine. If they have all these, they or their children may need instruction, warning, or encouragement. If there be no poor near you, think of those who are perishing elsewhere; if not in a famine of bread, yet in a famine of the Word of God, whether written or preached. Help them! Be both liberal and systematic in your charities. Remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how He said, 'It is more blessed to give than to receive.' It was when the prayers of Cornelius were united with his alms that they came up for a memorial before God. Separate not prayer and fasting from almsgiving. God has joined them together. One benefit of fasting is, that it affords or increases the means of giving to those who are more needy than ourselves. Beware of covetousness. Beware of the spirit of hoarding. Many, in our day, think they do well if they give even one-tenth of their increase. But the ancient Jewish Church gave far more than that. The Gospel settles nothing as to the proportion to be given, but it says, 'As ye abound in everything, in faith, and utterance, and knowledge, and in all diligence, and in your love to us, see that ye abound in this grace also.' The motives to it are of the highest kind. Every believer must feel their force. 'Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye, through his poverty, might be rich.' Surely, with superior privileges, Christians should have a higher standard of liberality than those who lived under a darker dispensation. Yet even to the Jewish Church God said: 'Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of Hosts, if I will not open the windows of Heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it.'" — Pastoral Letter, Minutes, 1849, p. 424.

SABBATH DESECRATION

"It is, indeed, a widespread, deep-seated, unblushing evil. It enters boldly into almost every commercial interest in the country, and embraces, directly or indirectly, in its broad sweep of mischief, a vast multitude of individuals and, what is still worse, an alarming proportion of these offenders belong to the Church of the living God. Here is the root of the evil. The Church has become a deliberate partaker in this sin. In this way has her warning voice been well nigh silenced, her redeeming power over the community paralyzed, and the salutary restraints of a consistent example effectually vacated. Reformation, then, must begin at the House of God.

"Resolved, That the observance of the Sabbath is indispensable to the preservation of civil and religious liberty, and furnishes the only security for eminent and abiding prosperity, either to the Church or the world.

"Resolved, That the growing desecration of the Sabbath in our country must be speedily arrested, and the habits of the community essentially reformed, or the blessings of the Sabbath, civil, social and religious, will soon be irrecoverably lost.

"Resolved, That inasmuch as the work of a general reformation belongs, under God, to the Christian Church, it is the duty of the Church to apply the corrections of a firm and efficient discipline to all known violations of the Sabbath on the part of her members.

"Resolved, That inasmuch as ministers of the gospel must act a conspicuous part in every successful effort to do away the sin of Sabbath-breaking, it is their duty to observe, both in their preaching and their practice, the rule of entire abstinence from all profanation of the Lord's day, studiously avoiding even the appearance of evil.

"Resolved, That in the judgment of this General Assembly, the owners of stock in steamboats, canals, railroads, etc., which are in the habit of violating the Sabbath, are lending their property and their influence to one of the most widespread, alarming and deplorable systems of Sabbath desecration which now grieves the hearts of the pious, and disgraces the Church of God."—Minutes, 1836, p. 281.

Assembly General, Formation of. The Presbyterian Church in the United States is to be considered as the offspring of the Church of Scotland. The first General Assembly of the Church of Scotland consisted of six ministers and thirty-four other persons, spontaneously met, and constituting at once the highest judicatory of the Church, and the only one above the parochial Presbytery. Precisely analogous was the origin of our General Assembly. The first leaf of the original Minutes being irrecoverably lost, the most accurate information we have of the time and circumstances of the first ecclesiastical association is, that it was "when the Rev. Jedediah Andrews was ordained pastor to the Presbyterian congregation of Philadelphia." The ministers who were there assembled agreed "to associate and join with one another stably, for the exercise of church government among themselves, being first agreed as to principles of faith and government."* In 1701, the congregation which Mr. Andrews served removed from the warehouse of the old "Barbadoes Trading Company," on the northwest corner of Chestnut and Second streets, in which they had previously assembled, to their first house of worship, a frame building on the south side of Market street, between Second and Third streets. "The space occupied by the annual minutes in the manuscript record book," says Dr. Samuel J. Baird, "would lead to the conclusion that the missing leaf would carry us back to the same year, and other circumstances concur to the conclusion that the removal of the congregation, the ordination of Mr. Andrews, and the organization of the Presbytery, occurred at the same date." Dr. William M. Engles, in his preliminary sketch of the "Records of the Presbyterian Church," in referring to the organization of the Presbytery, says: "Judging from the first date which appears on the first page of these records, it must have been about the beginning of the year 1705. This Presbytery consisted of seven ministers, viz: Francis Makemie, John Hampton, George NeNish, Samuel Davis—all, from the best accounts, emigrated from Ireland, and exercising their ministry on the eastern shore of Maryland; with the exception of Mr. Davis, who was laboring in Delaware. John Wilson, also, from Scotland, settled in New Castle, and Jedediah Andrews, from New England, settled in Philadelphia. To these may be added John Boyd, who was the first person ordained by the new Presbytery, in 1705, and settled in Freehold, New Jersey." It is proper to state that some respectable authorities place in this list, instead of the name of Mr. Boyd, that of Nathanael Taylor, who was settled on the Patuxent, over a congregation composed to a considerable extent of Independents, although the body consisted, originally, according to tradition, of a colony of two hundred from Fifeshire.

This body ordinarily assumed the title of "The Presbytery," never that of "The Presbytery of Philadelphia." It asserted to itself, and was recognized as possessing, not merely the functions of a particular subordinate Presbytery, from which Mr. Thompson, in the place above cited, carefully distinguishes it, but the powers of a supreme judicature, in the exercise of which it was alike unlimited by a written Constitution and uncontrolled by a superior (See Book I, § 1). Its appropriate title is The General Presbytery.

The General Presbytery, thus constituted, continued in form and name until 1716, when it resolved itself into a Synod, and divided into subordinate meetings or Presbyteries. The resolution making this division provided for four Presbyteries—Philadelphia, New Castle, Snow Hill, and Long Island, but Snow Hill was never organized. The Presbytery of Long Island embraced the province of New York. Philadelphia Presbytery covered East and West Jersey and so much of Pennsylvania as lay north of the Great Valley. All the other churches belonged to New-castle Presbytery; the project of forming the ministers on the peninsula between the Delaware and the Chesapeake into the Presbytery of Snow Hill having, as has just been stated, failed. The General Presbytery, under its new organization of Synod, met September 17th, 1717. The Rev. Jedediah Andrews was its first Moderator, and the Rev. Robert Witherspoon its first clerk.

The number of ministers in the organization had increased to seventeen, of whom thirteen, with six ruling elders, were present at the constitution of the body. The territory occupied by them extended along the Atlantic slope from Long Island to Virginia.

After the formation of the Synod, the Church went on increasing, receiving additions, not only by emigrants from Scotland and Ireland, but also from natives of England and Wales, who came to the middle colonies, and were thrown by circumstances in the neighborhood of Presbyterian churches; and also from natives, or their descendants, of France, Holland, Switzerland, who preferred the Presbyterian form of worship and government. To these may be added a number from New England, who were induced by local considerations, or other circumstances, to connect themselves with the Presbyterian body. As the result of this accession of ministers and others, coming from so many different countries, and having been bred up in so many various habits, the harmony of the Church was greatly diminished. It soon became apparent that entire unity of sentiment did not prevail among them respecting the examination of candidates for the ministry on experimental religion, and also respecting strict adherence to Presbyterian order, and the requisite amount of learning in those who sought the ministerial office. Frequent conflicts on these subjects occurred in different Presbyteries. Parties were formed. Those who were most zealous for strict orthodoxy, for adherence to Presbyterian order, and for a learned ministry, were called the "old side," while those who laid greater stress on vital piety than any other qualifications, and who undervalued ecclesiastical order and learning, were called the "new side," or "new light." And although, in 1729, the whole body adopted the Westminster Confession of Faith and Catechism as the standards of the Church, still it was found that a faithful and uniform adherence to these standards could not be in all cases secured. The parties, in the progress of collision, became more excited and ardent; prejudices were indulged, misrepresentations took place, and everything threatened the approach of serious alienation, if not of total rupture. While things were in this state of unhappy excitement, Mr. Whitefield, in 1739, paid his second visit to America. The extensive and glorious revival of religion which took place under his ministry, and that of his friends and coadjutors, is well known. Among the ministers of the Presbyterian Church, as well as those of New England, this revival was differently viewed; the "old side" men, looking too much at some censurable irregularities which mingled themselves with the genuine work of God, were too ready to pronounce the whole a delusion; while the "new side" men, with zeal and ardor, declared in favor of the ministry of Whitefield and the revival. This brought on the crisis. Undue warmth of feeling and speech, and improper inferences, were admitted on both sides. One act of violence led to another, until, at length, in 1741, the Synod was rent asunder, and the Synod of New York, composed of "new side" men, was set up in opposition to that of Philadelphia, which retained the original name, and comprehended all the "old side" men who belonged to the general body. These Synods remained in a state of separation for seventeen years. At length, however, a plan of reunion was agreed upon. Several years were spent in negotiation. Mutual concessions were made. The articles of union, in detail, were happily adjusted, and the Synods were united, under the title of the "Synod of New York and Philadelphia," in the year 1758.

From this time, the Presbyterian Church went on in as much prosperity as could consist with the disturbed state of the country, until after the Revolutionary War, when it was judged proper to enter into some new arrangements. Accordingly, in 1785, the Synod of New York and Philadelphia, began to take those steps for revising the public standards of the Church which led to their adoption and establishment on the present plan. A large and respectable committee, of which Dr. Witherspoon was chairman, was appointed to "take into consideration the Constitution of the Church of Scotland and other Protestant Churches," and to form a complete system for the organization of the Presbyterian Church in the United States. The result was, that on the 22nd of May, 1788, the Synod completed the revision and arrangement of the public standards of the Church, and finally adopted them, and ordered them to be printed and distributed for the government of the several judicatories. This new arrangement consisted in dividing the Old Synod into four Synods—namely, New York and New Jersey, Philadelphia, Virginia, and the Carolinas—and constituting over these, as a bond of union, a General Assembly in all essential particulars after the model of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. The Westminster Confession of Faith was adopted, with three small alterations. The Larger and Shorter Catechisms were adopted, with one slight amendment. And a Form of Government and discipline, and a Directory for public worship, drawn chiefly from the standards of the Church of Scotland, with such alterations as the form of our civil government and the state of the Church in this country were thought to demand, completed the system.

The first meeting of the General Assembly took place on the 21st day of May, 1789. The Assembly met in the Second Presbyterian Church, in the city of Philadelphia, and was opened with a sermon by the Rev. Dr. John Witherspoon, from 1st Cor., iii, 7: "So, then, neither is he that planteth anything, neither he that watereth, but God that giveth the increase."

The following delegates appeared and took their seats:—

Presbytery of Suffolk.—Minister, Mr. Joshua Hart.

Presbytery of Dutchess County.—Minister, Mr. Benjamin Judd.

Presbytery of New York.—Ministers, Dr. John Rodgers, Dr. Alexander McWhorter, Mr. Azel Roe, and Mr. John Close.

Presbytery of New Brunswick.—Ministers, Dr. John Witherspoon, Dr. Samuel S. Smith, and Mr. James F. Armstrong. Elders, Mr. Nehemiah Dunham and Colonel Bayard.

Presbytery of Philadelphia.—Ministers, Mr. James Sproat, Dr. George Duffield and Dr. John Ewing. Elders, Mr. Isaac Snowden, Mr. Ferguson Melvaine and Mr. Elijah Clark.

Presbytery of New Castle.—Ministers, Dr. Robert Smith, Dr. James Latta and Mr. Thomas Read. Elders, Mr. Moses Irwin, Mr. Amos Slaymaker and Mr. John Crawford.

Presbytery of Leves.—Minister, Dr. Matthew Wilson.

Presbytery of Baltimore.—Minister, Dr. Patrick Allison.

Presbytery of Carlisle.—Ministers, Mr. Robert Cooper, Mr. Thomas McPherrin and Mr. James Snodgrass. Elders, Mr. Samuel Edie and Mr. James Dixon.

Presbytery of Boston.—Elder, Hon. John Baird.

Presbytery of Lexington.—Minister, Mr. Moses Hage.

Presbytery of South Carolina.—Minister, Mr. Templeton.

It will be seen that there were twenty-two ministers and ten elders. The Rev. Dr. John Rodgers, of New York, was chosen Moderator. The minutes of the proceedings of the Assembly will be found in a volume published by the Board of Publication, entitled "Minutes of the General Assembly, etc., from 1789 to 1820."

In addition to various acts connected with the internal policy of the Church, the first General Assembly signalized itself by two important measures. These were, first, the commencement of the missionary work, by requiring collections to be taken up to assist in sending ministers to the frontiers and destitute settlements, and, second, measures to promote the printing and circulation of the Bible.

The following table has been compiled, by Synods, for the purpose of exhibiting the statistics of the Presbyterian Church at the organization of the first General Assembly:—

* Estimated. In 1786 there were 32 congregations.

The number of communicants is not given in the tables. The first statistics within our knowledge, which take notice of communicants, are those for the year 1807. At that time the number of ministers was about three hundred and fifty, and the number of communicants about twenty thousand. It is probable that the number of communicants at the organization of the General Assembly, in 1789, was between eight thousand and ten thousand.

Atkinson, John Mayo Pleasants, D. D., was born in Mansfield, Virginia, January 10th, 1817, and graduated at Hampden Sidney College, Virginia, in 1835, and at Union Theological Seminary. He was stated supply of Kent Street Church, Winchester, Virginia, in 1838, and of the Church at Lebanon, Virginia, in 1840-41. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of East Hanover, June 5th, 1841; was missionary in Texas, 1841-42; stated supply at Houston, 1843; pastor at Warrenton, Virginia, 1843-50; pastor of Bridge Street Church, Georgetown, D. C., 1850-56; and President of Hampden Sidney College, 1857. Dr. Atkinson's ministry was successful in a gratifying degree, and in all the relations he sustained to the Church he consecrated his gifts with great earnestness to the service of the Master. His later years were full of useful labors, chiefly at the head of the College which he served so faithfully and wisely. He was firm in his convictions, always courteous in his expressions of them, a true gentleman, a lover of the Church of God, and an earnest preacher of the gospel of Jesus Christ. He was one of the foremost ministers of the Southern Presbyterian Church. He died in 1883.

Atkinson, Rev. Joseph Mayo, was born in Mansfield, Va., January 7th, 1820. He went first to Hampden Sidney College in that State, and afterwards to the College of New Jersey, where he graduated in 1841. After studying theology at Princeton Seminary, he was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Winchester, in 1843, and was ordained by the same Presbytery, April 20th, 1845. His first pastorate was at Shepherdstown and Smithfield, Va., which he resigned in 1849, and accepted the pastorate of the Church in Frederick, Md., which he held till 1855. He was pastor of the First Church, Raleigh, N. C., 1855-75; teacher in Raleigh, 1875-7, and became pastor of the Second Church in that city in 1877. Mr. Atkinson is a good preacher, and a writer of ability. He contributed to the Princeton Review (1852), "Moral Aesthetics," "National Literature the Exponent of National Character," (1853), "Henry Martyn;" (1855), "The Turkish Letters."

Atkinson, William Mayo, D.D., the son of Robert and Mary (Mayo) Atkinson, was born at Powhatan, Va., April 22d, 1796. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1814; was admitted to the Bar, and practiced his profession in Petersburg until 1833. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the East Hanover Presbytery, June 17th, 1833, and ordained as an evangelist, April 26th, 1834. Shortly after his licensure, he traveled extensively in Virginia, as agent of the Virginia Bible Society, and after a year or two his field was enlarged so as to include several other of the Southern States. In this agency he was remarkably successful. On resigning it, he supplied vacancies for a few years, in Chesterfield county, and in the vicinity of Petersburg. He was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Winchester, in February 1839. In the Spring of 1846 he resigned this charge, and accepted an Agency for the Board of Education of the Presbyterian Church. He died February 24th, 1849, in all the serenity of Christian faith and hope, passing to his reward. Dr. Atkinson was a man of good talents, and possessed an unusual degree of common sense. His piety was remarkably humble, cheerful and gentle. Above most he was unselfish. He did not love to think or speak of himself. As a preacher, he was clear, judicious, instructive, and practical—always animated, never overwhelming. He was a very useful member of Church Courts, always studying the things which make for peace, as well as those which promote truth and order. He possessed peculiar qualifications as a presiding officer in deliberative assemblies.

Atwater, Lyman H., D. D., LL. D., was born February 23d, 1813, at Cedar Hill, then a part of the town of Hamden, since incorporated into the city of New Haven, Conn. He was descended from genuine Puritan stock—his parents on both sides having for their ancestors the original settlers of New Haven, who emigrated from England. At an early age Professor Atwater gave signs of the intellectual vigor evinced in his later years. He began the study of Latin in 1825, at the age of twelve, entered Yale College in 1827, and was graduated in 1831, at the age of eighteen, with the second honor in a class of eighty-one members. He spent the year following his graduation, as head of the classical department of Mount Hope Institute, Baltimore. He then returned to New Haven and entered the Yale Theological Seminary, of which Dr. Nathanael W. Taylor, his pastor in infancy and boyhood, was the distinguished head. At the end of his first year in the seminary he became tutor of mathematics in Yale College, in which office he continued for nearly two years, pursuing meanwhile his studies in theology. He was licensed to preach, by the Association of New Haven West, in May, 1834, and in the Summer of 1835 left the tutorship to accept a call to the pastorate of the First Church of Fairfield, Conn., one of the oldest, and at that time one of the most prominent in that State, over which he was installed July 29th, 1835, at the age of twenty-two. In this responsible charge he continued between nineteen and twenty years.

In 1861 he was appointed to the Lectureship Extraordinary in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J., on the Connection between Revealed Religion and Metaphysical Science, for the five years for which it was established.

The General Assembly (O. S.), in 1869, made him a member of the joint committee which perfected the basis of union upon which the Old and New School branches of the Presbyterian Church were re-united. Dr. Atwater was charged by the Board of Trustees with the duties of administration ad interim between the retirement of Dr. John Maclean from the Presidency of the College, in June, 1868, and the inauguration of Dr. McCosh, toward the close of the same year. On his assumption of office, by mutual consent, the departments of Psychology and the History of Philosophy were transferred from Dr. Atwater to Dr. McCosh, while the department of Economics and Politics was given to Dr. Atwater. Thus, since 1869 he was Professor of Logic, Metaphysics, Ethics, Economics and Political Science. Dr. Atwater died at his home, in Princeton, February 17, 1883. Since 1876 he had been Vice-president of the board of trustees of Princeton Theological Seminary. For many years he was an associate editor and valuable contributor to the Princeton Review. He wrote largely for periodicals, and was the author of a "Manual of Elementary Logic," for the class-room.

Auburn, New York, First Presbyterian Church. This church has existed seventy-two years. It was the outgrowth of the pastorate of the Rev. David Higgins with the Church of Aurelius, already of some years' standing, and which included Auburn within its bounds. Here also its founder resided for the larger part of his ministry, with the mother church located more centrally, as the town was then constituted. He was a man of cultured gifts, sound and distinctive in his doctrinal views, with New England ideas and methods, which had much to do in determining, at its critical period, the character of both the church and the town. As the earliest settled minister on the ground, he attracted to his support the best elements of the thriving settlement, irrespective of religious preferences, and drew around him the men of enterprise and foresight who believed in the church and the school as essential to the best type of morals and manners. Every movement for the spiritual and social improvement of the place, was conceived and carried out in a generous way.

Since that time, the church has had four pastorates. The first, that of the Rev. Hezekiah N. Woodruff, which continued but three years, synchronizes the second war with Great Britain, the distracting influences of which were alike unfavorable to commerce, to morals and religion. The membership of the church made slow increase. Mr. Woodruff, who was a worthy pastor, and an excellent preacher, was a man of cultured habit, of positive convictions, and sincere devotion to his work. In consequence of a local excitement, in which he became involved, and which divided the village and threatened the peace of the church, he resigned his charge. During his brief and disturbed ministry, the first church edifice, a model of architectural beauty, and for half a century a centre of spiritual life and power, was begun and completed. It marked the first important epoch in the history of the church.

The new pastor, Rev. Dreck C. Lansing, like both his predecessors, was a graduate from the foremost college of the land, but unlike them was neither of Puritan descent nor of New England habit, but a scion of one of the early and most distinguished Dutch families of New York. Born to wealth and ancestral renown, ardent in temperament, and eloquent of speech, his passion was to save souls, and to this end he bent the whole energy of his fervid ministry. Revival followed revival in rapid succession through more than the first half of his pastorate, which continued twelve years, resulting in a large increase in the membership and lifting the church into singular prominence. Its more permanent results exist to-day, in the Theological Seminary, established during its third year, and the Second Presbyterian Church, founded just after its close, leaving the congregation diminished in numbers but more united in sentiment as to methods of administration.

The third pastorate, that of the Rev. Josiah Hopkins, was filled by a man who had not passed through the training of the schools, but had sustained his previous ministry with great acceptance in the immediate vicinity of a New England college. He was a close reasoner, a plain, strong preacher, a kind pastor, a single-hearted, solid man. At the very outset, his ministry here caught the spirit of the great revival which broke simultaneously over the whole country, without regard to measures or special agencies, and swept the churches like the breath from the four winds which the prophet invoked upon the slain in the valley of vision. How far the great awakening gave its characteristics to this pastorate, need not be said, but it was followed at intervals by special means to quicken religious interest, and in each instance it was through the agency of evangelists, an order of men devoted to that particular work.

A period of thirty-five years, or the first half of the life of the church, had elapsed, and the fourth pastorate, that of the Rev. Henry A. Nelson, opened with new and important changes—changes which came from necessity rather than design. There was a variation from methods which had lost their freshness, if not their vitality, and it became the order to seek church growth less from special and temporary effort than in the steady use of the appointed and accepted instrumentalities; with more of system in pastoral supervision. The pastor, unlike the men who had preceded him, entered upon this pastoral charge without ministerial experience, and fresh from his preparatory studies; and for that reason, it may be, was the better fitted to meet the conditions of a transition service. Transition periods are not without their perils, and religious associations are tenacious of their hold upon the past. But without jar or disturbance the old gave place to the new; and together the Church and its youthful pastor wrought, with earnest devotion and in steadfast zeal; together grew in grace and in strength, until, after ten years of mutual fidelity and loving respect, he was transferred, at the call of the country, scarcely less than of the Church, to a more responsible pulpit, and to meet a more weighty crisis, only to win larger successes.

The Rev. Charles Hawley, D. D., succeeded Mr. Nelson in this pastorate at Auburn, and there continues to this day, with "eye undimmed and natural force unabated," presenting the example beautifully set forth by the Psalmist, of that man whose "delight is in the law of the Lord, meditating therein day and night, like a tree with unwithering leaf, planted by the rivers of water, bringing forth his fruit in due season." For twenty-six years he has faithfully labored among his people, in fullest exercise of all the abilities and grace bestowed upon him, ministering to them with great tenderness and love, in all phases of their church and home life. Soon after a very interesting celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of Dr. Hawley's pastorate, November 3d, 1882, the Church Session adopted a minute for the Sessional record, recognizing the Providential direction of their pastor to their pulpit, uniting with him in devout thanksgiving to God, for the preservation of his life and health, and for the measure of strength given him for the arduous duties of his ministry, also specifying the erection of their beautiful sanctuary, the enlarged benevolence of the church, the maintenance of its numbers, notwithstanding the organization of other churches of the same denomination, and the prevailing harmony of its membership, as honorable features of the long ministry of their pastor.

Auburn Theological Seminary. In February, 1818, at the meeting of the Synod of Geneva, the Rev. William Wisner, long pastor at Ithaca, N. Y., moved that the Synod establish a seminary. The Synod decided in favor of the project, provided it should meet the approval of the General Assembly. In May, 1818, the Assembly expressed itself as "not prepared at present to give any opinion or advice on the subject, believing the said Synod are the best judges of what may be their duty in this important business." In the following August, Synod held a special meeting, at Auburn; the attendance was full, and President Davis, Dr. McAuley, and Rev. John Frost were present, from the neighboring Synod of Albany. At the meeting in February, the prevailing view had been in favor of a School which should provide for a short course into the ministry, combining theological with academical training. This plan was abandoned at the meeting in August, and a purely theological school, for men who had graduated from college, was determined upon.

Thirty-five thousand dollars and a site for building having been contributed in Auburn and Cayuga county, the Seminary was located in Auburn. Ground was broken for a building in November, 1819. A charter was granted April 11th, 1820. The corner-stone was laid the 11th of May following. The first class of students, eleven in number, was admitted in the autumn of 1821. In 1823 a gift of fifteen thousand dollars from Arthur Tappan, Esq., of New York, enabled the governing boards to secure the acceptance of Dr. James Richards for the chair of Theology, thus making a full Faculty. The previous Professors were Dr. Henry Mills, Dr. Matthew La Rue Perrine, and Dr. Dirk Cornelius Lansing. Dr. Lansing served without salary, and resigned in 1826, when it seemed to him that his services in the chair were no longer absolutely indispensable to the Seminary. His chair, that of Homiletics, proved difficult to fill, and was vacant much of the time for the next thirty years. Dr. Samuel Hanson Cox occupied it from 1835 to 1837; Dr. Baxter Dickinson from 1839 to 1847; Dr. Joseph Fewsmith from 1848 to 1851; Dr. William Grenough Thayer Shedd from 1852 to 1854; Dr. Jonathan Bailey Condit from 1854 to 1873, being Emeritus Professor till his death, in 1876; Dr. Herriek Johnson from 1871 to 1880, and Dr. Anson Judd Upson from 1880 to the present time.

In the department of Biblical Criticism, Professor Mills remained until 1851, when he was succeeded by the present incumbent, Dr. Ezra Abel Huntington. Dr. Mills was Emeritus Professor till his death, in 1867.

Professor Perrine remained in the chair of Church History until his decease, in 1836. His successor was Dr. Luther Halsey, from 1837 to 1841. The present Professor, Samuel Miles Hopkins, took the chair in 1847.

Professor Perrine gave instruction in theology until the coming of Professor Richards. The latter died in 1843. Dr. Laurens Perseus Hickok was Professor of Theology from 1841 to 1852, and Dr. Clement Long from 1852 to 1851. Dr. Edwin Hall filled this chair from 1855 to 1876, being Emeritus Professor till his death, in 1877, and was succeeded by Dr. Ransom Bethune Welch in 1876.

In 1847 the duties of the Professor of Biblical Criticism were divided, by the erection of the department of the Hebrew Language and Literature. The Rev. James Edward Pierce occupied this chair from its establishment until his death, in 1870, and in 1871 was succeeded by Dr. Willis Judson Beecher.

The original Seminary building yet stands. As the number of students increased, a large wing was added to the building, to the west, for their accommodation; but this was taken down when Morgan Hall was erected. In 1870, on the fiftieth anniversary of the laying of the corner-stone of the original building, was laid the corner-stone of a new library building, built of stone, and finished inside in ash, the joint gift of the Hon. William E. Dodge, of New York, and the Hon. Edwin B. Morgan, of Aurora. In 1875 the new dormitory building, Morgan Hall, was completed, at a cost of about one hundred thousand dollars, of which seventy-five thousand dollars was the gift of the Hon. Edwin B. Morgan, for whose son, Alonzo Morgan, the building is named. At the laying of its corner-stone there was present the Rev. William Johnson, who had offered the prayer on the occasion of the breaking of the ground for the old building, fifty-five years previously. The new building is of stone, is finished in ash, is 216 feet long by 45 feet wide, has five stories, and will accommodate 76 students, each with a study and bed-room. All the rooms are heated by steam, and supplied with gas and city water.

The early financial history of the Seminary was largely a history of struggles. In 1854-5 the Seminary was virtually closed, in part for pecuniary reasons. With the reorganization of the Faculty which followed, a period of greater prosperity began. At the time of the building of Morgan Hall, $300,000 were, by special effort, added to the endowment. Other generous gifts have since been received. Large as the endowment is, however, it is mostly devoted to specific purposes designated by the donors, so that the managing boards are in great need of funds for ordinary general purposes.

In the various efforts to endow the Seminary, Sylvester Willard, M. D., of Auburn, for nearly forty years secretary of the board of trustees, has borne an especially important part, both by gifts and by personal care and effort. Beyond this, it is impossible to name, in this article, even the more prominent of the friends who have made the Seminary the object of their interest and munificence.

Auburn is one of the oldest of the seminaries. Since its foundation, the increase in the number of theological schools in the various Protestant churches has kept pace with that of the churches themselves. With two or three exceptional short periods of prosperity or decline, the attendance of students at Auburn has maintained a pretty even average, ever since the first few years of its existence. The last general catalogue was published in 1883. The aggregate number of the students, including those now in the Seminary, is somewhat more than one thousand two hundred and fifty. It would be interesting, in the case of these men or of the men from any other seminary, to follow them to their fields of labor, to trace their geographical distribution, and especially to sketch among them the remarkable groups of men who have, at different times, been associated in particular enterprises. Auburn has had such groups in the foreign mission field, in the pioneer home mission field, in the work of founding educational and other institutions, in the work of college and theological instruction, in literature and in the other departments of the work of the ministry. But our limits forbid any attempt to present these matters.

In its management and teachings Auburn Seminary has always been strictly Presbyterian. Originally its course of study, its matriculation pledge, the declarations subscribed to by its Professors, and other like matters, were closely modeled after those of Princeton Seminary, and there has never been any change in the direction of a departure from the Standards of the Presbyterian Church. The "Auburn Declaration" is famous among the landmarks of American Presbyterian Orthodoxy. A very large majority of all the Auburn students have entered the ministry of the Presbyterian Church. But a large number have also been Congregational ministers, and smaller representations are to be found in the Reformed, the Episcopalian, the Methodist, the Baptist and other churches.

Axtell, Henry, D. D., was born at Mendham, New Jersey, June 9th, 1773. He took his collegiate course at Princeton, where he was graduated, an excellent scholar, in 1796. After several years spent in teaching at Morristown and Mendham, and as the head of a flourishing school in Geneva, New York, he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Geneva, November 1st, 1810. In 1812 he was installed colleague pastor with the Rev. Mr. Chapman, of the Church at Geneva, and continued in this relation till the close of his life. His ministry was, on the whole, decidedly a successful one. Besides being permitted to witness every year a greater or less accession to his church, there were two extensive revivals in connection with his labors, one in 1819, the other in 1825, each of which resulted in an addition of about one hundred to the number of communicants. He died, in the utmost peace, February 11th, 1849. The Rev. Samuel H. Cox, D. D., says of Dr. Axtell: "All his attainments had an evangelico-utilitarian character. . . . Politics, doings in Wall street and romantic stories, were no part of his preaching. His ministry was richly scriptural; it spoke its own character thus: 'My doctrine is not mine, but His who sent me.' His audience retired thoughtful. They felt the Master, rather than the man. As a consequence, they were Bible reading, and Bible searching, and Bible thinking in their piety, and if there be any better kind of Christians than such, let him who can, tell us where to find them."

Ayres, Rev. Enos, seems to have been a pupil of Dr. Bellamy. He graduated at Princeton College in 1748, and his name stands first on the Catalogue of the Alumni of that Institution. He was probably a native of Elizabethtown, N. J.; if not, he was certainly residing there before he entered college, as his correspondence with Dr. Bellamy shows. Mr. Ayres was ordained by the Presbytery of New York, about 1750, and settled as pastor of the churches at Bethlehem and Blooming Grove, Orange county, N. Y. In a few years he relinquished the charge at Bethlehem, and continued the pastor of Blooming Grove until his death, which occurred in 1765.

Babb, Clement Edwin, D. D., was born at Pittston, Pa., August 19th, 1821. He graduated at Dickinson College in 1840, and studied theology at Union and Lane Seminaries. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Indianapolis, in September, 1848. He was pastor of the Second Church, Indianapolis, 1848-53; editor of Christian Herald, 1853-70, and of the united paper Herald and Presbyterian, 1870-3; corresponding editor of the same paper, 1873-8; editor of the Occident, San Francisco, 1876-81. He resides at present at San Jose, California. Dr. Babb has been faithful in all the positions he has occupied. He is a forcible preacher, a graceful and vigorous writer, and has exerted a large influence for good in the communities in which his lot has been cast.

Babbitt, Rev. William Hampton, son of William and Elizabeth E. (Sutton) Babbitt, was born in Mendham, New Jersey, June 5th, 1825. He received his academic training in a classical school of celebrity in his native place, entered the College of New Jersey, Princeton, and was graduated, one of the first in his class, in 1846. He spent three years teaching in an academy at Flushing, Long Island, and subsequently entered the Princeton Theological Seminary, graduating in 1853. He was two years tutor in Princeton College. After serving as a licentiate in Ohio and in Deckertown, New Jersey, he was ordained as an evangelist, by the Presbytery of Rockaway, in 1856. He was pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Hoboken, New Jersey, 1857-67; of the First Presbyterian Church of Glendale, Ohio, 1867-81; and has been supply and pastor of the Church of Tecumseh, Mich., from 1882 to the present time.

Mr. Babbitt is a fine scholar, a chaste and polished writer, a sound theologian, a faithful pastor, with gifts for the pulpit much above the average. Unostentatious in manner, wholly devoted to his sacred calling, prudent in speech, wise in counsel, with the advantages of the best home and literary culture, he has always been highly esteemed by his ministerial brethren, and loved as the faithful pastor of the flocks over whom the Holy Ghost has made him overseer.

Backus, John Chester, D. D., was born in Wethersfield, Conn., September 3d, 1810. He graduated at Yale College in 1830. After his graduation he studied law. His theological studies were pursued at New Haven, Andover and Princeton Seminaries. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, in December, 1835, and was assistant secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Domestic Missions 1835-6. In 1836 he accepted the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church, Baltimore, Md., retaining the charge until his resignation in 1875, since which time he has been Pastor Emeritus.

Dr. Backus is a gentleman of great personal culture, united with marked dignity of character. He is a forcible preacher, and always presents the truth with an earnest spirit, and controlling reference to its practical bearings. His long ministry in Baltimore has been eminently blessed, not only in the prosperity of his own congregation, but in the influence which he has exerted for the growth of Presbyterianism in that city, where his exemplary and useful life has secured for him universal esteem. As a member of several of the boards of the Church he has been very useful, by his sound judgment and wise counsels. He has been a Director of the Theological Seminary at Princeton since 1841, and has ever shown a deep interest in that institution. He was Moderator of the General Assembly at its meeting in Philadelphia in 1861, and presided over its deliberations ably and acceptably.

Backus, J. Trumbull, D.D., LL.D., son of E. F. Backus, was born in the city of Albany, N. Y., January 27th, 1809. He was prepared for college at the Albany Academy, and graduated at Columbia College, New York city, in 1827. He received from that institution the degree of A.M., in 1830. He pursued his theological studies at Princeton from 1827 to 1830, at Andover from 1830 to 1831, and at New Haven during the last half of the year 1832. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of New York, in 1830. He was ordained and installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Schenectady, N. Y., by the Presbytery of Albany, in December, 1832, and continued in this relation until 1853, when declining health required the resignation of the charge. He received the honorary degree of S.T.D., from Union College in 1847. He has been a member of seven General Assemblies, and has served the Church on many important committees. He was one of the Committee that prepared the Hymnal. He was unanimously elected Moderator of the first reunited Assembly of 1850. In the discharge of his duties in this high office he gained the commendation of all his brethren, for the impartiality, suavity and dignity with which he presided over the deliberations of the Assembly. Dr. Backus still resides at Schenectady, enjoying the respect and confidence of the community in which he lives, as well as the regard of the entire Church for the advancement of whose interests he has labored with so much earnestness and success.

Backus, Rev. Wilbur, was born in Richmond, Mass., November 9th, 1788, and graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1813, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1816. Immediately after this, having been licensed to preach in April of that year, he, in company with Mr. (afterwards the Rev. Dr.) Gilbert, set out on a mission through Virginia, Ohio, and Illinois Territory, which they closed in February, 1817. On his return he preached five months, and with great success, to the Presbyterian congregation in Dayton, O. After leaving Dayton, he labored, for a while, under the direction of the Philadelphia Missionary Society, and afterwards supplied, for a considerable time, Dr. McDowell's pulpit, at Elizabethtown, N. J. On the 27th of August, 1818, he was installed pastor of the church in Dayton, and died on the 29th of the following September. Mr. Backus possessed a sound and well-balanced mind, was an earnest Christian, and an instructive and acceptable preacher.

Badger, Rev. Joseph. This name will long be remembered in Eastern Ohio. He whom it designates was the great missionary of the Western Reserve, and one of the pioneers to regions further west. He was a most remarkable man; eminently a man for the times in which he lived.

Joseph Badger was born in Wilbraham, Mass., February 28th, 1757. At the age of eighteen he entered the army, and continued in military service several years. After his conversion, he entered Yale College, in 1781, as a Freshman, and pursued his studies under great pecuniary embarrassment. Here he constructed a planatorium that cost him three months' labor, and for which the college authorities gave him an order on the steward for one hundred dollars. He graduated in the Fall of 1783.

The next year Mr. Badger taught school and studied theology under the venerable Rev. Mark Leavenworth, and in due course was licensed to preach the gospel, by the New Haven Association. After serving several churches in Connecticut, until October 21th, 1800, he accepted the commission of the Connecticut Missionary Society to labor as a missionary in the Western Reserve of Ohio, or New Connecticut, as it was then called. He started for his new field of labor, November 15th, alone and on horseback. As the roads, towards the close of his journey, were mere bridle-paths, for nearly two hundred miles he had to lead his horse. He was obliged to swim the Mahoning River in Ohio, but at length reached Youngstown, and found a hospitable reception with the pastor, Rev. William Wick. Here he commenced a series of labors leading him in every direction where the cabin of a settler was to be sought. By request of the Presbytery of Ohio he went, in company with Rev. Thomas Edgar Hughes, as far as Maumee and Detroit, to consider the propriety of establishing a mission among the Indians. On his journey homeward he suffered great hardships.

Having returned to Connecticut, Mr. Badger made a report of his missionary operations to the Board, and on the 23d of February, 1802, started with his family to the Western Reserve, a journey of four or five hundred miles. The outfit was a four-horse wagon, in which were stowed his wife and six children, together with their household effects. After much exposure and trial by the way, he reached Austenburg, Ohio, at the expiration of two months. Here he built a rude cabin of logs, without a floor, furniture, or even a door, or chinking between the logs. Leaving his family to plant the garden and the corn-field, he set out on a missionary tour that continued three months, when he returned home. These missionary tours continued, with little cessation, until April, 1803. At that time he became a member of the Presbytery of Erie.

In 1806 Mr. Badger accepted a commission from the Western Missionary Society, located at Pittsburg, Pa., as a missionary to the Indians in the region of Sandusky, Ohio, for about four years. After resigning this commission, in 1810, he removed to Ash-tabula, Ohio, where, and in the neighboring settlements, he preached, deriving his support in part from the people, and in part from the Massachusetts Missionary Society. During the war of 1812 he was, after solicitation to accept the position, appointed brigade chaplain and postmaster of the army, by General Harrison, and served in this capacity until Spring. He continued to preach in various places, without any regular support, until 1826. At that time he was placed on the pension roll of the War Department, as a soldier of the Revolution. He was installed pastor of a small congregation in Gustavus, Trumbull County, Ohio, by the Presbytery of Grand River, in October, 1826, and labored there with encouraging success, until obliged, by declining health, to seek a release from his charge, June 26th, 1835. He died, April 5th, 1846, in the ninetieth year of his age. To the last he retained his mental powers, and died in the exercise of a triumphant faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.

Bailey, Francis Gelson, was born in County Down, Ireland, in the year 1797; came to America when about eighteen years of age, and settled at Pittsburg, Pa., where he engaged in mercantile life, and through his energy and enterprise soon won his way to the foremost rank among the business men of the then fast growing town. In the community in which he lived his character as a Christian shone forth with peculiar lustre.

A child of the Covenant, trained by a godly father, whom he closely resembled, he had connected himself with the Church at an early age. In 1819 he became a member of the church under Dr. McElroy. In 1824 he united with the First Presbyterian Church, under the pastoral care of Dr. Francis Herron. Having removed to East Liberty, in 1827, he devoted himself with energy and success to organizing a Presbyterian Church, which has since grown into one of the largest and most prosperous of the churches of the city of Pittsburg.

In 1841 he removed again to the heart of the city, and was at once called to the eldership in the First Church, in which connection he continued until near the close of his active and useful life.

In 1842 he was made a Director of the Western Theological Seminary, and was President of the Board of Trustees from their organization in 1844.

He was a member of the first Board of Directors of the Western Foreign Missionary Society, organized by the Synod of Pittsburg in 1831, when, in the First Church of Pittsburg was laid the foundation of our Board of Foreign Missions.

Mr. Bailey, on his retirement from active business, gave himself more entirely to personal work in the interests of the Church, in which he continued until, in December, 1868, he was suddenly transferred from great activity to the passive side of Christian life. From that time until his decease, on the 4th of August, 1870, more than a year and a half, he glorified God in the fires.

In the duties of his eldership Mr. Bailey found a large part of his life work. His natural disposition was cheerful and affectionate, his manner kind and winning. He had a natural politeness, deepened by Christian sympathy and the love of souls. He took special oversight of the needy, and his cordiality in welcoming strangers, his happy sympathy with the afflicted, his winning manners with the children—all these are fragrant memories in hundreds of families, many of whom rise up to call him blessed.

Bain, Rev. John Wallace, was born April 1st, 1833, near Hanover, Indiana. He entered Hanover College, September, 1851, and graduated at Westminster College, Lawrence county, Pa., in June, 1858. Having previously studied theology privately one year, he entered the Theological Seminary at Xenia, Ohio, in September, 1858, in which he continued until March, 1860, having, however, been licensed to preach in April, 1859. He was ordained and installed pastor of Canonsburg congregation (U. P. Church), Washington county, Pa., in October, 1861. He preached at Chicago, Ill., and Hamilton, Ohio, and other stations in the U. P. Church, continuing in connection with that Church as a minister for twenty years. In April, 1882, he took charge of the Alexander Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, of which he now is pastor. Mr. Bain is of a genial spirit, a fluent, earnest and impressive preacher, and a faithful pastor. Whilst carefully guarding his own flock, he is ready to avail himself of every opportunity for doing good, and is ardently devoted to the Master's service.

Baird, Charles Washington, D. D., second son of the Rev. Robert Baird, D. D., was born in Princeton, N. J., August 28th, 1828. He was graduated at the University of the City of New York, in 1848, and at the Union Theological Seminary in the same city, in 1852. From 1852 to 1854 he was Chaplain to the American Embassy in Rome, Italy. Since 1861 he has been pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Rye, Westchester county, N. Y.

In 1876 the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him by his alma mater. Dr. Baird's extensive reading, ripe scholarship, and graceful rhetoric, make him an instructive and attractive preacher. Aside from his pulpit labors he has accomplished much valuable literary work, as the following list of his publications will show: "Eutaxia, or the Presbyterian Liturgies," 1855. A revised edition, under the title "A Chapter on Liturgies," was published in London, in 1856, by the Rev. Thomas Binney. "A Book of Public Prayer," compiled from the Authorized Formularies of the Presbyterian Church, as prepared by Calvin, Knox, Bucer and others, 1857. Dr. Charles W. Shields, in "Liturgia Expurgata" (p. 22, note), refers to these books as "the two learned and valuable works of the Rev. Charles W. Baird, to whom belongs the credit of a first investigator and collector of the Presbyterian Liturgies." "Chronicles of a Border Town; the History of Rye, N. Y., 1660-1870," 1871. "History of Bedford Church, New York," 1882. Several minor publications might be added to this list. Dr. Baird has also published translations of "Malan on Romanism," and of Merle d'Aubigné's "Discourses and Essays." He has now in preparation "A History of the Huguenot Emigration to America."

Baird, Henry Martyn, D. D., Ph. D., son of Dr. Robert Baird, was born in Philadelphia, January 7th, 1832. After graduating from the University of the City of New York, in June, 1850, he spent the years 1851-3 in Greece and Italy, in the former country studying in the University of Athens. On his return to this country, he studied theology in the Union and Princeton Theological Seminaries, graduating at the latter in 1856. From 1855 to 1859 he was Tutor of Greek in the College of New Jersey. In 1859 he was elected Professor of the Greek Language and Literature, in the University of New York. He was ordained to the gospel ministry in April, 1866. In 1873 he was chosen Corresponding Secretary of the American and Foreign Christian Union. Besides a number of articles in the periodical press—the New Englander, Methodist Quarterly, etc.—Dr. Baird is the author of "Modern Greece; A Narrative of a Residence and Travels in that Country," etc., and of "The Life of Rev. Robert Baird, D. D."

ROBERT BAIRD, D.D.

Baird, Robert, D.D., was born October 6th, 1798, in the neighborhood of Uniontown, Fayette county, Pa.; graduated at Jefferson College, with high honor, in 1818, and studied theology at Princeton Seminary. During the third year of his theological course he was Tutor in Nassau Hall. In 1822 he took charge of the Academy which had just been established at Princeton, and retained his connection with it between five and six years. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, in 1825, and ordained by the same body in 1828, as an Evangelist. For a time he engaged in missionary work, as General Agent of the New Jersey Missionary Society, and in this capacity did effective service. In 1829 he accepted the office of General Agent of the American Sunday School Union, which he filled with great acceptance for six years. In 1835 he entered upon a sphere of labor which occupied all the energies of the remaining years of his life; the promotion of the interests of evangelized religion in the various countries of Continental Europe; a course of philanthropic labor which it has been justly said has not been excelled in its aims and usefulness by that of any man of our times. He died March 15th, 1863.

Dr. Baird was the author of a number of valuable works, some of which have obtained a very wide circulation, both in this country and in Europe. He was highly cultivated and dignified in manner. In the sphere in which he moved he always showed himself possessed of a clear discernment of the character and motives of men, and of a calm and solid judgment, whose decisions rarely had to be reversed. He was eminently characterized by gentleness and loveliness of temper, by industry and perseverance, and by large-hearted catholicism. Though a decided Presbyterian, his Presbyterianism was, to a great extent, merged in the common Christianity. He was greatly beloved, and extensively useful. To him, to live was Christ, and to die was gain.

Baird, Samuel John, D.D., is the son of the Rev. Thomas Dickson Baird, and was born at Newark, Ohio, in September, 1817. In 1839 he took charge of a school near Abbeville, S. C., and subsequently opened a Female Seminary at Jeffersonville, La. He studied theology in the seminary at New Albany, Ind., and finished his literary training, which had been interrupted by feeble health at Jefferson College some years before, at Centre College, in 1843. After being licensed to preach, he devoted three years to the missionary work in the Presbytery of Baltimore, in Kentucky, and in the southwest. For three years he was pastor at Muscatine, Iowa, then pastor at Woodbury, N. J., until 1865. After resigning this charge, under a joint commission from the American Bible Society and the Virginia Bible Society, he labored as their agent in Virginia. He now resides, W. C., at Covington, Ky. Dr. Baird is a gentleman of decided ability. He is the author of "The Assembly's Digest," and a number of well-written volumes, beside several articles contributed to the Danville, Southern, and Princeton Reviews.

Baird, Rev. Thomas Dickson, the son of John and Elizabeth Dickson Baird, was born near Goulford, County of Down, Ireland, December 26th, 1773. He was a student of the school at Willington, S. C., of which Dr. Moses Waddel was the Principal, and for a time Tutor in the institution. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of South Carolina, April 8th, 1812, and was installed pastor of the Broadway congregation, at the village of Varennes, in what was then the Pendleton district, in May, 1813. In connection with the duties of the ministry here, which he performed much to the satisfaction of the people, he conducted a large and popular classical school. In 1815 he became pastor of the church in Newark, Ohio, and continued to labor there, as both minister and teacher, for five years. In 1820 he took charge of the church in Lebanon, Allegheny county, Pa., and continued to be a laborious and successful pastor until disabled, by laryngitis, for stated preaching.

Mr. Baird had an important agency in originating and sustaining those measures which resulted in the establishment of the Western Foreign Missionary Society, whose missions, being transferred to the General Assembly, constituted the basis of the operations of its present Board. In 1831 he took the editorial charge of the Pittsburg Christian Herald (now the Presbyterian Banner), and conducted the paper with acknowledged ability. He died January 7th, 1839. Mr. Baird was a man of respectable talents and attainments, and of consistent ministerial and Christian deportment. He was remarkable for his candor and honesty of character. In the judicatories of the Church he was always listened to with respect. In his Christian character there was nothing fitful or sparkling. But, under the influence of Christian principle, he steadily and perseveringly sought to do good and promote the glory of God.

Baker, Daniel, D. D., was born at Midway, Liberty county, Georgia, August 17th, 1791. He graduated at Princeton College in 1815; studied theology with Rev. William Hill, of Winchester, Virginia, and was licensed to preach the gospel by Winchester Presbytery, in the Autumn of 1816. The second Sabbath after his licensure he preached at Alexandria, holding services on Friday night, Saturday night and three times on the Sabbath, when awakening influences went abroad in a most remarkable manner. He was settled over the church at Harrisonburg, Virginia, where, to increase his small salary, he also taught a private school. He subsequently took charge of the Second Presbyterian Church of Washington City, where his inadequate support was supplemented by an income from a clerkship in the Land Office. Resigning his church in Washington, he became pastor of a church in Savannah, where he remained until 1831, when he began his career as an evangelist.

In connection with Dr. Baker's labors at Beaufort, S. C., there was an extensive and powerful revival of religion. While pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Frankfort, Ky., he officiated for a considerable length of time as chaplain in the Penitentiary, where his labors were blessed to the awakening of many, and even to the hopeful conversion of some twelve or fourteen. He labored for a time, with great earnestness and success, at Galveston, Texas. He also did a great work on the frontier. In arriving, toward night, at a village in which there was no Presbyterian Church, and in which he had no acquaintance, he would obtain the use of whatever public building was in the place, and hire some one to go around with the information that there would be preaching there that night. He subsequently became president of Austin College, and resided in Huntsville, where this institution is located. The close of his useful career was one of triumph. He lifted his eyes to heaven, and exclaimed, in the serene exercise of a perfect faith, "Lord Jesus, into Thy hands I commend my spirit!" As these words passed his lips he closed his eyes on earth, to open them forever on the face of that Saviour whom, not having seen, he so loved.

Dr. Baker had what are called "peculiarities;" but he was one of the most devoted and successful evangelists the country, if not the world, has ever seen. His motto was "This one thing I do." The number of those hopefully converted under his preaching, he supposed to be about 2500. His "Revival Sermons" were reprinted in 1875, in England, at the suggestion of Mr. Moody, as the best of the kind for general distribution among the people. Thus "being dead, he yet speaketh," and the truths he preached while living are still the means, in God's hands, of the conversion of souls.

Baker, George Davidson, D.D., was born at Watertown, N. Y., November 30th, 1810, from which place his parents removed to New York city in 1815. He graduated from the University of the City of New York in 1830, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1863. From 1863 to 1864 he supplied the Brainerd Church at Easton, Pa., and the Seventh Presbyterian Church at Cincinnati, Ohio. He was ordained and installed as pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church at Watertown, N. Y., in June, 1864. In October, 1867, he was called to the Presbyterian Church of Oneida, N. Y., and there installed in November of that year. In June, 1871, he was called to the First Presbyterian Church of Detroit, Mich. (formerly Dr. Duffield's), and installed in October of the same year. He still remains its esteemed and efficient pastor. Dr. Baker's labors in this congregation have been marked with large success, in the increase of church members, and of working organizations among them, especially so among the ladies and young people. As a preacher, he commands the respect of the entire community and the affection of a united and large congregation.

Baker, Hon. James M., LL. D., son of Archibald Baker and Catherine (McCallum) Baker, was born, July 20th, 1821, in Robeson County, North Carolina. He graduated at Davidson College in 1841, immediately began the study of law, and, in 1846, was admitted to practice in the courts of Florida, to which State he had removed. In 1853 he was appointed State's Solicitor, which position he held for three years, faithfully performing its duties. In 1856 he was elected Judge of the Circuit Court, and held the office with ability and fidelity, until 1862, when he resigned. Subsequently, he resumed the practice of law in Lake City. Soon after returning to the Bar, he was appointed one of the Justices of the Supreme Court, which position he held for two years, again resuming practice in 1868, which he continued with success until 1881, when he was appointed Judge of the Fourth Judicial Circuit. This office he now fills.

Judge Baker was made an elder of the Presbyterian Church, Lake City, in 1856, and is now elder of the Presbyterian Church (Southern) in Jacksonville, Florida. In both State and Church he sustains a high character, and is greatly respected and beloved for his uprightness, integrity and Christian excellence. His counsels in the courts of the Church are judicious, his devotion to her interests is deep and earnest, and his contributions to her causes are frequent and generous. As a man he is honored with public esteem, as a jurist he is able and successful, and as a judge he is courteous, but firm, kind, but just and impartial. He was a delegate to the Pan-Presbyterian Council, which met in Philadelphia in 1880, and he has frequently been a member of the inferior and superior courts of the Church, in whose deliberations he always takes an active and influential part.

Baker, William Munford, D. D., was born in Washington, D. C., June 5th, 1825. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1846, and studied theology at Princeton Seminary. He was stated supply at Batesville, Arkansas, in 1849, and at Galveston, Texas, in 1850. He was subsequently pastor at Austin, 1850-65; at Zanesville, O., 1866-72; at Newburyport, Mass., 1872-74; at Boston, 1874-81; and at Philadelphia (South Presbyterian Church), 1881-2; being soon obliged to relinquish this pastorate on account of impaired health. He died in Boston, August 21st, 1883. While continuing his ministry Dr. Baker also entered upon literary work, and for several years was wholly given to this kind of work. One of the productions of his pen was "His Majesty Myself." He was a constant writer for the news-papers and the literary magazines, and his writings were always popular. He was a good man, a true servant of Christ, striving always to honor His name and extend the power of His truth.

Balch, Hezekiah, D. D., was born in Maryland, but removed, while a child, with his father's family, to North Carolina. He graduated at Princeton College, in 1776, and for some time after this taught a school in Fauquier County, Va. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Castle, in 1768, and ordained in 1770; performed missionary work in Virginia, and for one year preached in York, Pa. In 1784 he removed to Tennessee, and, by reason of age and experience, took the lead in organizing churches. He obtained, in 1794, a charter for Greenville. His exertions in behalf of education gave an impulse to the cause through the whole southwestern region. He died, full of labor, in April, 1840.

Balch, Rev. Hezekiah James, a native of Deer Creek, Harford County, Md., graduated at Princeton College in 1766, was licensed by the Presbytery of Donegal in 1768, soon after which he removed to North Carolina. He was one of the leaders in the Mecklenburg Convention, and one of the committee that prepared the resolutions adopted by that Convention. Mr. Balch was the pastor of two churches, Rocky river and Poplar Tent. He died in 1776.

Balch, Stephen Bloomer, D. D., was a descendant of John Balch, who emigrated to New England, at an early period, from Bridgewater, in Somerset, England. A great grandson of his removed to Deer Creek, in Harford county, Md., and there the subject of this sketch was born, April 5th, 1717. While he was yet a youth his father removed with his family from Maryland, and settled in Mecklenburg, N. C. He was admitted to the degree of Bachelor of Arts, in 1774, in the College of New Jersey, and very soon after graduating became principal of the Lower Marlborough Academy, in Calvert County, Md., which position he held about four years, gaining, in an uncommon degree, the confidence and affection of his pupils. After being licensed to preach the gospel, by the Presbytery of Donegal, June 17th, 1779, he spent some months in traveling as a sort of missionary in the Carolinas. Declining a call to a congregation in North Carolina, he went, in March, 1780, to Georgetown, D. C., which was then a hamlet, with a view to establish there a Presbyterian Church. A very plain house for public worship was erected, and there were seven persons, including the pastor, who joined in the first celebration of the Lord's Supper. Shortly after this he was instrumental in establishing a Presbyterian congregation in Fredericktown, Md. His Church in Georgetown rapidly and greatly increased, as the village grew. To make his salary adequate to the support of his family he united teaching with the pastoral office. In 1821 the old church edifice was taken down, and a more commodious and more elegant house erected in its place. In 1831 Dr. Balch's house was completely destroyed by fire. He died September 7th, 1833, his death producing a great sensation in the whole community. His ministry in Georgetown extended through a period of fifty-three years. Dr. Balch had an exuberance of good humor. "The nature and permanency of his religious principles," says Dr. Elias Harrison, "were most effectually attested by the purity of his life, the stern fidelity with which he rebuked the various forms of evil, and his readiness to make personal sacrifices for the cause of Christ."

Balch, Thomas Bloomer, D. D., was a son of the Rev. Stephen Bloomer and Elizabeth (Beall)

Balch. He was born at Georgetown, D. C., February 28th, 1793. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1813, studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Baltimore, October 31st, 1816. From the Spring of 1817 to the Fall of 1819 he preached as assistant to his father, who was then in charge of the church at Georgetown, D. C., then spent nearly ten years in happy and useful labor as pastor of the churches of Snow Hill, Rehoboth, and Pitt's Creek, Md.; after which he lived four years in Fairfax county, Va., preaching as he had opportunity. Subsequently he supplied, for two years, the churches of Warrenton and Greenwich; was agent for the American Colonization Society; for nine months supplied the church at Fredericksburg, Va., then Nokesville Church, four years, and Greenwich Church, two years. Dr. Balch had a strongly literary taste, wrote much on many subjects, and published several volumes. He died February 14th, 1878. To the last his mind was clear, and he uttered many expressions of hope and faith up to his parting breath.

Baldwin, Rev. Burr, was a minister for sixty-four years. He was educated at Yale and Andover. He organized the first Sabbath School in the United States, at Newark, New Jersey, on the first Sabbath in May, 1815, and this led to the organization of the American Colonization Society, later. Most of Mr. Baldwin's ministry was spent in northern Pennsylvania. For a number of years he was pastor of the Church of Montrose, and Stated Clerk of the Presbytery of Susquehanna. He died in Montrose, Pa., in 1882, aged 92 years.

Baldwin, Elihu Whittlesey, D.D., was born December 25th, 1789, in Durham, Greene County, N. Y., whither his parents had migrated from Connecticut, shortly after the war of the Revolution. He graduated, with high honor, at Yale College, in September, 1812, studied theology at Andover Seminary, and was licensed in due form by the Presbytery of Newburyport, May 1st, 1817. Having accepted the place of a city missionary in New York, his labors were very soon attended with a manifest blessing, and resulted in the building of a place of worship and the formation of a church, which, in due time, was received under the care of the Presbytery, as the Seventh Presbyterian Church, of which he was installed pastor, December 25th, 1820.

Few men have ever more fully exemplified the virtues or the graces of an apostolic ministry. With scarcely one of the gifts of genius, with an exterior pleasing and winning, indeed, but far from commanding, he had yet that excellence ascribed by a political foe to Sir Walter Raleigh, when he said of him, "He can toil terribly." Possessed of a calm and even temper, and a spirit cheerful and hopeful in the most discouraging scenes, and, while struggling against obstacles seemingly insuperable, "bating no jot of heart or hope," and never entertaining the thought of deserting his post for the difficulties which bound him to it, he accomplished a work which would have conferred fame upon abilities and endowments far superior to his own. But his good sense, unwavering firmness of purpose, steady loyalty to duty, practical tact and ready sympathy, conspired to render him "the right man in the right place."

Dr. Baldwin's piety was unostentatious, but deep and fervent, and no showy exterior gave a counterfeit promise of his real worth. "None knew him but to love" him, or could come in contact with him without feeling that he was a man in whom they could confide. Dr. Dwight, whom he served for a short time as an amanuensis, declared him fully entitled to the epithet of "the beloved disciple," and the confidence and respect of his co-presbyters—grounded on his well-tryed qualities of sound judgment, tact, perseverance, and energy, as well as his learning and piety—are sufficiently attested by their recommendation of him, in 1835, to the post of first President of Wabash College. Duty alone extorted his consent to the resignation of his charge. Like the tree rooted deeper by the blasts, his attachment to his people had been strengthened by their common experience of hardship and self-denial. A rare success had also crowned his labors. Dr. Baldwin left his people on the 1st of May, 1835, and after devoting several months to an agency in behalf of the institution over which he was to preside, directed his course towards his new field of labor. His reception, on reaching the place of his destination, was everything he could desire. He entered on his appropriate duties in the early part of November, but was not regularly inaugurated until the annual Commencement, in July of the next year. His death occurred during his Presidency of Wabash College, in 1840.

Baldwin, Matthias W., was born in Elizabethtown, N. J., December 10th, 1795. From early childhood he exhibited a remarkable fondness for mechanical contrivances. He learned the business of manufacturing jewelry, in Frankford, Pa., and in 1819 commenced it on his own account in Philadelphia, but in consequence of financial difficulties, and the trade becoming depressed, soon abandoned it. His attention was then drawn to the invention of machinery, and one of his first efforts in this direction was a machine whereby the process of gold-plating was greatly simplified. He next turned his attention to the manufacture of book-binders' tools, to supersede those which had been, up to that time, of foreign production, and the enterprise was a success. He next invented the cylinder for printing calicoes, which had always been previously done by hand-presses, and he revolutionized the entire business. When the first locomotive engine in America, imported by the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, in 1830, arrived, he examined it carefully, and resolved to construct one after his own ideas. At the earnest request of Franklin Peale, proprietor of the Philadelphia Museum, he undertook to build a miniature engine for exhibition. His only guide in this work consisted of a few imperfect sketches of the one he had examined, aided by descriptions of those in use on the Liverpool and Manchester Railway. He successfully accomplished the task, and on the 25th of April, 1831, the miniature locomotive was running over a track in the Museum rooms, a portion of this track being laid on the floors of the transepts, and the balance passing over trestle work in the naves of the building. Two small cars, holding four persons, were attached to it, and the novelty attracted immense crowds.

Having received an order to construct a road locomotive for the Germantown Railroad, the work was accomplished, and on its trial trip, November 23d, 1832, the engine proved a success. It weighed five tons, and was sold for three thousand five hundred dollars. In 1831 he constructed an engine for the South Carolina Railroad, and also one for the Pennsylvania State Line, running from Philadelphia to Columbia. The latter weighed seventeen thousand pounds, and drew at one time nineteen loaded cars. This was such an unprecedented performance that the State Legislature at once ordered several additional ones, and two more were completed and delivered during the same year, and he also constructed one for the Philadelphia and Trenton Railroad. In 1835 he built fourteen, in 1836 forty. His success was now assured, and his works became the largest in the United States, perhaps in the world. Engines were shipped to every quarter of the globe, even to England, where they had been invented, and the name of Baldwin grew as familiar as a household word. Mr. Baldwin was one of the founders of the Franklin Institute. He was an exemplary Christian, and a very useful elder of the Presbyterian Church. He gave very liberally and cheerfully of his large means for the cause of Christ. His name is held in honored remembrance in the community in which he lived. His death occurred September 7th, 1866.

Balentine, Rev. Hamilton, was born January, 1817, at Churchtown, Lancaster county, Pa. After graduating at the College of New Jersey, in 1845, he passed through the full course of three years in Princeton Theological Seminary, distinguished for his diligence, regularity and piety. Having devoted his life to the Foreign Missionary work, and an urgent call having come for help to the Indian Missions, he at once proceeded to Kowetah, a station among the Creek Indians, and in July, 1848, devoted himself to his chosen work with an ardor which never abated while he lived. Before going to the Indians he was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, February 21, 1848, and ordained as an evangelist by the same Presbytery, May 29th, 1848.

In 1850 he was appointed to assist in giving instruction at Spencer Academy, among the Choctaws, and labored there until 1852, at which time the Board opened a boarding-school for females, at Wapanucka, among the Chickasaws. The institution was opened by him about October 1st, 1852, with forty pupils, but they soon increased to one hundred in number. He remained here, laboring efficiently, until the Fall of 1855, when he visited Philadelphia for medical advice, owing to severe illness in his family. On his return, after a few months, he was placed in charge of the boarding-school for females at Good Water, among the Choctaws, and continued to labor there until 1858. Early in 1859 he returned to Wapanucka, again taking charge of the school there, and laboring at the same time as an evangelist in the surrounding region. He remained there until after the breaking out of the civil war in 1861, when all communication with the Board of Foreign Missions was cut off, as well as all support from its funds. Nevertheless he continued to labor zealously for the spiritual good of the Indians, teaching and preaching at various points among them until the beginning of 1876, when, through excessive labors, his health became feeble and precarious. His death occurred February 21st, 1876. His dying hours were full of peace and strong faith. Mr. Balentine was an humble, earnest, faithful and self-denying missionary, ever active in the great work to which he had thoroughly consecrated his life and all his powers.

Ball, Rev. Eliphalet, graduated at Yale in 1748, and was settled at Bedford, January 2d, 1754. He was dismissed, December 21st, 1768, and when his successor resigned, in 1772, he resumed the charge, and remained till 1781. Having spent four years at Amity, in Woodbridge, Conn., he removed, with a part of the Bedford congregation, in 1788, to Saratoga county. The settlement was named Ball Town, but has long since become widely known as Ballston. He died in 1797.

Banks, Hon. Ephraim, was born in Lost Creek Valley, then a part of Millin County, now Juniata, Pa., January 17th, 1791. He came to Lewistown, in 1817, and was appointed Prothonotary by Governor Findley, in 1818, serving three years, and commenced the practice of law, at Lewistown, in 1823. He was elected to the Legislature, successively, in the years 1826, 1827 and 1828. He was a member, by election, of the convention which assembled at Harrisburg, May 2d, 1837, to reform the State Constitution. He was elected Auditor General of the State, in 1850, and re-elected in 1853, serving six years, and finally was elected Associate Judge of Millin County, in 1866, which office he held at the time of his death, which occurred at his residence, in Lewistown, January, 6th, 1871.

Judge Banks was a sincere and devoted Christian. He was an elder in the Presbyterian Church at Lewistown for many years, having been elected and ordained as such, probably, in 1823, or 1824. He often represented the church in the meetings of Presbytery, and as often, perhaps, as any other elder, represented the Presbytery in the meetings of the General Assembly. As a member of Church judicatories his opinions were always looked for and respected, and he was always appointed on the most important committees. In the church at home, he was always as the pastor's right hand. According to his Scotch-Irish Presbyterian training, he was firmly settled in the well known doctrines of the Confession of Faith and Catechisms of the Presbyterian Church. Not only was he faithful in his position as an elder of the Church, but he refused not the humblest service by which he could promote the cause of the Master. He was a diligent and faithful teacher in the Sabbath School till the infirmities of age compelled him to desist. Immediately upon his death the members of the County Court held a meeting, and passed resolutions expressive of their high appreciation of his character, and the business places of the town were all closed while his funeral ceremonies were being performed.

Bannard, William, D. D., the oldest child of William and Judson Bannard, was born in England, September 22d, 1820. He came with his parents to this country in 1832, and was graduated at Union College, N. Y., in 1841, and at the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J., in 1847. He was licensed to preach by the First Presbytery of New York, April 21st, 1847, and by the same Presbytery ordained and installed over Madison Avenue Church, New York City, October 25th, 1848. He was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Kingsboro, N. Y., April 8th, 1863, and had charge of the First Presbyterian Church, Salem, N. J., from April 27th, 1869, to April 18th, 1883. He is at this time a member of the Central Presbytery of Philadelphia. Dr. Bannard is a gentleman of scholarly attainments. He is of a modest and retiring disposition, but of substantial worth. He preaches the gospel in its purity, and with ability, and is characterized by fidelity in the discharge of every duty. He is highly esteemed by his brethren.

Barbour, Lewis Green, D. D., was born in Danville, Ky., September 19th, 1829. He graduated at Centre College, in 1846, at Princeton Theological Seminary 1848, was teacher in Boyle county 1849-50, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Muhlenberg in October, 1851. He was stated supply at Bowling Green, Ky., in 1852; pastor 1854-5; stated supply at Russellville, 1852-55, and teacher at Lexington, Ky., 1857-60. He was Principal at Lexington, Mo., 1860-65; teacher at Lexington, Ky., 1865-66; Principal at Danville, 1866-74; stated supply at Silver Creek, 1872-7. Since 1874 he has been Professor in Central University, Ky. Dr. Barbour is a gentleman of genial spirit and pleasing address. His scholarship is of a high order, and he holds an eminent rank as an instructor. As a preacher he is able, instructive and impressive. He is a vigorous writer, and frequently contributes valuable articles to the religious press. He is held in high esteem in the community in which he lives, and by his brethren in the ministry. His life has been one of marked usefulness in the Master's service.

LEWIS GREEN BARBOUR, D. D.

Bard, Rev. Isaac, was born near Bardstown, Ky., January 13th, 1797. He was admitted as a student in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, upon a certificate from Transylvania Presbytery, in 1817, and licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery, April 27th, 1820. In order to complete his classical education, he entered the Senior Class of Union College, and graduated in 1821. In 1823 he was installed pastor of the churches of Greenville and Mt. Pleasant, Ky., and sustained this relation ten years. After the dissolution of the pastoral relation, he continued to reside, throughout the whole of his long life, near Greenville, and during most of those years supplied them, as well as the Mount Zion and Allensville churches, preaching zealously and constantly, but never again assuming the pastoral office. He lived to be the ministerial patriarch of all that region. His death occurred June 29th, 1878.

Barnes, Rev. Albert, was born in Rome, N. Y., December 1st, 1798. His preparatory studies were conducted in Fairfield Academy, where he gave early promise of his abilities by composing, in connection with his fellow-students, a tragedy in verse, entitled "William Tell; or, Switzerland Delivered." In early life he was a skeptic. An article in the "Edinburgh Encyclopedia," by Dr. Chalmers, entitled "Christianity," first commanded his assent to the truth and divine origin of the Christian religion. But he resolved to yield to its claims no further than thenceforward to keep aloof from its active opposers, and to lead a strictly moral life. On entering Hamilton College he experienced the deeper change that set in entirely new channels the currents of his life. He became a Christian, gave up his fondly cherished plan of preparation for the legal profession, and consecrated himself to the work of the ministry. After graduating at the institution just named, he pursued a four years' course of theological study at Princeton. In February, 1825, he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Morristown, N. J. Here he commenced the preparation of his Commentaries. After nearly five years in this pastorate, he accepted a call from the First Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, with which church he retained official connection to the day of his death.

Upon the ministry of Mr. Barnes, both in Morristown and Philadelphia, the divine blessing abundantly rested. His ministrations were characterized by Scripturalness, clearness, fullness of treatment, fairness in dealing with objections, and thoughtful spiritual power. He was a firm and fearless advocate of the Temperance reformation, nor did he ever hesitate, in the clearest and most unmistakable manner, to express his opposition to the system of slavery. "His name," says the Rev. Dr. Robert Davidson, "appears without any title, because he was conscientiously opposed to all alms in degrees. As a preacher, it is sufficient to say that he stood at the head of his profession, in an arduous post, and under peculiarly trying circumstances, yet he commanded to the last the respect and admiration of persons of intelligence and culture, both in and out of the learned professions."

As a writer Mr. Barnes was remarkably clear and lucid. It was impossible to mistake his meaning. In 1832 he published his "Notes, Explanatory and Practical, on the Gospels; designed for Sunday-school Teachers and Bible Classes." Subsequently one book after another followed, until he found himself at the end of the New Testament. During these years he also wrote his Annotations, successively, on Isaiah, Job and Daniel, which were followed by his "Notes on the Psalms." Meanwhile other works in the line of his ministerial labors were given to the press. His pen was never idle. Among his other more important published works are "The Way of Salvation," "The Atonement," "Lectures on the Evidences," and "Life of St. Paul." His two discourses, "Life at Threescore" and "Life at Threescore and Ten," are among the most charming autobiographies the world has ever seen; they show beautifully how religion can gild and cheer a Christian minister's closing years. He lived to see edition after edition of his Commentaries exhausted, until more than half-a-million of volumes were sold in his own country, and perhaps even a greater number in England, Scotland, and Ireland, while translations of many of his Notes were made into the languages of France, Wales, India and China.

The years of controversy in the Presbyterian Church which culminated in its division in 1837, and in which some of Mr. Barnes' doctrinal views were assailed, were painful years to him. But through them all he bore himself with a firmness that never passed by its excess into obstinacy, with a gentleness that never degenerated into weakness, and with a patience that was never ruffled. He remained conspicuously connected with what was known as the New School branch of the Presbyterian Church, but through press and pulpit contributed largely to that state of things which made the reunion of the Presbyterian Church possible, and which so happily characterizes the union as actually accomplished.

In 1849 Mr. Barnes was invited to a professorship in Lane Seminary, which he saw fit to decline. In 1851 the General Assembly (New School) manifested their approbation of their favorite champion by making him Moderator. About this time his eyes began to fail, and this infirmity increased to such a degree that in 1868 he resigned his charge, much against his people's wishes, but continuing, at their request, as Pastor Emeritus. To the last, however, he continued to preach occasionally in the churches, and regularly in the House of Breeze, of which he was a Manager.

"Mr. Barnes," says Dr. Herrick Johnson, "was distinguished by a rare balance of faculties. He had also a rare command of his faculties. He was 'conscience incarnate,' a man for the stake, if need be, but not for a compromise of what he believed to be the truth. Yet his heart was full of charities withal. His affectionateness and childlikeness won for him a peculiarly tender regard. As a friend he knew no guile, there being deep-rooted in his heart every tender and sympathetic virtue. As a man he was singularly regardful of the rights of man, and was always the champion of all that were oppressed, and that were of low degree."

Mr. Barnes died on December 24th, 1870, while in the performance of a sacred and tender duty. On that day he walked a mile to administer consolation to a bereaved family, but had scarcely seated himself when he experienced a difficulty in breathing, and suddenly falling back in his chair, expired, without a struggle.

Barnett, Rev. John M., son of John and Mary Morrison Barnett, was born May 20th, 1826, in Derry township, Westmoreland County, Pa. Having pursued his preparatory studies at the Blairsville Academy, he entered Jefferson College, at Canonsburg, Pa., and was graduated with the class of 1849. Before and after graduation, to the extent of four and a half years, he was associated with the Rev. Alexander Donaldson, D. D., as assistant teacher in the excellent and eminently useful Academy of Elder's Ridge, Indiana County, Pa. He was graduated from the Western Theological Seminary, at Allegheny, in the Spring of 1855, and a few weeks later was licensed and ordained by the Presbytery of Blairsville, when, under commission of the Board of Home Missions, he proceeded to the head of Lake Superior, and there labored six years in this capacity, being one of the original members of the Presbytery of Lake Superior, and of the Synod of Minnesota, O. S.

Resigning his charge he then became pastor of the Church of Mount Pleasant, O. S., in the Presbytery of Redstone, until 1869, when he took charge of the Church of Connellsville, in the same Presbytery, in which happy and useful relation he remained for the period of thirteen years. In evidence of his success, it is enough to state that, finding the Connellsville Church with a membership of one hundred and forty, he left it with two hundred and seventy-five, the Church of Dunbar having meanwhile been set off from it, which, having an efficient pastor, now reports a membership of one hundred and forty-seven. In June, 1882, Mr. Barnett gave up the pastoral office to become Financial Secretary of Washington and Jefferson College, in which service he is now (1883) very actively and usefully employed.

He is a clear, evangelical and effective preacher and vigorous pastor, and a skillful ecclesiastic. He has shown special fitness for the office of Stated Clerk, having served both his Presbytery and the Synod of Pittsburg in that capacity for many years. Of the latter body he was Moderator, in 1880, at Johnstown, Pa.

Barr, Rev. Hugh, the son of Patrick and Nancy Barr, was born in North Carolina, May 12th, 1790. His parents removed to Middle Tennessee, with their family, in 1798. He was educated in the academy of the Rev. Dr. Blackburn. On leaving the academy he began life as a teacher, and established a school for English and classical studies, at Hopewell, Tennessee. In the Indian war of the South he served as a soldier under General Jackson, leaving his young wife and his home to hazard his life for the defence of his country. He served through the whole of that struggle, taking part in its bloodiest battles, particularly that known as the "Horse-Shoe" battle. Returning home after the war, he resumed his occupation as a teacher. After a vigorous study of theology, and completing his course about the year 1819, he was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Shiloh. He was ordained and sent as a missionary to Northern Alabama, and was settled at Courtland, in that State, in the year 1821. He remained as pastor of this church for fourteen years, serving in the meantime, as he had opportunity, the destitute neighborhoods in the region about him. In this, his first settlement, he was eminently successful in winning souls, and was greatly beloved, both as a preacher and as a man. He went to Illinois in 1835, and for six months supplied the church at Pisgah, in Morgan county, and then settled at Carrolton, Green county, Ill., in November of the same year, where he remained until he closed his ministerial labors, in 1852. Here he labored hard, and long, and well, to lay the foundations of society, to establish the Church of Christ, and to build up schools and institutions of learning for the community. Mr. Barr died August 1st, 1862. As a theologian, he was sound, systematic, and scriptural. As a preacher he was thoroughly doctrinal, argumentative, and expository. As a pastor he was greatly beloved. He was full of fidelity and zeal for his Church.

Barr, Thomas Hughes, D. D., fifth son of Rev. Thomas and Susannah (Welch) Barr, was born in Greensburg, Beaver county, Pa., November 19th, 1807. He graduated at Western Reserve College, Ohio, in 1835, with honor, studied theology at Princeton, N. J., was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Wooster, June 23d, 1841. He was pastor of Wayne and Jackson churches, Ohio, 1841-7, and of Jackson Church until his death, which occurred November 29th, 1878. His third daughter, Mary, went, in the Summer of 1878, a few months previous to the death of her father, to Peking, China, where she labored under the auspices of the New York Woman's Foreign Missionary Board. On account of ill-health she was transferred, in the Summer of 1883, to California, where she still labors, under the same Board. Dr. Barr was possessed of an active, energetic and well-trained intellect. Humility and simplicity were traits of character for which he was remarkable. He was an indefatigable student. His discernment of truth was only equaled by the clearness with which his views were expressed. His was truly a gospel ministry. He had no liking for fine-spun theories that had no foundation in the Word of God. In pastoral duties he was faithful and diligent; he was a faithful Presbyter, well versed in the government and discipline of the Church, and familiar with the forms of ecclesiastical business. He was greatly beloved by the people among whom he labored. For several years he was Stated Clerk of Presbytery, several times its Moderator, and at several different times he was a commissioner to the General Assembly. Dr. Barr's death was peaceful and happy, and his record is that of an able, good and useful man.

Barr, William H., D. D., was born in Rowan (now Iredell) county, North Carolina, about the year 1779. He graduated at Hampden Sidney College in 1801, and his theological studies were conducted by the Rev. Dr. Hall. He was licensed to preach in 1806, and almost immediately after was appointed by the Synod of the Carolinas, to itinerate as a missionary in the lower parts of South Carolina. His preaching, wherever he went, was received with marked approbation, and he was solicited in several places to accept a pastoral charge; but his health at that time was not sufficiently firm to justify it. In the Autumn of 1809 he received a unanimous call from Upper Long Cane Church, Abbeville District, South Carolina; accepted the call, and continued to be the pastor of the congregation till his death, which occurred January 9th, 1843. Dr. Barr was an eloquent preacher. His style of preaching was unique. His power of condensation was eminently great. He possessed a rare talent for eviscerating his text. His definitions were remarkably precise and intelligible, and his illustrations of obscure passages of Scripture by facts from ancient history were peculiarly pertinent and satisfactory.

Barrows, John Henry, D. D., was born in Medina, Michigan, July 11th, 1847. He graduated at the college, Olivet, Michigan, in 1867; then studied theology two years at Yale Seminary and Union Theological Seminary, N. Y. For three months he preached to the Congregational Church at North Topeka, Kansas, which was strengthened and quickened under his ministrations, and enabled to erect a comfortable house of worship. From January, 1871, to April, 1872, he was Superintendent of Public Instruction in Osage county, Kansas. Subsequently he received a call to the First Congregational Church of Springfield, Ill., where he preached for fifteen months with great acceptance. In June, 1873, he went abroad for a year, and during his absence preached for several months in the American Chapel in Paris. In February, 1875, he took charge of the Elliot Congregational Church, of Lawrence, Mass., and the church, during the nearly six years of his pastorate, enjoyed a high degree of prosperity. Resigning the charge at Lawrence, August 1st, 1881, he accepted a call to the Maverick Church, of East Boston, where he labored for thirteen months.

December 8th, 1882, Dr. Barrows was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Chicago, Ill., which relation he still sustains. He also preaches on Sabbath evenings in Central Music Hall, to large audiences. He has already secured a position in Chicago that is gradually widening, and gives promise of great usefulness. His intellectual endowments are of a superior order. He is in frequent demand on the lecture platform and at college commencements. As a pulpit orator he takes high rank. His sermons are elaborate, and his memory is so good that he can easily deliver them without notes, with all the freedom and naturalness of extemporaneous discourse. He has a vivid realization of the supernatural, and an implicit faith in the power and promises of God, and looks for immediate and large results from the preached Word.

Bartlett, William Alvin, D. D., was born in Binghamton, New York, December 1th, 1832. He graduated from Hamilton College, in the class of 1852, with the first honors. After his graduation he taught Greek and Latin in a collegiate institute at Mossey Creek, Va., where he first united with the Church. He studied in Union Theological Seminary, New York, of which he is an alumnus; also a year or two in Halle and Berlin, Germany, where he was a pupil of Tholuck. He was ordained in the Congregational Church, in Owego, N. Y., in the Autumn of 1857. In the Summer of 1858 he accepted a call to the Elm Place Congregational Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. Beginning in a tabernacle, after ten years of successful labor he left a strong church and a strong membership. In the Winter of 1868 he accepted a call to Plymouth Church, Chicago. During the fire there his church became, for a few weeks, both a boarding-house and a hospital. The congregation moved up town and built a stone church, between Twenty-fifth and Twenty-sixth streets, which will contain 2000 people.

In the Fall of 1876 Dr. Bartlett accepted a call to the Second Presbyterian Church of Indianapolis, Ind. After a revival during this period, he received into the Church one Sabbath morning 147 souls, comprising heads of families and leading citizens. He was called to the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., his present charge, and commenced work June 1st, 1882. Dr. Bartlett's churches have always been prospered of the Lord, and generally in a hopeful and spiritual condition. In his early ministry he lectured throughout many States, on the lyceum platform. He has preached on many special occasions, and formerly wrote much for the press. He is an eloquent, faithful and attractive preacher, and his present important pastorate is prosperous in an overflowing attendance and a fair spiritual growth.

Bartlett, William Frederic Vincent, D. D., was born at Portland, Maine, August 20th, 1831, the third of the eight children of William and Mary (Crie) Bartlett. He was graduated at Yale College, in the Class of 1853, and studied at Union Theological Seminary, New York, 1856-59. Delicate health debarred him from undertaking any permanent charge for some years, during which, with intervals of travel, he served several Congregational and Presbyterian churches in Boston, Brookline, Mass., Concord, N. H., New Orleans, La., and elsewhere. From 1870 to 1873 he was Professor of Latin at Oakland College, Mississippi. Since 1874 he has been settled in Lexington, Ky., as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church.

Dr. Bartlett is characterized by the blending of a fervent evangelical spirit with intellectual acumen and oratorical power. Equally at home among books and men, and combining dignified and conciliatory manners and a winning presence with tact and energy in the conduct of affairs, he has been repeatedly a peacemaker, as well as a leader, and followed by the strongest personal attachments. Since his settlement at Lexington, the church has increased from two hundred and forty to four hundred and sixty members. He received the degree of D. D. in 1875, from Central University, in Richmond, Ky.

Bartlett, P. Mason, D. D., was born at Johnstown, Ohio, February 6th, 1820, and graduated at Williams College in August, 1850, and at Union Theological Seminary, New York, in May, 1853. He has been pastor, in succession, of churches in Circleville, Ohio, Lansingburgh, N. Y., and Windsor

Locks, Conn., and always labored with zeal and success. Since 1869 he has been President of Marysville College, Tenn., in which position he has rendered most efficient, patient, and self-denying service to the cause of Christian education; partially, on account of the very limited means of the Institution, supporting himself from some small resources acquired in former years. President Bartlett took so high a rank during his collegiate course, that, at Commencement, the Faculty made for him an honor before unknown in Williams, viz.: the Metaphysical Oration, and the subject of his oration was Personal Identity. He is a gentleman of fine intellectual culture, devoted to the great cause with which he is entrusted, and the Institution over which he presides with ability is blessed with growing prosperity, and exerting a wide and salutary influence.

Baxter, George Addison, D. D., was born in Rockingham county, Va., July 22d, 1771; graduated at the Academy at Lexington 1796; studied theology under the direction of the Rev. William Graham, Principal of Liberty Hall, and was licensed to preach by the Lexington Presbytery, April 1st, 1797. After he was licensed he traveled for six months through Virginia and Maryland, preaching as a missionary, and at the same time making collections for the New London Academy. On his return from this tour he again took charge of that Academy, of which he seems to have had charge during a part of the year 1793.

On the 19th of October, 1798, he accepted the Professorship of Mathematics, Natural Philosophy and Astronomy, in Liberty Hall, and on the death of Mr. Graham, the next year, he was chosen his successor as Principal. In this new relation he was also constituted pastor of the congregations of New Monmouth and Lexington. He continued his connection with the Academy, which was soon after chartered as Washington College, until the Autumn of 1829, laboring for its welfare with great fidelity and self-sacrifice, but though he retired from the Institution, he still retained the pastoral charge of the congregation.

Dr. Baxter was inaugurated Professor of Theology in Union Theological Seminary, April 11th, 1832. Besides performing the duties of his Professorship, he preached regularly to vacant congregations in the neighborhood, and for four years before his decease supplied a church twenty-five miles from his residence, the first two years two Sabbaths, afterwards one Sabbath in each month. He continued to labor without interruption almost to the day of his death, which occurred April 24th, 1841.

Dr. Baxter was a great man. He had an understanding vast in its powers of comprehension, eminently profound, logical and lucid; a judgment which seldom erred, a memory which never forgot, and an amount of fervent emotion which sent forth his great thoughts in burning and melting masses. His leading mental quality, perhaps, was clearness. His power of condensation was remarkable. In his theological exercises, though he may not have been as methodical as some others, he could extemporize great thoughts in logical order and in proper language, and so taught as to set the minds of his pupils at work. He was an extempore preacher, never, probably, having had a manuscript sermon in the pulpit in his life. His sermons were always full of solid evangelical instruction. He was deeply solemn, impressive and affectionate, and, while he never preached any other than a good sermon, he was often truly and highly eloquent. Few pastors entered more heartily into revivals of religion. Such was his modesty, that he disliked to occupy a conspicuous position, and yet no man was more ready to do honor to others, and no one rejoiced more in the prosperity and usefulness of his brethren.

Bayard, John, a friend to his country, and an eminent Christian, was born August, 11th, 1738, at Bohemia Manor, in Cecil County, Md. After receiving an academical education under Dr. Finley, he was put into the counting-house of Mr. John Rhea, a merchant of Philadelphia. Here the seeds of grace began first to take root, and to give promise of those fruits of righteousness which afterwards abounded. He early became a communicant of the Presbyterian Church, under the charge of Rev. Gilbert Tennent. Some years after his marriage he was chosen a ruling elder, and he filled the office with zeal and efficiency. Mr. Whitefield, while on his visits to America, became intimately acquainted with Mr. Bayard, and was much attached to him. They made several tours together. When his brother's widow died, Mr. Bayard adopted the children and educated them as his own. One of them was an eminent statesman.

At the commencement of the Revolutionary War Mr. Bayard took a decided part in favor of his country. At the head of the Second Battalion of the Philadelphia Militia he marched to the assistance of Washington, and was present at the Battle of Trenton. He was a member of the Council of Safety, and for many years Speaker of the Legislature. In 1785, he was appointed a member of the old Congress, then sitting in New York. In 1788 he removed to New Brunswick, where he was Mayor of the city, Judge of the Court of Common Pleas, and a ruling elder of the Church. Here he died, January 7th, 1807. His death was one of triumph.

Baylis, Elias, was a noted and beloved elder in the Presbyterian Church of Jamaica, L. I., in the time of the Revolutionary War. He stood high in the community for uprightness and ability. There are still many of his descendants in the congregation. Though blind at this time, he was chairman of the patriotic committee. The day after General Woodhull's capture August 28th, 1776, he was arrested by a neighbor who wished to do something to ingratiate himself with the British, brought before the British officer, shut up in the Presbyterian church that night, and the next day carried to the prison at New Utrecht. Mr. Baylis wanted his fellow prisoners, in the same pew with him in the church, to get the Bible out of the pulpit and read to him. They feared to do it, but led the blind man to the pulpit steps. As he returned with the Bible, a British guard met him, beat him violently, and took away the book. They were three weeks at New Utrecht, and then marched down to the prison-ship, at New York. Mr. Baylis had a sweet voice, and could sing whole psalms and hymns from memory. It is not surprising, then, to find him beguiling his dreary imprisonment in singing, among others, the 113d Psalm:—

"Lord, I am brought exceeding low,
Now let thine ear attend,
And make my foes, who vex me, know
I've an Almighty Friend.

"From my sad prison set me free,
Then I shall praise Thy name,
And holy men shall join with me
Thy kindness to proclaim."

The aged man was visited in prison by his wife and daughter. After a confinement of about two months, at the intercession of his friends, he was released, barely in time to breathe his last without a prison's walls. He died in crossing the ferry with his daughter.

Beach, Rev. Charles, son of Isaac Newton and Mary Elizabeth (Meeker) Beach, was born in Newark, N. J., April 9th, 1819. He was graduated from Woodward College, at Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1840. After his graduation, he spent one and a half years in teaching as a private tutor in Berkley county, Va.; then entered Princeton Seminary in the Fall of 1842, where he was regularly graduated in 1845. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Elizabeth, April 16th, 1845, and soon after leaving the Seminary went to Mississippi, where he was ordained May 17th, 1846, by the Presbytery of Louisiana, and installed pastor over Woodville Church, Miss. Here he labored faithfully and successfully for eleven years, until released November 20th, 1857, after which he served, as stated supply, the church of South Plains, Abbeville county, Va., from December, 1857 to December, 1867. His next charge was the Church of Snow Hill, Md., over which he was installed May 16th, 1869, and from which he was released November 26th, 1870. He was then installed pastor of the Church at Darnestown, Md., October 30th, 1871, and was released from it September 17th, 1877. His last charge was Harmony Church, Md., over which he was installed October 20th, 1878, and of which he continued to be pastor until his death, which occurred March 9th, 1881. He was conscious to the last, and his end was peaceful and happy. He said, "I am so weak, I can only trust." Mr. Beach was a man of genial and amiable spirit, yet energetic and laborious, of devoted piety, an excellent preacher, a faithful pastor, held in the highest esteem and respect by all who knew him. He brought forth much fruit in old age; no part of his ministry being so influential or successful as its last ten years.

Beadle, Elias Root, D.D., LL. D., was born in Cooperstown, N. Y., October 13th, 1812. He became converted when seventeen years of age, and turning his attention to the ministry, he studied under Dr. E. N. Kirk, of Albany, and was licensed to preach at Utica, N. Y., in 1835. The next year he was ordained at Buffalo, and assumed the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church at Albion, N. Y. In June 1839, he went as a missionary under the A. B. C. F. M. to the Druses in Mt. Lebanon. The Druse work effectually ending all work among that people, Dr.

ELIAS ROOT BEADLE, D.D., LL.D.

Beadle returned to this country, and went to New Orleans, where he assisted in editing the New Orleans Protestant. Aside from this, as the result of his wise and indomitable energy, there were organized the Third, the Fourth, and the Prytanic Street churches, over the last of which he was pastor from 1843 to 1852, when he was called to the Pearl Street Congregational Church of Hartford Conn., there remaining until 1863. In 1861, he was called to the First Presbyterian Church of Rochester, N. Y., where he labored for a year though not accepting the call. November 12th, 1865, he was installed pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, Pa., where he remained until January 6th, 1879, when he was suddenly seized with an attack of angina pectoris, on his way home from morning service, and entered into rest before the dawn of another day. His last words were: "O Lord, is this the way?"

Dr. Beadle, without the advantages of either college or seminary discipline, yet stood in the foremost rank among scholars. His thirst for knowledge was insatiable, and he was a scientist of recognized ability. He was a man of wonderful personal magnetism, both in and out of the pulpit, and his deep sympathy with the troubled and sorrowing, and his ability to comfort them in his ministrations, gave a rare power to his work. Remarkable at almost every point, he was in nothing more so than in the fervency, beauty and pathos of his prayers. Here he was inimitable. The tenderness of his manner, the majesty of his thoughts, the glorious richness of their expression, his deep sympathy with human needs, and the unwavering assurance of a Father's love, made men forget everything but God, as they knelt in His presence. His sermons were rich in thought and beautiful in expression, clear, simple, full of the power of the Holy Ghost, and captivating by their earnest, forcible, fresh presentation of truth, and by their great spirituality and helpfulness.

Beatty, Rev. Charles, was born in County Antrim, Ireland, between 1712 and 1715. His father died while he was a child. He came to Philadelphia in the care of his uncle, Charles Clinton, in 1729. He had received a classical education in Ireland, to some extent. Reaching manhood he engaged in trade, traveling, as was common in those days, on foot or with his pack-horse. Stopping at the Log College, he amused himself by surprising Mr. Tennent and his pupils with a proffer, in Latin, of his merchandise. Mr. Tennent replied in Latin, and the conversation went on in the same language, with such evidence of scholarship, religious knowledge and fervent piety, that Mr. Tennent urged him to sell what he had, and prepare for the ministry. This he consented to do.

Mr. Beatty was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery, October 13th, 1742, was called to the Forks of Neshaminy May 26th, 1743, and was ordained December 14th. The Synod sent him to Virginia and North Carolina in 1751, and he accompanied Franklin, when he, with five hundred men, came up to defend the frontier, after the burning of the Moravian missionaries at Gnadenhutten, near Lehighton. The corporation for the Widows' Fund sent him to Great Britain in 1760, to collect money for its treasury. In 1766, the Synod appointed him and the Rev. Mr. Duffield, of Carlisle, missionaries to the frontiers of the province for two months, and in fulfilling this appointment, the former passed along the Juniata, and the latter went through Path Valley, Pannet and the Cove. The Delaware town on the Muskingum, one hundred and thirty miles beyond Fort Pitt, was visited by them, and they found a cheering prospect of a door opening for the spread of the gospel among the Indians. To relieve the College of New Jersey,

Mr. Beatty sailed for the West Indies, but died, August 13th, 1772, soon after reaching Bridgetown, in Barbadoes.

Beatty, Charles Clinton D. D., LL. D., was a descendant of a family well-known in Revolutionary annals. He was born in Princeton, N. J., January 1th, 1800; graduated in Princeton College in 1818, and in the year 1819 entered Princeton Theological Seminary, where he remained three years. He was ordained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick on October 2d, 1822, and passed two years as a missionary in Kentucky, Indiana and Illinois. This was a most self-denying and perilous work in those days, and it required a heroic spirit to encounter the difficulties and face the perils of the wilderness. The young missionary was equal to his work and its requirements. In 1823 he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Steubenville, Ohio, and served that church until 1837, after which he became pastor, until 1847, of the Second Presbyterian Church in the same place. In 1829, while busy in the duties of his pastorate, he founded the Female Seminary which has furnished so many women for spheres of eminent usefulness in the home and the Church, and continued to be its efficient head until 1879, a period of fifty years. He was also a lecturer in the Western Theological Seminary, and was for a long series of years the President of its Board of Directors, always showing a profound interest in its prosperity, of which "Beatty Hall" is a standing proof. In 1862 he was Moderator of the General Assembly which met at Columbus, the capital of the State in 1803, and passed his long and useful life. He died at his residence in Steubenville, October 30th, 1882. Only two weeks before his death he presided at the first meeting of the new Synod of Ohio, and was an active member of the body.

Dr. Beatty was for more than sixty years a minister of Christ, preaching the gospel with earnestness and directness, and fulfilling all his duties as a man, a citizen, and a servant of the Church of God, with unvarying faithfulness and success. His life was a busy and useful one. Though always calm and self-possessed, he wrought with a steady, unrelaxing diligence, which produced great results. In him the thought of stewardship was the uppermost and ruling thought. He was a trustee for his Master, and every gift was used as a trust for which he was accountable to God. He gave munificently to the cause of Christ and for the welfare of men. The chief objects of his benefactions were the Western Theological Seminary and Washington and Jefferson College. But to these he added gifts to churches, and to great numbers of the suffering and needy, many of which were known only to the generous giver. The sum of his benefactions was about $500,000.

Dr. Beatty was not only a generous, but also and always a just man. His integrity was unimpeachable, and men trusted him without any lingering doubt. His love for his country came with his blood, and his love for his Church was the love of one born within its pale and serving at its altars. God spared him to see many things in which he rejoiced, and permitted him to do much for the precious Kingdom of Christ, and in an honored old age, with his work well done, he fell asleep in Christ and went to be "forever with the Lord."

Beatty, John, M. D., was an Elder in the Presbyterian Church at Trenton, N. J. He was a son of the Rev. Charles Beatty. After studying medicine, he entered the army as a private soldier, reaching by degrees, the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel. In 1776 he fell into the hands of the enemy, at the capture of Fort Mifflin, and suffered a long and rigorous imprisonment. In 1779 he succeeded Elias Boudinot as Commissioner-General of Prisoners. After the war he settled at Princeton, where he practiced medicine. He was at one time a member of the Legislature of New Jersey, and the Speaker of the Assembly. From 1795 to 1805 he was Secretary of State, of New Jersey. In 1783 and 1784 he was a member of the Continental Congress. From May, 1815, until his death, he was President of the Trenton Banking Company. Dr. Beatty was President of the Company which built the noble bridge that unites Trenton to his native county in Pennsylvania, and on May 24th, 1804, he laid the foundation stone of its first pier. He died April 30th, 1826, full of honors.

Beatty, Hon. Ormond, LL. D., son of Hon. Adam and Sarah Beatty, was born in Mason county, Ky., August 13th, 1815. In 1832 he entered the Freshman class of Centre College, and was graduated in 1835, having been advanced to the Sophomore class during the Freshman year, on account of his proficiency. Before his graduation he was offered the Professorship of Natural Science in his Alma Mater, which he accepted. Before entering upon its duties, however, he spent a year at Yale College. In 1847 he was transferred to the Professorship of Mathematics, which he held till 1852, when he was restored to his original chair. This position he held for eighteen years, when, in 1870, he was elected President of the College and Professor of Metaphysics. These various offices, bestowed upon him unsought, he filled with eminent success.

In 1835 Dr. Beatty united with the Presbyterian Church, in Danville, and in 1841 he was elected an elder in the First Presbyterian Church in that place.

HON. ORMOND BEATTY, LL. D.

In 1852 he became an elder in the Second Presbyterian Church, which was organized in that year. He was a Commissioner to the General Assembly which met at Nashville in 1855, in St. Louis in 1866, and in Cincinnati in 1867. In 1866 he was appointed by the General Assembly, in St. Louis, a member of a committee to confer with a similar committee from the New School General Assembly, in regard to the desirableness and practicability of reunion, and to suggest suitable measures for its accomplishment. He was appointed a delegate to the First General Council of the Presbyterian Alliance, in Edinburgh, in 1877; and was also a delegate to the second meeting of that body, in Philadelphia, in 1880. In 1882 he was elected the first President of the College Educational Association of Kentucky. In 1883 he was appointed by the Trustees of the Theological Seminary, at Danville, to present before the General Assembly, in Saratoga, all the facts touching the history and prospects of the Seminary, and to show legal and other reasons for not disturbing the relations and control of that institution, in which mission he was successful. He was appointed by this same Assembly a member of a committee to confer with a similar committee from the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church South, for the purpose of securing the co-operation of the two branches of the Presbyterian Church in all measures which could be more effectively accomplished by friendly co-operation than by separate and independent action.

Dr. Beatty is a man of great natural ability and a profound scholar, possessing a mind singularly logical and practical. A man of remarkably equable temper and a speaker of rare force and clearness, he has few equals as a public debater. As an instructor he has a happy faculty of imparting knowledge, and is greatly venerated and beloved by his pupils. Of quiet tastes and habits and of modest and retiring disposition, the many positions of honor and trust he has enjoyed have been thrust upon him unsought. Eminently wise in counsel, his influence is deeply felt in ecclesiastical and educational affairs in his own State and elsewhere.

Beatty, William Trimble, D. D. The ancestry of William T. Beatty was Scotch-Irish. He was born in Fairfield county, Ohio, June 1st, 1834. At the age of seventeen, while pursuing his academical studies at Kingston, Ohio, he united with the Presbyterian Church, at the close of a series of precious revival meetings. He graduated at Miami University in 1857. His earliest predilections had been for the legal profession, but convinced that he was called of God to preach the gospel of Christ, he entered upon a course of training for the ministry. One year he spent at the seminary in Danville, Kentucky, but finished his preparatory course at the Western Theological Seminary, at Allegheny City. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Zanesville, Ohio, in April, 1859, and ordained a minister, May 16th, 1861, by the Presbytery at Greencastle, Pa., in the church to which he was called to officiate, and over whose people he was installed as pastor. In this field he served about two years. He then accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church of New Brunswick, New Jersey, where he continued to labor until the Summer of 1867, when he was called to the pastorate of the church just organized at Shady Side, Pittsburgh, Pa., where he spent the remainder of his pastoral life, from 1867 to 1889, when impaired health compelled his resignation. Under the advice of physicians he sought the climate of Minnesota, hoping for restoration, and while strength remained continued to preach, first, during the absence of the pastor, to re-

House of Hope, St. Paul, and then to Plymouth Congregational Church of Minneapolis.

Physically, Dr. Beatty was a man whose presence and bearing arrested attention anywhere. His intellect was strong, clear, methodical and healthful. He was a brilliant and graceful pulpit orator; his piety intelligent, loving and earnest; a man whose life was perpetual sunshine, and who carried genuine culture in his very presence. He was a faithful and wise Presbyter, acting for a long term as Stated Clerk of the Presbytery of Pittsburg, and as Secretary to the Board of Directors of the Western Theological Seminary; was Secretary of the Board of Trustees, and an honored Professor in the Pennsylvania Female College, which owed its birth mainly to his personal efforts. He died at Minneapolis, Minnesota, April 10th, 1882, in the 48th year of his age. Cut off in the meridian of life, his death was a sad loss to the church and the community.

Beaver, General James Addams, was born at Millerstown, Perry county, Pa., in 1837. His father, Jacob Beaver, married Ann Eliza Addams, whose father, Abrahm Addams, had come from Berks to Perry county, about the year 1811, and purchased a tract of land, upon part of which Millerstown grew up. Jacob Beaver died in Millerstown, August, 1849, leaving a young family to be brought up by the mother, a good woman, of noble character and intellectual vigor, who made herself the companion of her children, and taught them by the example of an unswerving Christian walk. In 1845 the widow of Jacob Beaver married Rev. S. H. McDonald, a Presbyterian minister of Millerstown

In April, 1846, the family removed to Belleville, Millin county. Most of the year 1849 James spent with his grandfather, in Millerstown, where he attended school. His grandfather dying at the close of the year, he rejoined the family at Belleville, a change which was altogether to his advantage. Mr. McDonald became his father, friend and tutor, and to his loving, painstaking labor with the boy the man owes the groundwork upon which was afterwards erected a solid and liberal education. In the latter part of 1852 he was entered at the Pine Grove Academy, and his progress was so rapid that before he was seventeen years of age he was able to enter the Junior Class of Jefferson College, at Canonsburg, and hold his own with his classmates. He graduated with honor in 1856, before he had reached his nineteenth year. His class numbered fifty-six men, not a few of whom have achieved distinction in the professions.

Leaving college, young Beaver settled at Bellefonte, and entered the law office of Hon. H. N. McAllister, a distinguished lawyer of that place, who died while a member of the Convention which framed the new Constitution of Pennsylvania. He applied himself with such assiduity to his studies, that when he had barely reached his majority he was admitted to the Bar of Centre county. He was so thoroughly grounded in the principles of the law, so painstaking in his work, so ready in speech and forcible in argument, that he at once made an impression, and was accounted a young lawyer of more than ordinary promise. His preceptor, recognizing his merit, and having need of such assistance as he could render in a large and important practice, took him into partnership. He is still a prominent member of the Bar of Centre county. In 1882 General Beeber was a candidate for the Governorship of Pennsylvania. He is an active and devoted member of the Presbyterian Church, fills the office of elder, and is enthusiastic in the Sabbath-school work of the State. He is a gentleman of irreproachable character, of great popularity, an able lawyer, ready for any good cause, and one of the finest platform speakers in Pennsylvania.

Beeber, Rev. Thomas Rissel, the second child of T. D. and M. J. (Artley) Beeber, was born at Muncy, Pa., June 18th, 1848. He graduated at Pennsylvania College in 1869, at Andover Theological Seminary in June, 1872, and January 30th, 1873, was ordained as associate pastor with Rev. Charles Beecher, over the First Congregational Church of Georgetown, Mass. October 27th, 1875, he was installed pastor of the Mahoning Presbyterian Church, Danville, Pa. Here his ministry was marked by an extensive revival, and the church was strengthened by a large accession. He became pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Scranton, Pa., June 1st, 1880, which, under his ministry, has enjoyed remarkable growth and prosperity. Mr. Beeber is a vigorous, evangelical, earnest and impressive preacher. He is deeply interested in the cause of Temperance, the missionary enterprises of the day, and the reform movements of the age. He has published several discourses, including "An Historical Sketch of Old South Church, Georgetown, Mass.;" and "History of the Second Presbyterian Church, Scranton, Pa."

Beecher, Lyman, D.D., was born at New Haven, Conn., October 12th, 1775. Graduating in 1797, he then studied theology with Dr. Dwight for one year, was licensed to preach by the New Haven West Association in 1798, was ordained in 1799, and in the same year was installed pastor at East Hampton, Long Island, where he was favored with three seasons of special divine influence, in which almost three hundred souls were added to the church. In 1810 he removed to Litchfield, Conn. Here his preaching labors, during his pastorate, extended through all the neighboring region, and here he wrote his famous "Six Sermons on Intemperance." In 1826 he took charge of the Hanover Church, Boston. In this important field the sincerity and spirituality of his preaching were generally acknowledged, and it was attended by decisive results, in a revival of the spirit and increase in the number of evangelical Christians.

On the 22d of October, 1830, Dr. Beecher was unanimously elected President and Professor of Theology in Lane Theological Seminary. So devoted were the people of Boston to him that nearly two years elapsed before his arrangements were made, and he assumed his new duties. December 26th, 1832, he moved to Cincinnati, was inducted into his office, and entered upon its duties. In the Spring following he was installed the pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Cincinnati.

After giving twenty years of his life to Lane Seminary, Dr. Beecher ended his public labors in 1852, when he returned to Boston, and afterwards removed to Brooklyn, where he lived within a stone's throw of his son's (Rev. Henry Ward Beecher) house and church, and where he was for some time an honored landmark of a former generation, and an object of universal esteem and affection. His death scene was one of triumph. When his daughter, Mrs. Stowe, repeated to him the words, "I shall be satisfied when I awake in thy likeness," he answered, "How wonderful, that a creature can approach the Creator so as to awake in his likeness! Oh, glorious, glorious God." The last indication of life on the day of his death was a mute response to his wife, repeating—

"Jesus, lover of my soul,
Let me to thy bosom fly."

The last hours of his earthly sleep his face was illuminated with a solemn and divine radiance, and softly and tenderly, without even a sigh, he passed to the everlasting rest.

Beecher, Willis Judson, D. D., was born in Hamden, Ohio, April 29th, 1838. He was one of the seven sons and daughters of Rev. John Wyllys and Aehsa Judson Beecher. Both father and mother came from the vicinity of New Haven, Ct. Three of the sons are ministers in the Presbyterian Church.

The subject of this sketch graduated from Hamilton College in 1858, receiving the highest classical prize and the valedictory honor in his class. He received the degree of D. D. from the same institution, in 1875. After leaving college he taught three years in the Whitestown Seminary, before entering the Theological Seminary at Auburn, where he was graduated in 1861.

Mr. Beecher was ordained and installed in the Presbyterian Church at Ovid, June, 1861. He was Professor of Moral Science and Belles Lettres in Knox College, Ill., from 1865 to 1869. From 1869 to 1871 he was pastor of the First Church of Christ, Galesburg, Ill. He resigned his charge in 1871, to accept the Professorship of Hebrew in Auburn Theological Seminary, which position he still holds. Dr. Beecher is a diligent student, an excellent scholar and an able writer. Since 1865 he has written many valuable sketches and articles for the newspapers and reviews. In 1874 the Presbyterian Board published a little volume by him, entitled "Farmer Tompkins and his Bibles." In 1883 he completed a new General Catalogue of Auburn Seminary. Out of the preparation of this work grew the Index of Presbyterian ministers, published by the Presbyterian Board in the same year.

Bedford, Gov. Gunning, was for many years an elder in the Presbyterian Church. He was a lawyer of eminence in Delaware, his native State.

In 1785 and 1786 he was a member of the Continental Congress, and in 1787 was a member of the Convention which formed the Constitution of the United States. Mr. Bedford was a personal friend of Washington, Franklin and other master spirits of the Revolution. In 1796 he was elected Governor of Delaware, and soon after was the first appointee of Washington to the United States District Court of Delaware, which position he held with distinguished honor until his death, in March, 1812.

Belknap, Aaron Betts, Esq., an eminent lawyer of New York city, was born at Newburgh, N. Y., December 10th, 1816. He was ordained May 21st, 1846, ruling elder in the First Presbyterian Church of New York city, which important office he filled to the end of his life. He was also made Treasurer of the New York Presbytery, Treasurer of the Presbyterian Hospital, and a manager and trustee of various important charities, discharging every trust with fidelity and ability. In 1873 he was elected a Director of Princeton Seminary, and filled that position until his death, June 4th, 1880, discharging all its duties with punctuality, promptness and fidelity. He was often a member of ecclesiastical judicatories. He is justly spoken of, in a resolution adopted by the Presbytery of New York, as an excellent man and a faithful officer, whose fidelity to every trust, devotion to the interests of the Church, legal counsel so wise and just, and great usefulness in our judicatories and Church work, endeared him to all, and made his death a loss deeply felt.

Bell, Rev. L. G., was the pioneer missionary of the west. "Father Bell," as he was called for many years, was born in Augusta County, Va., in 1788. He served his country as a soldier in the war of 1812, and had an honorable discharge at the close of the war. He entered the ministry of the Presbyterian Church in 1827, and after a short period spent as a pastor in Tennessee, he devoted himself to the missionary work in the new regions of the northwest. Here, chiefly in Iowa, he labored diligently and successfully, exploring the country in various directions, preaching in the destitute neighborhoods, gathering the scattered members and organizing them into churches, and supplying them with the Word of Life until he could procure some one to settle permanently among them. This done, he would move on into other regions and begin again his work of organization. Thus he spent some forty-eight years, chiefly on missionary ground.

No man has done, perhaps, so much for the extension of our Church in the West, as Father Bell. Nearly all the churches in the Synod of Southern Iowa were gathered and organized by him. He organized, in all, thirty three churches, and watched over them with paternal solicitude as long as he lived. He was a man of eminent evangelical spirit, and always delighted with the triumphs of the Cross of Christ. He was characterized by courteous bearing, gentleness, and kindness towards all. As a preacher he was simple, earnest, and solemn. None could doubt his sincerity, and the depth of his convictions, or fail to see that his soul yearned over lost sinners. In 1861 the feeble health of his wife, and his own advanced age (being over seventy years), rendered it imperative to withdraw from the kind of labor to which he had then given so many years of his life. He therefore moved from Fremont county, Iowa, to Monmouth, Ill. There, with the church whose existence was owing to his labors, and with affectionate kindred, he designed to spend his declining years; but still he labored in vacant churches in the vicinity. In 1867 his beloved partner died, and although urged by his friends to spend the remainder of his lonely days in rest, he afterwards twice visited his beloved churches in Iowa, riding hundreds of miles on horseback, rather than be idle. He died May 20th, 1868, calmly and sweetly falling asleep in Jesus, in the eightieth year of his age. Such a life and such a character, if written out, would be a valuable legacy to the Church.

Bell, Rev. Samuel Henry, son of Samuel H. and Margaret Parish Bell, was born on the plantation on Long Creek, N. C., November 15th, 1819. He was graduated from Davidson College in 1840; received a diploma in Ethics and Metaphysics from the South Carolina University in 1841, and completed the course at the Columbia Theological Seminary in 1843. He was licensed to preach by the Wilmington Presbytery, in the Autumn of 1842. Ordained by Savannah Presbytery, he was installed pastor of the church at Brunswick, Georgia, December 18th, 1843. He accepted a call to Wrightsville, Pa., in the Fall of 1845, and became pastor at Port Carbon, Pa., April 26th, 1848. He was settled over his present charge, Milton, Pa., February 22d, 1882.

Mr. Bell is a man of rich mental and spiritual endowments. He belongs to that class of bold, aggressive thinkers who mould opinion. He is thoroughly original; his ideas and his methods are his own. He brings to his aid in the pulpit a well-trained imagination, an abounding fancy, and a masterly skill in the art of English expression. His thought is clear and forcible. His sermons are manly. A robust faith in the divine mysteries, ripened in the sunshine and the shower of a varied experience, and mellowed with the charity that comes of knowledge, stands out in all his discourses. The gospel's inmost spirit kindles every period and gives to his utterances a deep human interest, which never fails to stimulate. His spirituality is practical and real. He has a large, genial soul. An important element of his strength is his ability to mingle with men and win them by the worth of his personality. He is a type of the many-sided man, who finds his best field of labor in ministering to the throbbing, eager, questioning intelligence of the nineteenth century.

Bell, Rev. William Gilmore, son of Moses and Mary (Gilmore) Bell, was born at West Alexander, Pa., December 11th, 1812; was graduated from Washington College, Pa., 1836, and studied theology at Princeton Seminary. He was licensed by Redstone Presbytery, October 5th, 1837, and was ordained, May 25th, 1840, by the Presbytery of Missouri, and on the same day installed pastor of the church at Boonville, Mo., where he labored over fourteen years, until released, October 11th, 1854. During this period he also had charge of a seminary for young ladies, which he organized in 1843, and presided over until September, 1858. After this he organized the Union Church, fifteen miles from Boonville, and supplied it, 1848-60. In 1860 he removed to Texas, but returned to Missouri in 1862, supplying Warrensburg Church, Mo., 1865-66. In 1869 he again removed to Texas, and was one year, 1872-73, engaged in the work of the American Bible Society; supplied the church at Georgetown, Texas, 1873-74; labored as Presbyterial missionary, 1874-77, and supplied various churches for short periods. In 1880 he was commissioned by the Board of Home Missions to labor at Fort Concho and vicinity, and had started for that point, when he was overtaken by death. He died, September 23d, 1880. Mr. Bell was an energetic and laborious missionary, a solemn and impressive preacher, beloved and venerated by his brethren, and held in great respect and esteem by all who knew him.

Belville, Jacob, D. D., was born at Hartsville, Pa., December 12th, 1820. He graduated with honor at the College of New Jersey, in 1839, and soon after pursued a course of theological study at Princeton Theological Seminary. He was settled for a time at Phenixville, Pa., as pastor of the Presbyterian Church, and also in Maryland. Having accepted, in 1849, a call to the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church of Hartsville, Bucks county, Pa., which was composed of the part of the Neshaminy Church that withdrew from the original church in 1838, he was installed in that charge, and remained its pastor ten years. In 1859, with an associate, he established "Roseland Female Seminary," at Hartsville, and after a year or two became sole proprietor of the Institution, which continued under his direction until 1863. During the last two or three years of his residence at Hartsville he ceased his labors as pastor of the church, on account of the failure of his voice. Having for the most part recovered his health, in 1861 he accepted a call to the pastoral care of the Presbyterian Church in Holmesburg, one of the suburbs of Philadelphia, where he remained three or four years, when he was called to the church in Mauch Chunk, Pa., and in 1873 he became, by invitation, the pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Pottsville, Pa., where he still resides. Dr. Belville is an able preacher, a faithful pastor, a valuable Presbyter, and his ministry has been accompanied by the Divine blessing.

Belville, Rev. Robert B., was of Huguenot ancestry, who came to this country from France soon after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, which occurred in 1685. He was born at or near New Castle, Del., in 1790; obtained his literary education partly under the tuition of James Ross, the author of the Latin grammar then commonly in use, and partly at the University of Pennsylvania, and studied theology under the instruction of Dr. Samuel Stanhope Smith, at Princeton. He was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Neshaminy, Bucks County, Pa., October 20th, 1813, and continued in this relation for twenty-five years, beloved and eminently useful among the people of his charge, when impaired health required his resignation. During a portion of the time of his pastorate he was also engaged in teaching. In 1845 he went as a commissioner to the General Assembly at Cincinnati, and at the close of its sessions visited some relatives in Dayton, O., where he died, June 28th of that year, aged fifty-five years.

Mr. Belville was an eloquent preacher, a firm defender of the doctrines of the Calvinistic system, yet earnest in enforcing practical duty upon his hearers. He was endowed with a lively imagination and a warm emotional nature, and possessed a command of rich and appropriate language. In the pulpit and the social prayer and conference meeting his ministrations were well adapted to move the heart, improve the mind and arouse the conscience. He was able in prayer; on funeral occasions his services were peculiarly acceptable, and in sickness and affliction, in joy and sorrow, he was a welcome visitor in the homes of his people.

Benjamin, Simeon, was born at Upper Aquaglogue, L. I., May 29th, 1792. After pursuing the mercantile business in his native town, he engaged in the same occupation in New York city, and the same traits which brought him thrift in rural traffic endowed him with wealth in metropolitan merchandise. The state of his lungs induced him to choose Elmira for his home. There he employed his capital in real estate and banking, and probably did more than any other one citizen towards changing the place from the village it was to the busy and prosperous city it now is.

Mr. Benjamin, in 1836, became an elder of the Church at Elmira, and held the office while he lived. His business was enough to engross him, but he kept it subordinate to his religion. His Bible lay near at hand, in his office. He was faithful in closet devotion and family worship, and in attendance upon all meetings for social and public worship. He delighted to visit, as an elder, from house to house, and deemed it a privilege and a pleasure to attend ecclesiastical bodies. To the improvements of the parish with which he was connected he contributed liberally. The Kingdom of God at large was actively and generously promoted by him. He was a corporate member of the American Board, and a Trustee of Hamilton College and Auburn Theological Seminary. He gave Hamilton College $10,000 towards the endowment of the chair of the Latin language and literature, and left it a legacy of $10,000. He also devised $10,000 to Auburn Theological Seminary, $30,000 to the Presbyterian Board of Publication, $2,000 to the Elmira Orphan Asylum, and ——— to be divided between the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions and the American Tract Society. To Elmira College he gave $55,000, and in his will he provided for the payment of $80,000 more. Mr. Benjamin died in peace. Not the slightest fear disturbed him. No doubt troubled him. He talked of his decease as he talked of everything else, and in 1868, like an undimmed star, he rose out of sight.

Benson, Gustavus S., was born in Baltimore, Md., in 1806. When he was six years of age his parents removed to Philadelphia, where he received his early education. He subsequently entered the University of Pennsylvania, and graduated in 1823, with the highest honors. Entering the law office of the late John M. Scott, at one time Mayor of the city, and afterwards a Justice of the Supreme Court of the State, he devoted himself assiduously to the study of law, and was admitted to the Bar in 1827. He never practiced however, but soon after his admission to the legal profession he engaged in the banking business, in which he rose to prominence in the financial world. He died at his home, 1515 Spruce street, March 23d, 1883, in the seventy-seventh year of his age.

Mr. Benson was a man of remarkable activity for his age, continuing in the discharge of important public and private trusts to the last. For fifteen years he was a valued member of the Board of City Trusts. He also occupied like positions in the Franklin Fire Insurance Company, the Presbyterian Board of Publication, and the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, all of which he served with fidelity. He was an elder of the West Spruce Street Presbyterian Church, and very active and useful in discharging the duties of that office. He gave constant and effective service to the Church, and was known as a generous contributor to all its missionary and benevolent schemes. He was a commissioner several times from his Presbytery to the General Assembly, and in this capacity rendered important service in that body. Mr. Benson was an affable and dignified gentleman, a faithful friend, an exemplary Christian, and highly esteemed by the community in which his life was spent, for his sterling character.

Bergen, Rev. George Providence, was born in Mercer county, Ky., January 1st, 1820. He graduated at Centre College, Kentucky; studied theology at Princeton; was stated supply of First Church, Covington, Ky., 1848; ordained by Presbytery of Cincinnati, May 1st, 1850; stated supply at Springdale, Ohio, 1849,—pastor 1850-57; missionary at Omaha, Neb., 1857-59; P. E., Bellefontaine, Ohio, 1859-63; Principal of a ladies' boarding-school at Mount Pleasant, Ia., 1863-64; President of Birmingham College 1864-76, and pastor at Birmingham, Ia., 1864-76. Mr. Bergen is to be numbered among that noble band of Presbyterian ministers who have been the pioneers of education in their respective regions. He has left two institutions in Iowa, founded by himself. Few men have lived of a sweeter, gentler and more even temper. His opinions were of the firmest texture. He had an opinion on almost all subjects, and was usually in advance of his time. He was, in a marked degree, a spiritually minded man, and, though in robust health, most of his life, seemed ever to live as under the immediate issue of the life to come. He was passionately fond of nature, and wonderfully observant of her mysteries. He was a sound and instructive preacher, and used no notes. He died April 11th, 1876, and was buried at Birmingham, mourned by the whole community in which he had lived and labored.

Bergen, John G., D.D., was born November 27th, 1790, at Hightstown, N. J. In 1806 he entered the Junior Class, at Princeton College, and in 1810 was appointed Tutor in the Institution, resigning the position in 1812. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, in 1811. On February 17th, 1813, he was installed over the Church at Madison, N. J., and during his pastorate there were three revivals of great magnitude and interest. Released from this charge, he started with his family for Illinois, September 23d, 1828. Locating in Springfield, he preached to a Presbyterian Church which had been organized there, January 30th, 1828, by the Rev. Mr. Ellis, of nineteen members, who were all the Presbyterians known to live within a circle of twenty miles around the town. In 1829 he formed there the first Temperance Association in Central Illinois, and probably the first in the State. The cornerstone for a church edifice was laid August 15th, 1829, and it was dedicated to the worship of God on the third Sabbath of November, 1830. The year 1831 was marked by a revival, the first in Springfield. Shortly after, a movement for a second church originated, and Mr. Bergen was installed its pastor, November 25th, 1835. A new house was commenced in 1840, and dedicated November 9th, 1843. In 1847 there was a precious revival of religion.

JOHN BERGEN, D.D.

The pastoral relation of Mr. Bergen was dissolved September 27th, 1848, and from that time his active life ceased. He devoted himself to writing for the press, and to missionary effort among feeble churches here and there. During the twenty years of his life in Illinois, about five hundred members had been received into the Church in Springfield, and six churches organized in the county. He was for many years a director of the Theological Seminary of the Northwest, at Chicago. He took an active part in the reunion movement of the Church, and was made Moderator of the reunited Synod of Illinois, in July, 1870. He died, January 17th, 1872. Dr. Bergen's spirit was love, such love as made him willing, always and everywhere, to sacrifice himself, in the most wonderful charity for those who differed in opinion from himself, and in a joyousness, through life, like that of a child.

Berry, James Romeyn, D. D., was born near Hackensack, N. J., March 8th, 1827. He graduated at Rutgers College, in 1847, and at the Theological Seminary in New Brunswick, in 1850. He was ordained to the ministry and installed pastor of the Reformed Church of Piermont, N. Y., in August, 1850. His subsequent settlements in the Reformed Church were, at Syracuse, N. Y., 1851-7; Kinderhook, N. Y., 1857-63; Jersey City, N. J., 1863-8; and Fishkill-on-Hudson, N. Y., 1869-70. Dr. Berry accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church of Montclair, N. J., in 1870, where he is still settled. He is a man of unusually fine presence, and dignified but genial manners. As a pastor he is eminently wise, faithful, successful and beloved. His manner in the pulpit is impressive and forcible, and his sermons are characterized by great soundness in the faith, clearness and spirituality. He has contributed occasionally for the press, and several of his sermons and addresses have been printed.

Berry, Rev. Robert, was born July 6th, 1812, at Berryplain, King George county, Va. He received his classical education at the celebrated school of Thomas H. Hanson, in Fredericksburg, Va. After a successful practice of law in Baltimore for some time, he entered Princeton Seminary, in 1835. He was licensed by Winchester Presbytery, May 30th, 1838; labored as a missionary in Warren and Rappahannock counties, Va., nearly two years; was pastor of the Bridge Street Church, Georgetown, D. C., from October 3d, 1841, until August 28th, 1849; was stated supply of the Church at Martinsburg, Va., from April, 1850, until September, 1858; supplied the Church at Canton, Miss., for eighteen months, and, having declined its call, returned to Virginia in April, 1860, and resumed his labors in the field where his ministry began. He died November 2d, 1877. Mr. Berry was an able and accomplished presbyter, a sound and learned theologian, an earnest and instructive preacher, a faithful and sympathizing pastor, a wise and judicious counselor and a true and constant friend. His courteous manners and genial spirit made him welcome in every company, and his varied excellencies of head and heart and life attracted to him, in a remarkable degree, the confidence and love of all who knew him.

Bertram, Rev. William, on the presentation to the Synod, in 1732, of most ample testimonials from the Presbytery of Bangor, in Ireland, was received by the Presbytery of Donegal. At the same time he accepted an invitation to settle at Paxton and Derry, and was installed, November 15th, 1732, at the meeting house on Swatara. The congregations executed to him the right and title to the Indian town they had purchased. On the settlement of Mr. Bertram the congregation on Swatara took the name of Derry, and the upper congregation, on Fishing Creek, was styled Paxton. Desiring leave to confine himself to one congregation, Derry engaged to pay him sixty pounds, in hemp, corn, linen yarn and cloth, and he was released from the care of Paxton, September 13th, 1736. He died, May 3d, 1736, aged seventy-two, and "his tomb may be seen by leaving the main road, near Hummellstown, and traversing the cool, clear Spring Creek, to Dixon's Ford, where stands the venerable Derry meeting house, on the banks of the Swatara." Mr. Bertram's son was Surveyor General of Pennsylvania.

Bertron, Rev. Samuel Reading, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., December 17th, 1806; graduated at New Jersey College in 1828; was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 23d, 1831; was stated supply of the Second Church of Kensington, Philadelphia, 1831-3, and agent of the this first meeting was held," writes one of the founders, "will doubtless never be forgotten by those who were present. No seats having been provided, the children were standing in a row around the room, when Mr. Kincaid, the owner of the house, entered, and said he was sorry he had no benches to give us, but there were some pieces of scantling in the cellar, to which we were welcome. His kind offer was gladly accepted, and the rough boards arranged on bricks in the centre of the room, in such a way as to form a square, and thus the children sat and sang their first Sabbath-school hymn."

It was not long before the rooms, halls and stairways were crowded with scholars, and the question what to do with the children became a serious one. The erection of a tent was resolved upon, and on the 18th of July, 1858, a tent, erected on the north side

BETHANY PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH AND SABBATH SCHOOL.

American Sunday School Union in Mississippi, in 1831. Near the close of this year he became a resident of Port Gibson, Miss., and continued so until his death, October 7th, 1878, preaching in neighboring churches as he had opportunity. Towards the close of his life he took a lively interest in establishing Chamberlain Hunt College, in Port Gibson, and was elected its president. Mr. Bertron had an active and vigorous mind. His tastes were cultivated and refined. He was a man of large intelligence, ardent nature, deep emotions and broad sympathies. As a preacher he possessed much more than ordinary ability.

Bethany Presbyterian Church and Sabbath School, Philadelphia, Pa. On the second Sabbath of February (February 11th, 1858, a Sabbath school was opened in two second-story rooms of the house 2435 South Street, with twenty-seven scholars and two teachers. "The circumstances under which of South street, west of Twenty-first street, was opened for religious services, and a sermon preached in the morning, by Rev. Dr. Challen. In the afternoon over three hundred children, with many of their parents, assembled in the new school-room. The evening service was a very precious one, a blessed earnest of better things to come. The canvas church was crowded with a motley audience. Old people tottering on the verge of the grave, mothers with children in their arms, young men and maidens, all eagerly listened to the gospel as there preached.

So great was the success of the work during the Summer months that a portion of the lot on which the tent was pitched was purchased from Mr. R. Dunning, who had kindly given the use of the ground for the tent; and on the 18th of October the cornerstone for a chapel was laid, with appropriate services. After the history of the enterprise had been read by Mr. John Wanamaker, the Superintendent, addresses were delivered by Rev. Drs. Leyburn, Brainerd, Chambers and McLeod.

During the winter, and while the chapel was being built, the school met, first, in the depot of the Passenger Railway, and afterwards in the public school-house on Twenty-third street. The chapel cost about $3700, and measured forty by sixty feet.

On the 27th of January, 1859, the Bethany Chapel was dedicated, with appropriate services; and on the following Sabbath the Sabbath School met in the new house, with two hundred and seventy-four scholars and seventeen teachers, although less than a year had elapsed since its commencement with twenty-seven scholars and two teachers. The school assembled every Sabbath morning and afternoon, and in the evening there was preaching. On the 4th of January, 1862, the Rev. Mr. Blanvelt commenced his labors as a missionary in connection with the enterprise. After laboring faithfully for a year, he resigned, that he might go as a missionary to a foreign field. He was a good man, and loved by all the people.

After an interval of a few years, the Rev. S. T. Lowrie was called to labor in the chapel. His first sermon was preached March 25th, 1865; and on the 19th of August following he commenced active labors among the people. On the 25th of September, the same year, a Presbyterian Church was organized, under the care of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, Old School. The installation of the Rev. Mr. Lowrie took place November 11th, the sermon being preached by Rev. H. A. Boardman, D. D.

Under the ministry of Mr. Lowrie the enterprise rapidly prospered, so that the chapel became too strait, and various measures were adopted to accommodate the throngs who sought to worship there. At last it was decided to erect a more commodious building, and the large lot embracing the end of the block, at the southeast corner of Twenty-second and Shippen (now Bainbridge) streets, running back to Pemberton street, and fronting on Shippen street one hundred and twelve feet, and on Twenty-second street one hundred and thirty-eight and one-half feet, was selected as the best location, where the corner-stone of a new and larger building was laid, with appropriate services; and on Thursday, February 13th, 1870, the new chapel was dedicated.

In 1869 the Rev. S. T. Lowrie resigned, that he might accept a call to the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church at Abingdon, Pa.; and in January, 1870, Rev. J. R. Miller, of Newcastle, Pa., became the pastor. Mr. Miller proved himself a very efficient pastor, and when he was constrained to resign, at the close of 1878, to accept a call to a church at Rock Island, Illinois, he carried with him the love and respect of the people. In the month of June, 1879, a call was made out to the Rev. James B. Dunn, D. D., of Boston, who had been compelled to leave that city, owing to ill health. On the first Sabbath of October, 1879, Dr. Dunn commenced his ministrations at Bethany. After Dr. Dunn's resignation, the present pastor, Dr. A. T. Pierson, was elected, and was installed November 25th, 1883. The Bethany Church building has a front of one hundred feet, with a depth of one hundred and thirty-eight and one-half feet. The seating capacity is eighteen hundred. The Sabbath-school building covers the entire end of the block at Twenty-second street; embraces forty-eight rooms, with a seating capacity of three thousand and twenty adults and children. The cost of the ground and buildings was over $200,000. The school, at present, has forty-six officers, ninety-seven teachers, two thousand and eighty-six scholars.

Bethel Church, Fayette County, Kentucky.

There is no section of the Presbyterian Church on the American continent whose history has been more interesting or more eventful than that planted in Kentucky by the early pioneers. Their elevated and indomitable spirit, their love of liberty, both civil and religious, is traced back through Pennsylvania and the Valley of Virginia, across the broad ocean, to the north of Ireland and to the heath-clad hills of Scotland, where the heroic few stood up against fearful odds, and maintained, with unflinching courage "Christ's Crown and Covenant."

Three generations ago the silence of what was then a tangled wilderness was broken only by the howl of the wild beast or the war-whoop of the red savage. The dark forests, the impenetrable canebreaks and thickets, were stontly disputing with men armed with the axe, the rifle and firebrand, their right to the virgin soil.

Gradually, but sullenly and reluctantly, the Indian began his retreat before advancing civilization, fighting his way towards the more remote hunting grounds. The intercourse of these early settlers with the remote Eastern States was conducted in a slow, primitive style. Then the merchants rode on horseback to Philadelphia, carrying their money in saddle-bags, toiling weary days and nights through the forests and along the rugged sides of the Alleghenies, content to make their journey in thirty days, and wait patiently thirty or forty more for their wares and merchandise, transported on pack-mules, winding their way through by-paths and blazed roads.

But now, where once the red man built his council fires and danced to his war-song, the wilderness has been reclaimed and made to blossom as the rose. Where once stood the majestic forest, now stands the stately edifice where God is worshiped, the Bible read and truth proclaimed.

As near as can be now ascertained, Bethel Church was organized in the year 1789. Owing to the fact that the early Records of the church, from 1789 to 1818, were lost, many interesting incidents connected with its early history cannot now be reproduced. Even the names of the original office-bearers and members cannot now be stated with accuracy.

The following ministers of the gospel have been pastors or stated supplies in this church:—

The Rev. Samuel Shannon, who was a graduate of Princeton College, and admitted a member of Transylvania Presbytery, April 29th, 1789; took charge of the Bethel and Sinking Spring churches, and continued pastor for four years, when he resigned and took charge of the Woodford Church, where he continued preaching until the year 1806. In the year 1812 he volunteered and joined the American army, as chaplain. He was a man of great physical strength. His fist was like a sledge hammer, and he was said to have lopped off a stout branch of a tree at a single stroke of his sword when charging through the woods. The latter years of his life were spent in missionary labors, chiefly in the destitute parts of the State of Indiana, where he died, in the year 1822.

The first statement made on the present records of Bethel Church is, that the Rev. Robert M. Cunningham declined preaching at Bethel about the month of December, 1818. As Mr. Cunningham (who was from Georgia) commenced his labors as pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Lexington, Ky., in April or May, 1805, and continued in this relation fourteen years, the statement just referred to shows that while pastor at Lexington, he also supplied Bethel. On the 13th of June, 1793, the Rev. Robert Marshall (elsewhere noticed in this volume) was ordained pastor of Bethel and Blue Spring churches—known at an earlier date as McConnell's Run Church. His official connection with Bethel Church embraced a period of nearly thirty years. In the old Session Book of the church there is this record, June 16th, 1832: "Departed this life, in the full assurance of a joyful resurrection to eternal life, through our Divine Saviour, Jesus Christ, the Rev. Robert Marshall, aged seventy-two years, and the forty-second of his ministry, and for many years the venerable pastor of this Bethel Church."

Rev. Simon H. Crane was employed as stated supply for Bethel for the year 1830, for two-thirds of his time. In the year 1832 the Rev. J. H. Logan was employed as stated supply for one year. He continued to preach until December 11th, 1836. The church was then vacant for nearly two years. During that interval, occasionally the gospel was preached and the ordinances of the Church administered by Rev. J. Coons, Rev. J. C. Stiles, Rev. N. H. Hall. On the 26th of March, 1838, the Rev. J. H. Logan was again invited to resume his labors as stated supply. He continued preaching regularly until June 20th, 1850, making, in all, a ministry to this church of sixteen years. He died January 1st, 1856, in the fifty-seventh year of his age, in full faith of that Saviour he so often preached to others.

During the year 1850 the Session made unsuccessful efforts to procure the ministerial services of the Rev. R. L. Brock, Rev. F. G. Strahan, and Rev. J. C. Barnes. In the year 1851 they succeeded in procuring Rev. James H. Dinsmore as stated supply for six months. At the expiration of Mr. Dinsmore's time the Session informally invited the Rev. George Van Eman, a graduate of Danville Seminary, to supply the pulpit, which he did until the next meeting of Presbytery, when leave was given to continue his labors. He continued to preach until some time in May, 1852. On the first of May, 1856, the Rev. S. Yerkes, D. D., commenced his labors as stated supply, and continued to render this service until elected by the General Assembly of 1857 to fill the fourth professorship in Danville Theological Seminary.

On May 1st, 1858, Rev. Matthew McFeatters commenced his labors as stated supply, and August 21st was regularly called as pastor, but in the Spring of 1859 declined the call and ceased to act as stated supply. On the 18th of June, 1859, a unanimous call was given to the Rev. H. H. Allen, which he accepted, uniting preaching with teaching a school, until April, 13th, 1861, when, on account of failing health, he resigned the charge. On September 7th, 1861, Rev. M. Vanlear accepted a call to Bethel, and continued pastor until April, 1873. The present pastor is the Rev. W. George, who was elected in May, 1873, and whose ministry has been largely blessed among his people.

Bevan, Matthew L., Esq., was born at Old Chester, Delaware county, Pa., August 23d, 1777. He was for many years a commission and shipping merchant—the leading member of the firm of Bevan & Humphreys. His early religious training was among the Quakers, but he was baptized and received into the Church under the ministry of Dr. J. J. Janeway, then pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. Mr. Bevan was one of the founders of the Central Presbyterian Church of that city, and was made a Ruling Elder with Messrs. Alexander Henry and Matthew Newkirk. Through the influence of Dr. John Breckenridge, then Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Education, Mr. Bevan was led to take a deep interest in the cause of education. On the death of Mr. Alexander Henry, Mr. Bevan, who was long and intimately connected with him in educational labors, was chosen his successor in the Presidency of the Board, September 2d, 1847, which position he filled with great acceptance until his death, December 11th, 1849. His hospitality was large, and his generosity constant towards those struggling to fit themselves for the work of the ministry.

Bidwell, Hon. Marshall S., was born in Stockbridge, Mass., February 16th, 1799, and moved with his father's family to Kingston, Upper Canada, in 1812. He studied law, and when called to the Bar, his talents and integrity gave promise of the distinction he afterwards attained. He was then returned by the Reform party to the Legislative Assembly, and chosen Speaker of the House, which responsible and influential position he held for many years. But such was the disaffection of the dominant party toward the Reformers, that Mr. Bidwell removed to New York in 1838, where he formed those business connections which he so long and honorably maintained. Being early converted by the power of the gospel, its principles governed all the purposes of his life. His Christian philanthropy was manifested by his gratuitous services in works of benevolence, and his endeavors to do good unto all men as he had opportunity. As one of the original corporators of the Presbyterian Hospital in the City of New York, he evinced a deep interest in its prosperity, and, by his counsel and suggestions, contributed to its success. Grasping with strong faith eternal realities while in vigorous health, he shrank not at the prospect of sudden death; hence, his prayer was to be taken away when and where it pleased his Heavenly Father. That prayer was heard and accepted. Without any premonition, by an imperceptible and almost instantaneous transition, he died, at his office in New York, amid the crowded marts of business, October 24th, 1872.

Biggs, Thomas Jacob, D. D., the son of John and Sarah Biggs, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., November 29th, 1787; graduated at Nassau Hall in 1815; in the same year entered Princeton Theological Seminary. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia in 1817, and ordained by them in 1818, and installed pastor of the Frankford Church, Pa. His pastorate here was a very happy and useful one; many were added to the church, and a number of young men were brought into the ministry. He accepted the Professorship of Ecclesiastical History and Church Polity in Lane Theological Seminary in 1832, and resigning it in 1839, accepted the Presidency of Cincinnati College. This position he continued to fill until October 15th, 1845. He was President of Woodward College in Cincinnati from 1845 to 1851. During his presidency he ministered in the Seventh Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati, and the First Church of Walnut Hills. From October, 1852 to December, 1856, he was pastor of the Fifth Church, Cincinnati. He died February 9th, 1864. Dr. Biggs was a useful man. A beautiful trait in his character was the largeness of his Christian regards. His piety was of a cheerful type. He never seemed to see God in the pillar of cloud, but always in the pillar of light. Christ was so near to him that he felt no doubts, but rejoiced in his fellowship with Him.

Billings, Rev. Silas, was born at Somers, Tolland county, Conn., August 21st, 1801; graduated from Yale College in 1829; spent one year in teaching at Buckingham Academy, Worcester county, Md.; studied theology at Princeton; was licensed by Middlesex Congregational Association, Conn., in October, 1832, and was ordained by East Hanover Presbytery, October 19th, 1833, as an evangelist. He labored as a missionary in Prince George county, Va., from September, 1833, until October, 1836, after which he served the churches of Woodstock and Strasburg, Va., as stated supply, from October, 1836, to the Summer of 1846, through the whole time teaching a classical school five days in the week. He then went to Morgantown, West Virginia, and for seven years, 1846-53, had charge of a classical school, at the same time preaching as a supply at different points. By his energy and wisdom he here built up a large and flourishing Academy, which has since grown to be the University of West Virginia. He then became stated supply for two years, 1854-56, to the Church at Bloomfield, N. J., and afterwards to that at Orange, N. J., for two years more, 1856-58. Returning to Virginia, he became pastor of the Elk Branch Church at Duffield's Depot, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, where he was installed pastor August 17th, 1858, and through failure of health was released April 23d, 1869, and removed to Winchester, where he resided until his death. Soon after he began preaching at Elk Branch Church, he opened there a Seminary for girls, which he continued to teach until 1869. Very soon after removing to Winchester, he again opened a Seminary for females, called "Fairfax Hall," which, with the help of two of his daughters, became a most flourishing and useful institution, and so continues to this time. Yet, so long as was possible, he sought to preach, and gladly rode long distances to supply poor or vacant churches on the Sabbath. He died January 8th, 1884, at Winchester, Va. He was a man of indomitable energy, a laborious pastor, a successful teacher, a man of truly devoted and devotional spirit. His extraordinary musical gifts added much to the interest felt in his religious services.

Bingham, Rev. Samuel James, was the third son of Samuel Bingham and Mary Muldrow—both of Scotch-Irish descent—and was born in Marion county, S. C., December 6th, 1829. His father's house was the minister's home, and a nursery of piety, and thus he was reared under godly influences, which fitted him for his subsequent life of consecration and usefulness. He graduated at Oglethorpe University in 1852, and spent two years (1854-55) in the Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C. He was licensed in October, 1856, and was ordained April 5th, 1858, by the Presbytery of Tuscaloosa, and devoted himself with great ardor to the work of preaching the gospel of Christ, even to the very last Sabbath of his life. He spent the first eleven years of his ministry in the county of his boyhood, serving the churches of Elizabeth, Oxford and Hadden. Here his labors were abundant, faithful and very successful. He then spent five years of useful and successful labor in Jasper and Newton counties, Miss., a scattered field, in which he had to endure much self-sacrifice, which, however, he always bore cheerfully for the Master's sake. Thence, he went to Enterprise, Miss., and during the five years of his ministry there, gathered more than one sheaf into the Lord's garner.

His last field embraced the place of his residence, Moss Point, on the Gulf Coast, and the churches of Handsboro and Vernal. All these churches were built up and strengthened through his efforts. A handsome church edifice was erected at Moss Point, largely through his exertions. But many other churches enjoyed his occasional labors, and always with profit. He was deeply imbued with the missionary spirit, and was fond of visiting destitute regions and preaching to the poor. In this branch of labor he was greatly blessed in Alabama and Mississippi.

He was very genial and sociable in his disposition. Wherever he went he made friends of all classes. His style of preaching was plain, evangelical, earnest and practical. His whole soul was engaged in the work. He preached to win souls to Christ. He made sacrifices in order to preach. During his whole ministry he received rather a small salary. His ministry was emphatically a labor of love. Of a sympathetic nature, he was always a friend indeed to the poor, the suffering and the afflicted. He died June 25th, 1881.

Bishop, Rev. George Brown, was the son of the Rev. R. H. Bishop, D. D., and Ann Ireland, and was born in Fayette county, Ky., two miles south of Lexington, March 30th, 1810. He graduated at Miami University in 1828, studied theology at Princeton, was ordained by the Presbytery of Oxford, in November, 1833, and was pastor at Oxford, Ohio, 1833-4. In September, 1834, he was elected to the Professorship of Biblical Criticism and Oriental Literature in the Indiana Theological Seminary at Hanover, Ind., (now the Northwestern Theological Seminary at Chicago), and in this position was permitted to labor about three years. He died December 14th, 1837. Mr. Bishop was eminent in his Christian character. The Bible was his delight and constant companion. As a pastor, his dignified bearing commanded the respect and affection of his people. He never selected a text, prepared a sermon, or entered the pulpit, without first earnestly invoking the divine blessing. His prayers, exhortations, and sermons, were largely composed of Scripture language, and were pointed and discriminating. As a Professor, he was not only singularly earnest and faithful, but beloved by his classes. Every recitation was opened by prayer for divine guidance and illumination, and the first day of every month was set apart for special religious exercises. His contributions to religious purposes often exceeded twice the amount which, at the beginning of the year, he had set apart for benevolent objects. Few men have given so great promise of usefulness to the Church, or have, in so short a time, accomplished so much for the honor of our Master.

Bishop, Rev. Pierpont E., was born in Amherst county, Va., in 1803, graduated at Hampden Sidney College, Va., in 1829, and at Union Theological Seminary in 1833. After being licensed by the Presbytery of West Hanover, he was ordained pastor of Ebenezer and Unity churches, South Carolina, in 1834, and remained in Ebenezer until 1846. In 1845 he resigned his charge in Unity, and preached in Yorkville. During six of these years he was at the head of an Academy. Soon after leaving Ebenezer, he preached at Bethesda, as stated supply until 1851, when he was installed pastor in 1855. Having organized Zion Church, he preached for them one-fourth of his time. In 1856, he left Bethesda, and became pastor of Bennettsville and Great Pee Dee churches, and preached to the destitutions of the neighborhood. He died March 5th, 1859. Mr. Bishop was of an eminently practical turn of mind, a ready off-hand speaker, a faithful and laborious pastor, and beloved by all.

Bishop, William, D. D., is the oldest child of Ebenezer Bishop (brother of Dr. Bishop, formerly President of Miami University) and Margaret (Hastic) Bishop. He was born in Whitburn, Linlithgowshire, Scotland, December 9th, 1825. At nine years of age he removed with his parents to America. He graduated at Illinois College in 1847; studied theology at Princeton Seminary; was licensed to preach by the Second Presbytery of New York in 1850, and ordained in 1851. From 1850 to 1852 he was a member of the Faculty in his Alma Mater, and the next seven years Professor of Greek in Hanover College. In 1859 and 1860 he was pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Lawrence, Kansas, and the first President of the University established there in 1859. In 1860 he removed to Salina, and organized the Presbyterian Church there, remaining its pastor for four years. In 1861 he was pastor of the church at Highlands, and so continued until 1869. During part of this time he was also President of Highland University. Subsequently he returned to Salina to recruit his health, and for four years was Superintendent of the public schools. From 1875 to 1877 he was pastor of the church at Independence, Kansas, whence he returned to Salina, and was again Superintendent of schools until 1882.

Dr. Bishop is a man of fine social qualities, of exceptional scholarly attainments, and varied literary culture. A genial and somewhat humorous disposition lends additional interest to his conversation, as well as to his public discourses. While devoting the greater portion of his life to educational interests, and always with success, he is at the same time a preacher of marked ability and power. In clear analysis, logical arrangement, vigor of style and elegance of diction, his pulpit preparations will stand the severest criticism. A number of his addresses have been published, viz.: "Original Thinking," "Scholarly Culture and Character," "Philosophy of Education," "Moral Culture in Schools," the Centennial Sermon before the Synod of Kansas, in 1876, etc.

Black, Rev. John, a South Carolinian by birth, and a graduate of Princeton College, was licensed by Donegal Presbytery, October 14th, 1773, and was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Upper Marsh Creek, York County, Pa., August 15th, 1775. On the 10th of April, 1791, he was released from his charge, but continued to preach in various places without any regular settlement. Mr. Black possessed a high order of talent, and was especially fond of philosophical disquisitions. He died August 6th, 1802, in the exercise of a triumphant faith.

Blackburn, Gideon, D. D., was born in Augusta county, Va., August 27th, 1772. In his boy-hood his parents removed to Tennessee. He pursued his literary course under the direction of Samuel Doak, D. D., and his theological studies under the instruction of Dr. Robert Henderson, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Abingdon, in 1792.

Mr. Blackburn established the New Providence Church, Maryville, and also took charge of another church called Eusebia, about ten miles distant. Besides his stated labors in these congregations, he preached much in the region round about, and was instrumental in organizing several new churches. During the early part of his ministry here, his situation, from the exposure of the region to Indian depredations, was one of imminent peril. In 1803 he undertook a mission among the Cherokees, and his self-sacrificing labors among them were followed with excellent results. In 1811 he removed again to West Tennessee, settled at Franklin, took charge of Harpeth Academy, and preached in rotation at five different places within a range of fifty miles, organizing, within a few months after he commenced his labors, churches at the several places at which he preached.

On November 12th, 1823, Dr. Blackburn was installed pastor of the Presbyterian church in Louisville, Ky., where his labors were greatly blessed. He was President of Centre College, Danville, Ky., from 1827 until 1830. He then removed to Versailles, Ky., where he was occupied, partly in ministering to the Church in that place, and partly as an agent of the Kentucky State Temperance Society. In October, 1833, he removed to Illinois. In 1835 he was an agent to raise funds for Illinois College in the eastern States, and whilst thus engaged, conceived a plan of establishing a theological seminary in Illinois, which resulted, after his death, in the establishment of such an institution at Carlinsville, Ill. He died August 23d, 1838.

Dr. Blackburn was much above the ordinary stature, being about six feet one or two inches high. In his manner he was easy, gentle, mild, courteous, affable, but always dignified. "He was," says one who knew him well, "not only an eloquent, but laborious and successful preacher. Like Whitefield, he loved "to range," and besides many extensive tours of preaching through various portions of the United States, his vacations in the academy and college were uniformly spent in traveling from place to place, often preaching night and day, and uniformly followed by weeping, wondering, admiring audiences wherever he went; and even during the sessions of the academy and college, often have I known him, mounted on horseback on Friday afternoon, to dash off ten, twenty and even thirty miles, preach four or five times, administer the communion on Sabbath, and return on Monday morning in time to be in his chair in the lecture-room at nine o'clock. Very many were converted under his ministry, and many churches planted and watered by his indefatigable labors."

Blackburn, William Maxwell, D. D., was born December 30th, 1828, at Carlisle, Ind. He graduated at Hanover College in 1850. He was a student of Princeton Theological Seminary, 1851-4, licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, in April, 1853, and ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Lake, September 28th, 1851. He acted as supply of the New School Church at Three Rivers, Michigan, for nearly two years, and then became stated supply of Park Presbyterian Church, Erie, Pa., which had recently been organized. The next year, 1857, he was installed pastor, and continued in this relation until 1863, the church growing rapidly under his ministry. In 1859 he wrote his first book—"The Holy Child," which was regarded at the time a model Sunday-school book. Just before this he had translated John Gerhard's Sacred Meditations. "The Holy Child" was the commencement of a series of books that flowed from Mr. Blackburn's pen. During the next ten years he wrote twenty-six volumes, chiefly for Sunday Schools, but of a high order, and which met with a large sale. Many of these were historical biographies, in which the religious and political events of the stirring days of the Reformation period were interwoven with the individual life biographically portrayed. In order to equip himself the more completely for this kind of composition, in 1862 he spent several months in Europe, visiting the places most distinguished in the Reformation, and collecting books not obtainable in this country which illustrated that period. During this time he wrote articles for Magazines, Reviews and Cyclopedias, mostly of an historical character.

In 1864 Mr. Blackburn took charge of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, Trenton, N. J. and during the four years of his pastorate the church increased in number, and through his exertions a burdensome debt was removed. In 1868 he was elected Professor of Church History in the Theological Seminary of the Northwest, at Chicago, which position he occupied with great acceptance until 1881, when he accepted a call to the Central Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati, his present field of labor. For two years of his Professorship, 1869-71, Dr. Blackburn was stated supply of the Fullerton Avenue Presbyterian Church, Chicago. In 1879 he published the "History of the Christian Church from its Origin to the Present Time," a work which has been commended in the highest terms by the religious press of all denominations. Each year of his pastorate in Cincinnati he has delivered a course of lectures on historical or religious subjects. For ten years he has lectured at Sunday-school Institutes and Assemblies. He is yet in the prime of life, enjoying excellent health, to which his genial manners and humorous disposition contribute.

Blackwood, William, D.D., LL.D., was born in the parish of Dromara, in the county of Down, Ireland, and educated in Lisburn and Dublin. He graduated in the Royal College, Belfast, where he also passed through a full course of theology. In his undergraduate course he was distinguished in the departments of Logic, Rhetoric and Belles Lettres, and also in Metaphysics and Ethics, as well in Mathematics, in each of which he was honored with premiums for excellence. After being licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Dromore, he was called to the pastorate of the church of Holywood, near Belfast, where he succeeded in erecting a very tasteful and commodious church edifice. His next field of labor was Newcastle on Tyne, the commercial capital of the north of England, where he undertook the organization of a new church, and also succeeded in having built one of the most perfect church edifices in the bounds of the Church. In recognition of his services he was placed in the Moderator's chair in the highest Court of the English Presbyterian Church.

Dr. Blackwood, in 1850, became pastor of the Ninth Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, in which relation he still continues, beloved by his people and blessed in his ministry. After the sudden decease of the Rev. Richard Webster, during his preparation of the "History of the Presbyterian Church in America," Dr. Blackwood was induced to take charge of the papers, which had been left in a state of confusion, and arrange and edit them. He has written much for magazines and other journals. His most extensive literary work is a very large and elaborate encyclopaedia, which is historical, theological, collegiate, antiquarian, architectural and biblical in its character, and indicates both research and erudition.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD, D.D., LL.D.

Dr. Blackwood has a fine clerical appearance, is dignified in his manner, and is of a very courteous, genial and gentlemanly spirit. Though he never fails to indulge his strong literary tastes, he is a hard worker in his profession, doing ample justice to his large congregation, both in pulpit ministrations and pastoral visitation. His sermons are solid, Scriptural, sound, bearing the impress of his vigorous intellect and affectionate heart. As a Presbyter he is faithful in the discharge of duty, and is always listened to by his brethren with the attention to which he is entitled by his extensive learning, mature experience and excellent character. In the community in which he has spent the third of a century as a custodian of the high interests of the gospel, he has wielded a potent influence for good, and achieved a reputation such as only real worth can gain.

Blain, Rev. Daniel, was born in Cumberland county, Va., November 20th, 1838. He is the eldest son of the Rev. Samuel Blain and Susan J. (Harrison) Blain. He graduated, in 1858, at Washington College, Va. (now Washington and Lee University). He pursued his theological studies at Union Seminary, Va., and was licensed by Lexington Presbytery, September 22d, 1866. November 29th, 1867, he was ordained to the ministry and installed pastor of Collyerstown Church, whence he was called to his present pastorate at Christiansburg, Va., and there installed, October 1st, 1871. Mr. Blain is a man of fine physique and talents, a close student, impressive as a pulpit orator, and wields a ready and graceful pen. He is the author of a history of the Christiansburg Church, containing many interesting facts as to early Presbyterianism in Southwest Virginia, and editor of the Church News, a Presbyterian monthly.

Blain, Rev. Daniel, was born in South Carolina, Abbeville District, in 1773, of the Scotch-Irish race. He passed his early life on the frontiers, in the American Revolution. Like Andrew Jackson and a multitude of Scotch-Irish boys in North and South Carolina, who, in mature years, rose to eminence and worth, he was familiar with the privations and distresses, and battles and massacres of the famous campaigns of the Southern war. When about twenty years of age he repaired to Liberty Hall, near Lexington, Va., and there completed his academic and theological course of study, in preparation for the ministry. He was licensed by Lexington Presbytery about the year 1796. He engaged with Mr. Baxter in teaching the New London Academy at Bedford, and removed with him to Lexington, being appointed Professor in the Academy. He was a member of the committee appointed by the Synod, in 1803, to establish a religious periodical if the way was clear, and under whose direction the first number of The Virginia Religious Magazine was issued, October, 1804. To that periodical he contributed a number of valuable articles. Mr. Blain was called from earth in the meridian of life, from increasing usefulness and a young family, March 19th, 1814. President Baxter loved him as his amiable professor and co-laborer, and his brethren called him "the amiable Mr. Blain." "Had the church no such lovely characters as Daniel Blain," says Dr. Foote, "her beauty would be marred, and her hands loosed."

Blair, Andrew, son of William and Sarah (Holmes) Blair, children of William Blair, Sen'r, and Andrew Holmes, Sen'r, was born at Carlisle, Pa., April 10th, 1789, and there died, most peacefully and hopefully, July 21st, 1861, in his 73d year. He had been ordained a ruling elder in the First Presbyterian Church of his native place, December 25th, 1825, and when the Second Church was organized,

January 12th, 1833, he was one of the first three elders therein elected and installed. This office he most faithfully and acceptably filled until his death, and throughout this time had taken a very active and leading part in the growth and prosperity of the church. He was also fully identified with the cause of public education in Carlisle, and had been President of the Board of School Directors for twenty-five years previous to his death. Though a very diligent and systematic business man—for his family and the Church and the public—yet he was a reading and reflecting man, and few laymen were more familiar with the Bible and better acquainted with the distinctive doctrines and principles of our Church than Mr. Blair. In understanding, appreciating and discharging the several duties of his responsible position, he was a model elder. In the Presbytery, Synod and General Assembly, he was a useful and honored member.

The Rev. Dr. A. T. McGill, who had been the excellent pastor of the Second Church, thus writes of him: "Andrew Blair was always a prince among the elders of the Church; he could 'rule well' and he was singularly 'apt to teach.' His pastor could always depend on him to visit the sick, to conduct the meetings for prayer, Bible-class teaching, and superintendency of the Sabbath school. He was an intellectual man of no ordinary power, and yet that sturdy mind was balanced admirably with fine emotions of tenderness, love and generosity. The people always loved him and revered him as an oracle. All honor to the memory of Andrew Blair! To 'do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with his God,' summed and adorned his religion to the end of his days."

Blair, Rev. John, a brother of the Rev. Samuel Blair, was born in Ireland, and was educated at the Log College, and licensed by the New Side Presbytery of New Castle at its earliest sessions. He was ordained, December 27th, 1712, pastor of Middle Spring, Rocky Spring, and Big Spring, in Cumberland county, Pa., and gave two-thirds of his time to Big Spring, dividing the remainder between the others. During his ministry here he made two visits to Virginia—the last in 1716,—preaching with great power in various places, organizing new congregations, and leaving an enduring impression of his piety and eloquence. The incursions of the Indians led him to resign his pastoral charge, December 28th, 1718. He seems to have remained without a settlement till 1757, when he accepted a call from the church at Fagg's Manor, which had been rendered vacant by the death of his brother. Here he continued nearly ten years, and succeeded his brother not only as pastor of the church, but as head of the school which his brother had established. In this latter capacity he assisted in the preparation of many young men for the ministry. In 1767 he was chosen Professor of Divinity and Moral Philosophy in the College of New Jersey, and was elected President before he was thirty years of age. But soon after his election, intelligence was received from Scotland, that Dr. Witherspoon, who had previously declined the position, would, in all probability, if the call were repeated, accept it. As soon as this was known to Mr. Blair, with a modesty and magnanimity worthy of record, he immediately wrote to the President of the Board, declining the office, and accepted a call to Wallkill, in the Highlands of New York, May 19th, 1769. He died December 8th, 1771.

During the excitement growing out of the question concerning the examination of candidates on their experience of saving grace, one of the Old Side published "Thoughts on the Examination and Trials of Candidates." On this pamphlet Mr. Blair published "Animadversions," dated "Fagg's Manor, August 27th, 1766." He also published a reply to Harker's "Appeal to the Christian World," entitled "The Synod of New York and Philadelphia Vindicated." He left behind him a treatise on regeneration, orthodox, and ably written; it was published shortly before his death, with the title, "A Treatise on the Nature, Use, and Subjects of the Sacraments, on Regeneration, and on the Nature and Use of the Means of Grace." The preface is dated "Goodwill, alias Wallkill, December 21st, 1770." It was reprinted by Dr. James P. Wilson, in his collection of Sacramental Treatises.

A writer in the Assembly's Magazine says of Mr. Blair: "He was a judicious and persuasive preacher, and through his exertions sinners were converted and the children of God edified. Fully convinced of the truth of the doctrines of grace, he addressed immortal souls with that warmth and power which left a witness in every bosom. Though he sometimes wrote his sermons in full, yet his common mode of preaching was by short notes, comprising the general outlines. His labors were too abundant to admit of more, and no more was necessary to a mind so richly stored with the great truths of religion. . . . His disposition was uncommonly patient, placid, benevolent, disinterested and cheerful. He was too mild to indulge bitterness or severity, and he thought that the truth required little else but to be fairly stated and properly understood. Those who could not relish the savor of his piety, loved him as an amiable and revered him as a great man. Though no bigot, he firmly believed that the Presbyterian form of government is most Scriptural, and the most favorable to religion and happiness."

Dr. Alexander expressed the opinion that Mr. Blair, "as a theologian, was not inferior to any man in the Presbyterian Church in his day."

Blair, Rev. John Durburrow, was born at Fagg's Manor, Pa., October 15th, 1759. He was a son of the Rev. John Blair, who was ordained, December 27th, 1712, pastor of Middle Spring, Rocky Spring, and Big Spring, in Cumberland county, Pa., and who afterwards succeeded his brother as both pastor of the Church and teacher of the School at Fagg's Manor. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in the year 1775. After his graduation he was appointed, on the recommendation of Dr. Witherspoon, Principal of Washington Henry Academy, in Virginia, where he remained for a number of years. October 28th, 1781, he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Hanover. Soon after this he received a call from the church in Pole Green, in Hanover, of which the Rev. Samuel Davis had been pastor while in Virginia, and having accepted the call, was ordained to the pastoral office. About 1792 he was induced to remove to Richmond, and open a classical school. At the same time he began to gather a church, holding his services in the Capitol. In due course of time a building was erected for his congregation, on Shockoe Hill, where he officiated during the remainder of his life. He died, January 10th, 1823. Mr. Blair was highly esteemed in the community. He was a man of benevolence, of polished manners, and fitted to adorn any company. As a preacher he was solid and orthodox. His style was graceful and polished, and his delivery was in perfect keeping with his style. One of his peculiarities was that he was never willing to marry any one who had not been baptized, and sometimes, when he discovered at the moment when the ceremony was about to be performed that the bride had not received baptism, he would abruptly pause and proceed to administer it.

Blair, Rev. Samuel, was born in Ireland, June 14th, 1712. He came to America while quite young, and was educated at the Log College at Neshaminy, under the Rev. William Tennent. Having completed his classical and theological study, he was licensed to preach, November 9th, 1733, by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, and in the following September accepted a call to Middletown and Shrewsbury, N. J. Here he continued about five years, but there are no records remaining to indicate the amount of success that attended his labors. In 1739 he received a call to the Church in New London, Jersey, otherwise called Fagg's Manor, in Pennsylvania. This call he accepted, and removed to his new residence in November, 1739, but his installation did not take place until April, 1740. Shortly after his settlement at Fagg's Manor he established a classical school, which produced such men as Davies, Rodgers, Cumming, James Finley, Robert Smith and Hugh Henry, "as scholars, preachers, pastors, patriots, in their piety and success," says Webster, "a noble company, a goodly fellowship, showing the Church what manner of men the apostles and martyrs were."

In connection with Mr. Blair's ministry at Fagg's Manor, there occurred, in 1740, a very remarkable revival of religion. The number of the awakened increased very fast; scarcely a sermon or a lecture through the whole Summer failed to produce impressions, and many persons afforded very hopeful, satisfying evidence that the Lord had brought them to a true acceptance of Christ.

Mr. Blair made a tour of preaching through New England in the Summer of 1741. He was a prominent actor in those scenes which, in his day, agitated and finally divided the Presbyterian Church. He agreed with Gilbert Tennent in his opinions, and co-operated with him in his measures, and, of course, rendered himself obnoxious to the "Old Side" party in the Church. In his doctrinal views he was a thorough Calvinist, as appears from his "Treatise on Predestination and Reprobation."

Mr. Blair's last illness was contracted from his going, upon an urgent call, and in an enfeebled state of body, to meet the Trustees of New Jersey College. As he approached his end, he expressed the strongest desire to depart and be with Christ, and but a minute or two before his departure, he exclaimed, "The Bridegroom is come, and we shall now have all things." The monument over his remains in the burying ground of Fagg's Manor bears the following inscription:—

"Here lieth the body of
THE REV. SAMUEL BLAIR,
Who departed this life
The Fifth Day of July, 1751,
Aged Thirty-nine Years and Twenty-one Days."

"In yonder sacred house I spent my breath;
Now silent, mouldering, here I lie in death;
These lips shall wake, and yet declare
A dread Amen to truths they published there."

Mr. Blair was grave and solemn, yet cheerful, pleasant, even facetious, witty. He had great power as a preacher. Mr. Davies regarded him as excelled by none he had heard in England and Scotland. "When," says he, "in 1753, I passed the meeting-house where I had so often heard the great Mr. Blair, I could not help crying out, 'Oh, how dreadful is this place! this is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven.'" "He was," says Dr. Finley, in his funeral sermon, "a public blessing to the Church, an honor to his people, an ornament to his profession, who 'magnified his office.' He spoke as he believed, he practiced as he preached, he lived holy, and died joyfully."

Blair, Samuel D. D., a son of the Rev. Samuel Blair, of Fagg's Manor, Chester county, Pa., was born at that place in the year 1711. He graduated at the College of New Jersey with honor, in 1760, at the age of nineteen. He afterwards served as tutor there for about three years—from 1761 to 1764. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of New Castle, in 1764. He was popular as a preacher from his first appearance in the pulpit. His discourses were written out in full, with great care, and his elocution was at once chaste and impressive. Indeed, he seems to have been a young man of fine talents and more than ordinary acquirements for his age.

In November, 1766, Mr. Blair was installed pastor of the old South Church in Boston, as a colleague of the Rev. Dr. Sewall. On his way thither, after his acceptance of the call, he was shipwrecked in the night, losing his wardrobe and manuscripts, and escaping narrowly with his life. His exposure, on this occasion, injured his health and the loss of his sermons, which he had written with great care, depressed his spirits. He resigned his charge October 10th, 1769. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from the University of Pennsylvania, in 1790. After resigning his charge at Boston, he took up his residence at Germantown, now a part of Philadelphia, where he passed the remainder of his life, in retirement and devotion to his books, except that he served two years as chaplain in Congress, and preached at other times, occasionally, as opportunity offered. He died in September, 1818. Dr. Blair was a man of polished manners, and of amiable and generous disposition. He was also a superior scholar, a well-read theologian and an eloquent pulpit orator. He published two sermons, one of which was occasioned by the death of the Rev. Dr. John Blair Smith, Philadelphia, 1799.

Blake, James, Elder in the Third Presbyterian Church, Indianapolis, was born in Berlin, Adams county, Pa., March 3d, 1791. He came to Indianapolis in July, 1821, and was closely associated with Mr. James M. Ray, his life-long friend, and with other pioneers. They were men of integrity, morality and religious principles. Their spirit gave character to this infant community. Much of the commercial prosperity and spiritual growth of this city are due to the teaching, example and influence of these early settlers. Mr. Blake was identified for forty years with its business, its social and religious life; was President of the Board of Trade and State Board of Agriculture; opened the first large wholesale dry goods store; helped to build the first rolling mill, and to start the State benevolent institutions. The Benevolent Society was his child. He was its President and chief manager for thirty-five years. He was a great friend of the needy, and sought out the poor families. He aided in forming the first Sabbath School, and taught many who are now among the best citizens. With Mr. Ray he joined the First Presbyterian Church on the same day, in 1828, and they were elected elders on the same day, in 1830. In 1851 he withdrew, with twenty-one others, and formed the Third Presbyterian Church, in which he was then made an elder, serving till his death, November 21st, 1870. He took the deepest interest in its life and increase, which was largely due to his fidelity, energy and zeal. In work for the Church and Sabbath School he never grew weary. He was superintendent of the latter for twelve years, and a teacher till near the close of his life. He was a trustee of Hanover College, and gave to it liberally, as he did to his church, when his means permitted. In our Church courts he was often a representative, and was familiar with their proceedings. Without special reasons, his seat in the sanctuary, prayer meeting, and Sabbath School was never vacant. When occasion offered, he was always ready with words of counsel, or of prayer. Honored and beloved in life, he was in death greatly lamented.

Bliss, John Collins, D. D., the eldest child of Robert L. and Susan (Collins) Bliss, was born in Florence, Alabama, May 20th, 1837. Intending to devote himself to mercantile pursuits, through the influence of Rev. Dr. Chambers, and in connection with the "Jayne's Hall Prayer Meeting," in Philadelphia, which he was instrumental in starting, November 23d, 1857, he felt called to the ministry, and in the winter of 1858-9 entered the Western Theological Seminary. Graduating in April, 1862, he was licensed by the Central Presbytery of Philadelphia the following October. In November he was called to and began his labors in the Second Church of Carlisle, Pa., being ordained and installed by the Presbytery of Carlisle, May 13th, 1863. In November, 1867 he accepted a call to the Crescent Avenue Presbyterian Church, of Plainfield, N. J., known then as the Second, which under his ministry enjoyed almost unexampled and unceasing prosperity and growth. The new church edifice, completed in September, 1872, is one of the finest in the State. Dr. Bliss has in manners the bearing of refinement, kindness, gentleness, a peculiar and studied freedom from censoriousness and evil speaking, great caution and wisdom in executive management and as a pastor is faithful and affectionate; in the interests of temperance and kindred causes, radical but judicious. His spirit and life are marked by conscientiousness and unworldly consecration. His preaching is spiritual rather than philosophical, practical rather than theological, scriptural rather than speculative, exhibiting a chastened and refined taste, abounding in fervid eloquence of heart and voice—an eloquent and pathetic voice, expressive of deepest spiritual earnestness. He resigned the pastorate of the Church at Plainfield, in June, 1883.

Bliss, Thomas E., D. D., was born in Brimfield, Hampden county, Mass., November 25th, 1821. He graduated, with one of the class honors, at Union College, N. Y., in 1848, and completed his theological studies at Andover Seminary, in 1851. For four years he was pastor of the Congregational Church at North Middleboro, Mass., and for six years pastor of the Congregational Church at Blackstone, Mass. He spent the year 1862 at Hancock, Mich., and the next year he was connected with the Home Missionary Society, in Missouri. He had a pastoral charge in Memphis, Tenn., from 1861 to 1870, in which year he went to Denver, Col. Dr. Bliss's temperament is ardent, zealous, enthusiastic. His disposition is genial and kind. His convictions are deep, and his courage is always equal to their advocacy and maintenance. He is a faithful, fearless preacher, and his cheerfulness, strong sympathetic nature, and constant readiness to minister in his Master's name, make him a successful and beloved pastor. He lends his hand to every good work and, as a citizen, is active in support of all movements to improve public morals.

Blyden, Edward Wilmot, D. D., LL. D., was born August 3d, 1832, at St. Thomas, W. I. In 1842 his father removed his family to Porto Cabello, Venezuela, where he remained two years, returning to St. Thomas in 1844. While there, the son learned to speak the Spanish language. On his return to St. Thomas he was apprenticed to the tailoring trade for five years, being allowed to attend school in the forenoon. His conversion took place under the ministry of the Rev. John P. Knox, then pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church of St. Thomas, afterward of the Presbyterian Church in Newtown, Long Island. Encouraged by his pastor to prepare for the gospel ministry, when Mrs. Knox returned to the United States, in 1850, he accompanied her, with the view of entering one of the institutions of learning to fit himself for this purpose. But his application to them, through the sentiment then prevailing in regard to the colored race, was not successful. Discouraged by the failure, he proposed to abandon his plan for future life, and return to St. Thomas. A kind letter, however, from Mrs. Knox inspired him with renewed hope, and prompted him to continued effort, which produced the crisis in his career on which his subsequent eminence and usefulness hinged.

The New York Colonization Society having offered him a passage to Liberia, he accepted it, and entered as a student the Alexandria High School, which had been but recently established at Monrovia. He sailed thither December 21st, 1850, arriving January 26th, 1851. After a slight acclimation he was received into the school by the Foreign Missionary Board of the Presbyterian Church, as a student for the ministry. He was carefully instructed for three years by Rev. David A. Wilson, when, on account of the failing health of Mr. Wilson, he assisted him in teaching, meanwhile continuing his studies, and at the same time editing the Liberia Herald. In 1855, when Mr. Wilson retired, Mr. Blyden was placed in full charge of the school, and in the same year, after the usual examinations, he was licensed and ordained by the Presbytery of West Africa. He continued Principal of the Alexandria High School until 1861, when he was elected Professor of the Greek and Latin languages of Liberia College, which position he successfully filled until he resigned to make an extended trip into the interior of Africa. In 1861 he was made Secretary of State and afterwards Secretary of the Interior. In 1877 he was appointed Minister Plenipotentiary to England. In 1881 he was chosen President of Liberia College; meanwhile traveling extensively, making frequent visits to England, America, and into the interior of Africa.

Dr. Blyden is a laborious and eminently successful scholar, a clear, forcible and erudite writer, and a linguist of rare ability. He is a member of the Athenæum Club of London, one of the foremost organizations of Europe. He is a frequent contributor to Frazier's Magazine, and the Methodist Quar- terly Review. Some of his most important articles have been, "The Negro in Ancient History;" "Mohammedanism in West Africa;" "The Republic of Liberia;" "Liberia at the American Centennial," and "Echoes from Africa." He has also written several books, among which are, "Liberia's Offering," 1862, and "From West Africa to Palestine," 1873. His visit to the United States in 1883, in the interest of Liberia College, resulted in securing the consent of a number of students who were preparing in Southern Colleges for missionary work in Africa, to complete their preparation in Liberia College, also the services of two able professors, and a valuable teacher. No Negro is more widely known, or more eagerly sought and respected by scholars, and awarded a higher literary position in the race, than President Blyden.

Blythe, James, D. D., was born in Mecklenburg county, N. C., October 28th, 1765; graduated at Hampden Sidney College, in 1789; studied theology under the direction of Rev. Dr. Hall, of North Carolina, and was licensed by the Orange Presbytery. July 25th, 1793, he became pastor of Pisgah and Clear Creek churches, Ky.; resigned the charge in a short time; for a series of years was annually appointed a stated supply by the Presbytery, and in this way ministered to the Pisgah church upwards of forty years.

When the Kentucky Academy, in 1798, was merged in the University of Transylvania, he was appointed Professor of Mathematics, Natural Philosophy, Astronomy and Geography, and subsequently he was the acting President of the Institution for twelve or fifteen years. In 1818 he was transferred to the chair of Chemistry in the Medical Department, and retained the position until 1831. In connection with his Professorship he was associated, for some years, with Rev. James Welsh, as colleague pastor of the church in Lexington. About the time that he resigned the Presidency of the College he established a Seminary for young ladies, in which his instructions were exceedingly thorough, and his influence in this department was widely and deeply felt.

In 1816 Dr. Blythe was Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. In 1831 he was chosen Moderator of the convention of delegates from the Presbyteries which met at Cincinnati, at the suggestion of the General Assembly, on the subject of Domestic Missions. In 1832 he was elected President of South Hanover College, Ind., and for several years fulfilled the duties of the office with great acceptance, at the same time, giving more or less gratuitous instruction in the Theological Seminary in the same place. In 1836 he resigned the Presidency of the College, and from October, 1837, preached to the New Lexington Church, ten miles from Hanover, until declining health obliged him to desist from labor. During his last illness he viewed the approach of death with the utmost serenity of mind, and bore the fullest testimony to the all-sustaining power of Christian faith. He died, May 20th, 1842.

Dr. Blythe was a man of superior talents, and of very considerable erudition. He was a fluent and ready speaker, and in the pulpit especially had a good degree of fervor and animation. He probably showed his strength as a lecturer, a disciplinarian, and a debater in ecclesiastical bodies, even more than in the pulpit. He commanded great respect wherever he was known, and filled an important place in society with marked dignity and usefulness.

Blythe, Rev. Joseph William, was born at Lexington, Ky., February 21st, 1808, and was the son of the Rev. James Blythe, D.D., noticed above. He graduated at Transylvania University in 1825; studied medicine at Harvard University; graduated at Princeton Seminary, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, February 2d, 1831. His first pastorate was that of the Second Presbyterian Church of Pittsburg, Pa., which commenced January 30th, 1834, was prosperous and happy, but terminated July 26th, 1836, that he might accept an agency of the Western Foreign Missionary Society. His last charge was at Charlestown, Clarke county, Indiana. Here he died, April 25th, 1875. Mr. Blythe was a good preacher, unflinchingly faithful to his convictions of duty, warm-hearted, generous, hospitable, intelligent, a wise counsellor, and a devoted man of God.

Boal, Hon. George, was born in the County Antrim, Ireland, July 16th, 1796. When but two years old his father emigrated to the United States and settled in Penn's Valley, Centre county, Pa., where he connected himself with the Church known as Slab Cabin, now called Spring Creek, and was afterwards made an elder, in which office he served the congregation with great acceptance till the time of his death, which occurred in March, 1837. The son's education was only such as could be obtained in the common schools of the county, of which, however, he made the best possible improvement, and was therefore well qualified for all the ordinary business of a citizen, and for the offices of honor and trust to which he was afterwards appointed or chosen. He was a farmer all his life, and lived at the family homestead, which he inherited. He was elected an elder in the Church, in May, 1835, and continued to adorn the place as an honored and trusted leader in the Session and the Church till the time of his death. He was often called upon to attend Presbyteries, Synods, and General Assemblies, in all of which he was recognized as a judicious counsellor. He was equally respected and trusted in civil life. He was elected an Associate Judge of Centre county, and in 1840 a member of the State Legislature for one term. The civil offices which he held sought him, not he the offices.

The prominent points of Judge Boal's character were, soundness of judgment and eminent discretion, kindness to the poor, and liberality in giving to all benevolent objects. Willing to make sacrifices for the public good, social in his habits, and peculiarly kind in all the relations of life, he was universally beloved and respected in his immediate neighborhood. His decided piety was manifested by a conscientious and exact fulfillment of duty in every sphere he occupied. He loved the Church and was foremost in all things that pertained to its advancement.

Boardman, George Smith, D. D., was born at Albany, N. Y., December 28th, 1796; graduated at Union College in 1816; entered Princeton Seminary the same year, and graduated in 1819. After receiving license to preach the gospel, he spent about two years in traveling, on horseback, and preaching, from place to place in Ohio and Kentucky, which was then the "Far West." July 26th, 1821, he was installed pastor of the Church at Watertown, N. Y., and had a precious and fruitful pastorate there of sixteen years' duration. In 1837 he accepted a call to the Central Church of Rochester, N. Y., where he remained six years, except that he labored for six months, in 1842, at Columbus, Ohio, in connection with a very marked and productive revival, and supplied for a while the Third (or Pine Street) Church in Philadelphia. In 1843 he took charge of the Second Church at Rome, N. Y., which he left in 1847, to enter upon a short pastorate at Cherry Valley, N. Y. At the latter place he remained until 1850, when he accepted a call to the Church at Cazenovia, N. Y. This pastorate extended to 1865, a period of nearly fifteen years, in the course of which large numbers were added to the Church, the standard of piety was elevated, and the spirit and practice of Christian benevolence increased. At the end of this time impaired health required his release. But he could not be unemployed. After his health was restored he eagerly engaged in preaching, either as an occasional or stated supply. For longer or shorter periods he filled the pulpits of the First Church of Rome, N. Y., Ogdensburg, N. Y., and Little Falls, N. Y. His death occurred February 7th, 1877, in the eighty-first year of his age.

Dr. Boardman was a man of very positive convictions and of marked personal characteristics, yet he was faithful, sincere, gentle, courteous, always abounding in the work of the Lord, and always commending the gospel by his holy walk and beautiful example.

Boardman, Henry Augustus, D.D., was born at Troy, N. Y., January 9th, 1808. He graduated at Yale College in September, 1829, being the valedictorian of his class. He spent one year in legal studies, and then, having devoted himself to the work of the ministry, entered Princeton Seminary in September, 1830, and studied there three years. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, April 17th, 1833, and was ordained by the Third Presbytery of Philadelphia, November 8th, 1833, and installed as pastor of the Tenth Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. This was not only his first but his only charge, in which he continued to labor until released, May 5th, 1876, after which he continued, by a vote of the church and of the Presbytery, to hold the relation of Pastor Emeritus until his death. This occurred June 15th, 1880, in the seventy-third year of his age.

It was while yet in the Seminary that Dr. Boardman was called to the pulpit of the church just named. There he performed his great life-work of forty-six years with distinguished ability, learning and fidelity, and from this eminent position of usefulness he could not be drawn away. In 1853 he was elected by the General Assembly to be Professor of Pastoral Theology in Princeton Seminary, but he declined to accept the appointment. In 1854 he was Moderator of the (O. S.) General Assembly. In 1855 he was elected a Director of Princeton Seminary, in which office he continued until his death, being ever found unwavering, intense, and filial in his devotion to the interests of the Institution.

From the day of his settlement in the ministry Dr. Boardman became a leader in the Presbyterian Church. He speedily gained a wide and powerful influence, which he wielded always for the extension of the Church and the maintenance of her principles. He was a man of mark in all her assemblies, often appearing in her highest court: discussing important subjects with masterly ability, and assisting with wise counsels the establishment of many of the institutions which have given her strength and ministered to her rapid increase. During all the years of his pastorate he was busy with his pen, and a number of volumes treating of themes of public interest, and marked by fine scholarship and rare excellence of style, emanated from him. Some of them have been published abroad, and some, we believe, translated into other tongues.

Dr. Boardman held his position by the sedulous and conscientious cultivation of his pulpit powers. Evangelical and elevated in his thoughts, and pure, simple, and direct in his style, he charmed while instructing his people, and bound them to himself by the ties of a reverential love. He was uncompromisingly orthodox in his doctrinal beliefs, and Presbyterian in his ecclesiastical polity. Always and everywhere he maintained his Calvinistic and Presbyterian opinions, and living in times of high controversy in our own and with other denominations, he was pronounced in the defence and advocacy of those views. But he was so high-toned and courteous in his controversial character that he commanded the respect and admiration of opponents. He grew, to the end of his life, in influence, especially over his younger brethren in the ministry, with whom he was always ready to sympathize in their work and their struggles.

Board of Relief, Presbyterian. From an early period in the history of the Presbyterian Church in the United States efforts have been made to put in operation some effective plan for the sustenance and comfort of disabled ministers and their families. Most of them failed to secure their object, because they relied mainly on the clergy for the payment of the necessary premiums. This was a result to be expected, for the clergy, however rich they may be in faith, are generally poor in purse; but the main reason is to be found in the departure from the positive Divine requirement that the laity, always and everywhere, are to be charged with the temporal support of the clergy (with their families), whether in active service or withdrawn by age, disease or death.

One organization has continued in existence for many years, but its influence for good has been very limited; and, besides, it is not a Church institution, under Church control. After much discussion in religious papers and in the General Assemblies, the Ruling Elders of the Church took the matter in hand, among whom may be mentioned Judge H. H. Leavitt, of Cincinnati, and Robert Carter, of New York. Two Overtures on the subject were laid before the General Assembly of 1849, on which a report, drawn up by the Rev. Alexander T. McGill, D.D., LL.D., was presented and adopted, after thorough and earnest discussion.

A few attempts have been made since to subvert or materially modify the original plan, but the Assembly, in its wisdom, has never given encouragement to these movements.

For some time the fund was administered by a Committee of the Trustees of the General Assembly. In 1861 a similar scheme was adopted by the other Assembly and managed by a Committee of the Trustees of the Presbyterian House. At the re-union these committees were merged into one, and in 1876 the Committee was erected by the Assembly into a Board, and on the 21st of October, 1876 was chartered by the authorities of the State of Pennsylvania, with the corporate title: "The Presbyterian Board of Relief for Disabled Ministers, and the Widows and Orphans of Deceased Ministers."

In the words of its charter, "The purpose for which this Corporation is formed, is to receive, hold and disburse such real and personal estate as may be given to it for the relief and support of disabled ministers, and the widows and orphans of deceased ministers of said Church."

The plan, simple, compact and wise, embraces the following features.

I. Its basis is the Word of God. It conforms strictly to God's revealed plan, the fundamental principle of which is that the responsibility for the temporal support of those who minister in sacred things rests exclusively on the membership of the Church, the whole Church.

II. Reward for work done. Recompense for faithful ministerial service, is an essential feature of this plan. This is not almsgiving, it is in no sense eleemosynary. It pays a debt justly due, and so gives effect to the word of Christ, "The laborer is worthy of his hire."

III. The needed funds are obtained in two ways: 1st. Directly from the churches (and mainly from them), by annual contributions. 2d. By a Permanent Fund, established through legacies and large donations, the income only being applied to the uses and purposes of the Board.

IV. There is one general Treasury.

V. The only proper applicants for aid are designated by the rule, "Only members of Presbyteries in connection with the General Assembly, and the families of those who were at their death in such connection, are entitled to aid."

VI. The authority by which appropriations must be made is the Presbytery, or its Standing Committee. To that authority must every application for aid be first made. Nevertheless, special gifts take the direction indicated by the donor.

VII. Adaptation to the particular circumstances of each case as it arises, is an important feature of this plan.

VIII. The final decision in each case is entrusted to the Board, consisting of fourteen members, twelve elected, and two, the Secretary and Treasurer, members ex officio. The rule is, "While the responsibility of recommending applicants rests with the Presby- teries, and shall largely govern the action of the Board, yet the Board reserves to itself the right to appropriate according to the merits of the case, and the state of the Treasury."

IX. The Standing Committee on Relief, appointed by each Presbytery, is an agency essential in making this scheme efficient. This committee's office is twofold: 1st. To inquire into the necessities of disabled ministers and their families, with the view of bringing such cases before the Board by recommendation. 2d. To give attention to the raising of the funds necessary to sustain the cause. This is to be done by awakening an interest in all the churches of the Presbytery, so that at least one yearly collection shall be taken up in each church, and proper measures be adopted to increase the Permanent Fund by bequests and donations.

X. A statement of the doings of the Board for the year is sent up to each General Assembly, and placed in the hands of a standing committee, which reports thereon.

The first appropriation was made in November, 1852; the first report was presented to the General Assembly of 1856, and in 1861 the first Secretary was appointed, to devote to the cause his whole time, at which time it was reported that $5,308.87 had been received from the churches during the year, and fifty-two families had been assisted.

From the beginning of the work there have been gathered one million, six hundred thousand dollars, of which one million, three hundred thousand dollars have been distributed among disabled ministers, and the widows and orphans of deceased ministers of the Presbyterian Church, and three hundred thousand dollars have been invested as a Permanent Fund.

In March, 1883, Dr. Alexander M. Bruen conveyed to this Board, in fee simple, a property at Perth Amboy, N. J., covering eleven and a half acres, worth from $25,000 to $30,000. The main building is a substantial structure of stone and brick, one hundred and twenty feet front by forty deep, with three stories and a basement, containing eighty rooms, on high ground, commanding a view of Raritan Bay and the Atlantic Ocean in the distance. This is intended as a comfortable and permanent home for those whom God has, in His providence, committed to the care of this Board.

Bocock, John H., D. D., was born, it is believed, in the county of Appomattox, Va. His college studies were at Amherst, Mass. His theological training was at Union Seminary. In the counties of Buckingham, Louisa, Appomattox and Halifax, and in Parkersburg, Harrisonburg, Georgetown (D. C.) and Fineastle, at which places he was a laborer in the vineyard of the Lord (though we do not give them exactly in their succession), there are many to whom his earnest, pointed and able ministry was made a quickening power, and others to whom he was "as one that comforteth the mourners." He was a zealous man, and earnestly desired to "turn many to righteousness." He was deeply read in the great masters of history and theology. In mental acuteness he was equaled by few, and in the pulpit, in debate, in the social circle, or with the pen, his point and power of expression were often surprising and admirable. Dr. Bocoek closed his mortal life July 17th, 1872, in his fifty-ninth year. In his final illness, conscious that his work on the earth on behalf of the gospel was finished, his sole desire every day, almost every hour, uttered in tones that indicated the clearest vision and most joyful anticipations, was to depart and be with Christ.

"Bodily Exercise." The great awakening of 1801 and 1802, in Western Pennsylvania, was marked by extraordinary intensity and success. It was a memorable time of the display of divine power and grace throughout that entire region. All classes, all ages, all conditions in life were affected. The hoary-headed sinner was bowed and subdued; eyes that seldom wept poured out their tears like rain; hearts that were like the adamant were melted beneath the Spirit's power, and lips that curled with scorn at the name of Jesus, uttered cries for mercy, or lisped the praises of redeeming love.

Accompanying this work of divine grace was the remarkable effect, designated at the time and since known as "the bodily exercise," or "jerks." A writer in the Western Missionary Magazine, after referring to a solemn communion season in the congregation of Cross-Roads, at which nine ministers were present, three of whom preached on Monday, one in the house and two out in the encampments, adds: "This was a very solemn day, particularly in the house. After public worship, when the people were preparing to remove, the scene was very affecting; the house was thronged full, and when some of those without were about to go away, they found that parts of their families were in the house, and some of them lying in distress, unable to remove." Another account describes the work in a different congregation: "The administration of the Word and ordinances was accompanied with an extraordinary effusion of divine influence on the hearts of the hearers. Some hundreds were, during the season, convinced of their sin and misery, and many of them sank down and cried bitterly and incessantly for several hours. Some fell suddenly, some lost their strength gradually, some lay quiet and silent, some were violently agitated, and many sat silently weeping, who were not exercised with bodily affections."

From the account given, these affections, it is evident, were different in different individuals.

"It is no unusual thing," said Dr. McMillan, "to see persons so entirely deprived of bodily strength that they will fall from their seats, or off their feet, and be as unable to help themselves as a new-born child." "There was," says Dr. Anderson, "in some cases gradually, and in others instantly, a total loss of bodily strength, so that they fell to the ground, like Saul of Tarsus, and with oppression of the heart and lungs, with suspension of breath, with sobs and loud cries." The Rev. Robert Johnston, in a letter to the Rev. David Elliott, D. D., respecting the power of the revival in the congregation of Scrubgrass, in Venango county, Pa., of which he was at that time pastor, says: "The effects of this work on the body were truly wonderful, and so various that no physical cause could be assigned for their production. I have seen men and women sitting in solemn attitude, pondering the solemn truths that were presented, and in a moment fall from their seats, or off their feet, if they happened to be standing, as helpless as though they had been shot, and lie for ten or fifteen or twenty minutes, and sometimes as long as half an hour, as motionless as a person in a sound sleep. At other times, the whole frame would be thrown into a state of agitation so violent as seemingly to endanger the safety of the subject, and yet, in a moment, this agitation would cease, and the persons arise in the possession of all their bodily powers, and take their seats, composed and solemn, without the least sensation of pain or uneasiness.

Another fact that I ascertained beyond doubt was, that those who lay for a considerable length of time, apparently insensible, and sometimes without one discernible symptom of life, except the natural warmth and color of the skin, could hear, understand and reflect on what they heard as well as, or better than, when in possession of all their natural powers. Nor was there that kind of uniformity in the occurrence of the different effects on the body as to allow them to be ascribed to corresponding exercises of the mind. Some have been agitated in body, under pleasing exercises of mind, and others have lain motionless under the anguish of a wounded spirit. Some were under deep and pungent conviction for weeks before they felt any effect on the body, whilst some passed through the whole course of awakening and conviction, and became hopefully pious, who never felt any symptoms of bodily agitation."

"The physical effects of the excitement on the body were by no means a desirable appendage, in view of the sensible part of the community, but they were evidently irresistible, and persons were as liable to be affected in the very act of resisting as in any other circumstances; and many who came to mock and oppose remained to pray, and returned, inquiring what they must do to be saved."

In a conversation of Mr. Johnston on this subject, with the Rev. Johnston Eaton, pastor of the church of Fairview, in the Presbytery of Erie, and which is given in "Lakeside," a very interesting work by his son, the Rev. S. J. M. Eaton, D. D., the following additional particulars of this wondrous affection of the bodily powers appear: "It was not confined to the place of religious worship, but came upon men in the wood, in the fields, in the workshop, at home, and in bed. It extended to persons of different ages and temperaments. Even children were subject to the affection. The grave, the gay, the silent and talkative, the sober in judgment and the volatile, all came within the sphere of its influence. There was no distinction. Sometimes it came upon those who were professing Christians and who had given undoubted evidences of piety. On the other hand, many who were its subjects received no spiritual benefit, but went on careless as ever. And some, who were thus exercised and failed to obtain hope, yet in after years became pious, did not trace their conviction to this cause."

"I cannot," said Mr. Johnston, in the conversation just referred to, "account for the matter at all. I do not think it can be traced to physical causes. Physicians who were present, and anxious to understand the phenomena, and examined the subjects, were completely at a loss to account for the matter, or explain it to their satisfaction." And to the question of Mr. Eaton, "Was this bodily exercise encouraged by the ministers who were in charge of these meetings?" Mr. Johnston replied, "It was not. It was something we could not understand and we simply took matters as we found them. At the beginning of the revival I cautioned my people against outcries or outbursts of feeling. This seemed to have a good effect, for, although the work was very powerful, yet this bodily exercise was no interruption to the services. I have preached to a crowded assembly when more than one-half of the people were lying helpless before me during the greater portion of divine service, without the least noise or disturbance of any kind to divert or interrupt the attention of any individual from the word spoken."

The Rev. Thomas Hunt, who was present at Upper Buffalo, where the Rev. Elisha McCurdy, from a wagon, preached his famous war sermon, "at the close of which the scene appeared like the close of a battle, in which every tenth man had fallen, fatally wounded," says:—

"I have often talked with McCurdy about that meeting. It will never be forgotten by that generation. The state of the times may have had something to do with the matter. The gospel was a new thing to many of the multitude then; yet, withal, it was the mighty power of God. This is the only explanation we can give of the matter. And this is explanation enough. God carries forward His own work in His own way; and it may be that this baptism from on high is a preparation for some great mission this part of the land has to fulfill."

Boggs, John, M. D., was born August 7th, 1787. After leaving college, he studied medicine, practiced his profession for a time in Huntingdon county, Pa., and then settled in Greencastle, Pa., as partner of his old preceptor, Dr. McClellan. While the war of 1812 was in progress, Dr. Boggs joined Company 3,

Franklin County Volunteers, and went with it to Baltimore, September 8th, 1811, where his company, with several others, was formed into a regiment, and he was appointed Assistant Surgeon. After this he resumed his practice in Greencastle, and with singular success. He had a strong hold on the confidence and affection of the families under his medical care. Dr. Boggs was an earnest and active elder of the Presbyterian Church at Greencastle from 1825 until his death, July 12th, 1847. "An eminent physician, a faithful elder, an affectionate husband, father and friend, a useful citizen, an humble Christian; his life was piety, his death was peace."

Bolton, Rev. James Gray, was born at Kilrea, in the County of Derry, Ireland, March 17th, 1849. After preparing for Belfast College, he came to America in 1866, and soon entered a military school in Cranbury, N. J. In 1868 he entered Lafayette College, and in his Sophomore year was elected orator of the Franklin Literary Society for their annual exhibition. In 1871 he was elected Principal of Pleasant Grove Academy, near York, Pa., and met the demands of the position very acceptably. He entered Union Theological Seminary in 1872, and graduated in 1875. About this time Lafayette College conferred upon him the honorary degree of A.M. Before leaving the Seminary he accepted a call from the Session of Calvary Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, to take charge of Hope Chapel. Here he was ordained by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, in 1875, and he has since labored in this field with very gratifying success, the flock enjoying external and internal prosperity under his faithful ministry.

Bond, Rev. Lewis, Jr., was born in Plainfield, New Jersey, October 18th, 1839; graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1861, and at the Union Theological Seminary, New York, in 1867, after which he was a Resident Licentiate, 1867-8. He was ordained in 1868. Soon after he went to Turkey and joined the European Turkey Mission of the American Board. He was stationed at Eski Zaghra nine years, until its destruction by the Turkish army under Suleiman Pasha. His associate, Mr. Marsh, and himself, were the only Europeans in the city, and probably the only Christian men who were not massacred by the Circassians and Bashi-Bazouks. He was obliged to pay nearly forty dollars to a blood-thirsty Circassian, to dissuade him from hacking off his "infidel" head. Several persons who had fled to his house were butchered, and he could do nothing to prevent it. At length he and Mr. Marsh abandoned their houses to the flames and fled the city with their families. They were three days on the plain, subsisting chiefly on raw wheat, when they reached the railroad and civilized people. Mr. Bond's residence at present is Monastir, Macedonia, Turkey, where he is happy in preaching the gospel to the perishing, and training up a native ministry. The Lord has blessed him in his good work.

Booth, Henry Matthias, D. D., was born in New York city, October 3d, 1843. He graduated at Williams College in 1864, and at the Union Theological Seminary, New York, in 1867, and in the same year accepted the call of the Presbyterian Church, Englewood, N. J., and was ordained and installed by the Fourth Presbytery of New York, upon the 19th of September. Here he has continued ever since, laboring with great earnestness, and with marked acceptableness and success.

Dr. Booth is an accomplished and genial gentleman, an able and instructive preacher, and a devoted and faithful pastor. In connection with his pastoral duties he has found time to serve upon several important Committees and Boards of the Church, to membership in which the confidence of his brethren in his judiciousness and efficiency has summoned him. He has labored with commendable zeal for the cause of Systematic Beneficence, and also for the cause of Temperance, in connection with the Permanent Committee of the General Assembly, of which he is the chairman. As a member of the Board of Church Election and of the Board of Home Missions he has also rendered most valuable service. He counts the ministry his joy, and his heart and hand respond promptly and cheerfully to the claims of every work that aims at the elevation of humanity and the salvation of men.

ROBERT RUSSELL BOOTH, D.D.

Booth, Robert Russell, D. D., eldest son of William A. and Alida (Russell) Booth, was born in New York city. He graduated at Williams College in 1849, and at Auburn Theological Seminary in 1852. After spending some months in Europe and the East, in November, 1853, he was ordained colleague with Rev. Dr. Bennan, of the First Presbyterian Church, Troy, N. Y., and in that position he remained for three and a half years. Early in 1857 he was installed over the First Presbyterian Church of Stamford, Conn. In March, 1861, he was settled over the Mercer street Presbyterian Church in New York. In the Fall of 1870, after the reunion of the Old and New School churches, the Mercer street Church united with that in University Place, removing to the edifice of the latter, and he became pastor of the new organization, which position he has recently resigned.

Dr. Booth is an able, attractive and successful preacher. He has been an active worker through life, filling responsible positions with success. He has been a trustee of Williams College since 1866, was chairman of the New School Assembly's Committee on Foreign Missions, member of the American Board's Prudential Committee, and of the Executive Committee of the Evangelical Alliance, and Director of Union and Princeton Theological Seminaries. As Chairman of the Church Extension Committee of the New York Presbytery he has been very efficient, the debts resting upon the churches having been almost entirely removed by the Committee. Dr. Booth's recent church sustains several large and flourishing missions in the needy parts of the city. A number of his sermons have been published, and he has made frequent contributions to the religious journals. His business ability and forcible speaking always give him a prominent place in the Church courts.

Bostwick, Rev. David, was born in New Milford, Conn., in 1721. He was of Scotch extraction. He entered Yale College, but before graduating, left, and completed his studies with Mr. Burr, at Newark. For some time he was his assistant in the Academy. He was ordained by New York Presbytery, pastor at Jamaica, Long Island, October 9th, 1745. Here he remained more than ten years, in great repute, among not only his own people, but his brethren in the ministry and the surrounding churches.

On April 14th, 1756, Mr. Bostwick accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church in New York, and was installed shortly after. In the Winter of this year the prevalence of smallpox put him to study what was present duty and the mind of Providence in regard to himself and his family. "I had rather die in the way of duty," said he, "than purchase life by running out of it. I have, therefore, concluded to stay; but I have thought it prudent to send my family to Newark." He died November 12th, 1763, aged forty-three years.

Mr. Bostwick published a sermon, preached in 1758, at Philadelphia, before the Reverend Synod of New York, entitled, "Self Disclaimed and Christ Exalted," which was reprinted in London, 1776; also, "An Account of the Life, Character and Death of President Davies," prefixed to Davies' Sermon on the death of George II, 1761. After his death, there was published, from his manuscripts, "A Fair and Rational Vindication of the Right of Infants to the Ordinance of Baptism, being the substance of several discourses from Acts ii, 39." This Tract was reprinted in London, and a second American edition of it was printed in 1737. The degree of Master of Arts was conferred on Mr. Bostwick, by the College of New Jersey, in 1756, and he was one of the overseers of the same institution from 1761 till his death.

The Rev. Joseph Treat, who was called to be Mr. Bostwick's colleague in October, 1762, says: "As a preacher he was uncommonly popular. His gifts and qualifications for the pulpit were of a high order. His appearance and deportment were peculiarly venerable. He possessed a clear understanding, a warm heart, a quick apprehension, a lively imagination, a solid judgment. He had a strong voice, and spoke in a distinct, deliberate and impressive manner, and with a commanding eloquence. He dealt faithfully with his hearers, declaring to them the whole counsel of God, showing them their danger and their remedy, speaking with the solemnity becoming the importance of the subject, in language pure and elegant, plain and affectionate, never below the dignity of the pulpit, nor above the capacity of any of his hearers."

"His piety and prudence," says Dr. Miller, "were as conspicuous as his brilliant gifts. His eloquence was such as few attain; the ardor of his piety, and the purity of his life, gave him a strong hold on public esteem."

Botsford, Rev. Alfred P., was born in Onondaga county, N. Y., April 21st, 1827. He graduated at Union College in 1847, and was chosen to deliver the Italian oration. He was made a member of the Phi Beta Kappa Society. After graduation he was, for a time, Professor of Ancient and Modern Languages in the High School at Uniontown, Pa., and then Principal of the Vernon Academy, near Utica, N. Y. He entered Princeton Theological Seminary in September, 1849; at the close of the second year was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick to preach the gospel, after which he continued his studies in the Seminary until his graduation in May, 1852, also supplying, at the same time, the Wither- spoon Street Church, and teaching a parochial school connected with the Presbyterian Church at Princeton. He was pastor at Red Mills, N. Y., then at Hughsonville, on the Hudson, where, from April 26th, 1854, he labored nearly four years, with gratifying success. He was installed pastor of Port Byron, N. Y., in July, 1857, and after laboring there pleasantly and prosperously for four years, he took charge, in 1861, of the Fifty-sixth Street Presbyterian Church, New York city, where he labored six years, with success. He was installed over the church at Port Jervis, in June, 1867, of which he now has charge, with the divine blessing on his ministry. Mr. Botsford is an earnest laborer and a pleasant and impressive speaker. His sermons indicate ability, careful thought, logical reasoning and sound judgment. He indulges in no vain, florid rhetoric, avoids the tricks of sensationalism, and preaches as though he had a mission to his hearers which they cannot afford to ignore.

Bower, Edwin, D. D., a member of the Presbytery of Chester, and Professor of Theology in Lincoln University, departed this life April 7th, 1883. Dr. Bower was born in Lancaster county, Pa., in 1826; graduated at Princeton College in 1851, and then entered the Theological Seminary in that place, where he remained three years. He became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Wappinger's Falls, N. Y., from which he went, in 1861, to become pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church in Springfield, Ohio. After serving this Church for six years he was elected Professor of Theology in Lincoln University, and to this institution he gave fifteen years of diligent and successful labor. For this post he was well qualified by his education, by careful study, and by experience in teaching, as well as by his thorough sympathy with the young men of the race he was called to teach. He was patient, kind, and in many ways helpful to his pupils, and they were strongly attached to him, as a friend and counsellor. He was highly esteemed by the ministerial circles in which he moved. He was a man of true modesty, deferring to the opinions of others, but always holding firmly to the convictions which he had formed, and expressing them candidly and in earnest words. He lived in communion with Christ. In the pulpit he was always heard with pleasure and profit, and always dealt with the great themes of the gospel of Christ, which he heartily loved and constantly preached.

Bowman, Francis, D. D., was born in Westford, near Burlington, Vt., February 27th, 1795; graduated at the University of Vermont; entered Princeton Seminary in 1821; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Otsego, July 17th, 1824; was ordained to the full work of the gospel ministry by the Presbytery of Hanover, and became pastor of the Church at Charlottesville, Va., where, as well as in the Church of South Plains, in which he also preached, his labors were greatly blessed. He subsequently entered the service of the American Bible Society, then resumed the work of the ministry, preaching at Greensboro, Ga., and at Bryan Neck, Bryan county, Ga., near Savannah. He died April 26th, 1875, in his eighty-first year. His end was peace. Dr. Bowman was a noble specimen of a refined, Christian gentleman, and of a devoted and intelligent preacher of the gospel.

Bowne, Hon. James, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., was born in Fishkill, N. Y., December 25th, 1798. When he was sixteen years old he left his home for Poughkeepsie, where he spent his life, as clerk and merchant, commanding respect, and a positive force for good in all his relationships. His fellow-citizens honored him with many important trusts, electing him to the Mayoralty in 1861, which office he filled with scrupulous fidelity. In religious and moral movements Mr. Bowne was one of the most useful of men. The Presbyterian Church of Poughkeepsie is largely indebted to him for its growth and prosperity, as he was an active mover in its organization in 1826, became a member in 1828 and an elder in 1839, which office he held until his death, July 31st, 1883. For fifty-five years he was a diligent and successful teacher in the Sabbath school, and for many years a prominent trustee of the Church.

Mr. Bowne was long an earnest friend of the Temperance cause. His history in this respect is somewhat peculiar. In 1829, when merchants sold and the multitude drank intoxicating liquors, he was in New York for the purchase of goods, liquors among the rest. Being induced to attend the anniversary of the National Temperance Society, he was deeply interested in the addresses. As the result he resolved to make a smaller purchase of liquors than he intended, and subsequently determined to put his liquors in the cellar, and by this suppress, in a measure, their free use by customers and others. Finally, one Sabbath evening, on his return from church service, he descended into the cellar, turned open the faucets of the several liquor casks, and allowed the contents to flow out and waste upon the cellar floor. This action was followed by the formation of the first Temperance Society of Poughkeepsie.

Boudinot, Elias, LL.D., was a prominent and useful member of the Presbyterian Church. He was born in Philadelphia, May 2d, 1740. After a classical education, he studied law under Richard Stockton, and soon after entering on the practice of his profession in New Jersey rose to distinction. He early espoused the cause of his country. In 1777, Congress appointed him Commissary General of Pensioners, and in the same year he was elected a delegate to Congress, of which body he was elected the president, in November, 1782. In that capacity he put his signature to the treaty of peace. He returned to the profession of the law, but was again elected to Congress, under the new Constitution, in 1789, and was continued a member of the House six years. In 1796 Washington appointed him the Director of the Mint of the United States, as the successor of Rittenhouse; in this office he continued till 1805, when he resigned it, and, retiring from Philadelphia, passed the remainder of his life at Burlington, New Jersey. He died, October 24th, 1821, aged eighty-one.

After the establishment, in 1816, of the American Bible Society, which he assisted in creating, Dr. Boudinot was elected its first president, and he made it a donation of ten thousand dollars. He afterwards contributed liberally towards the erection of its depository. In 1812 he was elected a member of the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions, to which he presented, the next year, a donation of one hundred pounds, sterling. He was deeply interested in every attempt to meliorate the condition of the American Indians. His house was the seat of hospitality, and his days were spent in the studies of biblical literature, in the exercise of the loveliest charities of life, and the performance of the highest Christian duties. He was a trustee of Princeton College, in which he founded, in 1805, the cabinet of natural history. He was cheered and supported by his religion as he went down to the grave. His last prayer was, "Lord Jesus receive my spirit." By his last will, Dr. Boudinot bequeathed his large estate principally to charitable uses.

Boyd, Rev. Abraham, was born in Ireland, in December, 1770. He pursued his studies at the Canonsburg Academy, and was licensed to preach the gospel June 25th, 1800, by the Presbytery of Ohio. On June 17th, 1802, he was installed pastor of the congregations of Bull Creek and Middlesex, in Armstrong county, Pa. This relation continued at Middlesex until 1817, and at Bull Creek until June 25th, 1833. After leaving Middlesex he gave half his time to Deer Creek, from 1817 to 1821. An anecdote of Mr. Boyd is related in connection with his early ministry. He was passing through the woods on the Sabbath, on his way to preach. In the depth of the forest he encountered an Indian, tricked out in his feathers and war paint. He saw that he was observed, and to flee would be in vain, so he knelt down at the roots of a large tree, and in full view of the savage, and began to pray. When he arose from his knees the Indian had departed, and he was safe. Mr. Boyd was a spiritually-minded man, an earnest preacher, and a strict disciplinarian. He was also a man of great power in prayer, and seemed to grow in grace as he grew in years.

Boyd, Rev. Adam, was born at Ballymoney, Ireland, in 1692, and came to New England as a probationer in 1722 or 1723. He was received under the care of New Castle Presbytery in July, 1724. He accepted a call to the churches of Octorara and Pequea, and was ordained, October 13th, at Octorara. In October, 1727, the families on the west side of the stream Octorara having asked for one-third of his labors, he was directed to spend every sixth Sabbath at Middle Octorara. The Forks of Brandywine composed part of his field until 1734. In the progress of the great revival, a large portion of his congregation having left him and joined the Brunswick brethren, he asked leave, August 14th, 1741, to accept the invitation given him by the fraction of Brandywine which adhered to the Old Side. His relation to the Forks was dissolved in 1758. He died November 23d, 1768. Mr. Boyd was a man of great exactness, recording in what articles his salary was paid; thus, John Long paid by publications (as a magistrate) of marriages and astrays, and by a riddle. His congregation agreed to pay him twenty-five pounds yearly, during his life, and several of them remembered him, in their dying testaments, by small bequests.

Boyd, Andrew Hunter Holmes, D. D., the second son of General Elisha Boyd, of Berkeley county, Va., was born at Boydsville, near Martinsburg, in 1811. He received his academic education at Martinsburg and Middleburg; when fourteen years old, entered the junior class of Jefferson College, and graduated with distinction in 1830. Shortly after entering college he joined the Presbyterian Church, and resolved to preach the gospel. After graduation in Jefferson he spent two years at New Haven, to perfect himself in particular studies, completed a regular course of theological education thereafter, at Princeton, and subsequently attended lectures delivered by Dr. Chalmers and Sir William Hamilton, in Edinburgh. He was licensed to preach the gospel at Woodstock, by the Presbytery of Winchester, in 1837; entered upon his first charge over the churches of Leesburg and Middleburg in 1838; accepted a call to Harrisonburg in 1840, and to Winchester in 1842. His valuable ministry of twenty-three years in this last church was terminated, after a mournful and protracted illness, December 16th, 1865.

Dr. Boyd was a man of fine intellect. He was endowed with quick and clear perception, a sound, discriminating and comprehensive judgment, and especially with strong and active reasoning faculties. He was a man of indefatigable mental industry throughout his life, constantly accumulating valuable knowledge, miscellaneous and professional. His life-power lay largely in those distinguished moral principles, which were every way equal to his mental endowments. He was a man of strong feelings, vehement promptings, inflexible principles. His character was remarkably well balanced, both in its moral feelings and in its active principles. He was characterized by pre-eminent simplicity, independence and intrepidity. This last virtue he exhibited unostentatiously throughout life. In principle everybody felt that he was benevolent, just, true, firm and modest; in practice everybody knew him to be earnest and studious, and steady and reliable. He left his mark amongst men, and wrought a great work for the Church of God.

Bracken, Thos. A., D. D., son of Henry and Martha Bracken, was born in Washington county, Pa., August 14th, 1820. His grandfather, Thomas Bracken, was one of the first trustees of Canonsburg Academy, afterwards Jefferson College. Dr. Bracken is sprung from a family of preachers, two of his paternal uncles, four of his brothers-in-law, and several cousins having entered the Presbyterian ministry. Dr. Bracken was graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1842; studied theology in New Albany Seminary, Ind.; was ordained by Upper Missouri Presbytery and installed pastor of Prairie Church, in Lafayette county, Mo., in 1849; installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Independence, Mo., in 1855, and took pastoral charge of the Second Presbyterian Church, Lebanon, Ky., in 1867, where he still remains.

Sprung from the Scotch-Irish stock, Dr. Bracken maintains their staidy adhesion to the Confession of Faith and the Form of Government, and their repugnance to latitudinarianism in doctrine, or laxity in morals. His mind is of a decidedly logical turn; he is fond of the epistle to the Romans, and of systematic views of theology. As a preacher he is Scriptural, sound, very much in earnest, rightly dividing the Word of Truth. As a pastor he has the happy faculty, of attaching his people warmly to himself. Dr. Bracken is a strong advocate of education, and has been an active and liberal supporter of Central University, at Richmond, Ky.

Brackett, Gilbert Robbins, D. D., son of

GILBERT ROBBINS BRACKETT, D. D.

Charles and Lucy (Gay) Brackett, was born in the city of Newton, Mass., July 9th, 1833. Entered Amherst College in 1853; was compelled to leave before graduating, on account of ill health. Removing South in 1859, he entered the Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C., and graduated in May, 1862. Was licensed to preach by Bethel Presbytery, S. C. Ordained and installed pastor of Third Creek Church, Rowan county, N. C., May 11th, 1864. Became pastor of Scion Church, Winn-boro, S. C., June 5th, 1868. Accepted a call to the Second Presbyterian Church, Charleston, S. C., May, 1871, and, as the successor of the Rev. Dr. Thomas Smyth, who had served the church with great acceptance, devotion and distinction for forty years, was installed pastor in June, 1872. In 1877 Davidson College, N. C., conferred upon Mr. Brackett the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity.

In the several pastoral relations which he has held, as in the large and important charge which he now administers, Dr. Brackett has been uniformly happy and successful. A close and eager student of all knowledge that may be made tributary to his sacred calling, he is an unwearied and faithful laborer in all its practical duties. Forceful, logical, eloquent and earnest in the pulpit, he is a pastor, wise, gentle, sympathetic and self-sacrificing. Admirably qualified to win distinction in letters, and often called upon for public addresses, his ambition is bounded by the desire to win souls. Whilst in pulpit preparation he will have none but "beaten oil for the lamps of the sanctuary," it is only that their light may shine upon his Master. Devoted, by intelligent conviction, to the polity and doctrines of his own Church, and ready always to uphold and defend them, he counts all as brethren who seek earnestly to follow the same Lord, though by ways unessentially different. Illustrating in himself the unselfish spirit of the gospel, he is the centre of a dear regard and affection from all, and especially from his brethren in the ministry, by whom he is equally honored and loved. Dr. Brackett is a frequent contributor to theological reviews, and many of his occasional sermons are in print. His memorial discourse upon the decease of his revered predecessor, Dr. Smyth, has been widely circulated and read.

Bradford, Hon. Benjamin Rush, second son of the Hon. Thomas Bradford, LL.D., and Elizabeth his wife, was born in Philadelphia, September 15th, 1813. His academical studies were conducted in Pittsfield, Mass. Owing to his delicate health he did not pass through a regular collegiate course. He resided three years in Dover, Del., where he resuscitated the old Presbyterian Church. He became a member of the Fifth Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, in 1831, and was one of the number of those young men who formed the nucleus of the Union Benevolent Society. In 1837 he removed to Mercer county, Pa., and in 1839 he settled on a farm near New Brighton, Pa. In 1848 he was elected an elder of the Beaver Falls Presbyterian Church, now called the First Presbyterian Church of New Brighton.

In 1849 Mr. Bradford was elected a Director of the Western Theological Seminary, and has remained a member of the Board ever since. He was one of the corporate members of the Board of Colportage when it was instituted in Pittsburg, and was elected a member of the same by the Synod of Erie. The degree of A. M. was conferred upon him by Jefferson College. He was a member of the General Assemblies of 1849, 1855 and 1860. In 1854 he was nominated as a candidate for Governor, on the American ticket, and at another election received the nomination for Lieutenant-Governor, on the Prohibition ticket. Mr. Bradford has taken a great interest in the Sabbath-school cause, and was a scholar, teacher, and superintendent, for fifty years, and only under the failure of health has ceased from active labor in the Church and Sabbath School. He has been an active Temperance worker. His life has been one of Christian consistency and usefulness. During his early manhood, when his business duties required, he traveled some 18,000 miles on horseback, through Pennsylvania, as well as in Virginia, looking after large landed estates entrusted to his care, and while thus engaged, for the period of twenty-five years, had numerous land ejectment cases and other suits in law, not one of which he lost, and for his mode of preparing which he received the encomiums of Chief Justice Agnew, Judge Church, and others.

Brainerd, Rev. David, was born at Haddam, Conn., April 20th, 1718. At the age of twenty he entered on a course of learning in the house of Mr. Fiske, the minister of that place. He finished his preparation for college with his brother, the minister of Eastbury. In September, 1739, he entered Yale College. In the Spring of the same year in which he left college he commenced the study of theology, under the direction of the Rev. Jedediah Mills, of Ripton, Conn., and on the 20th of July following (1742), was licensed to preach by the Association of Ministers, holding its session at Danbury. From the commencement of his theological course he had felt a deep interest in the deplorable condition of the heathen, especially the aborigines of our own country; his heart burned to follow in the footsteps of the apostle Elliot, in bringing the gospel in contact with their darkened understandings, and accordingly, in the Autumn after he was licensed, he went to New York, by invitation from the correspondents of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and, after being duly examined, received a regular appointment from them as a missionary among the Indians.

Having now undertaken the missionary work, and thinking he should have no need among the Indians for the estate left him by his father, Mr. Brainerd assumed the expense of educating "a dear friend," Nehemiah Greenman, of Stratford, for the ministry. He was soon put to learning, and was supported by Mr. Brainerd till his death, Mr. Greenman having gone through his third year. He was, for many years, the pastor of Pittsgrove, in West Jersey.

The first scene of Mr. Brainerd's missionary labors was at an Indian village called Kaunaumeeck, about half-way between Stockbridge and Albany. Here he lived in the woods nearly a year, lodging, during a part of the time, in a wigwam with the Indians, and subsisting altogether upon Indian fare. Having been ordained by the Presbytery of New York, at Newark, N. J., in June, 1744, he immediately stationed himself near the Forks of the Delaware, in Pennsylvania, where he labored, with comparatively little apparent effect, for about a year. At the end of this period he visited the Indians at a village called Crosweeksung, in the neighborhood of Freehold—the residence of the celebrated William Tennent. Here was the scene of his greatest success. A wonderful divine influence accompanied his labors, and in less than a year he baptized seventy-seven persons, thirty-eight of whom were adults, whose subsequent life furnished satisfactory evidence of a true conversion.

In the Summer of 1746 Mr. Brainerd visited the Indians on the Susquehanna, and on his return, in September, found himself worn out by the hardships of his journey. His health was so much impaired that he was able to preach but little more. Being advised, in the Spring of 1747, to travel in New England, he went as far as Boston, and returned in July to Northampton, where, in the family of Jonathan Edwards, he passed the remainder of his days.

Mr. Brainerd was a man of vigorous powers of mind. While he was favored with a quick discernment and ready invention, with a strong memory and natural eloquence, he also possessed, in an uncommon degree, the penetration, the closeness and force of thought, and the soundness of judgment, which distinguish the man of talents from him who subsists upon the learning of others.

His knowledge of theology was uncommonly extensive and accurate. President Edwards, whose opinion of Mr. Brainerd was founded upon an intimate acquaintance with him, says that he never knew his equal of his age and standing, for clear, accurate notions of the nature and essence of true religion, and its distinction from the various false appearances.

As a Christian, his experience of the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit were not only great at his conversion, but it was so, in a continued course, from that time forward, as appears by a private journal he kept of his daily inward exercises, from the time of his conversion until he was disabled by the failing of his strength, a few days before his death. He had extraordinary gifts for the pulpit, his manner of preaching being clear and instructive, natural, forcible, moving, and very searching and convincing.

In his last illness, and during the approaches of death, Mr. Brainerd was remarkably resigned and composed. Shortly before his decease, in answer to an inquiry concerning his experience, he said: "I am almost in eternity. I long to be there. My work is done. I have done with all my friends. All the world is now nothing to me. Oh, to be in heaven, to praise and glorify God with His holy angels!" He entered into rest October 9th, 1747, aged twenty-nine years.

Brainerd Institute. This Institution, of which the Rev. S. Loomis, A. M., is superintendent, is located at Chester, S. C., in the midst of a dense, and in the main, thrifty colored population. Around the Institute are clustered the nine churches that have constituted Brainerd Mission, and on every hand there are public and Sabbath Schools, instructed by Brainerd scholars. The Institute is thoroughly organized, with a graded course of study in eight departments, Primary, Grammar, High School, Scientific, Normal, Mechanical, Agricultural and Girl's Industrial.

In connection with Bible training, the design of the Institute is to impart a thorough English education; to elevate the mind by a study of the works of the Creator through the natural sciences; to prepare teachers for the public schools; by mechanical drawing and a practical acquaintance with wood working tools, to acquaint the students with the simpler forms of rural architecture, that the home may take the place of the cabin; to instruct the girls in all the details of household management and domestic economy; to enable the young men to aid themselves in obtaining an education; to develop the strength and hardihood that come from self help; to maintain and promote habits of industry; to counteract the danger of sickness and disease, so peculiarly, among this people, the result of sedentary occupation; to provide more wholesome living from orchard, farm and garden; and to impart a practical acquaintance with improved systems of agriculture, a pressing need for a more comfortable livelihood in this Southern country.

The Institute has about two acres of ground near the railroad depots; ten acres a little distance away, and a farm of a hundred acres, with forty acres of woodland, about a mile outside the corporate limits of the town; with two Institute buildings, a chapel, two cottages, and a large two-story mansion 50x80 feet, with extended piazzas, airy and well furnished rooms, for the Female Seminary.

The Cabinet and Museum contain a scientific and miscellaneous library, with a large number of the best treatises on agriculture, valuable ornithological and botanical collections; various apparatus for general school instruction, and a collection of one thousand five hundred minerals and fossils, one of the choicest in the country.

There were three hundred and sixty on the roll of the Institute the last year.

Brainerd, Rev. John, was a native of East Haddam, Conn., and was the brother of David Brainerd. He graduated at Yale in 1746, and, his brother's health failing, he was appointed by the correspondents of the Scottish Society to take his place as a missionary among the Indians. He came to Elizabethtown, N. J., April 10th, 1747, and, having been examined by New York Presbytery on the 13th, he went the next day to the Indians at Crambury. He was ordained by that Presbytery early in 1748.

Mr. Brainerd traveled to the Forks of Delaware and to Wyoming several times, to induce the Indians to leave their unsettled life and dwell near him. Numbers came, from time to time, but he succeeded in doing little more than civilizing them. In 1751 he had some special success, and in October, 1752, he had forty families near him, and thirty-seven communicants. There were fifty children in the school. In the same year, with only one attendant, he spent a fortnight on the Susquehanna. Their horses were stolen, the guide was too lame to go on foot, and they remained three days where there was no house. That year, also, the General Court of Connecticut, on the petition of the Correspondents, granted a brief for a general collection to aid him in his school.

In 1755 Mr. Brainerd retired from the Society's service as a missionary, and in 1757 took charge of the congregation in Newark. Here he remained but a little while, for, in 1759, he resumed his mission among the poor Indians. "As to the success that has attended my labors," he wrote, "I can say but little. It is a time wherein the influences of the Divine Spirit are mournfully withheld. I think, however, I have ground to hope that some good has been done among both Indians and white people, and the prospects of further usefulness are very considerable, if proper means could be used."

Mr. Brainerd resided for some time at Mount Holly. He had a meeting-house there, which was burned by the British in the Revolutionary War. Seven other places were regularly and frequently visited by him. The Synod, in 1767, granted him twenty pounds, besides his salary, for "his extraordinary services in forming societies and laboring among the white people in that large and uncultivated country." The grant was renewed the next year, for his extensive services and labor in those uncultivated parts. From 1760 to 1770 he received from the congregations between Egg Harbor and Manahawkin fifty-nine pounds, nineteen shillings, though he had preached to them five hundred times. He continued to supply these numerous vacancies, and the annual allowance of twenty pounds was promised by the Synod for that service. In 1773 it was increased to twenty-five pounds. The next year he gave an account of his labors and prospects of success, and the interest of the Indian Fund was reserved for him. In 1777 he removed to Deerfield, and preached there till his death, March 18th, 1781. His remains repose beneath the floor of the Deerfield Church. The Rev. Dr. Field, who was for many years minister of the congregation in which Mr. Brainerd's parents resided, says: "The tradition in Haddam is that he was as pious a man as his brother David, but not equal to him in ability."

Brainerd, Thomas, D. D., sprung from an old English family that had emigrated to Haddam, Connecticut, in 1619. The celebrated missionary brothers David and John Brainerd, and the poet John Q. C. Brainerd, were of the same stock. The subject of this sketch was born June 17th, 1801, in Leyden, Lewis county, N. Y. He early showed a fondness for reading, but had not the opportunity of studying at any college. At the age of seventeen he taught school, and afterwards studied law in Rome, N. Y. He was converted under Mr. Finney's preaching in 1825, and soon after, under the pressure of a sore affliction, he gave up the law for the gospel ministry. To obtain the means of study he taught school for a year in the northern part of Philadelphia. After a three years' course in Andover Seminary, he was ordained by the Third Presbytery of New York, and immediately turned his face westward with a commission from the Home Missionary Society. His first charge was in the suburbs of Cincinnati, the Fourth Church, in November, 1831. In 1833 he was associated with Dr. Lyman Beecher in the Second Church, and assumed the editorship of the "Cincinnati Journal." In March, 1837, he was installed over the Third, or Old Pine Street Church, Philadelphia, where he remained for the rest of his life, nearly thirty years. In the year 1861 he was made Moderator of the General Assembly, New School.

Dr. Brainerd's last public service was at Easton, July 22d, 1866. He was invited by the Brainerd Evangelical Society of Lafayette College to deliver an address in the Brainerd Church, on the very spot, the Forks of the Delaware, trodden by the feet of those holy men, David and John Brainerd, a century before. Thence he went to visit his married daughter at Scranton, and for a fortnight gave rest to his body and mind. His death occurred there very suddenly, from apoplexy, August 21st, 1866. On the day of his funeral, in Philadelphia, the stores in the neighborhood were closed, the bell of St. Peter's (Episcopal) Church was tolled, the clergy of various denominations took part in the services, and the poor colored people in the alleys hung their bits of crape to their doors, in memory of their steadfast friend.

Dr. Brainerd could not be called a learned or profound scholar, but he was a man of intense zeal and activity. Nervous and impulsive in the highest degree, he was ready with voice or pen for every emergency. He was the promoter of several new Church enterprises in the city of Philadelphia, while no one could say "his own vineyard he had not kept," for from his quarter-century sermon it appears that he had admitted a thousand communicants into the Old Pine street Church.

He contributed abundantly to the daily and weekly press, as well as to the "Presbyterian Quarterly Review." He also published a "Life of John Brainerd," and a score of discourses in pamphlet form.

Brayton, Isaac, D. D., was born in western New York, June 26th, 1812. He graduated at Union College in 1833; was at Princeton Theological Seminary two years, and finished his theological course at Auburn Seminary, in 1836. He was ordained and installed pastor over the First Presbyterian Church in Watertown, N. Y., August 31st, 1837. Here he remained, with great acceptance and large usefulness, till 1861, when the ill-health of his wife compelled him to resign the pastorate. He now resides in Poughkeepsie, N. Y. As a preacher Dr. Brayton is scholarly, evangelical and earnest; his manner is pleasant and impressive, courtly and gentle. As a man and citizen, he is conservative, upright and reliable in all his relationships. As a friend he is true and affectionate, a most valuable adviser, and ready and strong in the support of all that is right.

Brearley, Rev. William, was born in Lawrenceville, New Jersey, November 30th, 1801, and died in Sumter county, South Carolina, January 8th, 1882. In June, 1820, he graduated at Princeton College, and in the Spring of 1825 he graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary, and at once entered upon his great life work, in the pines of New Jersey. Here he labored zealously and successfully, as a missionary, for two months. In the Autumn of 1825, with the hope of finding under the sunny skies of the South a climate more favorable to his frail constitution, he removed to Wimsboro, South Carolina.

In April, 1826, he was ordained by Harmony Presbytery, and ministered to the churches of Salem, Ainswell, and Seion, in Fairfield county. He remained in Wimsboro until February, 1832, when he was called to Darlington, and in the month of May, in the same year, was installed pastor of the Darlington Presbyterian Church. He continued to serve this church, with great zeal, fidelity and affection, until January 1st, 1879, when, at his urgent request, after a pastorate covering the space of thirty-seven years, he was released from further service, and retired to the privacy of his own domestic hearth, there to spend the evening of his days in meditation on the goodness of God and the love of Jesus, and in prayer for the people to whom he had ministered for more than a quarter of a century. During the thirty-seven years of his ministry in Darlington two hundred and thirty-one souls were added to the Church. Mr. Brearley died, November 8th, 1882, and his remains were buried in the Presbyterian Church-yard at Darlington. No better eulogy could be pronounced upon him than the utterance of the Rev. Dr. Capers, of the Methodist Church, who declared that "his life was a benediction to the community."

Breckinridge, John, D.D., was the second of four remarkable sons of the late Hon. John Breckinridge, one of the first representatives of the State of Kentucky in the Senate of the United States, and at the time of his death, Attorney General of the United States, under Thomas Jefferson. His mother was Mary H. (Cabell) Breckinridge. He was born at the family home, Cabell's Dale, near Lexington, Kentucky, on the 4th of July, 1797. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey, at Princeton, in 1818, and at the Theological Seminary at Princeton in 1822, and during part of his seminary course was Tutor in the college. He was licensed in the year 1822, by the Presbytery of New Brunswick. He was elected and served for a short time as Chaplain of the United States House of Representatives, but resigned this office to accept a call to the McChord Presbyterian Church at Lexington, Kentucky, of which he was pastor for somewhat less than three years. In the year 1826 he became collegiate pastor, with the Rev. Dr. Glendy, of the Second Presbyterian Church of Baltimore, where he remained about five years. In 1831 he was elected Secretary and General Agent of the Board of Publication of the Presbyterian Church, and removed to Philadelphia. While thus engaged he conducted a controversy, both oral and written, which excited much attention, in this country and abroad, involving all the issues between Protestantism and Papacy, with the Rev. John Hughes, afterwards Archbishop. In May, 1835, he was chosen, by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, Professor of Pastoral Theology and Missionary Instruction in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, New Jersey. In 1838 he resigned this Professorship, to become the General Agent of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. While in the discharge of the duties of his agency, he was called to become pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of New Orleans, and though he declined the call, he ministered to that congregation for the greater part of two years. During his stay at New Orleans he was elected President of Oglethorpe University, in Georgia, and if his life had been spared, would probably have accepted that position. But, worn out by ceaseless activities and constant labors in his sacred calling, he died, at the place of his birth, where, in his failing health, he had wished to go, on the 4th of August, 1841, but little more than forty-four years of age.

Dr. Breckinridge was of a noble presence, and was gifted with a voice of great sweetness and compass; his mind was of unusual force, strengthened and enriched by careful culture and generous learning; his heart was as tender, and his affections as strong, as a woman's; his religion was a constant, animating principle, present in all his intercourse with men; he was always dignified, courteous, just and courageous; and he possessed a rare fascination of manner, which, both in private and in public, made lasting impressions on all who saw him.

As a pastor, the memory of his abundant labors, his untiring zeal, his absolute forgetfulness of self in his efforts for the good of souls, and his surpassing eloquence, is as vivid as if his brilliant and laborious life had just ended. When he entered upon his work fatigable zeal and energy in directing the operations of the great benevolent agencies of the Church, and his fervid eloquence in presenting their claims to Christian affection and support. Here, if he had an equal, he had no superior; and the Church has had no servant, since his death, more faithful, and few as fruitful, in all labors for her advancement.

Dr. Breckinridge's active and busy life left him little leisure for labor as a writer or author. During his first pastorate, in Lexington, Kentucky, he was Editor of the Western Luminary, a religious periodical. He published a number of occasional sermons, and contributed at times to various religious publications. While Secretary of the Board of Education he published an Annual, devoted to the interests of that Board. These, with his debates in the Catholic controversy, comprise all of his published writings now recalled.

Breckinridge, Robert Jefferson, D. D., LL. D., third son of the Hon. John and Mary Hopkins (née Cabell) Breckinridge, was born at Cabell's Dale, Ky., March 8th, 1800; was graduated from Union College, N. Y., in 1819, and entered the Bar at Lexington, Ky., in 1824. In 1825 he was elected to the Lower House of the Kentucky Legislature, and was three times subsequently re-elected. During the winter of 1828-29 God converted his soul, at Frankfort, as he humbly trusted; and he immediately determined to quit the practice of the law, which neither the state of his health nor his feelings permitted him to pursue, and also to take final leave of public life. He made public profession of faith in the Spring of 1829, connecting himself with the McChord Presbyterian Church, at Lexington, Ky., but soon afterwards removed his membership to the Mt. Horeb Church, Fayette county, where he was elected ruling elder, late in 1829. In the Summer of 1830 he felt bound to appear once more before the people of his native country, to defend and commend the laws of God and Christian morality in the matters of the abolition of negro-slavery and the transportation of the mails on the Sabbath day. He honestly, in the fear of God, pleaded with his countrymen in behalf of these great interests of God and men, and when the cause which was dear to him met with defeat, publicly and privately retired once more from public life. He did not, as yet, however, feel called to preach the gospel; that work was first done in him through the instrumentality of a great woods-meeting, held on his own farm, in the Autumn of 1831. He had been urged, indeed, to the step, by his friends; but he had some false notions and many false feelings, and (he writes) it was not "until this woods-meeting that I fully determined to preach the Word." He immediately put himself under the care of West Lexington Presbytery, and six months later, April 5th, 1832, was licensed by that body, at its meeting at Walnut Hill. After the meeting of the Assembly of 1832 (in which he sat as Ruling Elder) he retired to Princeton to complete as Secretary and General Agent of the Board of Education, there were but sixty candidates for the ministry under its care. But the noble enthusiasm he brought to its service so roused the Church to its forgotten duty, that very speedily the number of its beneficiaries exceeded one thousand. He brought the same unconquerable energy and fiery zeal to his work as Professor and as Agent for the Board of Foreign Missions, and the results in both were no less remarkable.

He was a great preacher; an orator; seeming sometimes almost inspired by the grandeur of his theme; heard eagerly everywhere, and in his varied services to the Church, heard by unusual numbers in all parts of the land. But, perhaps, his greatest service resulted from his unparalleled skill in organizing, and his inde-his preparation for preaching; but had been there only some five months when he received and accepted a call to the Second Church of Baltimore, by which act he became the successor of his brother John, and accepted a call declined by his brother William. He was received by the Presbytery of Baltimore, November 22d, 1832, ordained and installed, November 26th, 1832, and after a remarkably successful pastorate of over twelve years, was dismissed, April 17th, 1845, to the Presbytery of Ohio, in order to become President of Jefferson College, Pennsylvania. On September 16th, 1847, he accepted the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church, Lexington, Ky., which he retained until September 7th, 1853, during which period he also discharged most ably the duties of Superintendent of Public Instruction for the State of Kentucky. He was elected Professor of Exegetic, Didactic and Polemic Theology in the new seminary at Danville, and began his duties there at its opening, in September, 1853; his formal inauguration took place on October 15th, 1853. His resignation of this position was offered on September 17th, 1869, to take effect the following December; and he died, after a long illness, December 27th, 1871.

Dr. Breckinridge has almost equal claims to be remembered as a devoted and successful pastor, an eloquent and impressive preacher, a profound theologian, a wise administrator, a brilliant journalist, and an unequalled ecclesiastical debater. He was practically the leader of the Old School party through all the troubles which accompanied and followed the division, in 1837. He was the author of the "Act and Testimony," and of its defence as put forth by the Philadelphia Convention of 1837. He participated in all the great discussions which agitated the Church for forty years, from 1831. He first appeared in the Assembly, as an Elder, in 1831, but after that was a very frequent member, and was made Moderator in 1841. A collection of his debates would fill volumes, and would comprise thorough discussions of nearly the whole range of great ecclesiastical questions. The exigencies of his position at Baltimore, where he was publicly assaulted by Romanist controversialists, and denied the columns of the public press for reply, forced the establishment, in January, 1835, of "The Baltimore Literary and Religious Magazine," which, under the care of Mr. Cross and himself, did a good work under that name, and subsequently under the name of "The Spirit of the XIX Century," until 1842. His share was also very large in the management of "The Danville Quarterly Review" (1861-65). His theology may be judged of by his printed works. But the immense power of his preaching, and his untiring devotion as a pastor, are in the hands of unstable tradition. The labor with which he burdened himself was excessive; but the success of his ministry was correspondingly great. The spring of his whole life was an unfeigned piety, which wrought in him a burning love for souls, and great depth of personal humility, which was all the more marked in its contrast with his great acquirements and the occasional pain-bred irritability of his temper. The brief manuscript notes for his sermons seldom fail to be crossed with a prayer, evidently from the heart: "Lord, add thy blessing, for Jesus' sake!" "Oh, Lord, own and bless thy truth." "Oh, Master, give me utterance." "Oh, Lord! help me to preach." "Amen! Help, Lord Jesus!" "Oh that I may be owned and blessed by the Lord Jesus Christ," and the like. His private diary is full of marks of the same perfect humility and dependence on God. No wonder that the gospel from his lips seemed burning fire. In private life he was as delightful a conversationalist as he was a beloved husband and parent, and a trusted adviser and friend. He exhibited here, as in public affairs, that marvelous readiness and unexpected preparation which was the most striking characteristic of his genius.

Prominent among Dr. Breckinridge's publications were, "Papism in the XIX Century," "Memoranda of Foreign Travels," "The Knowledge of God, Objectively Considered" (first part of his System of Theology), "The Knowledge of God, Subjectively Considered" (second part of his System of Theology). Besides these were numerous pamphlets on ecclesiastical subjects, numerous printed sermons, a lecture on "The Internal Evidences of Christianity," delivered at the University of Virginia, a series of Kentucky School Reports, from 1848-53, and political articles and addresses, mostly printed in the Danville Review.

Breckinridge, Samuel M., LL. D., is the son of the late Rev. John Breckinridge, D. D., and of the late Margaret (Miller) Breckinridge, daughter of the late Rev. Samuel Miller, D. D., of Princeton, New Jersey, and was born in Baltimore, Md., November 3d, 1828. He was educated in part at Union College, New York, and at Centre College, Kentucky, but chiefly at the College of New Jersey, at Princeton.

SAMUEL M. BRECKINRIDGE, LL. D.

He graduated at the Law School of Transylvania University, at Lexington, Kentucky, and settled at St. Louis, Missouri, in 1850, and has there since resided.

In 1854-5 Mr. Breckinridge represented the city and county of St. Louis in part, in the Legislature. In 1859 he was elected Judge of the Circuit Court of the State of Missouri, and while on the bench, was chosen a member of the State Convention, which continued in existence until 1863. He became Elder of the Second Presbyterian Church of St. Louis in 1871. In 1871 he was a member of the General Assembly which met at St. Louis; in 1873 he was a member of the committee on Fraternal Relations, appointed to meet a similar committee of the Southern Presbyterian Church.

In 1878 Judge Breckinridge was made a member of the General Assembly's Committee on the Revision of the Book of Discipline, which was continued from time to time, making its final report to the Assembly of 1882, at Springfield, Illinois. He was a member of the Assemblies of 1881, at Buffalo, of 1882, at Springfield, and of 1883, at Saratoga. He is a model Christian gentleman, wise in counsel, and exercises a marked influence in ecclesiastical assemblies.

Breckinridge, William Lewis, D. D., LL. D., eighth child and fourth son of Hon. John and Mary Hopkins (née Cabell) Breckinridge, was born at Cabell's Dale, near Lexington, Kentucky, on the 23d of July, 1803. He became a follower of Christ at about the age of fifteen, and entered the ministry about 1831. His first pastorate was fulfilled at Maysville, Ky. When his brother John was made Secretary of the Board of Education, he was sought for to succeed him in the pastorate of the Second Presbyterian Church, Baltimore, but preferred a Professorship of Languages in Centre College, Ky. Thence he was called to the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church of Louisville, Ky., where he began his work on the first Sabbath of January, 1836, and profitably preached for a period of three-and-twenty years. Subsequently he was President of two colleges; first of Oakland College, Miss., and then of Centre College, Ky. At the time of his death he was residing on his farm in Cass county, Missouri, and laboring in the surrounding country, as minister at large. He died peacefully, December 26th, 1876.

WILLIAM LEWIS BRECKINRIDGE, D. D., LL. D.

The following estimate of his character is from the pen of his life-long friend, Rev. Dr. Edward P. Humphrey: "The grace of God, which took possession of his mind and heart when about fifteen years old, gave sweetness and dignity to his elevated nature, true love to Christ and to the souls of men, together with a spirit of self-sacrifice and of unquestioning obedience to God. As a preacher he was instructive, lucid and thoroughly evangelical. He had a clear conception, an intelligent and experimental knowledge of the gospel, and expounded the saving truths always with great simplicity, and often with an earnestness, a pathos, a persuasive power, that brought his hearers 'into captivity to the obedience of Christ.' And then, a certain propulsive power was imparted to his discourses, by his manliness, his moral and physical courage, his profound conviction of the truth and glory of the gospel, and by the unspotted purity of his life. His character came with him into the pulpit; it robed his person with honor when he walked through the streets. What men thought of him strengthened all our ministers, of every Church, in the confidence of the community.

"Few men have been so diligent and useful in pastoral visitation. His fine social qualities, his ready, even spontaneous, sympathy, his sense of propriety and delicacy, made him welcome always to the families of his congregation. The sick and the dying and the bereaved turned to him as at once a learner and a teacher in the school of Christ, the Consoler. His labors as a pastor were the most prominent, and, as he thought, the most fruitful branch of his ministry. Through these labors he reached a place in the love of the people which has not been often attained in our generation.

"In the Presbyterian Church at large he was a wise and trusted counsellor. He loved the Church; he consecrated himself, body and spirit, down to the end of his days, to its welfare. His brethren throughout the land committed to him the most sacred trusts, and they bestowed upon him the highest honors of the profession."

Breed, David Riddle, D.D., was born June 10th, 1818. His father was a merchant, of old Puritan stock. His mother, Rhoda Ogden Edwards, was a great-grand-daughter of President Edwards. He was received into the Church (Third Presbyterian, Pittsburg), by Dr. Henry Kendall, in 1861; prepared for college at Western University of Pennsylvania, from 1859 to 1862, inclusive; pursued a business life from January, 1863, to May, 1861, and graduated at Hamilton College, N. Y., in 1867. He graduated at Auburn Theological Seminary in 1870, and was called, December 25th, 1869, to the House of Hope Presbyterian Church, St. Paul, Minnesota, of which he still has charge. He was ordained by the Presbytery of St. Paul, October, 1870. In 1880 he was a delegate to the Sunday-school Centenary, in London. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from his Mother, in June, 1883. Dr. Breed is an earnest and able preacher, and faithful to pastoral responsibility. He is beloved by his people, and ready to aid in every good work.

Breed, William Pratt, D.D., is one of the most effective preachers and industrious and successful pastors in the city of Philadelphia. It can well be said of him that he is "abundant in labors" whether we consider his pastoral work, his pulpit ministrations, his service in the Boards of the Church, or the extent and variety of the fruits of his pen. He has written and published sixteen bound volumes, one-half of which are specially adapted to the young, besides various tracts and numerous newspaper articles. In the pulpit Dr. Breed has been no less laborious. He was for eight years pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, of Steubenville, Ohio, the church which the young ladies of the Seminary at that place attended, by whom he was greatly loved as a pastor, and to whom his ministry was specially blessed. Of the three hundred and eighty additions to his church during this pastorate, many were from the Seminary, and are now occupying prominent places in social life and in the benevolent work of the Church. In 1856 he was called to a new enterprise just starting in West Spruce Street, Philadelphia, under the auspices of Dr. Boardman's church. The organization then consisted of thirty-four members. To this number more than one thousand have been added under his ministry, and the splendid church at Seventeenth and Spruce has been built.

Dr. Breed was born in the State of New York, united with Dr. Kitch's Church, in New York city, when he was sixteen years of age; graduated at the University of New York under Chancellor Frelinghuysen, and spent one year at Union Theological Seminary, and two at Princeton, where he graduated. He has been twice honored with the Moderatorship of the Synod of Philadelphia, and in 1883 was Moderator of the Synod of Pennsylvania. From his untiring efforts sprang the Witherspoon Monument, in Fairmount Park. That monument was practically his work. "A Historical Discourse on Presbyterians and the Revolution," presenting the subject of the monument, was delivered by him in more than seventy pulpits, from Roslyn, L. I., on the East, to Steubenville, Ohio, on the West. He presented the cause also in ten Synods and Presbyteries. His activity in behalf of the monument is only a fair specimen of the constantly recurring "outside work" of the Church in which he is sure to be one of the prominent promoters and efficient co-workers. He wields a strong influence in the Church judicatories.

To Dr. Breed was assigned the honor of delivering the address of welcome to the Second General Council of the Presbyterian Alliance, which convened at Philadelphia, September, 1880, and he discharged the pleasant duty with great credit.⁹ He also read before that body an admirable paper on "The Diffusion of a Presbyterian Literature." Dr. Breed is always in a good humor, excepting when sound Calvinism is attacked. He is genial, social, of benevolent spirit, and greatly beloved by his congregation and his brethren, as well as highly esteemed in the community in which he has so long lived and labored.

Brice, Rev. John, was a native of Harford county, Md. He removed with the family to Western Pennsylvania; received his education chiefly under the direction of the Rev. Joseph Smith; studied theology partly under Mr. Smith and partly under Mr. Dod; was licensed by the Presbytery of Redstone, April 15th, 1788, and by the same Presbytery was ordained and installed pastor of the congregations of Three Ridges and Forks of Wheeling, April 22d, 1790. In these congregations he labored until about the year 1807, when, on account of ill health, the pastoral relation was dissolved. Mr. Brice still continued, however, to preach the gospel in Green county, Pa., and in the adjacent parts of Virginia, as often as health would permit, until April 18th, 1810, when he was dismissed to connect himself with the Presbytery of Lancaster. He died August 26th, 1811. He was a man of nervous temperament, subject, occasionally, to great despondency of mind, but of deep piety. His labors were attended with a divine blessing, and many rich fruits appeared after his decease, both in his former charge and in the country adjacent.

Brick Church, New York City. The first account we have of Presbyterianism in this city, is the combination of several Presbyterian families from England, Scotland, Ireland, France and New England, in the year 1706, who were in the habit of assembling together on the Lord's Day, in a private house, and conducting their religious services without the aid of any Christian minister. The following year they worshiped occasionally in the Dutch Church in Garden street, and in the year 1716 formed themselves into a regular Presbyterian Church, under the stated ministry of Rev. James Anderson, a native of Scotland.

For three years this infant church assembled for public worship in the City Hall, then on the corner of Nassau and Wall streets, and in 1719 they erected the First Presbyterian Church, in Wall street, out of which was formed the Church of the Seceders, in Cedar street, under the pastoral charge of the Rev. Dr. Mason, the elder, and also the Brick Church in Beekman street. The corner-stone of this edifice was laid in the autumn of the year 1776; and on the first of January, 1778, it was opened for public worship, by a discourse from the Rev. Dr. Rodgers, its first pastor. The congregations worshipping in Wall street and in Beekman street remained for a series of years one church, under the same associated pastorate, the same Board of Trustees, and the same bench of Ruling Elders. This identity of interest was preserved during the whole of the Revolutionary War, and down to the year 1809. During the war these two Presbyterian churches were the objects of the special vengeance and indignity of the enemy. The church on Wall street was converted into barracks, and the Brick Church into a hospital; defaced, stripped of their interior, and left in ruins, and the parsonage house burned to the ground. On the return of peace, and while these edifices were being repaired, the congregations stately worshiped in St. George's and St. Paul's, through the unsolicited and generous courtesy of the vestry of Trinity Church.

After having been repaired, at great expense, the Brick Church was reopened in June, 1784, by a discourse from Dr. Rodgers, from the words of the Psalmist, "I was glad when they said unto me, let us go into the house of the Lord." The minister successively associated with Dr. Rodgers, after the conclusion of the war, were, the Rev. James Wilson, from Scotland; the Rev. John McKnight; and the Rev. Samuel Miller. These congregations, in their united capacity, and for many years, established and sustained a large parochial school, in Nassau, between Liberty and Cedar streets, and relinquished their funds, for this object, to the public school directors, on the expressed condition that no child whom they should recommend should be excluded, and that the Bible should be daily read in the schools.

Serious inconveniences were found to attend the arrangement of this collegiate charge, and by an amicable stipulation, in the year 1803, the congregations, till then united, were formed into separate and distinct churches, the Rev. Dr. Rodgers retaining his relation to both, and the Rev. Dr. Miller, the stated pastor of the church in Wall street, Dr. McKnight voluntarily resigning his connection with both churches.

The eldership of the Brick Church at this time consisted of men well known, both in civil and ecclesiastical life, and venerable for age and character. They were Abraham Vangelder, John Thompson, William Ogilvie, Benjamin Egbert, Thomas Fraser, John Bingham, John Mills, and Samuel Osgood; to which were added, shortly after the separation of the churches, William Whitlock, Richard Cunningham, Rensselaer Havens, and John Adams. While all these gentlemen were men of worth and influence, the ruling spirit among them, and the man eminent for discernment, practical wisdom, ardent piety, and vigorous action, was John Mills.

On the 8th of August, 1810, the Rev. Gardiner Spring was ordained by the Presbytery of New York, and installed the pastor of the Brick Church, in which he labored for half a century, with marked acceptableness and great success, making a powerful impression for good upon the community by his consistent character, eminent pulpit ability, and pastoral fidelity. In a discourse delivered by Dr. Spring, May 25th, 1856, as the closing sermon in the old Brick Church in Beekman street, he made the following eloquent and touching reference to his ministry in the venerable building:—

“The speaker stands here for the last time, and you, beloved friends, meet for the last time in the consecrated place where we have so often assembled for the worship of God. I am not ignorant of the defects of my ministry. Yet have I this thankful conviction, that, so far as I have known it, I have not shunned to declare the whole counsel of God. If I have not, testify against me this day. We call upon you to witness, we call upon the sainted spirits of the departed to witness, we make an appeal to the walls of this hallowed edifice, if the truth of God, detached from the systems of human philosophy, from the misnamed improvements and ultraisms of the age, and from the popular daubing with untempered mortar, has not been proclaimed from this pulpit. This house has also been greatly endeared to us as ‘the house of prayer’—as ‘the house of prayer for all people.’ Many are the seasons which the living and the dead have here enjoyed, in sweet communion with God and one another. This house has been our thankful resort in prosperity; in adversity it has been our refuge. Here the aged and the young have come, for the first and last time, to commemorate the love of Christ at His table. Here our children have been baptized, and their children after them, and here we have wept and prayed together as God has called them from these earthly scenes. Here other generations have listened, as you now listen, and around this spot and beneath it are the sepulchres of the departed. I seem to stand, to-day, amid generations that are past, so vividly does my imagination people these seats with faces and forms whose place now knows them no more. Pleasant, yet mournful, are these reminiscences; memory has no associations more delightful than those which run by the waters of the sanctuary. This house has also been the stranger’s home. Of this and of that man it shall one day be said, that ‘he was born here.’ Many a wanderer from other lands, and more from distant regions of our own broad territory, have here sought and made their peace with God, while many a backslider has been restored, amid scenes which have given joy to the angels of God, and told of the years of the right-hand of the Most High.”

The Dedication Sermon of the New Brick Church, on Murray Hill, was preached by Dr. Spring, October 31st, 1858, on the text, “Ye shall reverence my sanctuary.”—Lev. xix, 30. In this discourse the venerable preacher said: “This is God’s house, and we come to dedicate it to Him. And there is, in my humble judgment, no superstition, but great propriety and truth, in these acts of dedication. There is, and there ought to be, as wide a distinction between the house of God and all other places of public resort, as between all that is secular and all that is sacred. The one is a select and consecrated territory; the other belongs to the business of the world. Secular themes and secular objects have their place, but that place is not the sanctuary. From our hearts we dedicate this edifice to the God of heaven. It is nothing to us if He do not occupy it. Stand up, all ye people, and before God, angels and men, consecrate it to His worship and honor to whom it belongs, each one of us humbly looking to Him, that He would fill it with His great glory. Be it ever sacred to Him by whose name it is called; sacred to His mercy-seat and His praise; sacred to His pure gospel, to His own ordinances, to the fellowship of the saints, the conversion of men, and the comfort and edification of those who fear God and love His Son. Sacred place! ‘Arise, O Lord God, thou and the ark of thy strength! Let thy priests be clothed with righteousness, and let thy saints shout for joy!’ From this good hour let this house be devoted only to sacred and religious uses. Here let all that is sacred be put in motion, and all that is secular be put at rest.”

For a short time the Rev. W. J. Hoge was co-pastor with Dr. Spring, of the Brick Church, toward the close of his pastorate. After Dr. Spring became Pastor Emeritus he was succeeded in the pulpit by the Rev. W. G. T. Shedd, D. D., LL. D., the Rev. J. O. Murray, D. D., and the Rev. Llewelyn D. Bevan, D. D. The present pastor of the church is the Rev. H. J. Van Dyke, Jr., who has recently been called to this important charge.

Brinsmade, Horatio Nelson, D.D., was born at New Hartford, Conn., Dec. 28th, 1798; graduated at Yale College in September, 1822, and immediately after entered Princeton Seminary, where he remained nearly one year, after which he went to Hartford, Conn., and studied theology about two years, under the Rev. Joel Hawes, D.D., teaching also in the Deaf and Dumb Asylum in that city, from May 1823, until December, 1831.

He was licensed by the North Congregational Association of Hartford, in June, 1824; ordained by the same body as an evangelist, June 1st, 1825; supplied the North Congregational Church in Hartford a part of the years 1827 and 1828; in December, 1831, began to preach at Collinsville, Conn., and served a Congregational Church which was organized there in August, 1832, until November, 1834. At the latter date he began to preach at Pittsfield, Mass.; where he was installed pastor of the First Congregational Church, February 11th, 1835. Here he labored with great popularity and success for six and a half years, and was released September 9th, 1841, having a call to the Third Presbyterian Church of Newark, N. J. Over this new charge he was installed September 23d, 1841, and here he labored with large acceptance and usefulness for twelve years. On October 9th, 1853, he was released by the Presbytery of Passaic.

Dr. Brinsmade's next pastorate was over the First Congregational Church at Beloit, Wis., where he was installed, February 10th, 1851, and closed seven highly successful years of labor, January 1st, 1861. During nearly the whole of this time he gave gratuitous instruction in Beloit College. From Beloit he returned to Newark, N. J., where he commenced labors with a mission of the Third Presbyterian Church, as a result of which the Wickliffe Presbyterian Church was organized by the Presbytery of Passaic, May 11th, 1865. He continued to serve this young church as stated supply until April 15th, 1867, at which date he was duly installed as its pastor, from which pastoral relation he was released by Newark Presbytery, April 17th, 1872. He continued, however, to reside in Newark, preaching often, useful in many ways in the church and the community, honored and beloved by all around him, until his death, which occurred January 18th, 1879. In his last hours all with him was light, and peace and joy in believing.

Dr. Brinsmade was one of the best of men, and one of the most faithful and useful of pastors. His preaching was always with earnestness and love. He spent and was spent in the service of Christ. Having traveled extensively in Europe and the East, he had broad and intelligent views. He was faithful, affectionate, devout. The law of love was the rule of his life. He made the impress of his piety and fidelity on all who came within the reach of his influence.

Brodhead, Augustus, D. D., son of Hon. John H. and Eliza Cross Brodhead, was born in Milford, Pennsylvania, May 13th, 1831. He graduated at Union College, New York, in 1855, and passed at once into the Theological Seminary at Princeton, taking there a full course. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Hudson; and, having been appointed by the Board of Foreign Missions as a missionary to India, he was ordained as an evangelist by the same Presbytery, May 4th, 1858.

This date coincides with the darkest period in the history of our missions to India. The Sepoy mutiny had broken up all Christian work in the Northwest Provinces. Four of our missionaries, with their families, had been massacred. The Christian converts were scattered, and confusion and anarchy still prevailed throughout the country. But all the atrocities of the mutiny and all the uncertainties of the future could not daunt the courage or shake the resolution of those young Christians who consecrated themselves to the service of the India Mission and pressed forward to take the place of their martyred brethren.

On the 15th of July, 1858, Mr. Brodhead was married to Miss Emily Cumming, of Princeton, N. J. They sailed for India on the 7th of November, by the Cape of Good Hope, and, after a protracted voyage, landed in Calcutta, April 1th, 1859. Their first settlement in India was at Mainpuri, an interesting city of twenty-five thousand inhabitants, lying in a broad and fertile plain, midway between the Ganges and Jumna rivers, a densely-peopled region, occupied by a race of sturdy and prosperous farmers, with the usual admixture of Brahmins, merchants and artisans, presenting some of the best features of Hindoo social life. Here, and at Futtehgarrh, near by, twelve or thirteen years were spent in preaching, teaching, ministering to the native churches and organizing their evangelistic efforts.

In 1872 he was transferred by the Mission to Allahabad, the seat of Government of the Northwest Province, one of the most important cities in North India, where several years more of missionary life were permitted him, which were spent in a wide range of Christian work. He took a prominent part in the Theological Training School of the Synod of India; wrote and published valuable treatises in Sacred and Church History, as well as other books of a more practical and devotional character; he edited the magazine published by the Mission for the use of the native Christians, and assisted in the preparation of hymn books for the Church and Sunday School, for which he wrote a considerable number of hymns and translations; he was actively engaged in the management of the North India Bible and Tract Societies and the Christian Vernacular Education Society. His knowledge of affairs, his calm and impartial judgment, his warm and kindly heart, his extensive missionary experience, combined to give him great influence, not only in his own, but also in the Missions of other churches.

At length a succession of severe attacks of illness made it evident to his medical advisers and the members of the Mission that his constitution would not much longer be able to bear the strain of the Indian climate. Very reluctantly he yielded to the necessity, and in 1878 resigned the service of the Mission and returned to America, where after several temporary engagements he accepted a call from the First Church of Bridgeton, N. J., over which he was installed pastor, May 4th, 1881.

Brown, Rev. Andrew, from Pendleton District, South Carolina, settled at Tuscaloosa, Alabama, in January, A. D. 1820. This venerable servant of Christ was the first of our order to break the bread of life to wanderers scattered up and down in that then recent wilderness, and he, unaided and alone, except by Him who hath said, "Lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the world," was enabled, by untiring zeal and perseverance in his Master's work here, to rear the blood-stained banner, and gather around it the soldiers of the Cross. In 1820 he organized the Bethel Church in Tuscaloosa. In 1821 he, assisted by the lamented brother, Rev. Francis H. Porter, organized the New Hope Church, in Greene county, and in 1822 he organized the Lebanon Church, in Tuscaloosa county.

In January, 1822, he removed to Mesopotamia, still preaching at most of the churches he had already organized, and here, in the Fall of 1823, he had called on the Rev. James Hillhouse, and the Rev. Joseph P. Cunningham, to assist in organizing the church in Mesopotamia. The day for that purpose being set, he went to Marion, Perry county, to attend a meeting of the Presbytery, where he died, after five days' sickness. This event was a severe bereavement to his brethren of the Presbytery, who, being mostly young men, looked up to him as their guide in ecclesiastical matters. He was a man of clear, discriminating views on all theological subjects; rigid in his adherence to what he believed to be truth, and fearless in proclaiming it.

Brown, Alexander Blaine, D. D., was the son of Matthew Brown, D. D., LL. D. and Mary Blaine. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1825; spent some time in teaching a classical school in the State of Delaware; studied theology at the Western Seminary, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Ohio, in October, 1831. After his licensure he spent a short time as a missionary in Virginia, his field of labor being the counties lying below the Blue Ridge. Here his services were greatly acceptable, and he was earnestly urged to settle among them. On June 27th, 1833, he took charge of the churches of Birmingham and Concord, in the vicinity of Pittsburg, and devoted himself assiduously to his work, especially among the children and youth of his flocks. He subsequently became pastor of the Church in Niles Michigan, where he was beloved and honored. In 1839 he left Niles, and was settled for a short time in Portsmouth, Ohio, where he labored with great acceptance. In 1841 he accepted the post of Professor of Belles Lettres and adjunct Professor of Languages in Jefferson College, and also the charge of Centre Church, a few miles distant from Canonsburg. In 1845 he was made Professor of Rhetoric, Logic and General History, and, at the same time, transferred to the pastoral charge of the congregation at Chartiers. In October, 1847, he was chosen President of the College, as successor of Dr. R. J. Breckinridge, by a unanimous vote of the Board of Trustees, in which position he fully met the expectations of the trustees, the students and the country. In 1856 impaired health led to his resignation of the presidency, retaining, at the earnest solicitation of the Board, the office of "Extraordinary Professor of English Literature."

Dr. Brown died on his farm, near his old flock, at Centre, September 8th, 1863. He was a singularly guileless and unselfish man. The salient points of his character were excellent judgment, exquisite taste and extraordinary modesty and delicacy. He was an admirable teacher of mental and moral philosophy. As a preacher he was instructive, pathetic and impressive. He was greatly beloved by all who knew him. Religion and learning, alike, will long cherish his memory, and blend their tears over his grave.

Brown, Rev. Allen Henry, was born in New York city, September 23d, 1820; graduated at Columbia College in 1839, and studied theology at Union Seminary, New York, and at Princeton Seminary. He was Agent of the American Tract Society, 1844-46; ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of West Jersey, January 5th, 1848; stated supply at May's Landing, N. J., 1847-60; Presbyterial Missionary, Absecon, 1860-70; stated supply at May's Landing and Tuckahoe, 1870-72; resided in New York city in 1873, and since 1874 has been Synodical Missionary of New Jersey, residing at Camden. Mr. Brown is an exemplary Christian, mild and winning in manner, and devoted to the work of doing good. He has accomplished much for Presbyterianism in New Jersey, by organizing new churches, strengthening feeble ones, and publishing a history of the cause in that State. His efforts in behalf of Sabbath observance are worthy of all commendation.

Brown, Rev. Charles, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., in November, 1805, educated in the same city, and was licensed and ordained by the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia, in 1833. For the first six years he ministered, successively, to the churches of Greensborough, Mispillion, Drawyers and Port Penn. He was Secretary of the Philadelphia Tract Society, in 1841, and pastor of the Logan Square Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, from 1842 until 1855, when he became City Agent of the Pennsylvania Colonization Society, and held the office for three years. He was Corresponding Secretary of the Philadelphia Education Society, from 1858 until 1861, and Secretary of the Relief Fund for Disabled Ministers (N. S.), from 1864 until 1870, when, on the reunion of the two branches of the Presbyterian Church, he was elected Treasurer of the united Fund. He still holds the office of Recording Secretary and Treasurer of the Presbyterian Board of Relief. For nearly seven years Mr. Brown preached regularly to the First Church of Darby, in addition to his labors as Corresponding Secretary, and for thirty-five years the Philadelphia Presbyterian Ministerial Association was avored with his weekly services as its Recording Secretary. He is now in the fifty-first year of his ministry. Mr. Brown's life has been one of steady Christian consistency, and of diligent activity and marked usefulness in the Master's service. In all the congregations of which he has been pastor he held the affections of his people, prosecuted his work without any discord among them, and his labors were attended with the divine blessing. The origin of at least four churches can be traced to his early and earnest labors. He has filled all the offices to which the Church has called him with great fidelity and satisfaction, and deservedly enjoys the confidence and affection of his brethren.

Brown, Duncan, D. D., was born in Bladen, now Robeson county, North Carolina, October 31, 1774; received a classical education in the neighborhood; studied theology under David Caldwell, D. D., in Guilford county, N. C.; was licensed March 5th, 1801, by Orange Presbytery, and immediately entered upon his labors as an itinerant missionary in North and South Carolina. In 1802 he was ordained and installed pastor of the churches of Hopewell and Aimwell, in South Carolina, and continued in this relation until 1810, when he removed to Maury county, Tennessee. He resided in that county, though not always in the same place, until his death, which occurred June 17th, 1861. During his long ministerial career, Dr. Brown labored as a missionary and stated supply in Middle Tennessee and Northern Alabama, where many churches enjoyed his labors and much good was accomplished.

Brown, Frederick T., D. D., was born in West Carlisle, Coshocton county, Ohio. He was the fourth son of William and Eleanor Brown. He was prepared for College in the Primary Department of Jefferson College, Pennsylvania, in which Institution he passed the Freshman year. He then entered the Sophomore Class of Princeton College, and graduated from Nassau Hall in 1845. He studied theology in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, and in the Theological School at Geneva, Switzerland, under D'Aubigné, Gaussan and others. His first ministerial charge was as a supply to the First Presbyterian Church, Dayton, Ohio, during a six months' absence of its pastor. In the Spring of 1850 he was called to the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church, Madison, Ind. In 1853 he was sent by the Board of Domestic Missions to Cleveland, Ohio, where he organized the Westminster Presbyterian Church, and ministered to it until 1861. In 1862 he was called to Bridge Street Presbyterian Church, Georgetown, D. C. In 1865, at the command of his Presbytery, he was sent on a special mission for the Church to Chicago. In 1867 he was called to the Central Presbyterian Church, St. Paul, Minn. In 1875 he was called to the First Presbyterian Church, Ann Arbor, Mich. And in 1881 he was called to the First Presbyterian Church, Manassquan, N. J., of which he is now the acceptable and useful pastor. Dr.

Brown is an able, sound and earnest preacher. He is a vigorous and graceful writer, and uses his pen frequently for religious periodicals. He is ever fearless and faithful in what he regards to be his duty. He was one of the first O. S. Commissioners appointed to negotiate the union of the O. S. and N. S. churches.

Brown, Rev. Henry, son of the Rev. Samuel and Mary (Moore) Brown, was born in Rockbridge County, Va., November 28th, 1801, graduated at Washington College, Va., in 1827, was a student at Princeton Seminary and Union Seminary, Va., and was licensed by Lexington Presbytery, April 15th, 1829. He first labored as a missionary in Kanawha county, Va., then (in 1831) in Randolph county, Va., preaching at Beverly, Huttonsville, and Mingo Flats, with great success, then (in 1832) at Woodstock, Va., where for two years he enjoyed similar success. From 1833 to 1836 he labored in Augusta county, where he gathered and organized Shemariah Church. For two years, 1836-8, he was stated supply at Briery Church, Va.; from 1838-40, preached in churches in the neighborhood of Wilmington, N. C., with much success, supplied Black River and Rockfish churches, Va., 1840-1, and the church at Harrisonburg, 1841-53. In July 16th, 1853, he was installed pastor of Goshen Church, Va., and continued in this relation until August 13th, 1857. At the same time he was also pastor of Pisgah Church, from September 24th, 1853 to November 23d, 1856. Subsequently he was pastor of the Church at Lake City, Fla., from April 25th, 1858 until February 15th, 1859; a missionary in Cherokee Presbytery from 1859 to 1862; stated supply of Lafayette and Harmony churches, Alabama, in 1866-7, and an evangelist in Knox Presbytery five years, 1867-72. From 1872-7, he preached at Pilatka, Enterprise, Cedar Keys, and other places in Florida, as he was able. Mr. Brown died January 14th, 1881. He was a man of earnest piety, of deep humility, of sound mind, of great energy, of tender emotion, and of strong affections. He was intensely devoted to the work of the ministry and to the cause of Christ.

Brown, Rev. Horatio Woodward, was born at Buffalo, N. Y., on the 27th day of July, 1833. He graduated at Yale College, Conn., in 1854, and was Tutor in the College from 1856 to 1859. He pursued theological studies in both Union Theological Seminary, New York, and at New Haven. In the Winter of 1859-60, he was ordained to the gospel ministry, and spent a few months laboring in Wisconsin. His health, however, becoming impaired, he sought its re-establishment by travel and a sojourn of two years in Europe. Returning home he soon resumed ministerial work, and up to the Spring of 1870 was the very acceptable and useful pastor of the Presbyterian Churches of Lyons and Brockport, N. Y. In the year 1871 he was called to the Presbyterian Church of Williamsport, Pa., his present charge.

The Sabbath services of Mr. Brown are eminently instructive, and he has the power, in no ordinary degree, of interesting his hearers in the subjects he preaches upon. He is, moreover, a most faithful pastor. Burdened with the calamity of deafness, it is surprising to his friends and people how he can accomplish the amount of service he so regularly renders. He has ever been a hard student, and his preparations for the pulpit are carefully and laboriously made. His love of books in the line of his profession almost amounts to a passion. In the delivery of his sermons he is animated. His well furnished mind, his excellence as a preacher, his kindness of heart, his evident anxiety to do good, his sense of the great responsibility resting upon him as a shepherd over those whom the Master has committed to his care and oversight, and his ceaseless devotion to his work, not only make him a useful servant of Christ, but endear him greatly to the hearts of his people.

Brown, Rev. Hugh Arbuthnot, was born in 1819, in St. Clairsville, Ohio; was educated at Jefferson College, Pa., from which he was graduated, with the first honors of his class, in 1840; studied theology at the Theological Seminary, Princeton, where he graduated in 1843; went as a missionary to China, under the Presbyterian Board, where he remained till 1849, when an affection of the eyes, endangering his sight, compelled him to return. He organized and ministered to the First Presbyterian Church of Rockford, Ill.; removed from there to Mossingford, Charlotte county, Va., in 1857, where he still is the faithful and efficient pastor of Hermon Church.

Brown, Isaac V., D. D., was born in Pluckamin, Somerset county, N. J., November 4th, 1781. He graduated at Nassau Hall; studied theology under Dr. John Woodhull, of Freehold, N. J.; was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery, and ordained by it in 1807, as pastor of the church at Lawrenceville, N. J. In 1810 he established the Lawrenceville Classical and Commercial Boarding School, and remained at the head of it until 1833, when he removed to Mount Holly, N. J., and was instrumental in organizing the Presbyterian Church now in existence there. In addition he preached at Plattsburg, N. J., and organized a church there. The remaining years of his life were passed in New Brunswick, Trenton, and other places in the vicinity, preaching as occasion required. Dr. Brown was one of the founders of the American Colonization Society, and one of the original members of the American Bible Society. He died April 19th, 1861. He was a man of rare talents and learning, enterprising and public spirited, a warm friend, a liberal and zealous supporter and defender of whatever he felt was "the right."

Brown, James Caldwell, D.D., was born at St. Clairsville, Ohio, in October, 1815; graduated at Jefferson College with honor, and studied theology two years in the Seminary at Allegheny, Pa., also one year at the Seminary in Columbia, South Carolina. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Harmony, S. C., 1838. In the fall of 1839 he settled in Valparaiso, Indiana, then a village, and there labored with ardent zeal and remarkable success. Not less than a thousand souls there and in the country round acknowledged him as their spiritual father. Nearly every Presbyterian church within a circuit of thirty miles was organized by him. He was known to ride sixty miles to preach to a poor Presbyterian widow and her family, in a destitute neighborhood. In 1860, at the urgent request of the Directors of the Theological Seminary at Chicago, he became General Agent of that institution, but the national troubles blasted all prospects of raising money, and after a few months of fruitless efforts in the work, he accepted an invitation to St. Louis, to supply the pulpit of Dr. McPheters' church, during his absence for his health. Here he labored eight months, God blessing him with a glorious revival and the devoted love of that people. On Dr. McPheters' return he accepted an invitation to supply temporarily the pulpit of the Presbyterian Church of South Bend, Indiana. There, also, a blessed revival attended his labors. He died, July 11th, 1862, in the triumphs of the faith of Jesus. Dr. Brown was a devout Christian and eminently devoted to the work of the ministry. He was "instant in season and out of season," not only in preaching the gospel publicly and from house to house, but in devising and executing schemes for advancing the interests of our poor humanity in every way. He exhibited an endless activity in doing good, and sought to make his whole life one living sermon.

Brown, James Moore, D. D., was born in the Valley of Virginia, September 13th, 1799; was educated at Washington College, Va.; studied theology under George A. Baxter, D. D., and was licensed by Lexington Presbytery, April 23d, 1824. In August following he visited the churches of Gerrardstown, Tuscarora and Falling Waters, in Berkeley county, Va., and September 30th, 1826, was installed their pastor. Here he labored like an apostle, earnestly, faithfully and successfully. In 1835, at the urgent solicitation of the Synods of Virginia and North Carolina, he undertook an agency for the cause of Missions, and removed to Prince Edward county, Va., as a more central location for his work. In this work he continued two years, and labored with untiring industry and great efficiency.

In April, 1837, he received a call to the Church of Kanawha, then embracing the present churches of Charlestown and Kanawha Salines, Va., where, for twenty-five years, he labored with success, beloved more and more by all who knew him. With his usual energy and activity as a minister of Christ, he extended his labors through all the surrounding regions, for a hundred miles or more. He died June 7th, 1862, and his final scene was one of triumph.

Dr. Brown was held in very high regard as a man, a citizen, and a friend. He was eminently a wise man, and a wise counsellor in the Church. For thirty years, at least, he stood forth eminent as a wise man in the Synod. He was eminently a man of peace whenever it was possible to live peaceably with all men without compromise of the Truth as it is in Jesus. His judgment was almost unerring, and this not only because of his finely balanced intellectual powers, but above all, because he seemed ever to be a man without the passions of other men. As a preacher he was solid and earnest. He presented the great points of the gospel without meretricious ornament, but with unusual clearness, point, and vigor. "Of all the preachers we have ever known," said the Rev. Stuart Robinson, D. D., "Dr. Brown might apply to himself the language of Paul: 'I determined to know nothing among you save Jesus Christ and Him crucified.'"

Brown, Rev. John, was born in Ireland; graduated at Nassau Hall in 1749; was licensed by New Castle Presbytery, and was sent to the Valley of Virginia. In August, 1753, he was called to Timber Ridge and Providence. He was ordained at Egg's Manor, October 14th, 1753. Mr. Davies speaks of him, in 1754, as a youth of piety, prudence, and zeal. It was under a sermon preached by Mr. Brown, from Psalm vii, 12, that the Rev. Dr. McWhorter, in early youth, was impressed and led to the Saviour. He resigned the charge of Timber Ridge in 1776, and removed, in 1797, to Kentucky. He died in 1803, aged seventy-five.

Brown, John A., Merchant and Banker, was born at Ballymena, County Antrim, Ireland, May 21st, 1788. His father, Alexander Brown, a gentleman of good family and large fortune, left Ireland in consequence of the political agitation, came to this country, and established himself at Baltimore, about the opening of the present century. The son, after completing his education, and spending some time in his father's counting-house, in 1818 settled in Philadelphia, and engaged in business as an importing, jobbing and general commission merchant, gradually becoming also a banker. He soon attained a leading position in the business community, and was elected a Director of the old United States Bank, under the presidency of Nicholas Biddle. In 1838 he retired from active business pursuits, but still continued, as long as his health would permit, to take an influential part in the management of many public institutions. He had served as a Director of the Philadelphia Saving Fund Society from 1827, in which position he still continued, his name for many years heading the list, and mainly through his influence the handsome and substantial building at Seventh and Walnut streets, in which its business is now conducted, was erected.

Mr. Brown was always active in religious and benevolent enterprises. He acted for many years as President of the American Sunday-school Union and of the Philadelphia Sabbath Association; served as a manager of the Blind Asylum; was chiefly instrumental, in connection with Henry Baldwin, in founding the Calvary Presbyterian Church (of which he was a member), one of the largest and most useful in the city, contributing, also, the ground and a large share of the money for the chapel, and, finally, crowned a long career of usefulness and benevolence by donating three hundred thousand dollars to the Presbyterian Hospital, which was founded in West Philadelphia, in 1871. Mr. Brown died in Philadelphia, December 31st, 1872, leaving an only son, Alexander Brown, of that city. His generous charities while living were supplemented by large bequests to numerous public institutions by the provisions of his will. He was very highly esteemed in the city of his residence, for his integrity, public spirit and Christian consistency, and has left the record of an untarnished name and an eminently useful life.

Brown, Rev. Joseph, was a son of the Rev. Samuel Brown and Mary (Moore) Brown, the latter of whom, in early life, was the captive among the Indians whose history is given in the volume entitled, "The Captives of Abb's Valley," and was born in Rockbridge county, Va., September 24th, 1809. He graduated at Washington College, Va., in 1830; spent two years in teaching, and graduated at Princeton Seminary, in 1835. He was licensed by Lexington Presbytery, October 17th, 1835; accepted, September 7th, 1837, calls from the two churches of Spring Creek and Oak Grove, and was soon after installed as their pastor. Here he labored faithfully and successfully until the pastoral relation was dissolved, October 8th, 1847. This was his first and only pastorate. From this time to the end of his life his ministerial labors were of a missionary character, usually in frontier settlements and among the colored population. He spent six years in preaching to the colored people in the State of Mississippi. For a large portion of his time he connected teaching with his preaching labors. During a residence in Florida, at Clear Water Harbor, he gradually gathered, and watched over and supplied the Andrews Memorial Church. He died, February 14th, 1880. Mr. Brown, from his childhood, was godly, devout, spiritually-minded, self-sacrificing, ever anxious to benefit those around him. He was clear in his convictions, sound in the faith, a thorough-going Presbyterian, candid, open-hearted, amiable, affectionate, generous, industrious, energetic, beloved by all who knew him.

Brown, Col. Joseph C., was a man of rare virtues and impressive character. He was born in Virginia, in 1784. Having removed to Missouri in 1818, before its incorporation as a State, he quickly rose to prominence in its affairs, as an officer of the General Government. In 1822 he made a public confession of Christ and united with the First Presbyterian Church of St. Louis. He was elected ruling elder in that church in the year 1830, in which capacity he served until 1842, when he became a member of Maline Creek Church, near the city of St. Louis. No fitter tribute to his memory can be written than to say that his entire life, from the day of his espousal to Christ, was characterized by unswerving devotion to duty, guided by an intelligent piety and the most scrupulous fidelity to every trust. Though his lot was cast amid the lawlessness which belonged to adventurous frontier life, he was constant in defence of the right, and wielded a most wholesome influence for the maintenance of law and order. His face was resolutely set against the violation of law in every form, and the community in which he lived was indebted to no man more than to him for the preservation of peace. The Christian character of Col. Brown took the mold of his natural disposition. He was resolute, courageous, conscientious and discreet. There has been preserved, in evidence of his decided piety, a private covenant, drawn by his own hand, as an expression of his sense of obligation and his purpose wholly to consecrate himself and all his possessions to the glory of the Redeemer.

Brown, Matthew, D. D., LL. D., was descended from respectable and pious ancestors. His paternal grandfather, a native of Ireland, but of Scottish extraction, came to this country about the year 1720, settled in Pennsylvania, and at his death left five sons, all distinguished as devout and exemplary Christians. His son Matthew, the father of the subject of this notice, was born in 1732, resided some years in the vicinity of Carlisle, Pa.; thence removed to White Deer Valley, Northumberland county, of which he was one of the early settlers. He was a ruling elder in the Reformed Presbyterian Church, and is reported to have been a man of decided talents, and to have been somewhat famous for his wit. He took an active part in the early stages of the Revolutionary struggle, and, while thus engaged, died of a fever, in 1778, at the age of forty-six.

Matthew, his youngest son, was born in the year 1776, two years before his father's death. He was adopted in his infancy by his uncle, William Brown, who for many years was well known, and exerted an extensive influence on both the political and religious world. This uncle resided in Dauphin county, near Harrisburg, and it was at a school in that neighborhood that young Matthew was fitted to enter college. In due time he became a member of Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., where he was graduated in May, 1791, during the Presidency of Dr. Nisbet, for whom he always entertained the highest regard. After his graduation he taught, for some time, a classical school, in Northumberland county, where he became intimately acquainted with Dr. James Priestly, and other distinguished men of that region. He commenced his theological studies about the year 1796, and was licensed to preach by Carlisle Presbytery, October 3d, 1799.

Two years after he was licensed he accepted a call from the united congregations of Mifflin and Lost Creek, within the bounds of Huntingdon Presbytery, and, October 6th, 1801, he transferred his relation to that Presbytery, and in due time was ordained and installed as pastor of these churches. Here he labored a few years, but receiving an invitation from the Church in Washington, Pa., to become their pastor, and by the Board of Trustees of Washington Academy to become its Principal, he accepted these invitations, and removed there in the Spring of 1805. During the Spring of 1806 the Academy of which he was Principal became merged in Washington College, a charter for that purpose having been procured, and very much through his influence, from the Legislature of Pennsylvania. Of the new college, Mr. Brown was elected the first President, December 13th, 1806, still retaining his pastoral connection with the congregation. For the discharge of his double duties as pastor and president, his time was most diligently employed, and his faculties tasked to the utmost. In 1816, however, he resigned the Presidency of the College, preferring to give his whole time to the pastoral charge of his church.

He was offered the Presidency of Centre College, Danville, Ky., but declined it. He, however, in 1822, accepted the Presidency of Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa., and continued to hold the office twenty-three years, and during his whole administration the college was eminently prosperous. For several years after his removal to Canonsburg, he preached a part of each Sabbath, in conjunction with the Rev. Dr. J.

McMillan, at Chartiers. After some time a separate organization was effected in the town of Canonsburg, in connection with the college, and Dr. Brown became their regular pastor, and continued to serve them in that capacity until he resigned the Presidency of the college, when the pastoral relation ceased.

In view of the incipient decay of his physical energies, from overtaking his constitution with too much labor, Dr. Brown, in the year 1815, tendered his resignation, as President of the college, to the Board of Trustees, and, in accepting it, they passed resolutions testifying their high appreciation of his character and services, and at the same time conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Laws, the College of New Jersey having, in 1823, conferred the degree of Doctor of Divinity upon him. After his release-ment from the college, he gladly availed himself of every opportunity for preaching the gospel. This was the work in which he especially delighted. He died at the residence of his son-in-law, Rev. Dr. Riddle, at Pittsburg, Pa., July 29th, 1853, and was buried at Washington, Pa., amid every demonstration of consideration and respect.

Dr. Brown published a Memoir of the Rev. Obadiah Jennings, D.D.; also numerous sermons and addresses. His mind was of a high order, and was specially adapted to abstract, metaphysical inquiries. He possessed great moral courage, and was distinguished for his benevolence; delighting in doing good, and in making everybody happy, to the extent of his ability. He was one of the most effective preachers in the part of the country in which he resided. He was a man of truly liberal views and feelings, and made a deep and during mark upon his generation.

Brown, Gen. Robert S., now an elder in the First Presbyterian Church of Bethlehem, Pa., is of Scotch-Irish descent, and was born in the old "Settlement," located in the central part of Northampton county, Pa. He is the only son of William Brown, Esq., who was a graduate of Dickinson College, and a member of the Constitutional Convention of Pennsylvania, in 1837. He is the grandson of Gen. Robert Brown, who commanded a company from the "settlement" during the Revolutionary war, and who became so popular that, at its close, he was made Major-General, commanding the militia of the eastern district of Pennsylvania, and, for twenty years, held a seat in Congress.

General Brown (the subject of this sketch) was carefully nurtured by Christian parents, who set a high value upon religious training at home, and who personally instructed him from the Bible and the shorter Catechism. Having pursued his studies at the old academy in the "Settlement," and at Easton and Nazareth, he completed his education in the higher branches at Latitz, Pa.

By profession he is a lawyer, but some years ago retired from practice, and is now residing on his handsome farm properties, about two miles from Bethlehem, on the main road to Easton, and in the fertile limestone belt that stretches from the Delaware, southward, to the Shenandoah.

In early manhood he entered the ranks of the State militia, and rose from one position to another until he was made Major-General of the Seventh Division.

From 1868 to 1871 he represented the counties of Northampton and Lehigh in the State Senate, where his honorable course, his strict honesty and integrity, won for him the esteem and confidence of members of both parties.

He was elected an elder in the Presbyterian Church of South Bethlehem, Pa., in 1873, and retained this position until the organization of the First Presbyterian Church in Bethlehem, November 14th, 1875, of which movement he was one of the leaders. He was then elected an elder of the new organization, which position he now holds. He has frequently represented his church in Presbytery and in Synod, and was a member of the General Assembly which met in St. Louis in 1871.

Brown, Rev. Samuel, was, on the father's side, of English extraction, on the mother's side, of Scotch. He was born in Bedford county, Va., November 18th, 1766. At a very early period he discovered a decidedly intellectual taste. About the year 1786 he taught a common English school. In 1788 he became connected with the Grammar school of the Rev. James Mitchell, in his native county. In 1790 he resided at Liberty, with his brother-in-law, where he prosecuted his studies, more or less, for two years. After this he was a pupil at the New London Academy, and finally completed his studies at Washington College, Lexington, known at that time by the name of Liberty Hall. He was licensed to preach by the West Hanover Presbytery, April 5th, 1793, and after being employed, under the direction of a Commission of Synod, as a missionary in Eastern Virginia, until April, 1796, he received a call to the Church at New Providence. This call was put into his hands on the 5th of June, shortly after which his installation took place. Here he remained, a faithful and zealous minister, during the residue of his life. He died in October, 1818. Though Mr. Brown never enjoyed the highest advantages of early and thorough mental training, yet he rose to an eminence as a preacher, little if at all inferior to the best educated ministers of Virginia. In his family he was an example of intelligent and consistent piety. All his brethren acknowledged his pre-eminant native talents, and loved him for his exalted character as a Christian and a minister. When it was proposed in Synod that Dr. Speer should be appointed to preach his funeral sermon, he rose, and in his brief and decisive manner said, "I am not worthy to preach the funeral sermon of such a man as Samuel Brown."

Brown, Samuel T., was born March 21st, 1827, of Scotch-Irish parentage. By the death of his father he was, early in life, thrown upon his own resources, and this circumstance developed in him sterling and self-reliant characteristics which strengthened as he grew to manhood. Having removed to Huntingdon, Pa., about 1849, he was admitted to the Bar at that place, in April, 1852. In 1851 he was associated with the Hon. John Scott in the practice of his profession. In 1857 he was elected an elder of the Presbyterian Church, Huntingdon, and has ever since held that position, discharging its duties with fidelity, and representing his Church frequently in Presbytery, Synod, and General Assembly. In 1869 he served as a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature. Mr. Brown is distinguished, as a lawyer, for his wide and accurate knowledge of the law, a good advocate, and a safe counsellor. He is a man of stern, unwavering principles, but, at the same time, generous, considerate, and at all times commanding the entire respect, confidence, and good-will of his fellow-men. He is a successful lawyer, a good, substantial citizen, and above all, an earnest and sincere Christian.

Brown, Rev. William, D. D., is a son of Rev. Samuel Brown, of New Providence Church, Rockbridge county, Va., and Mary Moore, whose eventful history is widely known through the little volume of the Presbyterian Board of Publication, "The Captives of Abbe's Valley." He is the youngest of four sons who became ministers in the Presbyterian Church, of whom three have "entered into rest."

He was born September 11th, 1811; was received into full communion in the church of which his father was pastor, when ten years of age; was graduated at Washington College (now Washington and Lee University), Lexington, Va., in 1830; entered Princeton Theological Seminary in 1832, and after spending three years there, was licensed to preach the gospel, in September, 1835, by the Presbytery of Lexington, Va. He then spent several months at Union Seminary, Prince Edward county, Va., when, having received a call to the pastorate of Augusta Church, one of the oldest churches in the Valley of Virginia, he was ordained and installed pastor of the same in October, 1836. In this, his first and only pastoral charge, he remained for twenty-four years, preaching the gospel with great acceptance, the Lord blessing his labors to the edification of the Church.

At the call of his brethren of the Synod of Virginia, and with the advice of his Presbytery, in November, 1860, he removed to Richmond, Va., and took charge of The Central Presbyterian. For a period of nineteen years, covering a season of great agitation and trouble, both in Church and State, Dr. Brown edited that paper with great ability, and in such a way as to retain to the last the full confidence of his brethren. In 1879, on account of a serious failure of vision, he relinquished his editorial labors, and for some time resided in Fredericksburg, Va., doing missionary work as he had opportunity, but without any regular ministerial engagement. He is at present in Florida.

In his conduct of his paper, in the meetings of his Synod, from which he was never absent during a ministry of nearly half a century, and of the General Assembly, of which he was several times a member, Dr. Brown was always listened to with marked attention, and pursued such a course as to secure and retain the confidence of his brethren. This confidence the Synod manifested by continuing him a Director of Union Theological Seminary for thirty years, and the General Assembly by continuing him their Permanent Clerk since 1865. A man of remarkable singleness of purpose, a clear head and sound judgment, Dr. Brown's influence in shaping the course of the Southern Presbyterian Church has been widely felt, and will continue to be felt for many years to come. In 1883 Dr. Brown was one of the delegates from the Southern Assembly to the General Assembly which met at Saratoga, N. Y.

Brown, Rev. William, Biays, was born in the city of Philadelphia, of Presbyterian and Scotch-Irish ancestry, November 17th, 1818. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1847, and studied theology at Union Seminary, Va. He first settled as pastor at Hillsboro, N. C., in 1850. In 1851-5 he was Principal of Augusta Female Seminary. He was Professor of Latin and Belles Lettres in Transylvania University, Lexington, Ky., for one year. He taught school in Kentucky, and while thus engaged supplied various churches until the close of 1863. He was pastor of the Second Church of Wabash, Ind., until 1869, and supplied the Church at Bel Air, Md., for two years. In September, 1871, he was appointed by Westminster Presbytery to supply the churches of Donegal and Mount Joy. Mr. Brown is an able preacher, a good pastor, and faithful to his high calling as a minister of the gospel.

Brown, William Young, D.D., is a native of Ohio, the fifth son of the late William and Mary M. Brown, of Achor, Columbiana county. He was born July 22d, 1827; graduated at Jefferson College in 1848, at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1853, and was ordained by the Presbytery of New Lisbon, June 15th, 1853. He was pastor at New Lisbon, O., 1853-6; stated supply of Seventh Street Church, Washington, D. C., 1863-4; pastor elect, Buffalo, Pa., 1865-6; pastor at Perrysville, 1866-70; pastor elect of the First Church, Denver, Col., 1870, and pastor, 1872-3. He has been eminently successful as a minister of the gospel and an educator of youth. He is an able ecclesiastical lawyer, a good preacher and pastor, and is very active in promoting the cause of Temperance. During the last nine years he has been the efficient pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of the borough of Darby, Pa.

Brownson, James I., D. D., was born at Mercersburg, Pa., March 14th, 1817. He graduated at Washington College, Pennsylvania, in 1836, and after a year spent in the Bucks County Academy, at Newtown, Pa., as a teacher of the Ancient Languages and Mathematics, he entered the Western Theological Seminary. After his licensure to preach, in 1840, by the Presbytery of Carlisle, he was installed as the pastor of the united congregations of Greensburg and Mount Pleasant, Pa., in the Presbytery of Redstone. In this field he labored, with great acceptableness and success, for eight years. On the first Monday of December, 1848, a call was made out by the Presbyterian Church of Washington, Pa., for Dr. Brownson's services as its pastor, and in that important charge he has ever since continued, much beloved by his people, and greatly prospered in his ministry. From those added to the church during his pastorate, forty-four have entered the ministry.

Dr. Brownson acted as President of Washington College, pro tem., for the greater part of two years, and, after the consolidation of the two colleges of Washington and Jefferson, he again served in the same capacity one year, in both cases satisfactorily discharging the duties of the position. In 1859 he was Moderator of the Synod of Wheeling, and in 1871 of the reconstructed Synod of Pittsburgh. In 1871 he represented Pennsylvania in the Board of Visitors for the examination of the cadets at the United States Naval School at Annapolis, Md. In September, 1880, he was a member of the Second General Council of the Presbyterian Alliance, at Philadelphia. Dr. Brownson is of a genial disposition, and happily unites suavity and dignity of manner. His scholarly attainments are of a high order. As the published productions of his pen show, he is a clear, logical and cogent writer. He is an instructive, forcible and impressive preacher, a faithful pastor, and in the Church courts wields a strong influence.

Bruen, Rev. Edward Baldwin, was born at Newark, N. J., July 17th, 1823; graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1842, and studied theology in Union Seminary, New York city, and at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained by the Fourth Presbytery of Philadelphia, June 25th, 1848. He was stated supply of the First Church, Southwark, Philadelphia, Pa., 1846, and pastor 1848-58; evangelist in Philadelphia, 1859-61; stated supply of Mantua Church, Philadelphia, 1861-8; evangelist in Philadelphia, 1869-73; stated supply of Logan Square Church, 1871, and stated supply of South Street Church, Philadelphia, 1871, of which he has been pastor since 1876. Within a year the congregation, now called the Church of the Atonement, has erected a handsome edifice, at the corner of Wharton and Tiernan streets. Mr. Bruen is an instructive preacher, a diligent pastor, and ready for every good work.

Bryson, Rev. John, was one of the five members that constituted the Presbytery of Northumberland at its organization, in October, 1811. He was born in Cumberland county, Pa., in January, 1758. He was a member of the first class formed in Dickinson College, and graduated at that Institution September 26th, 1787. He seems to have studied theology under Dr. Nisbet, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Carlisle in 1789. After laboring for a few months in Martinsburg, Va., and in the region round about there, he was ordained and installed pastor of the churches of Warrior Run and Chillicothe, June, 1791, occasionally preaching at Danville, and subsequently at Milton. Under his long and faithful ministry of the Word, his charge was favored repeatedly with times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord, and grew and prospered. He was eminently a man of prayer, serving the Lord with all humility of mind. He was a mighty textuary. His sermons were replete with apposite quotations from the Sacred Scriptures, and he was habitually ready to quote largely and accurately from the Divine Word. He was an admirable pastor, adorned his domestic relations, and gave with exemplary liberality to the needy. Mr. Bryson, on August 3d, 1855, without a struggle or a groan, passed to his heavenly reward.

Bryson, J. H., D. D., is the eldest son of Rev. Henry Bryson, D. D., and was born at Fayetteville, Tenn., April 3d, 1831. He took his literary and theological course at Erskine College, South Carolina. Afterwards he spent a year at the Theological Seminary at Newburg, N. Y. He was ordained to the gospel ministry in 1855. He changed his ecclesiastical connection from the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church, to the Presbyterian Church, South, in 1866. From 1868 to 1872 he was pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Shelbyville, Tenn. He then spent a year at the University of Virginia, reviewing his studies in moral philosophy and natural science. In September, 1873, he accepted the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church, Columbia, S. C. In 1876 he resigned. In 1881 he accepted the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church, Huntsville, Alabama.

Dr. Bryson has filled some of the most important pulpits in the Southern Presbyterian Church, and, by his indomitable energy and ceaseless labors, has built up and strengthened every church with which he has been connected. He has few equals as a pulpit orator. Though wonderfully gifted as an extemporaneous speaker, he elaborates his sermons with the utmost care. He is a ripe scholar, and a profound theologian. In ecclesiastical law he is well versed. In Church courts his opinions always command the highest respect. As a pastor, he is attentive and sympathetic. Dr. Bryson was a member of the General Council of the Presbyterian Alliance in Edinburgh. After the adjournment of that body he traveled through Europe and the countries of the East. Since his return he has delivered a series of lectures on Palestine, which intelligent audiences have everywhere heard with rapt attention. Now, in the full vigor of manhood, he ministers as pastor to the Church in Huntsville, beloved by his own people, and admired by all the inhabitants of that highly cultured city.

Buchanan, Hon. James, who was of Presbyterian parentage, was born April 23d, 1791, about four miles west of Mercersburg, Pa. He graduated with distinction at Dickinson College, Carlisle, in 1809; studied law in Lancaster; was admitted in 1812 to the bar in that city, and soon established a high reputation as a jurist, and acquired a large practice. In 1814 and 1815 he was elected a member of the State Legislature, where he took high position, and wielded, though so young a man, not a little influence. In 1814 he went, as a private in a company of volunteers, to Baltimore, to aid in defending it against an anticipated attack from the British. In 1820 he was elected by his Congressional district to the National House of Representatives, and re-elected in 1822, 1824, 1826 and 1828, when he declined further re-election. He was from almost his first entrance into the House, one of its most prominent and leading members.

HON. JAMES BUCHANAN

In the same year (1831) in which Mr. Buchanan ceased to be a member of the House he was sent by President Jackson, as Minister Plenipotentiary, to the Court of St. Petersburg, where he negotiated the first commercial treaty which our Government ever had with that of Russia. After his return from Russia (1833) he was a member of the United States Senate for ten years, where he took a similarly high rank to that which he had occupied in the House. In 1845 he accepted the position of Secretary of State, in President Polk's Cabinet, holding the position until the expiration of Mr. Polk's Presidential term, 1849. In 1853 he accepted from President Pierce the Mission to the Court of St. James, the duties of which he discharged in such a manner as to reflect honor on his country. Returning from England, in 1856, he was elected, in that year, to what is, perhaps, really the highest political position on earth, the Presidency of the United States.

At the expiration of his Presidential term, in March, 1861, Mr. Buchanan returned to his home at Wheatland, near Lancaster, where he spent the remainder of his days, enjoying the society of his neighbors and friends, and employing himself with his books and pen. One of the books most frequently perused by him was the Bible, in the teachings of which he was a firm believer, and on the promises of which he cheerfully relied. He had always been a believer in the Holy Scriptures, and in the truth of the Christian religion, and besides being always strictly moral in his conduct, had been, in many respects, a devout and religious, as well as a kind and charitable man. But he never made a profession of being a disciple of Christ until within the last few years of his life, when he became a communicant of the Presbyterian Church. He died, calmly and peacefully, on Monday, June 1st, 1868, and on the Thursday following his remains were followed to the grave by large numbers of his fellow-citizens, whose deference, respect and attachment he had won.

On opening Mr. Buchanan's will, it was found that he had remembered the poor of Lancaster, as well as the church of which he was a member, and had arranged that a handsome addition should be made to the fund which he had appropriated for their benefit years before. It may be added that in person Mr. Buchanan was large, in manners courteous and polished, and that his stores of knowledge and powers of conversation were such that no one could be long in his company without being deeply interested and without receiving valuable information.

Buchanan, Rev. James, was a native of Chester county, Pa. He graduated at Dickinson College, in 1803; studied theology with Rev. Nathan Grier, of Brandywine Manor, and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle, when he was about twenty-three years of age. His first settlement was in the Presbyterian Church of Harrisburg, Pa., where he labored some years with faithfulness and success. In 1816 he became pastor of the Church in Greencastle, Pa., and labored with great fidelity and acceptance in this field for about twenty years, when, on account of declining health, he resigned the charge, to the very great regret of his congregation, who were devotedly attached to him. He removed to Logansport, Ind., where, in charge of the Presbyterian Church in that place, he labored with encouraging success, until the Head of the Church dismissed him to the possession of his reward. His death took place, September 16th, 1843.

The piety of Mr. Buchanan was of a retiring and unostentatious character. It was, however, eminently practical, prompting him to the diligent discharge of all incumbent duties. He was a man of a warm heart and of a kind and generous disposition. As a preacher, he held a very respectable rank. His sermons, in their structure, were neat, systematic and short; in their matter, solid, evangelical and practical, and in their manner, grave, solemn and earnest. Scarcely ever did he fail to interest and please those who were capable of judging correctly and had a taste for good preaching. In the judicatories of the Church he rarely spoke, on account of his nervous debility. He was, however, a judicious counsellor, and did his part in this way, in the disposal of the business of the Church.

Buell, Samuel, D. D., was born at Coventry, Conn., September 1st, 1716; entered Yale College in 1737, and graduated in 1741. He purposed to spend the usual time in studying divinity, but, by the advice of Edwards and others, the zealous friends of the Revival, he was licensed, in the Fall of 1741, and went forth as "a strolling preacher." His ministrations were not lifeless; he notes at one time, in his diary, that then, for the first time, when he preached no tears were shed.

After having spent a year in visiting different parts of New England, he was ordained in 1743, by an ecclesiastical council, as an evangelist. Carrying with him testimonials from respectable ministers, he was admitted into many pulpits from which other itinerants were excluded. He was led to East Hampton, on Long Island, by a direction of Providence in some respects extraordinary, and was installed pastor of the church in that place, September 19th, 1746. For a number of the first years of his ministry he seemed to labor without effect. His people paid but little attention to the concerns of religion. But in 1764, he witnessed an astonishing change. Almost every individual in the town was deeply impressed, and the interests of eternity received that attention which their transcendent importance demands. He had the happiness at one time of admitting into his church ninety-nine persons who, he believed, had become the subjects of saving grace. In the years 1785 and 1791, also, he was favored with great success. After a life of eminent usefulness, he died, July 19th, 1798, aged eighty-one.

Dr. Buell was a most exemplary Christian. He was attached to literature and science, and was the father and patron of Clinton Academy, in East Hampton. His house was the mansion of hospitality. Possessing a large fund of instructive and entertaining anecdote, his company was pleasing to persons of every age. In no respect was he more distinguished than for a spirit of devotion. In his last hours his mind was in perfect peace. He had no desire to remain any longer absent from his Saviour. The world into which he was just entering absorbed all his thoughts. While his friends were endeavoring to prolong the dying flame he would put them aside with one hand, while the other was raised towards heaven, where his eyes and soul were fixed. In this happy state of mind he expired.

Dr. Buell published a narrative of the revival of religion among his people, in 1764, and fourteen occasional discourses, which evince the vigor of his mind and the ardor of his piety.

Buist, Rev. Edward Henry, was born in the city of Charleston, South Carolina, October 17th, 1838. He was hopefully converted during the great revival of 1858, and after graduating with distinction at the South Carolina College, bearing off the first honor of his class, he entered the Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C., and completed the prescribed course of study in the year 1861. He was licensed and ordained by the Presbytery of South Carolina, and served the Church at Newberry until his removal to Society Hill, Darlington county, where he taught school and preached to the Centre Point and Great Peedee churches. In the year 1869 he was installed pastor of the Cheraw Church, where he continued to labor, with many tokens of the Master's favor, until death closed his brilliant and useful career. During his pastorate of thirteen years at Cheraw, one hundred and four names were added to the roll of the church.

Mr. Buist was richly endowed with intellectual faculties of a very high order. He was possessed of a brilliant intellect, a wonderfully retentive memory, and a warm, generous nature. By close application to study he had acquired a vast fund of useful and varied information, which was laid at the Master's feet, and consecrated to the great work of advancing the Redeemer's kingdom among his fellow-men. Socially, he was very attractive. In manner, free and engaging, he was the life of every circle in which he moved; large-hearted and public-spirited, he was deeply interested in all that concerned the physical, moral, and spiritual welfare of his race. As a theologian, he was indoctrinated by the living principles enunciated by the great Thornwell, at whose feet he sat, like Paul at the feet of Gamaliel, an enthusiastic pupil of an enthusiastic teacher. He was a thorough scholar, profound thinker, an eloquent and logical orator, a powerful preacher, and faithful pastor. He died at Cheraw, S. C., September 11th, 1882. His body was entombed by loving hands, in the presence of an immense concourse of people, who testified to the universal esteem in which he was held.

Buist, George, D. D., a son of Arthur and Catharine Buist, was born in Fifeshire, Scotland, in 1770. He entered the College of Edinburgh in 1787, and gained a high reputation, both as a scholar and a man of original genius. In 1792 he was admitted an honorary member of the Edinburgh Philological Society, and about the same time published an abridgement of Hume's History of England, which passed to a second edition. He contributed also some important articles to the Encyclopedia Britannica. He was called, in 1793, to the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church in Charleston, S. C. In 1794, the degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him by the University of Edinburgh. In 1805 he was appointed Principal of the Charleston College, accepted the appointment, and continued to hold the office as long as he lived, though he still retained his pastoral charge. He died August 31st, 1808. With his very decided literary tastes and great diligence in study, Dr. Buist was a proficient in various departments of learning. He was eminently qualified to be at the head of a literary institution. His style of preaching was very impressive. The graces of his delivery won the attention and conciliated the favor of his hearers. He was much respected and beloved by his congregation, and had great influence with them. For a number of years before his death there were always more applicants for pews in his church than could be accommodated.

EDWIN A. BULKLEY, D. D.

Bulkley, Edwin A., D. D., was born in Charleston, S. C., January 25th, 1826, of old Puritan stock, being a lineal descendant of Peter Bulkley, the founder and first minister of Concord, Mass. Early removing from the place of his birth, his residence during youth and preparatory education was in New York city. He was graduated from Yale College in 1844, and from Union Theological Seminary, New York city, in 1847. After a short term of service at Geneva, N. Y. (1847-1850), he became pastor of the Congregational Church in Groton, Mass., and continued in charge of it till 1864. Then removing to Plattsburg, N. Y., he held the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church till 1878, when he resigned it and accepted a call to the Church of Rutherford Park, N. J., with which he has since remained.

He has won reputation outside of the ordinary round of pastoral service, which has been almost unbroken, by numerous sermons, which, from their approved style and concurrence with great public events, have been sought for publication.

He is also a frequent contributor to the religious press; and in recognition of his administrative ability, has often held important offices in the gift of Presbyteries, Synods, and the General Assembly. He is at present the Stated Clerk of Jersey City Presbytery. Dr. Bulkeley is a vigorous writer, an able preacher, faithful in the discharge of pastoral duty, an useful Presbyter, and highly esteemed by his brethren.

Bullen, Rev. Joseph, was the pioneer of the Presbyterian Church in the Southwest. It is from the traditions preserved among his descendants that the facts of his history are to be gathered. He was a native of Worcester county, Mass.; born, it is supposed, about 1753; was educated at Yale College, and at an early age devoted himself to the ministry. His first charge was in Windham county, Vermont, in which he remained about twenty years. In 1798 he was sent out, by the Presbyterian Missionary Society of New York, to the country occupied by the Chickasaw Indians, lying in the northern section of the Mississippi Territory, to prepare the way, if practicable, for establishing a mission among that people. His report having been favorable, he was commissioned to open and superintend the mission. For this purpose he removed, in March, 1800, with his family, to the field of his future labors. The difficulties and perils of such a journey can hardly be understood at the present day. From Pittsburg he descended the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, in a flat-boat, to the Chickasaw Bluffs (the site of the present city of Memphis), where a stockade fort, with a garrison of sixty or seventy soldiers, had been stationed by the U. S. Government. From this point the party were conveyed on pack-horses to Pontotoc, an old Indian town, distant about one hundred miles to the southwest.

Mr. Bullen's efforts to elevate and Christianize the Indians were pursued faithfully for three years, and were attended with good results. In 1803 he left the Mission and moved into Jefferson county, in the southern part of the Territory, establishing himself in a neighborhood about twenty miles northeast of Natchez, into which a considerable tide of emigration from North Carolina and the seaboard had been flowing. Supporting himself here by his farm, and by occasionally teaching a school, he became the evangelist of the region. In 1804 he organized the first Presbyterian Church in the Mississippi Territory. It was called the "Bethel" Church, and in the branches into which it was subsequently divided, it still maintains its existence. Mr. Bullen was assiduous in gathering up the Presbyterian element wherever it could be found, and was successful in organizing several other churches before he died. He not only folded these sheep in the wilderness, but, like a true bishop, watched over them and administered to them the Word and ordinances. He became known and respected through a wide extent of country, through his frequent missionary journeys, and the appellation, "Father Bullen," which came to be generally applied to him, was expressive, not so much of respect for his years, as of the filial reverence with which he was universally regarded. He died, March 26th, 1825.

Burchard, Whiting Cyrus, son of Cyrus Burchard, was born in Cambridge, Crawford county, Pa., January 21st, 1835. Graduated at Allegheny College, Meadville, Pa., in 1858, and at Union Theological Seminary, New York city, in 1862, in which year he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New York, Fourth, and ordained by the Presbytery of Meadville. He supplied the Presbyterian churches of Cherry Tree and Sunville, in Venango county, Pa., five years, and then, 1867-8, made a tour through Europe and the East. From 1868 to 1872 he was pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Rushville, Ill. After supplying, temporarily, the Presbyterian Church at Petroleum Centre, Pa., he became pastor of the Valley Presbyterian Church of Allegheny, Pa. (his present charge), over which he was installed, November 11th, 1871.

Mr. Burchard is a man of accurate scholarship, genial manners, fervent piety. As a preacher he is earnest, instructive, evangelical, and is pre-eminently distinguished as a pastor. His labors have been richly blessed. His present charge, which he found struggling and feeble, has, under his care, become strong and influential. He has for a number of years been Stated Clerk of the Presbytery of Allegheny, and, as a Presbyter, is held in high estimation by his ministerial brethren.

Burnet, Hon. Isaac G., was born in Newark, N. J., July 17th, 1784; graduated at the College of New Jersey, and, after studying law, removed to Cincinnati, Ohio, in June, 1805. For some years he practiced his profession at Dayton, and in 1815 settled in Cincinnati. In 1819 he was appointed Mayor and Judge of the City courts, to which office he was successively re-elected until 1831, when he declined a re-election. Previous to this, in 1817, he became one of the proprietors of the Cincinnati Gazette, and its editor. He held this position for a short time, but continued for many years to write largely for the secular and religious press. In 1833, he was appointed Clerk of the Supreme Court for the county where he resided, and held this appointment until the abolition of the court a few years before his death.

In 1834 Judge Burnet was elected a ruling elder in the Second Presbyterian Church in Cincinnati, and held the office for nearly twenty years. Two years before his death he removed to Walnut Hills, and joined the Lane Seminary Church, and was immediately elected an elder. He died March 11th, 1856. Judge Burnet was eminently exemplary as a Christian, and faithful as an officer of the Church. He was a man of great decision and earnestness. When Mayor of the city, he singly faced a mob in the flush of their riotous and revengeful triumph, and with a few words quelled their lawless spirit. He carried this decision into religion. From the moment he entered the Church, to the time of his death, no one who came in contact with him ever doubted where he stood. He died as he had lived. For years, sickness had invaded his constitution, and he stood with his loins girt about him and his lamp burning, awaiting the coming of the Lord. He had no fear of death, for Christ had already given him the victory.

Burr, Aaron, D. D., was a descendant of the Rev. Jonathan Burr, who migrated to New England in 1639, and was for some time pastor of the Church in Dorchester, Mass. He was born January 4th, 1715. He graduated at Yale in 1735; was licensed in September, 1736, and preached his first sermon at Greenfield, Mass. While laboring at Hanover, N. J., he was invited to the church at Newark, as its stated supply for a year, after which he was ordained and installed its pastor, January 25th, 1737. There was a remarkable revival in his congregation in the Autumn of 1739; in March the whole town was brought under an uncommon concern about their eternal interests. In February, 1741, there was another effusion of the Holy Spirit, principally upon the young. In June, 1744, the First Church in New Haven called Mr. Burr to become associated with their pastor, the Rev. Mr. Noyes, but the call was not accepted.

On the death of the Rev. Jonathan Dickinson, first President of the College of New Jersey, at Elizabethtown, in the Autumn of 1747, the Institution was removed to Newark, and Mr. Burr was placed at its head. In 1751 Whitefield, who was then paying a visit to Governor Belcher, at Elizabethtown, attended the Commencement at Newark, on which occasion President Burr had the pleasure of conferring upon him the degree of Master of Arts. His devotion to the college was most constant and exemplary, and the agency which he undertook in its behalf, by request of the Trustees, was remarkably successful. He discharged the duties of both President of the college and pastor of the church until the Autumn of 1755, when his pastoral relation was dissolved, and he gave his whole time to the service of the college. The village of Princeton having been fixed upon as the most convenient situation for the college, the new edifice was erected there, under the superintendence of Mr. Burr. In the Autumn of 1756, the building being so far completed as to be ready for the reception of the students, they removed thither, about seventy in number, and commenced the occupancy of it.

In the Summer of 1757 Mr. Burr, being in a low state of health, made a rapid and exhausting visit, in a very hot, sultry season, to his father-in-law, at Stockbridge. He soon returned to Princeton, and went immediately to Elizabethtown, and, on the 19th of August, made an attempt to procure the legal exemption of the students from military duty. Thence he went to Newark, and on the 21st, being much indisposed, he preached an extemporaneous sermon at a funeral in his successor's (Rev. John Brainerd's) family. Returning to Princeton, he immediately went to Philadelphia, on business of the college, and on his return home, learned that Governor Belcher had died on the 31st. He prepared the sermon for his funeral, under a high fever, and at night was delirious. He rode to Elizabethtown, and on the 4th preached, being in a state of extreme languor and exhaustion. Returning home next day, he sank under a nervous fever, and died September 24th, 1757. The Rev. Caleb Smith preached his funeral sermon. William Livingston, afterwards Governor of New Jersey, pronounced his eulogium. It was printed in New York, and speedily reprinted in Boston.

Mr. Burr published a Latin grammar, a pamphlet entitled, "The Supreme Deity of our Lord Jesus Christ Maintained, in a Letter to the Dedication of Mr. Emlyn's Inquiry into the Scriptural Account of Jesus Christ," reprinted in Boston, 1791; a Fast sermon, on account of the encroachments of the French, 1755; a sermon, preached before the Synod of New York, 1756; and a sermon on the death of Governor Belcher, 1757.

The intellectual attainments of Mr. Burr were of a high order. His piety was marked and fervent, prompting him to indefatigable efforts to cultivate the hearts of his pupils as well as their heads; to make them good Christians as well as good scholars. In the pulpit he shone with superior lustre. He was fluent, copious, sublime, persuasive. What he preached in the pulpit he lived out of it. His life and his example were a comment on his sermons. He was distinguished for public spirit and love of his country. As a teacher he had a most engaging method of instruction. In matters of government in the college he discovered great wisdom and sagacity. In ecclesiastical judicatories and councils his assistance was often desired, and his judgment deservedly esteemed. And his assiduity in propagating the gospel among the Indians constitutes one of the brightest features of his admirable character.

Burrell, David James, D. D., son of David and Elizabeth Felgar Burrell, was born at Mount Pleasant, Pa., August 1st, 1814. He graduated at Yale College, in the class of 1837. In New Haven he showed distinctly the traits that have distinguished him since: social attractiveness and natural oratorical ability. He led a brilliant career at college, ending with winning the De Forest gold medal, the highest literary honor of the University. He studied theology for one year at the Northwestern Seminary, at Chicago, and took the remainder of the three years' course at Union Theological Seminary, New York, where he graduated, in 1870. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, and, for two years, had charge of a mission chapel in New York city. Thence he went to Chicago, to a chapel, which grew rapidly, and became, during his ministry, the Westminster Church. In 1876 he was called to the Second Presbyterian Church of Dubuque, Iowa, where he now is, continuing what has been a singularly successful pastorate. Dr. Burrows was an active participant in the Iowa Temperance campaign of 1882 and 1883, and is now one of the editors of a paper whose object is to push the Temperance issue. He is a frequent and vigorous contributor to the religious press, chiefly the Interior, whose Sunday-school department he has conducted for some time.

Burrowes, George, D. D., was born at Trenton, N. J., April 3d, 1811. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1832. In the Fall of that year he commenced the study of theology in the Princeton Seminary, but for some months he also acted as a Tutor in the college, and completed his theological course in the Fall of 1835. In July 1836 he became pastor of the West Nottingham Church and what is now Port Deposit Church, at the same time taking charge of the West Nottingham Academy. His pastorate here was greatly blessed by additions to the Church, but in 1840 he was induced to accept the Chair of Latin and Greek in Lafayette College, which he held until March, 1855. He was pastor of the Church at Newtown, Pa., 1857-59.

In June, 1859, Dr. Burrowes went to California with a commission from the Board of Education to lay the foundation of a Presbyterian college on the Pacific Coast. In this he has been eminently successful, and, as the Founder of the University of San Francisco, will long be remembered there. From an humble beginning in 1859, with four boys, one of them not six years of age, in the dark basement of Calvary Presbyterian Church, by Dr. Burrowes' vigorous efforts, succeeded (when forced to desist from labor for a period of three years) by those of the Rev. P. V. Yeeder, there has been raised an institution which is an honor to the Presbyterian Church, and the most prosperous of the kind on the Pacific coast, and which promises to be a blessing even to other lands. Dr. Burrowes was elected Professor of Hebrew and Greek, in San Francisco Seminary, in 1873. His principal literary work is his "Commentary on the Song of Solomon," which was published in 1833. He was also some months editor of the Pacific Expositor, and has been a contributor to the Princeton Review. He is justly held in high esteem for his scholarship and excellence of character.

Burtis, Arthur, D. D., the son of Arthur and Elizabeth Palmer Burtis, was born in New York city, October 25th, 1807. He graduated at Union College in 1827; studied theology at Princeton and Auburn, and was licensed by Cayuga Presbytery in 1833. After serving the Reformed Dutch Church at Fort Plain, N. Y., for a year, he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church at Little Falls, N. Y., where his usefulness was interrupted by a bronchial affection, his pastorate only lasting for a year. When his health was restored he acted for some time as agent for the American Tract Society, at his own cost. He next supplied a church at Binghamton, N. Y., for a year, and then took charge of the Church at Oxford, N. Y., where he spent a happy, useful and honored pastorate of seven years. Subsequently he supplied the Church at Yernon, N. Y., for one year, then removed to Buffalo, N. Y., where he supplied the First Church for nine months, then became pastor of the South Presbyterian Church for three years, and of the Tabernacle Church for four years, both in the same city. For two years he was agent of the American and Foreign Christian Union. In 1866 he was invited to Miami University, to take charge of the classes in Greek, with a view to the Greek Professorship, to which position he was soon elected, being invited at the same time to supply a church in Oxford.

Dr. Burtis, just when he had fairly entered on his duties, died, March 27th, 1867. He was a cultivated gentleman and a good scholar. He was so genial, social, kind and polite that all esteemed and loved him. In his religious character he was consistent, decided and earnest; as a preacher, seeking the solid and true, rather than the showy and fanciful, and making it ever manifest that he was striving rather to honor his Master than himself.

Burt, Rev. John, the son of Robert and Jane (Drennan) Burt, was born in Knockmarlock House, Ayrshire, Scotland, May 23d, 1789. When sixteen years of age, he was seized by a "press-gang," and compelled to serve in the English navy. Here he remained five years, and experienced a most painful service; at the end of this time, through the aid of a friend connected with the navy, he was released. On his return home he renewed his literary pursuits, and taught school in Kilmarnock until 1816, when he went to Glasgow, Scotland, to attend medical lectures. In 1817 he emigrated to the United States, making his home in Philadelphia, Pa. After the study of divinity in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J., he was licensed by Philadelphia Presbytery, in 1821, and in the Autumn of the same year was ordained by the same Presbytery, and became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Salem, N. J. Here he labored until the Autumn of 1828. He then spent a few months in Deerfield, N. J., and in 1831 became the editor of The Presbyterian. He was the first editor of that paper. He continued as its editor until November 21st, 1832. After this he removed to Cincinnati, and in 1833 he became editor of The Standard, a religious paper under the care of the Presbyterian Church. In 1842 he returned to New Jersey, locating at Blackwoodtown, where he labored until 1859, when he removed to Salem, N. J., the scene of his early labors in the ministry, where he died, March 21th, 1866.

Mr. Burt was "clothed with humility," with a mind of uncommon strength, cultivated to a remarkable degree, fully competent to take a prominent position in the Church, and with many invitations that called him from obscurity, he firmly resisted all efforts to render him prominent, and by a sincere choice preferred in retirement to advance the interests of the kingdom of his Redeemer. He often prepared books for the press, and published much that would have distinguished him as a scholar and writer, while he carefully concealed his name. As a preacher he was sincere, earnest, affectionate, instructive.

Burwell, Robert, D. D., son of Armistead and Mary Cole (Turnbull) Burwell, was born in Dinwiddie county, Va., June 12th, 1802. On his father's side he was of English, and on his mother's, of Scotch parentage. He was graduated from Hampden Sidney College, in 1823, and the same year, with Thomas P. Hunt and Jesse S. Armistead, entered the first class, of three, in Union Theological Seminary, in Virginia, under the instruction of Rev. John H. Rice, D. D. He was taken under care of Hanover Presbytery, September 30th, 1825, licensed by the same, October 23d, 1826, and ordained, November 27th, 1830. He was dismissed to East Hanover Presbytery, October 22d, 1831, and installed pastor of Chesterfield Church, June 1st, 1832. He was dismissed to Orange Presbytery, N. C., July 20th, 1836, and soon after installed pastor of Hillsboro Church, where he labored for twenty-three years. Here, in conjunction with his cultivated and energetic wife, he opened and conducted a Female School, of high grade, for more than twenty years. In 1857 he was selected to open the Female Institute, in Charlotte, N. C., which he conducted successfully for fifteen years. In 1872 he was elected as Principal of the new Female College, Peace Institute, in Raleigh, N. C., where, associated with his son, John B. Burwell, Esq., he still remains (May, 1883). For forty-six years he has been chiefly engaged in teaching the girls of the Southern Atlantic States, and has had about twelve hundred pupils under his instruction during that period. In 1882 the University of North Carolina conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity.

Dr. Burwell has been a diligent student all his life, still reads his regular portion of Hebrew and Greek, purchases and reads the latest theological and literary works, and takes an interest in the affairs of the Church. He is quiet, gentle, scholarly in his tastes, and his sermons are polished in style and full of sound instruction. Though engaged in teaching he has always had his regular appointments for preaching on the Sabbath, and still has, which he fulfills with the strictest punctuality. Dr. Burwell, in his own modest, quiet, unobtrusive way, has done a noble work for his generation.

Bushnell, Daniel, is the eighth child of Alexander Bushnell and Sarah (Wells) Bushnell. He was born in New York city, December 29th, 1808. His father moved with his family to Pittsburg, in 1813, and worked as a ship carpenter, in the employ of Robert Fulton, and assisted in building the Vesuvius, the first steamboat built for business on Western rivers. The son grew up in Pittsburg, being only five years old when his father moved West. When of age he went into business with his father. For three years (1833-6), father and sons engaged in mercantile pursuits at New Albany, Indiana. In 1840 Mr. Bushnell went into the coal business, which he successfully pursued for twenty years. He was the first man to introduce the "barge system" in transporting coal down the rivers, having taken the first tow down as early as 1845. From 1860 to the present time he has been interested in the oil business, with success.

Mr. Bushnell was baptized in the First Presbyterian Church of Pittsburg, and raised under the pastoral care of the Rev. Dr. Francis Herron. The Rev. Wells Bushnell was his brother, and another brother has, for over fifty years, been a ruling elder in New Albany, Ind. He was one of the original thirty-six that formed the Third Presbyterian Church, Pittsburg. He was elected elder in 1850, and has served faithfully ever since. He is now the oldest in office, and for intelligence, integrity and sterling worth, is an honor both to the eldership and to the whole Church. He is now seventy-five years old, and, although living several miles from his church, seldom, either on Sabbath or week-day, forsakes the assembly of God's people.

Butler, Zebulon, D. D., was born in Wilkesbarre, Pa., September 27th, 1803; was a student at Nassau Hall; graduated at Princeton Seminary in 1826, and, being licensed by Susquehanna Presbytery, he set out for the Southwest, under a commission for six months, from the Board of Missions. On his arrival at the field of labor, the central point of which was Vicksburg, Miss., he addressed himself earnestly to his work, and engaged to remain with the people a year, they assuming his whole support. At the expiration of the time he accepted a call to the Church at Port Gibson, and it was among this people his earnest, faithful and laborious life was spent. Here, for nearly thirty-four years, he toiled on, amid many trials, but with much success. Dr. Butler's influence extended gradually over a large extent of country, so that he became virtually a diocesan bishop, establishing churches and confirming the disciples in many localities. By his instrumentality many young men were assisted into the ministry. In founding and sustaining Oakland College, Mississippi, he bore a prominent part. He died in triumph, December 23d, 1860, greatly beloved and lamented.

Buttolph, D. L., D. D., was born in Norwich, N. Y., December, 1822. He was the son of Judge David and Maria (Lyman) Buttolph. After graduating at Williams College, in the year 1845, he went to Charleston, S. C., and engaged in teaching.

In 1849 he entered the Theological Seminary in Columbia, S. C., and after completing the regular course of study, he was licensed, in 1852, by the Charleston Presbytery, to preach the gospel. After leaving the Seminary he was invited to preach in the Second Presbyterian Church of Charleston, S. C., as the assistant of the Rev. Thomas Smyth, D. D. He remained there two years, when he accepted a call from the Midway Congregational Church in Liberty county, Georgia.

This Church is distinguished for having sent more than sixty of her sons into the gospel ministry, many of whom are now laboring in different sections of our country. In 1867 Dr. Buttolph accepted a call to become pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Marietta, Georgia. He began his labors in this church in December of the same year, and is still its pastor, covering a space of nearly sixteen years.

Dr. Buttolph is a thorough Bible student, and preaches the gospel in all its purity. His style is clear, logical and pointed. He speaks with earnestness and power, and in his appeals there is a warmth and fervidness that compel attention. As a pastor he is dearly beloved, not only by his own congregation, but by every one who becomes acquainted with him, for his kind, courteous and sympathetic nature, which enables him always to have a word of good cheer and encouragement for every one, and his labors have been blessed to the good of many souls.

Caldwell, David, D. D., the eldest son of Andrew and Martha Caldwell, was born in Lancaster county, Pa., March 23d, 1725. After receiving the rudiments of an English education, he served an apprenticeship to a house-carpenter, and he subsequently worked at the business four years. He was graduated at Princeton in 1761, the year in which President Davies died, and he has been heard to say that he assisted in carrying him to his grave. After leaving college, Mr. Caldwell was engaged as a teacher, for a year, at Cape May. He then returned to Princeton, and acted as assistant teacher in the college, in the Department of Languages. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, June 8th, 1763. After spending some time as a missionary in North Carolina, he was ordained at Trenton, N. J., July 6th, 1765. On March 3d, 1768, he was installed pastor of the two churches in Buffalo and Alamance settlements, in North Carolina. To supplement his meagre salary, he purchased a small farm, and about the same time commenced a classical school in his own house, which he continued, with little interruption, till the infirmities of age disqualified him for teaching. He was identified with some of the most terrible events of the war of the Revolution. His house was plundered, his library and furniture destroyed, and the most vigorous and unspurious efforts were made to overtake and arrest him when he had fled for his life. He was a member of the convention that formed the Constitution of the State of North Carolina, in 1776, and took an active interest in the political concerns of the country, his opinion always carrying with it great weight. He continued to preach in his two churches till the year 1820. He died, August 25th, 1821. "Dr. Caldwell," says Governor Morehead, of North Carolina, "was a man of admirable temper, kind to a fault to every human being, and I might say to every living creature, entitled to his kindness. He seemed to live to do good. It would be difficult to duly appreciate his usefulness through his long life. His learning, his piety and his patriotism were infused into the generations of his day."

Caldwell, Rev. Elias Boudinot, a son of James Caldwell, of the class of 1759, whilst living in Washington, D. C., as Clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States, obtained a license from the Presbytery, and was accustomed to preach to the ignorant and degraded in that city. He is especially known for the prominent part he took in the cause of African colonization. In honor of him the Managers of the Society gave the name of Caldwell to a town in their African colony. He died in May, 1825.

Caldwell Institute, N. C. This was a High School, founded by Orange Presbytery and under its care. It was incorporated with a Board of Trustees, and was named in honor of Rev. David Caldwell, D. D., an eminent teacher and minister of Guilford county, N. C., and of Rev. Joseph Caldwell, D. D., an early and justly distinguished President of the State University, both Presbyterians, but of different families. The Institute had its origin in a general movement in the State in behalf of denominational schools, the immediate outcome of which were this Seminary and Davidson college, Presbyterian; the Greensboro Female College, under the care of the N. C. Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South; Wake Forest College, Baptist; and St. Mary's Female School, Episcopalian. It was located in Greensboro, and was opened in its own building, in the year 1836, the pupils having their quarters at boarding-houses in the town.

The first Faculty, which continued to serve for nine years, consisted of Rev. Alexander Wilson, D. D., Rev. John A. Greter, D. D., and Silas C. Lindsley; the curriculum embraced most of the ordinary college studies, and from the start the Institution assumed the highest position for discipline and thoroughness of instruction. It generally numbered from seventy-five to one hundred students, a large proportion of whom became men of power and usefulness, and some of them attained to the highest positions in the ministry and in other callings. In 1815 Presbytery resolved to move it to Hillsboro, and one of the Faculty, Dr. Wilson, went with it to its new location; but this step caused differences of opinion among the friends of the Institution; its endowment was small, new expenses had to be incurred, and it did not long survive this change. It may be added that the apparent necessity for denominational schools of this kind was passing away, in the rapid growth of institutions promoted by the advancement of the common school system, and it ultimately became the policy of the Presbyterians to concentrate their energies on Davidson College, though still supporting the State University, to the usefulness of which they have ever been devoted. Comparatively brief as was its career, the Caldwell Institute did much to advance and elevate the cause of sound education in the South, and its influence has been widely felt and lasting.

Caldwell, Rev. James, was born in a settlement called Cub Creek, in what is now Charlotte county, Va., in 1734. He graduated at Princeton College in 1759; in about a year afterward was licensed as a probationer for the ministry, and in 1761 was ordained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, and probably at the same time installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Elizabethtown, N. J.

Soon after Mr. Caldwell's settlement in Elizabethtown commenced the differences between Great Britain and her Colonies which resulted in the War of the Revolution, and subsequently in our Independence, and he entered with all his heart into the controversy. On the commencement of hostilities, and the formation of the Jersey Brigade, he was at once selected as its chaplain. In June, 1776, he joined the Jersey regiment, then on the northern lines, and under the command of his friend and parishioner, Colonel Dayton. He did not remain with the army until the close of the campaign, but returned to New Jersey, where he was incessantly occupied by his public and parochial duties. His popularity with the army and the people was unbounded, and his practical wisdom and business talents were held in the highest estimation. But his popularity with the friends of the Revolution was equaled, if not surpassed, by his unpopularity with its enemies. High rewards, it is said, were offered for his capture, and to avoid the dangers to which he was constantly exposed from the Tories and the enemy, then in possession of Staten Island and New York, he removed his residence to Connecticut Farms, a small place distant a few miles from Elizabethtown, where he continued until his death. Such were his own apprehensions and those of his friends, that he usually went armed, and, after the burning of his church, when preaching in what is yet spoken of as the Old Red Store, he was often seen to disencumber himself of a pair of pistols and lay them by his side. The church in which he preached was cheerfully yielded as a hospital for sick, disabled and wounded soldiers, and its worshipers on the Sabbath were often compelled to stand through the service, because of the greasiness of the seats, and the fragments of bread and meat by which they were covered. In vengeance on the pastor and people this church was fired, on the 25th of January, 1780, by a refugee named Cornelius Hetfield. On the 25th of June following, Mrs. Caldwell was shot by a refugee, through the window of a room to which she had retired with her children, for safety and devotion, two balls passing through her body. Her corpse having been drawn forth and laid in the open street, the building was fired, and soon all the surrounding buildings were in ashes. When the army was reduced to a very low state, as to both pay and provisions, Mr. Caldwell was appointed Assistant Commissary General, and in this position his services were of immense value. He was shot by James Morgan, belonging to the Jersey militia, an Irishman by birth, and a man of the most debased and profligate character, and his funeral took place November 28th, 1781.

Mr. Caldwell was a man of unwearied activity, and of wonderful powers of both bodily and mental endurance. Feelings of the most glowing piety and the most fervent patriotism occupied his bosom at the same time, without at all interfering with each other. He was one day preaching to the battalion; the next, providing the ways and means for their support; the next, marching with them to battle; if defeated, assisting to conduct their retreat; if victorious, offering their united thanksgivings to God; and the next, carrying the consolations of the gospel to some afflicted or dying parishioner. Down to a very recent period the aged ones spoke of him with tearful emotion. Never was a pastor more affectionately remembered by a people. And, as a token of grateful respect and veneration for his memory, one of the townships in the county of Essex has been called by his name. Through the joint agency of a committee of the Cincinnati of New Jersey and a committee of the First Presbyterian Church of Elizabethtown, a beautiful monument to the memory of Mr. Caldwell was erected over his remains, in the graveyard of that church, to transmit the memory of his patriotism, piety and exalted worth to generations to come. That monument was dedicated, by appropriate ceremonies, on the 24th of November, 1845, the sixty-fourth anniversary of Mr. Caldwell's death. An appropriate and impressive address was delivered on the occasion by the Rev. Samuel Miller, D. D., which was subsequently published.

Caldwell, Joseph, D. D., was born at Lamington, N. J., April 21st, 1773. He entered Princeton College, in 1787, and during his whole collegiate course maintained the highest rank as a scholar. He graduated in 1791, on which occasion he delivered the Salutatory Oration in Latin. After his graduation he engaged in teaching for a time; studied theology under the direction of the Rev. David Austin, at Elizabethtown; in April, 1795, became tutor in Princeton College, and continued to hold the office somewhat more than a year; in the summer of 1796 received and accepted the appointment of Professor of Mathematics in the University of North Carolina; on the 23d of September following was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, and immediately entered on the duties of his Professorship, being then only twenty-three years of age. The college was at that time in a feeble state, and to him is justly ascribed the merit of saving it from ruin in its various vicissitudes.

In 1801 Mr. Caldwell was transferred from his Professorship to the Presidency of the University. This latter office he continued to hold till 1812, when he resigned it, and returned to the Mathematical chair, being succeeded by the Rev. Dr. Chapman. In 1817 Dr. Chapman retired from the Presidency, and Dr. Caldwell was chosen President again. In 1821 he went to Europe for the purchase of apparatus and books for the University, and returned the following year. He died, January 24th, 1835, and a monument to his memory was erected in the grove surrounding the University buildings by the trustees. Dr. Caldwell was a man of remarkably sound judgment. He was self-denying, generous, fearless, and persevering. Few, if any, of the graduates of the University ever failed to remember him with admiration and affection. "North Carolina," says Dr. Ohmstead, U. S. C., "reveres his memory. Her most distinguished sons were his pupils, and cherish for him a truly filial affection, and the advance which that State has made in intelligence and virtue through the instrumentality of his labors is the highest monument of his power and wisdom."

Calhoun, Rev. Philo, was born in Green county, New York, about the year 1806, and died at Vienna, La., July 20th, 1872. He graduated with distinguished honor, in 1826, at Union College, in his native State. Soon after his graduation, he took charge of a private school in the vicinity of Farmville, in Prince Edward county, Va. Here he distinguished himself by his ability and faithfulness as an instructor of youth. He studied theology at Union Theological Seminary, Virginia; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of West Hanover, in 1832, and in 1833 was ordained to the full work of the ministry.

Having labored in the ministry a short time, at Washington, N. C., with great acceptance and profit to the church at that place he was invited to take charge of the churches of Lacy Hoge and Blue Stone, in Mecklenburg county, Va. Accepting this invitation, he labored with zeal and fidelity with those churches till he was called to the Professorship of Mathematics in Washington College, Va., now Washington and Lee University, about the year 1836. Here he remained, occupying this important position with distinguished ability and success, till about the year 1851, when he retired from that place to occupy other places of influence and usefulness in the educational interests of our country, as well as in the ministry. About 1860 he became the head of an important Female Seminary at Houma, La., which position he filled to the great satisfaction of that community for some years. He was next a Professor in Oakland College, Miss., where he discharged the duties of that office with distinguished ability and usefulness. In the Fall of 1870 he visited Texas. His reputation as an educator of youth having gone before him to that new and rapidly improving State, he received many solicitations to engage in teaching. He went to Vienna, in the State of Louisiana, resolved to devote himself thenceforth entirely to his favorite work of preaching the gospel. Accordingly he engaged to preach to the Church at Vienna, and at other points in reach of that place. Here he labored in the Master's service, with great acceptance and profit to the churches, preaching with unvaried fidelity and zeal, till his heavenly Father informed him that his work was done.

Calkins, Rev. Matthew Henry, son of Calvin Pardee and Betsey (Smith) Calkins, was born in Ballston, Saratoga county, N. Y., March 15th, 1812. He graduated at Princeton College, with honor, in 1865; at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1868, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Albany in June, 1867. He was installed over the Solebury Church, Bucks county, Pa., August 20th, 1868. In June, 1873, he accepted a call from the Second Presbyterian Church of Newcastle, Pa., and was soon after installed. Here he still continues. His work has been prospered, and the church has been increased and strengthened under his faithful ministrations. Mr. Calkins possesses rare merits and most excellent qualities of mind and heart. He preaches good sermons, and is a kind, devoted pastor. Patient industry, steady perseverance and good talents have, with God's blessing, wrought good success in the past, and ensure it for the future.

Calling, Effectual. Man does not come to God till he is called by the operations of the Holy Spirit in his soul. The truth of this doctrine appears from the accounts given in Scripture, of the corrupt state of mankind by nature. They are said to be not only diseased and weak, but to be "dead in trespasses and sins" (Eph. ii, 1); to be not only blind, but "darkness" itself (Eph. v, 3, etc.); to be "natural" or animal men, who "do not receive, and cannot know the things of the Spirit" (1 Cor. ii, 14); to be "the servants of sin" (Rom. vi, 17); to be the "enemies of God" (Col. i, 21); who are not and cannot be subject to his law (Rom. viii, 27). Now, if these things are true, how is it possible, according to the doctrine of Pelagius, adopted by Socinians and some of the followers of Arminius, that men have free will to good as well as to evil; that they possess a degree of moral power, which, by culture, may increase in strength, so as to change the current of their affections and actions; that with some assistance they can work out their salvation?

That the grace of God, in the application of redemption, is mighty, may be inferred from the effect. It is a change of the whole man, of his views, and principles, and inclinations, and pursuits. Now, this is a change which no means merely human have ever been able to accomplish. Not to mention the total failure of philosophy to reform mankind, or even in a single instance to inspire true virtue, we may remark, that the superior instructions, and precepts, and motives of Christianity, although employed with great diligence and earnestness, prove so often ineffectual, as to convince every person of reflection that, when they do take effect, their success should be attributed to a higher cause than their intrinsic excellence, or the eloquence of the teachers. The hand of God is clearly seen in the sudden, commanding and lasting impressions which are often made upon the mind. When the thoughtless are compelled to think, and to think with an intenseness and seriousness which they never formerly felt; when the careless are in a moment affected with a sense of their most important interests; when the lips which were accustomed to blaspheme learn to pray; when the proud assume the lowly attitude and language of the penitent; when those who were devoted to the world give evidence that now the object of their desires and pursuits is a heavenly inheritance; and when this revolution, so wonderful, has been effected by the simple Word of God, and by the Word which the subjects of this change had often heard before unmoved, we must be convinced that some mighty influence has been exerted, and that that influence is divine. Here, if anywhere, we perceive the finger of God. Hence His power is represented as displayed in the success of the gospel. "The Lord shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion; rule thou in the midst of thine enemies. Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power" (Ps. cx, 2, 3).

The power of God exerted in the regeneration and conversion of sinners, is invincible. We make use of this term rather than the word irresistible, because, when the latter is taken in its natural import, it does not express what is the fact. Resistance is made to the grace of God, not only by the finally impenitent, but also by those who ultimately yield to it. In particular, when they begin to feel convictions of sin, they often endeavor to suppress them, or resort to improper expedients for relief; "going about," for example, "to establish their own righteousness, and not submitting to the righteousness of God"—Romans x, 3. In these instances, they are chargeable with opposition to grace. Those, therefore, who speak of irresistible grace, mean that it cannot be finally resisted; that it will overcome all the efforts of corrupt nature to counteract its design; and that it will ultimately render sinners obedient to the faith. But this idea is more properly expressed by the term, invincible. Man must submit, in the end, to the power of God; and this will be the more evident, if we consider that His power is not only sufficient to compel the most refractory to yield, although with the greatest reluctance, but that it can take away the spirit of opposition, and so influence the hearts of men that this submission shall be voluntary.

Were we to say that the grace of God is not invincible, we should be under the necessity of adopting the opinion, which we have already proved to be unscriptural, that there is a power in man to comply or not to comply with the call of the Gospel. We should take the work of conversion out of the hand of God, and commit it to man himself. After God had done all that He could do for our salvation, it would depend upon ourselves whether the intended effect should follow. Hence the result of the dispensation of the Gospel would be altogether uncertain. It would not be known beforehand whether all would believe, or all would disobey. If the grace of God was effectually resisted in one case, it might be effectually resisted in every case; and, consequently, although Christ shed His blood that He might bring sinners to God, and the whole economy of grace has been instituted with a view to carry the design of His death into effect, it might happen that not an individual of the human race would be saved. The very possibility of such an issue, by which the scheme of redemption would be frustrated, furnishes a strong presumption in favor of the doctrine that the grace exercised in the conversion of sinners is not of such an equivocal character that it may or may not accomplish its design, but that its operation is mighty and efficacious, bearing down all opposition, and "bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ."

The great objection against the invincibility of Divine grace is, that it is subversive of the liberty of the will. It seems inconceivable, to some, that a man should be free, and at the same time should be infallibly determined to a particular purpose. But the objection proceeds upon a misapprehension of the mode of operation. The idea occurs of external force, by which a man is compelled to do something to which he is averse. It is not considered that the power of grace is not compulsive; that it puts no force upon our minds; that, instead of disturbing our mental constitution, it goes along with it; and that, in a manner at once natural and supernatural, it secures the concurrence of the will. True liberty consists in doing what we do with knowledge and from choice; and such liberty is not only consistent with conversion, but essential to it; for if a man turn to God at all, he must turn with his heart; God does not lead us to salvation without consciousness, like stones transported from one place to another; nor without our consent, like slaves who are driven to their task by the terror of punishment. He conducts us in a manner suitable to our rational and moral nature. He so illuminates our minds that we most cordially concur with His design. His power, although able to subdue opposition, is of the mildest and most gentle kind. While He commands, He persuades; while He draws, the sinner comes without reluctance; and never in his life is there a freer act of volition than when he believes in Christ, and accepts of His salvation.

Calvin, Hon. Samuel, was born July 30th, 1811, in Washington, Montour county, Pa. His education was received chiefly at the Milton Academy. For a time he taught school. Subsequently he was intrusted with the charge of Huntingdon Academy, applying all his leisure time to the study of law. In 1836 he was admitted to the Bar, rising rapidly in his profession and in public estimation. In 1848 he was elected to Congress, serving one term, and declining a re-nomination. He has occupied many offices of local responsibility, and was selected to fill a vacancy in the Constitutional Convention of 1872-3, of which body he was a prominent and influential member. Mr. Calvin is a lawyer of very decided ability. He was brought up in the Presbyterian faith, to which he still adheres. His present residence is Hollidaysburg, Pa., where he is held in high esteem.

Cameron, Rev. Archibald, was born in Scotland, about the year 1771 or 1772, but his parents emigrated to America when he was in his infancy. He spent a year or more at the "Transylvania Seminary," now "Transylvania University," and subsequently completed his literary course at Bardstown, under Dr. James Priestley. He studied theology under the direction of the Rev. David Rice, at Danville, and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Transylvania Presbytery, February 14th, 1795. On the 2d of June, 1796, he was ordained and installed over the churches of Akron and Fox Run, in Shelby, and Big Spring, in Nelson. For several years his labors were spread over a very extensive field, now occupied by the churches of Shelbyville, Mulberry, Six Mile, Shiloh, Olive and Big Spring, and embracing a circuit of from thirty to forty miles. These churches, with the exception of Big Spring, were organized and built up through his instrumentality; he also organized the churches of Cane Run and Pennsylvania Run, in Jefferson county. For many years he was the only Presbyterian minister in this wide extent of country, to supply which he labored with indefatigable industry and perseverance, traveling through a wilderness, in the most inclement seasons, and often being obliged to swim the swollen streams, to fulfill his appointments. He found it necessary to contract his labors, from time to time, within a narrower field, and from 1828 until near the close of life, he devoted himself to the churches of Shelbyville and Mulberry. Here he had a long and interesting term of service, it being altogether more than forty years. He died December 4th, 1836.

Mr. Cameron was an able, earnest and effective preacher. He was a ripe scholar in all that fitted him to interpret the Scriptures. His mind was cast in the finest mould, and its distinctive characteristics were strength, originality and discrimination. He was regarded as decidedly a leader in the Synod, and next to that illustrious pioneer, the Rev. David Rice, he was the father of Presbyterianism in Kentucky.

Cameron, Henry Clay, D. D., was born in Shepherdstown, Va., September 1st, 1827. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1847; was teacher for a time; Principal of "Edgchill," Princeton, N. J., 1851; Tutor in New Jersey College, 1852-5; Adjunct and Associate Professor of Greek in the same Institution, 1855-61; was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, February 1st, 1863; was Instructor in French in New Jersey College, 1859-70; Librarian of the College, 1865-72; and was elected Professor of Greek there in 1861. Professor Cameron is a gentleman of cultured manner, agreeable address, and scholarly ability. He is of good Presbyterian stock, having both Covenanting and Huguenot blood in his veins. The Rev. Archibald Cameron, noticed in the preceding sketch, almost the founder of the Presbyterian Church in Kentucky, was a cousin of Professor Cameron's grandfather. They arrived in this country together, before the Revolution, Archibald Cameron being, however, almost an infant. Professor Cameron's great-grandfather and one of his brothers were in the battle of Culloden, on the side of "Prince Charlie." The father of Archibald Cameron, and the grandfather of General Simon Cameron, of Pennsylvania, were the two brothers who did not join in the Rebellion of 1745.

Campbell, Allan Ditchfield, D. D., was born at Chorley, in Lancashire, England, March 15th, 1791, and at an early age left Great Britain with his father and mother, who settled in Baltimore. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, in Philadelphia. In 1815 he was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, of the Associate Reformed Church, and was by that body appointed to preach in the vacant churches in Western Pennsylvania, adjoining Pittsburg. Soon afterward, he joined the Presbytery of Redstone, of the Presbyterian Church. Removing to Tennessee in 1820, he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Nashville, where for seven years he prosecuted his Master's work, amid many difficulties and much suffering from frequent attacks of illness. He returned to Pennsylvania in the Spring of 1827, and in the Fall of 1828 the family removed to their pleasant home overlooking the Ohio River near Pittsburg, where he breathed his last, September 20th, 1861, uttering, in a voice of great firmness, as he departed, "I know whom I have believed."

Dr. Campbell was deeply interested in the founding of the Western Theological Seminary, at Allegheny. He went to England and Scotland to collect a library for the Institution, and secured upwards of two thousand volumes. After several years of great exertion, as General Agent of the Seminary, and as Instructor in it of Church Government and Discipline, the connection terminated, in 1840, but, to the end of his life, he was the unflinching friend of the Institution. Dr. Campbell was an earnest man in his profession. Of his preaching it might be said, "the common people heard him gladly." He was a true patriot, and was exceedingly liberal and hospitable. Many a theological student and poor minister were the recipients of his bounty. Many cherish his memory with affection.

Campbell, Alfred Elderkin, D. D., born in January, 1802, was the oldest son of James S. Campbell, Esq., of Cherry Valley, N. Y. He graduated from Union College in 1820, and studied theology at Princeton. His first settlement was at Worcester, Otsego county, N. Y., and his subsequent settlements were in Newark and Palmyra, in Ithaca, and in Cooperstown, in the last of which places he remained for twelve years, in favor with God and man. He was pastor of the Spring Street Church, New York, 1848-57, and Secretary of the American and Foreign Christian Union, 1858-67. He died December 28th, 1874. Dr. Campbell was a man of action, impelled to it by forces within himself, and led to the best movements and measures by intention and instinct. His pulpit preparations were generally popular, but more from the free outflow of his heart than from the laborious exercise of his mind. A gentleman in himself and brought up as a gentleman, he graced and gratified the social circle, and his genuine kindness, sympathy and love of souls endeared him to a parish and made him a blessing to it. He recognized the claims upon him of his Denomination and of the Church at large, and of the public in general, and actively participated in ecclesiastical proceedings and in movements for moral reform and the common welfare. His benevolence was expansive, and suiting his actions to his prayers, he sought the doing of God's will on earth as in heaven.

Campbell, John N., D.D., was born in Philadelphia, Pa., March 4th, 1798; was a student in the University of Pennsylvania, and subsequently became, for a time, teacher of the languages in Hampden Sidney College, Va. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Hanover, May 10th, 1817, and preached for some time in Petersburg, Va., also in Newbern, N. C., where he was instrumental in establishing the First Presbyterian Church. In 1820 he was chosen Chaplain to Congress, and discharged the duties of the position with unusual acceptance. He afterwards spent two or three years in Virginia. He became, in 1823, the assistant of Dr. Balch, of Georgetown, D. C., and continued so from one to two years. In December, 1828, he took charge of the New York Avenue Church, in Washington, D. C., where his great popularity very soon crowded their place of worship. In January, 1825, he was elected one of the Managers of the American Colonization Society, and very ably and efficiently discharged the duties of the office for about six years. He died March 27th, 1864.

Dr. Campbell's character, in respect to its predominant qualities, both intellectual and moral, was strongly marked. His mind was uncommonly versatile; with a firmness that never yielded, he united a frankness that loathed dissimulation. He had always an open heart and hand, according to his ability, for administering to the wants of the poor and suffering. His remarkable executive power, in connection with his great familiarity with ecclesiastical rule, gave him a decided influence in the councils of the Church, so far as he mingled with them.

Campbell, Joseph, D. D., was born in Omagh, County of Tyrone, Ireland, in the year 1776. He came with his parents to America in 1797. For two or three years he had charge of a school at Cranbury, N. J. In 1801 he opened an English and Classical School at Princeton. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, October 5th, 1808. In 1809 he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Hackettstown, N. J., where he continued laboring with great acceptance and success for nearly thirty years. In 1838 he accepted a call to the pastoral charge of the churches in Milford and Kingwood, N. J. He died September 6th, 1840. His remains were removed for burial to Hackettstown, and the people of both his charges met at his funeral and mingled in a common lamentation.

Dr. Campbell was a most faithful pastor, and greatly beloved by all the churches of the large Presbytery of Newton, and respected and honored by the whole Synod of New Jersey. He was a popular and most successful minister of the gospel. He was always found among the friends of order and law. He promoted all philanthropic movements. He sustained the Boards of the Church, and was the untiring friend of schools and colleges. He sought out and educated promising young men for the ministry. He was a great peace-maker. Those who knew him well in private could testify that he was a devout man. In the judicatories of the Church, few were more prompt, judicious, or efficient than he. It may be justly said of him, that he was "a master in Israel."

Campbell, Rev. Robert K., now of South Salem, O., was born in Washington county, Pa., May 6th, 1832. He was brought up in connection with the Associate Reformed Church. He graduated at Jefferson College, in 1852, and received his theological training at Allegheny City, Pa., and at Oxford, O. He was licensed by the First A. R. Presbytery of Ohio, in April, 1855, and ordained by the same Presbytery, in August, 1856. He was pastor of the Sycamore Church, near Cincinnati, for nine years, then of the F. P. Church, in Greenfield, O., for five years. In 1869 he transferred his ecclesiastical connection to the Presbyterian Church, and in the following year was settled as pastor over the large and influential Church of South Salem, in the Presbytery of Chillicothe, a church that he still serves most usefully and acceptably. Mr. Campbell is a good preacher, clear and pointed, and in his preparation for the pulpit is very careful and painstaking. As a pastor he is diligent and faithful. As a Presbyter he has much influence, on account of his candor and good judgment, and high sense of probity and conscientiousness.

CAMPBELL, MINOR CAMPBELL, D. D.

Campbell, Samuel Minor, D. D., was born in Campbell, Steuben county, N. Y., June 1st, 1823. His ancestors were Scotch, and were the first settlers of the town of Campbell. He graduated at Franklin Academy, Plattsburg, N. Y., and at Auburn Theological Seminary, in 1849, and was ordained and installed at Paris Hill, N. Y., by the Oneida Association, December 20th, 1850. He preached in Danville, N. Y., 1857-8; was pastor of the Westminster Presbyterian Church, Utica, 1858-66; of the Central Presbyterian Church, Rochester, 1866-81. In 1881 he took charge of the First Presbyterian Church, Minneapolis, Minn., which is his present field of labor. In 1878 he was sent by the General Assembly, as a delegate, to the Pan-Presbyterian Council at Edinburgh. Besides being a frequent contributor to the religious and secular press, and publishing occasional sermons, he has published several deservedly popular volumes: "Across the Desert, a Life of Moses" (1872), and "The Story of Creation" (1877).

Dr. Campbell has filled several of the most important pulpits in the Presbyterian Church, with rare ability and success. His popularity has never been ephemeral or sensational, but well-founded and abiding. He is a clear, suggestive and independent thinker, using apt illustrations, and has a simple, crisp and incisive style. He has a terse, pointed, practical and common-sense way of putting things, which commends itself to the judgment of his hearers, gains their assent, and carries them with him. Personally he has a magnetism of manner which wins and puts at ease, and assures of friendship. As a pastor, he is constant in kindly ministrations, and possesses the confidence and affection of his people. Dr. Campbell is much sought for on special occasions, and is very happy in revivals. He is also esteemed a wise leader and counsellor in ecclesiastical bodies, where his influence is very effective.

Campbell, Rev. William Graham, son of Alexander and Jane (Smith) Campbell, was born in Rockbridge county, Va., July 27th, 1799. He was graduated from Washington College, Va., A. D. 1825; afterwards spent one session as a Tutor in that college; entered Princeton Seminary in the Fall of 1825 and spent there one year, in study. He was licensed by Lexington Presbytery, October 23d, 1826, and was ordained an evangelist by the same Presbytery, April 26th, 1828. After licensure he supplied the Church at Christiansburg, Va. (which he began), and at the same time taught a school in that place. He next labored, from 1830 to 1841, as a missionary in Greenbrier and Pocahontas counties, Va., supplying the churches of Spring Creek, Anthony's Creek, Little Levels (now Oak Grove), and, one year, also Mt. Carmel. From 1841 to 1843 he was stated supply at Warm Springs, Va. He then became pastor of Shemariah Church, over which he was installed by Lexington Presbytery, August 24th, 1844, and from which he was released May 3d, 1850. From 1850 until 1857 he resided at Staunton, Va., preaching and teaching; then from 1857 to 1859 he resided at Salisbury, N. C., having charge of an academy for girls and preaching in adjacent churches as he had opportunity. From 1859 until 1865 he was stated supply to Lebanon Church, Va. From 1866 until his death he resided at Harrisonburg, Va., and after many years of feeble health died at that place, August 2d, 1881, of old age, in his eighty-third year, at the last making a clear confession of his faith in Christ as his Redeemer, and dying a most peaceful death. He was an able preacher of the Word, and his labors everywhere were greatly blessed, being in many of his fields much enhanced by his tact and ability as a teacher.

Campbell, William H., an elder of the First Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., was born in Newburyport, Mass., March 26th, 1800, and died in Georgetown, D. C., May 21st, 1881. Mr. Campbell was, for two years, a clerk in a store in Portland, Maine, where, under the ministry of the Rev. Dr. Payson, he received some of his earliest and deepest religious impressions. In 1817 he engaged in business in Richmond, Va., and in 1820 joined the First Presbyterian Church of that city, of the Sabbath School of which he was for some time superintendent. In 1828 he established himself in business in Washington, and connected himself with the First Presbyterian Church, and accepted the office of Superintendent of the Sabbath School, in which relation he stood for some twenty-two years. In 1840, he was elected a ruling elder of the Church, and continued so until his death, faithfully and acceptably discharging the duties of his position.

Mr. Campbell was a truly exemplary Christian. He acted ever as a steward of the goods which God bestowed. He gave liberally in response to the various claims of Christian charity. He was as faithful a man in all his relations as is likely to be found in the midst of human imperfection. In the domestic sphere he was a model of affection, and by precept and example taught his loved ones the way to heaven. He was kind, courteous, upright, a man of singular probity, of great good sense and practical wisdom. He was clear-sighted and punctilious in all business affairs. He kept his promises and constrained men to keep theirs; but he was the soul of honor and of honesty in all things. Though he had great devotion for his own home church, yet he had a wide, deep sympathy for the cause of Christ everywhere, and in every form, and no one felt more delight than he in the ordinances of the sanctuary and the prosperity of the Redeemer's kingdom.

Canfield, William B., was born in the State of Connecticut, in the year 1809, and in early life removed to Baltimore, Md. Here, together with his brother, he established one of the largest jewelry stores in the State. Several years previous to his death, which occurred January 10th, 1883, he was compelled, by failing health, to withdraw from all active business pursuits. In 1850 he was elected a member of the Board of Managers of the Maryland Bible Society; and in 1859 was chosen vice-president of the Board, which position he filled to the time of his death. For more than forty years he was a member of the First Presbyterian Church of Baltimore. For thirty-five years he was a ruling elder in that church, and during the same period was superintendent of the Sabbath School.

In all religious duties Mr. Canfield manifested singular devotion and zeal. One intimately associated with him in Church work writes, "He was not only ready at all times, but also watchful for opportunities to do his part in every kind of service; judicious in counsel, tender in sympathy, and benevolent in deeds." Rev. Dr. Backus, for many years his pastor, speaks of him as having been a model elder—prudent, active, wise, filled with the Spirit, his Master's work consuming a large portion of his time, his energy, and his solicitude.

Cannon, Rev. John F., was born in Cabarras county, N. C., January 3d, 1851; graduated at Davidson College, N. C., in 1869; spent the following year in study at the University of Virginia; afterwards took the full course of study at Union Theological Seminary, Prince Edward county, Va. He was licensed by Mecklenburg Presbytery, May 20th, 1873, and transferred to Chesapeake Presbytery, to take the pastoral charge of Leesburg Church, in Loudon county, Va. He was ordained and installed pastor of Leesburg Church in October, 1873, and continued in this charge for nearly eight years, developing most admirable qualities, as pastor, preacher and presbyter.

In April, 1881, he was transferred to the pastoral charge of the Church of Shelbyville, Tenn., in which he continues to the present time (1883). The qualities developed in his Leesburg charge have been more fully brought out in his present larger one. His early ministry was remarkably characterized by sound judgment and wisdom in the various exigencies of the work. His fine personal appearance and great dignity of manner prepossess in his favor, and the expectations thus raised are well answered in the calm and clear, but full and forcible presentation of richest gospel truths in his preaching. His very careful habits of study and preparation give promise of still larger development of power in his ministry. Mr. Cannon was a Commissioner from Chesapeake Presbytery to the General Assembly in New Orleans, in 1877.

Carmichael, Rev. John, was born in the town of Tarbert, in Argyleshire, Scotland, October 17th, 1728. His parents migrated to this country in the year 1737. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in August, 1759; studied theology at Princeton, under the direction of the Rev. Samuel Davies, who had then become President of the College, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, May 8th, 1760. On April 21st, 1761, he was ordained to the work of the ministry, and installed pastor of the Church of the Forks of Brandywine, Chester county, Pa. This connection continued until the close of his life. His death, which occurred November 15th, 1785, was a scene of uncommon triumph, and the last expression that fell from his lips was—"Oh that I had a thousand tongues, that I might employ them all in inviting sinners to Christ."

Mr. Carmichael was an eminently devout and earnest Christian, as well as an uncommonly laborious and faithful minister. The Rev. Dr. J. N. C. Grier, whose father as well as himself were successors of Mr. Carmichael at Brandywine Manor, says of him: "He was an eloquent man, in his day, and mighty in the Scriptures." He was a man of ardent feelings, and what he did, he did with his might. He was the pastor of this congregation during the whole of the great American Revolution, and, like most of the Presbyterian clergymen of that day, he espoused the cause of his country, like one who would rather perish battling for freedom, than live a slave. He was long spared to the affections and prayers of his people, going in and out before them as a burning and a shining light, breaking to them the bread of life, and being an example to the flock over which the Holy Ghost had made him an overseer, ever calling upon them to be followers of him, even as he also was of Christ. The congregation increased under his ministry, which lasted about twenty-four years. He died greatly respected and deeply lamented by his people, and having in all the churches of his Presbytery the reputation of a man thoroughly furnished for his work, one who needed not to be ashamed, because he rightly divided the word of truth."

Carnahan, James, D. D., the son of Major Carnahan, of the Revolutionary army, was born in Carlisle, Pa., in 1775. He graduated with the highest honors, at Princeton (1800), speaking the English Salutatory at Commencement. For one year after his graduation he studied theology under Dr. McMillan, at Canonsburg, Pa., after which he returned to Princeton, becoming Tutor in the college, and pursuing his theological studies under President Smith. In April, 1804, he was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, and supplied the vacant churches in the bounds of that Presbytery for some time. On the 5th of January, 1805, he was ordained pastor of Whitesborough and Utica churches, in New York, where he remained until 1814, when, on account of the state of his health, he resigned this charge, and after teaching for a short time in Princeton, N. J., removed to Georgetown, D. C., and opened a Classical Academy, which soon became quite prosperous.

In 1824 Dr. Carnahan was elected President of Princeton College, Dr. Green having resigned the year before. He remained in this eminent post for thirty years, presiding with dignity and honor. But in 1854, failing health and the increasing infirmities of age compelled him to resign. He remained a member of the Board of Trustees till his death. He died at his son-in-law's, in Newark, March 3d, 1859. The college had never reached as great prosperity as during the time which Dr. Carnahan presided over it.

Dr. Carnahan published a number of Baccalaureate Addresses and sermons, and some articles in the earlier numbers of the Princeton Review; he also edited the Life of the Rev. John Johnson, of Newburgh, New York, in 1856. Though a forcible writer, with great perspicuity of style, he was very reluctant to appear as an author, so much so, that he expressly stated in his will that none of his lectures or other manuscripts should be published. His funeral took place in Princeton, and his dust mingles with the dust of the mighty dead of Nassau Hall.

Carothers, Rev. James Neely, was the eldest son of Hon. John Carothers and Mary (Hope) Carothers, and was born in Union county, S. C., on the 13th of November, 1805. He graduated at Washington College, Tenn., in 1826, and soon afterwards engaged in teaching a classical school in Mesopotamia (now Entaw), Ala. He studied theology under the direction of Rev. John H. Gray, D. D., and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of South Alabama, in 1830. His first pastoral charge was Centreville, in Bibb county, Ala., where he remained a few years, and returned to his former home, in Greene county, and preached at Entaw and Clinton until 1847, when he removed to Houston, Chickasaw county, Miss., where for several years he had charge of the Female College in that place. He was installed pastor of Friendship Church, in 1852, which relation has been uninterruptedly maintained until the present time. 1883, he having now labored most acceptably and efficiently in the same field for the unusual period of more than thirty years.

Mr. Carothers is a man of genial nature and attractive manners, and is a forcible and popular preacher, and readily wins the hearts of those, both young and old, with whom he comes in contact. He was, for a number of years, and is now, the only resident Presbyterian minister in Chickasaw county, although there are five churches in the county. Promptness and punctuality in meeting all ministerial appointments, as well as in all the business engagements and transactions of life, have always characterized him. As a preacher he has always been bold and vigorous in the statement of Bible truth and gospel doctrine, and clear and successful in maintaining and enforcing them. The people of his pastoral charge have ever been greatly attached to him, and they are no less interested in his preaching and in himself now, than they were thirty years ago. He was for many years the Stated Clerk of his Presbytery, and although he recently resigned that office, he continues to be punctual in his attendance upon the higher judicatories of the Church. God has blessed him with uniform success in his ministerial and pastoral work; and there is no apparent diminution in his earnest zeal and active efforts in the service of his divine Master, now that he has almost reached the allotted ultimatum of man's life, fourscore years.

Carothers, Rev. W. W., the son of John and Mary (Hope) Carothers, was born in Union county, S. C., January 17th, 1819. After completing an academic education he taught school for three or four years, then studied theology, under the direction of Rev. Robert Y. Russell. He was licensed to preach on the 21st of October, 1843, and ordained to the full work of the ministry about a year thereafter. He graduated at Washington College, in East Tennessee, in 1847. He then returned to South Carolina, and for more than twenty years was actively and laboriously engaged in preaching the gospel, and most of the time teaching a classical school. In 1863 he was Moderator of the Convention of the Independent Presbyterian Church at which the union between said Church and the Old School Presbyterian Church was consummated, and he became a member of Bethel Presbytery. He had been pastor of Beth-shilo Church, in York county, since 1853 (ten years), and in 1865 Allison Creek Church was added to his pastorate. He was greatly blessed in his ministry there, and those churches enjoyed repeated seasons of revival. He labored in that field seventeen years. In February, 1871, he was called to Fairview Church, in the Presbytery of South Alabama, and removed to Perry county, Ala. He continued there six years, and then was called to Valley Creek and Mount Pleasant churches, near Selma, Ala., where he is greatly beloved, and is now laboring faithfully and most acceptably.

Carrick, Rev. Samuel, was a native of York county (now Adams), Pa., and was born on July 17th, 1760. He prosecuted his studies in the Valley of Virginia, under the Rev. William Graham; was licensed to preach by Hanover Presbytery, October 25th, 1782, and was ordained and installed pastor of Rocky Spring and Wald Meeting-house, in November, 1783. On the division of the Presbytery, in 1786, Mr. Carrick became a member of the Lexington Presbytery. For several years he seems to have divided his labors between Virginia and Tennessee, but he did not settle permanently in Tennessee till about the year 1791, when he was regularly dismissed to join the Abingdon Presbytery. In February, 1791, Mr. Carrick, by their invitation, preached before the Territorial Legislature in Knoxville. The same year he was chosen, by the Legislature, President of Blount College, which office he held till his death. During this whole period he had the pastoral charge of the Knoxville Church, and until 1803, of the Lebanon Church also. Mr. Carrick took great interest in the general cause of education. In 1800 he was chairman of a committee appointed by the General Assembly to prepare a pastoral letter to the churches. In the pulpit Mr. Carrick's manner was grave, dignified and solemn. His views of Divine truth were clear and definite, and they lost nothing by his mode of exhibiting them. As a preacher he commanded great respect in the community in which he labored. The circumstances of his death were impressive and startling. It was the season for the sacramental meeting in his church. He had spent much of the preceding night in preparatory thought and study. Very early in the morning he was seized with apoplexy, and in a few moments his spirit had taken its upward flight.

Carroll, Daniel L., D. D., was born in Fayette county, Pa., May 10th, 1797. After surmounting great difficulties in the way of getting an education, he graduated at Jefferson College in 1823, being twenty-six years old. He then took the three years' course in Princeton Seminary, and six months additional. He was settled over a Congregational Church in Litchfield, Conn., October, 1827. March 4th, 1829, he was installed over the First Presbyterian Church, in Brooklyn, L. I., but in 1835 resigned, on account of throat-ail, and accepted the Presidency of Hampden-Sidney College, Virginia. In 1838, on account of theological difficulties, he resigned, and accepted a call to the First Church of the Northern Liberties, Philadelphia, where he remained until 1844, when ill-health compelled him to relinquish the charge. After a brief tour of service for the Colonization Society, he died, in Philadelphia, November 23d, 1851, in the fifty-fifth year of his age. As a preacher Dr. Carroll was very popular, and preached to crowded houses. He had a refined taste, lively imagination and nervous organization. He excelled on the platform. He published two volumes of sermons, besides occasional discourses.

Carson, William, for nearly forty years a ruling elder in Bellevue Church, Washington county, Mo., was born 1794, and died 1870. Mr. Carson was a man of superior natural intelligence, sound reason, and rare wisdom. His mind laid hold of subjects with a comprehensive grasp, and gave them a thorough and independent investigation. Yet his faith was adorned with submission and meekness. He came to Missouri in 1829, and pursued the life of a farmer. In 1830 he became an elder in the Bellevue Church, which was then known as the Concord Church. In the government and doctrines of the Church he was well versed, firm in maintaining its order, and zealous for its peace and purity. His devotion to truth was that of a martyr. He could see his house reduced to ashes, and suffer the spoiling of his goods for conscience' sake, but he could not renounce his principles or deviate from what he conceived to be right. He could and did pray for them who despitefully used and persecuted him. To his rectitude of principle and ardent piety he added the testimony of a life which commended itself to every man's conscience in the sight of God. When Presby-terianism had a sparse settlement on Missouri soil, he became an officer in the sanctuary, and from no duty or position to which the Lord called him did he shrink. Of him, his pastor could say, "He is profitable to me in the ministry." The legacy of his godly life is transmitted in a pious seed; children's children are inheritors of his peace.

Carter, Robert, the founder and present head of the firm of Robert Carter & Brothers, New York, is an elder in the Presbyterian Church, Sing Sing, N. Y., of which the Rev. Wilson Phraner, D. D., is pastor. He was born in the little town of Earlston, about six miles from Abbottsford, Scotland, November 2d, 1807. While a mere boy he exhibited a remarkable fondness for study and a great desire to obtain an education. When only fifteen years old he opened a night school for young lads, in one of the rooms of his father's cottage. One-half of his scholars were older and larger than he was, but his school proved to be a great success. Meanwhile he was carefully studying Latin and Greek, assisted, occasionally, by a cousin, some years older than himself, who had been at college. When he was twenty years old he heard that Mr. Sloane, of Peebles, wanted an assistant in his grammar school. He determined to apply for the situation. The distance was twenty-five miles. Rising early he started, on foot, reading, as he went, Sallust's "Jugurtha," secured the situation, and returned to his home the same day. The next week he entered upon his duties in the school, which he discharged very effectively and acceptably. He remained in this situation for about two years. Then, having saved a little sum of money, he resigned, and entered the University of Edinburgh.

Mr. Carter, not long after, sailed for this country, and landed in New York, May 16th, 1831. For a time he was a teacher in the New York High School. Subsequently he began a school of his own, which was successful, some who afterwards became prominent in Church and State being among his pupils. In April, 1834, he began the selling of books and stationery, and since that time has been engaged with such success in the book publishing and selling business as has given him a national reputation, having associated with himself, in 1848, as partners, his two brothers, Walter and Peter Carter.

Mr. Carter is a most earnest, exemplary and useful Christian. He has frequently served the Church as a member of some of its Boards; is a faithful and influential member of Presbytery and Synod, and in the General Assembly, to which he has often been sent, has always been regarded as a man of sound judgment, inflexible principle and active zeal. He was a prominent member of the Reunion Committee. He has accomplished a vast amount of good by his consistent example, liberality, and favor to all good enterprises, and such is the standing of his firm as publishers, that their imprint is accepted as a sufficient guarantee of a book's excellence.

Caruthers, Eli Washington, D. D., was born in Rowan county, N. C., October 26th, 1793, of Scotch-Irish parentage, and received his preparatory education in the school of Rev. Jos. D. Kilpatrick. He first entered Hampden-Sidney College, Virginia, but went thence to the College of New Jersey, and was graduated from that Institution with distinction, in 1817. From the College he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, and after finishing his course was licensed, by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, in 1820. Returning to North Carolina he took charge of Alamance, Bethel and Buffalo churches, in Guilford county, and was ordained by Orange Presbytery at Buffalo, November 10th, 1821. He gave up Bethel Church in 1822, and Buffalo in 1846, continuing at Alamance, until July, 1861, when he felt constrained, by the infirmities of age, to resign this church also. He died November 14th, 1865.

As a preacher, Dr. Caruthers, in his prime, possessed considerable power, his sermons being characterized by fullness of gospel doctrine and studied accuracy of statement. His success as a pastor is shown by the fact that he never had but one charge, and voluntarily resigned it, part by part, as the labors became too burdensome for his strength.

Dr. Caruthers never married, and his habits of life were those of the recluse, varied by some harmless eccentricities, superinduced by his lonely mode of life. He was a close student, and a painstaking antiquarian, and had a keen relish for the musty odor of an old document, and a real delight in a venerable tradition. As the successor of Dr. Caldwell, the first pastor of the Guilford churches, he began early to collect documents and traditions concerning the early settlers, and the times of the Regulation and the Revolution. In 1842 he published, in Greensboro, N. C., his "Life of Rev. David Caldwell, D. D." This book consists of but one chapter, three hundred octavo pages long, without table of contents, and with an index of half a page. It is really a mine of valuable historical information, but so undeveloped as to require the toil of the miner, the skill of the assayer and the art of the coiner, to transform his nuggets into popular currency.

At a later date Dr. Caruthers published two more volumes, containing Revolutionary incidents and sketches of character, entitled "The Old North State in 1776." These are well written, racy, entertaining contributions to North Carolina history.

Casey, Hon. Joseph, was born in Ringgold's Manor, Washington county, Md., December 17th, 1811. For several years he pursued a trade, and taught school, eagerly availing himself of every opportunity for acquiring knowledge. After studying law for two years, in the office of the Hon. Charles B. Penrose, at Carlisle, Pa., he was admitted to the Bar at that place, in November, 1838. He then settled at Bloomfield, Perry county. In the Spring of 1845 he removed to New Berlin, Union county, where he at once assumed a leading position at the Bar of that region. In 1818 he was elected to Congress, in the old Thirtieth District of Pennsylvania. He declined renomination in 1850. In Congress, as elsewhere, he was liberal and conservative in his views and votes. In 1855 he removed to Harrisburg, and accepted from Governor Pollock the appointment of Commissioner, under an Act of Assembly, to settle the contest between the State and certain New York and Ohio railroad corporations, known as "The Erie Railroad War." While thus engaged he was appointed Reporter of the Decisions of the Supreme Court, and reported twelve volumes, known as Casey's Reports, which gave general satisfaction, both to Bench and Bar. During all this time he also attended to an increasing and important practice. In May, 1861, he was appointed to the Bench of the United States Court of Claims, and in 1863, upon the reorganization of that Court and the extension of its authority, he was appointed its first Chief Justice. This position he held until December 1st, 1870, when, in consequence of ill health and the demands of private business, he resigned, and resumed the practice of law in Washington, D. C., his practice being extensive and lucrative. The records of the court over which he so long presided are substantial evidence of his high character as a Judge. Judge Casey was an elder of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church in Washington.

Catechisms—The Larger and Shorter. The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States has said, "We believe that no uninspired men have ever been able to exhibit, in as short a compass, safer and sounder views of the doctrines of salvation than are contained in our Larger and Shorter Catechisms." To all who love these precious standards of our Church, and have not access to fuller sources of information respecting them, the following brief sketch of their origin and history will be of interest.

On June 12th, 1613, in the reign of Charles I, an ordinance of Parliament was issued, calling an assembly of divines to meet at Westminster on the first day of the next month. This ordinance originated in a grateful recognition of the blessings of Almighty God upon the nation, and in a conviction that as yet many things remained in the liturgy, discipline and government of the English Church, which necessarily required a further and more thorough reformation than had yet been attained. The names contained in the ordinance amounted to one hundred and fifty-one, namely, Ten Lords and Twenty Commons as lay assessors, and one hundred and twenty-one Divines. Of this list, about twenty-five never appeared at the Assembly, one or two having died about the time it met, and others bearing the displeasure of the King, or having a preference for the prelate system. In order to supply the deficiency thus caused, and also occasional diminution caused by death during the protracted sittings of the Assembly, the Parliament summoned about twenty-one additional members, who were termed the Super-added Divines.

On Saturday, the first day of July, the members of the two Houses of Parliament named in the ordinance, and many of the Divines therein mentioned, with a vast congregation, met in the Abbey Church, Westminster. Dr. Twisse, who had been named in the ordinance as President, preached an elaborate sermon, from the text, "I will not leave you comfortless, I will come to you" (John, xiv, 18). After the sermon all the members present adjourned to Henry VII's Chapel, and the roll of members being called, it appeared that there were sixty-nine clerical members present on that the first day of the Westminster Assembly.

Our limits will only allow us to notice the Scottish ministerial members of this body, so famous for its intellectual force and adherence to truth. Henderson, Gillespie, Rutherford and Bullie, occupied a high and commanding rank in the Scottish Church. The great abilities of these eminent men attracted the attention of the English of all ranks in a very remarkable manner, and recommended the Presbyterian system of church government much more effectually than arguments alone could have done. Nor was this strange. Henderson was a man of uncommon prudence and sagacity, profound judgment, decided eloquence and the most attractive amity of manners. He was one of those gifted men whom the Ruler of all events sends forth, in time of great emergency, to mould the minds of his fellow-men and aid in working out the will of the Most High. He was one of the most distinguished of an age fertile in great men, and, with all due veneration for the names of Knox and Melville, we do them no discredit when we place that of Henderson by their side—the "first three" of the Church of Scotland's worthies. Bullie, though greatly inferior to Henderson in mental powers and somewhat fickle in disposition, arising from a facile temper and constitutional timidity, was one of the most learned men of his time. Rutherford, in addition to his scholarly attainments, was possessed of peculiar heavenly-mindedness. For his fidelity to principle the deadly gripe of the Parliament in his subsequent history, was attempted to be laid on him. Not content with burning his work entitled "Lex Rex," they summoned him to appear before them at Edinburgh, to answer to a charge of high treason. He was at that time lying on his death-bed. "Call them," replied he, "that I have received a summons already to appear before a superior Judge and jury, and I believe to answer my first summons, and ere your day arrive, I will be where few kings and great folks come." Gillespie, though still a very young man, had already proved himself to be endowed with powers and possessed of acquisitions of a very high order. His learning was both extensive and singularly minute; his intellect clear, acute and powerful, qualifying him for eminence in debate, and his high and fervid eloquence was pervaded by that electric energy which is an essential attribute of true genius.

The chief duties of the Assembly of which these men were ornaments were discharged when they had prepared and laid before the Parliament directories of ordination and worship. Its attention was occupied almost entirely by the discussions respecting these, till towards the end of 1644. The Assembly then began to prepare for composing a Confession of Faith and a Catechism, and a committee was appointed to draw up an outline, in regular and systematic order, for its consideration. This committee consisted of Drs. Gouge and Hoyle, and Messrs. Herle, Gataker, Tuckney, Reynolds, Vines and the Scottish ministers.

The committee at first wrought at the work of preparing the Confession and Catechisms simultaneously. "After some progress had been made with both, the Assembly resolved to finish the Confession first, and then to construct the Catechism on its model." They presented in a body the finished Confession to Parliament, December 3d, 1646, when it was recommitted, that the "Assembly should attach their marginal notes, to prove every part of it by Scripture." They finally reported it as finished, with full Scripture proofs of each separate proposition attached, April 29th, 1647.

On the 22d of October, 1647, "the Larger Catechism was ordered to be sent up to both Houses of Parliament, by the prolocutor, attended with the whole Assembly." November 26th, 1647, "the prolocutor informed the Assembly that he had delivered the Short Catechism and message to the House of Commons (25th November) . . . the Short Catechism be printed, as the Larger, and Scriptures affixed to the margins of both the Catechisms." April 14th, 1648, "the prolocutor informed the Assembly he had delivered the Catechisms (to the House of Commons), and was called in and told that they had ordered six hundred copies, with the proofs, to be printed for the use of the Assembly and two Houses." (See Minutes of the Westminster Assembly, Edinburgh, 1871.) After they had been carefully perused by the Parliament an order was issued on the 15th of September, 1648, commanding them to be printed for public use.

After the completion of the Catechism the business of the Assembly was virtually at an end. But the Parliament neither fully approved nor rejected the Assembly's productions, nor yet issued an ordinance for a formal dissolution of that venerable body. Negotiations were still going on with the king, and in one of the papers which passed between His Majesty and the Parliament he signified his willingness to sanction the continuation of Presbyterian Church government for three years, and also that the Assembly should continue to sit and deliberate, His Majesty being allowed to nominate twenty Episcopalian divines to be added to it, for the purpose of having the whole subject of religion again formally debated. To this proposal the Parliament refused to consent, but it probably tended to prevent them from formally dissolving the Assembly, so long as there remained any shadow of hope that a pacific arrangement might be effected with His Majesty.

In the meantime many members of the Assembly, especially those from the country, returned to their own homes and ordinary duties, and those who remained in London were chiefly engaged in the examination of such ministers as presented themselves for ordination or introduction into vacant charges. They continued to maintain their formal existence till the 22d of February, 1649, about three weeks after the king's decapitation, having sat five years, six months and twenty-two days, in which time they had held one thousand, one hundred and sixty-three sessions. They were then changed into a committee for conducting the trial and examination of ministers, and continued to hold meetings for this purpose every Thursday morning, till the 25th of March, 1652, when Oliver Cromwell having forcibly dissolved the Long Parliament, by whose authority the Assembly had been at first called together, that committee also broke up and separated without any formal dissolution and as a matter of necessity.

What the Westminster Assembly did in the formation of a rule of faith and a form of church government, and, as it hoped, for both nations, was ultimately rejected by the English and adopted by the Scotch. The Confession of Faith and Larger and Shorter Catechisms were adopted by the original Synod in North America, A. D. 1729, as the "Confession of Faith of this Church," with the exception of what the Confession contained in respect to the power of civil magistrates concerning religious things, in relation to which point the Synod declared that it did not receive the passages referring to it in the Confession "in any such sense as to suppose the civil magistrate hath a controlling power over Synods with respect to the exercise of their ministerial authority, or power to prosecute any for their religion, or in any sense contrary to the Protestant succession to the throne of Great Britain."

The Synod again, when revising and amending its Standards in 1787, in preparation for the organization of the General Assembly in 1789, "took into consideration the last paragraph of the twentieth chapter of the Westminster Confession of Faith, the third paragraph of the twenty-third chapter, and the first paragraph of the thirty-first chapter, and, having made some alterations, agreed that the said paragraphs as now altered be printed for consideration." As thus altered and amended, this Confession and these Catechisms were adopted as the doctrinal part of the Constitution of the Presbyterian Church in America in 1788, and so stand to this day.

Cater, Richard B., D. D., of the Presbytery of South Carolina, became a member of the Presbytery of South Alabama September 28th, 1837, from which time to the day of his death he was a most active and laborious minister, a man of indomitable energy and untiring perseverance, knowing no abatement, even under the failings of "the outward man." Few men have been more honored of God in the erection of new houses of worship, and the upbuilding of feeble churches. He had a warm heart and a strong hand for every good cause. He finished his earthly warfare in the triumphs of a living faith, November 24th, 1850. Dr. Cater had often been heard to express the wish that he might die with the harness on! And the desire of his heart was granted to him; for the spot of earth on which he stood on Saturday, as a minister of consolation to the mourners around his friend, Rev. Junius B. King's, grave, received, on Monday, his own body, in trust till the resurrection morn. "Lovely and pleasant in their lives, they were not divided in their death."

Cathcart, Dr. Robert, was born November, 1759, near Coleraine, Ireland. He was educated in the College of Glasgow, and after being licensed, preached several years without a fixed charge, till 1790, when he emigrated to the United States. Declining other overtures, he was settled October, 1793, over the united churches of York and Hopewell, Pa., fifteen miles apart, which he served on alternate Sundays. When the infirmities of age told on him, he relinquished the Hopewell Church, commonly known as York Barrens. In 1839 he was forced to resign the York Church also, after a pastoral connection of forty-six years. He died October 19th, 1849, at the advanced age of ninety years.

Dr. Cathcart was an instructive doctrinal preacher, fond of expository preaching as well as lecturing on the Catechism. He was regarded as a well-read theologian, and kept abreast with the knowledge of the times. He was especially remarkable for his clock-work punctuality, whether as trustee of Dickinson College, as member of the Synod of Philadelphia, or in attendance on the General Assembly. He never missed a meeting of the Synod but once, and that was occasioned by sickness. For twenty years he served as one of the clerks of the Assembly.

Although Dr. Cathcart was consulted by other authors, he never gave anything to the press but one sermon, which was a tribute to the memory of his friend Dr. Davidson, of Carlisle.

Cattell, William Cassiday, D. D., LL. D., was born at Salem, N. J., August 30th, 1827. He graduated at New Jersey College in 1844, and studied theology at Princeton Seminary. He was Associate Principal of "Edgehill Academy," at Princeton, N. J., 1853-55, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Newton in 1856. From 1855 to 1860, he was Professor of the Greek and Latin languages in Lafayette College. From 1860 to 1863, he was pastor of the Pine Street Presbyterian Church, Harrisburg, Pa., where his labors were crowned with success, and he was greatly beloved by his congregation. In 1863 he was elected President of Lafayette College, which position he occupied until June, 1883, when impaired health through over-work, obliged him to tender his resignation.

Dr. Cattell rendered distinguished service to Lafayette College. During his administration of twenty years, and mainly by his own exertions, the assets of the College were increased from $40,000 to nearly $900,000, new and commodious buildings were erected, the equipments were made of the highest order and the system of instruction much enlarged and made thoroughly efficient, so that Lafayette now stands among the leading colleges of the country. During this period, besides contributing $10,000 to the construction of McKee Hall, he gave his personal labor for a merely nominal salary, and devoted himself so unselfishly and untiringly to the interests of the Institution that his physicians were compelled to advise absolute rest and freedom from official responsibility. In accepting Dr. Cattell's resignation, to take effect October 23d, 1883, the Board of Trustees yielded to a most painful necessity and against its strongest wishes that an administration so fruitful only of good to the college should be continued as long as its distinguished, honored and beloved President lives.

Dr. Cattell is a superior scholar, an accomplished and affable gentleman, of great energy of character, and an excellent preacher. He has the confidence and regard of his brethren. He received his degree of Doctor of Divinity from Hanover College, Indiana, and New Jersey College, in 1861.

Cavin, Rev. Samuel, a licentiate from Ireland, was sent by Donegal Presbytery, November 16th, 1737, to Conococheague. This congregation then embraced Falling Spring (Chambersburg) and Greencastle, Mercersburg and Welsh Run. It separated into East and West, and Mr. Cavin was installed pastor of the East Side, November 16th, 1739. In the Winter of the next year he visited the settlements on the South Branch of Potomac. The Presbytery of Philadelphia, in May, 1741, at his request, dismissed him from his charge at Falling Spring. He spent some time in the Summer at Antedam (Hagerstown), Marsh Creek, Opequhon, and on the South Branch. In May, 1743, he was called to Goodwill, or Walkkill, New York. The remainder of his life was spent in itinerating in Virginia and the other vacancies. He was an occasional supply of Falling Spring and Conococheague, and was invited, November 6th, 1744, to the "South Side of East Conococheague." Mr. Cavin died November 9th, 1750, aged forty-nine, and lies buried in the graveyard at Silvers Spring.

Central Presbyterian Church, Baltimore, Md. When "Baltimore Town," the future metropolis of Maryland, was founded, in 1730, a number of Presbyterian families, driven thither by a storm of religious persecution, sought refuge in and around it. And in 1760, when its population numbered some three hundred, the First Church was planted. In 1802 the Second Church was organized; in 1822, the Third Church; in 1833, the Fourth Church; in 1835, the Fifth Church; in 1842, the Aisquith Street Church; in 1846, the Broadway Church; in 1847, the Franklin Street Church; in 1852, Westminster Church; in 1853, the Twelfth Church, Madison Street (colored), and the Central; in 1856, the South Church; in 1870, the Dolphin Street Church; in 1871, Brown Memorial Church, and, in 1875, the Lafayette Square Church. Very slowly Presbyterianism advanced, until about the year 1842, when there was a sudden outburst of the spirit of church extension, some eight new churches being planted in quick succession, within the next twelve years.

The Central Church was organized on the 13th of April, 1853, and grew out of a division in the Associate Reformed Church on Fayette street, to which the Rev. Dr. J. M. Duncan so long ministered. After the death of Dr. Duncan, the church called the Rev. Stuart Robinson, of Frankfort, Ky., as a stated supply. Mr. Robinson accepted the call, but finding his position as a Presbyterian minister in an Independent Church in many ways embarrassing, resigned his charge, and eighty-three persons, some seventy of whom were from Fayette street, organized themselves into a Presbyterian Church under him as their pastor. Dr. Baer and John McElderry were elected elders. A commodious hall on Hanover street was procured, for the temporary use of the congregation, and steps were immediately taken for the erection of a church. The lot on the corner of Saratoga and Liberty streets was secured, at a cost of some $24,000, and the church was completed in about two years, at a total cost of some $63,000 for lot, building and furniture. A debt was left upon it of $30,000, $18,000 of which was made permanent. Mr. Robinson was eminently popular, and attracted large and interested congregations, and the new enterprise seemed to be wonderfully successful; but the finances were not in a satisfactory state, and irritating questions having arisen as to the proper policy to be pursued, he was released, at his own request, in 1856, to accept a Professorship in Danville Theological Seminary. In January, 1858, Dr. Thomas E. Peck, for several years pastor of Broadway Church, accepted the call of this congregation. With talents and culture of the highest order, with large experience and extensive acquaintance in the city, he struggled for two years with the old difficulties, and then left to accept a Professorship in Union Theological Seminary, Va. For the same reason, the Rev. Silas G. Dunlap, who was installed as pastor, in May, 1860, resigned the year following.

The Rev. Joseph T. Smith, D. D., then a Professor in Danville Theological Seminary, was next called to the pastorate of this church, and entered upon his duties on the first Sabbath in January, 1862. Here he still remains. Under his ministry the congregation at once entered upon a career of great prosperity. All its services were largely and increasingly attended, and large accessions were made at the successive communions. In 1873 the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States met in the church, and in July following it was destroyed by the great fire which swept over that section of the city. After the fire a public hall was at once secured for the uses of the congregation, and steps taken toward rebuilding. A lot on Eutaw Place was selected for the edifice, and on the 20th of December, 1871, the beautiful and commodious chapel was opened for public worship, and a series of services were held in connection with the opening, of great profit and refreshment. The church building, one of the finest in Baltimore, was dedicated in March, 1879. Recently the amount of thirty-five thousand dollars, necessary to free the church from debt, was subscribed. The roll of membership is large, and the future of the congregation is bright with promise.

The present officers of the church are: Elders—Dr. James McIntire, W. H. Cole, and T. K. Miller; Deacons—A. McElmoyle, R. R. Milliken, H. G. Tyson, Louis Deitch, Wm. Dugdale, and H. Long cope; Trustees—T. Kensett, T. K. Miller, W. H. Cole, J. W. Maxwell, Wm. Dugdale, H. G. Tyson, A. McElmoyle, Wm. Galloway, and A. M. VanArsdale.

Centre Presbytery of Illinois. The Rev. S. C. Baldrige, in his "Life of Stephen Bliss," gives the following interesting account of an "old-time" meeting of this Presbytery:—

"The Presbytery was constituted by the Synod of Indiana, in 1829. It embraced the State. The second 'Fall meeting' was held on Decker's Prairie. The names of the members of Presbytery present were Revs. B. F. Spilman, Shawneetown; John M. Ellis, Julian M. Sturtevant, Theron Baldwin, all of Jacksonville; Solomon Hardy, Greenville; John Mathews, Kaskaskia; Thomas A. Spilman, Hillsboro; John Brick, near Jacksonville; Thomas Lippincott, Edwardsville; John Herrick, Carrollton; Stephen Bliss, Centreville; John McDonald, Benoni Y. Messenger, Cyrus L. Watson, Rev. Artemas Bullard (settled afterwards at St. Louis, as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of that city), corresponding member. Our hard-wrought missionary, B. F. Spilman, was chosen Moderator, and John McDonald, A. M., long pastor of Pleasant Prairie, was the temporary Clerk.

"The meeting was held at Mr. Bliss's residence. During the Summer he had built a new house. The family occupied the L, and the main part of the building was left without partitions, and formed an open hall, eighteen by thirty-six feet, that was filled with temporary seats for this occasion. Here the Presbytery held its sessions. Here the brethren preached the Word, and the people pressed to hear. Curiosity was excited by the appearance of so many strangers. And then everything was favorable. It was lovely, ripe October, the heat of Summer assuaged, the weather superb. To the farmers it was a time of leisure—the long rural holiday that comes after wheat sowing. And so, of course, the meetings were crowded, day and night. The venerable Mr. Lippincott says: 'Our services were not without the divine presence. At times the silence and solemnity were awful.' We may safely infer, from this remark, that the exercises were often very interesting, for the congregations were motley throngs. Wabash Church numbered but twenty-nine, counting every member within a radius of ten miles of the pastor's house. Professing Christians of every name must have made up but a small part of the crowds that filled the house and all the grounds around. The bold and reckless character of the mass of them may be inferred from what has been said of the general state of society. So that when we hear that the 'silence and solemnity of the meetings were sometimes awful,' we conclude, at once, that God gave His blessed truth an able advocacy and a noble hearing.

"But the gem had a wild and rustic setting. Around them, as they looked out of the open windows, was nothing in view but the wide prairie, covered with its enormous Autumn growth of grass and weeds, gay now with brilliant, coarse flowers; the natural pasture for herds of rattle and deer, the lurking-place for hares, foxes, wolves, wildcats, panthers, catamounts and bears. This last named animal was not numerous, but was sometimes met with on the small water-courses and in unfrequented places, and the knowledge of their existence gave a spice of danger to an evening stroll along any of the lonely paths that led through the high grass to the neighboring cabins. Their rest at night was disturbed by the cries of birds and prowling beasts of prey, and in the morning they were roused up betimes by the piping quails, or the wild call of the turkeys and prairie fowls, and the howling wolves in the rank wilderness around them. But they had before them, too, an emblem of the changes and progress of the country that were to be expected in the teeming future. Under the 'aged oaks' yet stood the lowly, primitive cabin, with the 'lean to,' that Mr. Bliss and the sainted May had built for themselves in 1818. This, whitewashed as of old, and fitted up by one of the neatest and most practical housekeepers in the world, was the cosy cubiculum where Mr. Bliss lodged all of his guests. But just a few feet to the west, where the rustling leaves of the oaks threw their shadows on the porch, was the 'new house,' a commodious and substantial frame. The lesson taught by this scene was one that the Presbytery urgently felt. Their present work was one of preparation. If all now was strong, rough, untamed, yet a little while to come and the State would be filled with population, enterprise and wealth. They were sitting at the springs of future greatness, and needed wisdom, grace and zeal for their work.

"The historical interest of this meeting of Presbytery centres around the far-sighted measures then taken to promote the Sabbath-school cause in their field. Sabbath-school Missions in the State of Illinois, their efficiency for good, their necessity; this was the theme around which all the life of the meeting clustered. Much had been attempted under the auspices of the 'American Sunday-school Union,' but a thorough and systematic endeavor to fill the rising State with Sabbath Schools and Sabbath-school libraries and influences, originated in this meeting of the Centre Presbytery of Illinois. There was present, to promote this, a young and gifted minister, in his fervent prime, the Rev. Artemas Bullard. The interesting providence by which this noble spirit was brought among them is thus narrated by the Rev. Thomas Lippincott, himself an actor in the scene. It is valuable as an illustration of that glorious Providence that rules in all things, however trivial they may seem, and makes them to 'work together for good to them that love God.'

"Our course," says he, "from Vandalia through the 'Grand Prairie,' led us to cross the Vincennes and St. Louis road, at Maysville, then little if anything more than a tavern. We, i. e., nearly all the Presbytery from the west side of the State, arrived at the inn just at nightfall, and proceeded to secure lodgings. Whilst attending to our horses it was removed that a minister from Massachusetts, on his way to the west part of the State, had arrived just before us, and was then in the house. I believe something was said with regard to his mission. 'Let us take him with us,' was the spontaneous and universal thought. An interview and explanation resulted in his accompanying us the next day, and then in a cordial understanding that his 'Sunday-school Mission' was recognized as sent of God. We were delighted with him, and I believe the pleasure was mutual.'

"The purpose of Mr. Bullard's mission is stated with so much simplicity by Mr. Bliss, in his 'Report to the Home Missionary Board,' prepared after the rising of Presbytery, that we can do no better than quote from it. We readily see that the presence of this gifted man had 'filled their mouths with laughter, and their tongues with singing.'

"Our sorrow and grief," says Mr. Bliss, referring to their previous discouragement respecting the training of the youth of the country, 'were suddenly turned into joy, hope and high expectation, by propositions made by Mr. Bullard, 'Corresponding Secretary of the Massachusetts Sabbath-School Union,' at our recent meeting of Presbytery. That 'State Union' proposes to take Illinois under its fostering care, as it respects Sabbath-school operations; appropriate funds to establish a general 'depository' of Sabbath-school books for the supply of the State, constantly employ a traveling agent or agents to carry the Sabbath-school system into effect, as far as practicable. What is particularly needed in this country, they propose to enter largely into the 'emigration scheme.' Mr. Bullard is now engaged traversing the State, to ascertain the existing wants as to Sabbath-school teachers. The object is, when those wants are definitely ascertained, to search out and encourage pious lay members of the churches in the older States (male and female) to emigrate to this country and settle down, in their respective occupations, with special reference to Sabbath-school and other benevolent operations.'

"Mr. Bullard laid all this far-seeing scheme open before the Presbytery. He urged them, ministers and laymen, to arouse and bestir themselves. 'How did the presence, the addresses, the conversation of that brother cheer us,' says Mr. Lippincott; 'we thanked God and took courage.' The definite plan, the tangible help, the hopeful spirit of the enthusiastic missionary, were like an inspiration in their counsels. The brethren enlisted anew in the Sabbath-school work. Agents were sent forth, who traversed the State, preaching and lecturing on the godly training of the young, and organizing Sabbath Schools. A mighty impetus was given to this cause, so vital to the well-being of Church and State. 'The East,' says one, 'has more than fulfilled all her promises to the Christian workers in Illinois.'

"But is it not a curious fact that this arousing call to diligence, in this most potent of all missions, should have sounded out over the State from so quiet a work and amidst such humble surroundings? How broad and bright a stream has risen from this lowly fountain! The impetuous current has had many a check, and sometimes has almost ceased to flow; but in this generation we are permitted to behold it rising with a grander tide than ever before. To the devout men—ministers and laymen—who now see the great State filled with Evangelical churches, with their Schools, their Bible, Tract, Temperance and Missionary agencies, every means for maintaining and promoting our Protestant religion, this humble name—Wabash Church—should wear a hallowed charm. There the words of cheer were spoken, the help proffered, the councils formed, and the decisive steps taken, that, in the long years, have led to it all. This is the cool, sequestered source from which arose, amidst the prayers and praises of devout men, in October, 1830, this 'stream that is making glad the City of God.'"

Chamberlain, Jeremiah, D. D., is said to have been solemnly dedicated to the Church by his parents, in his infancy, in accordance with a vow made by his mother. He was born in Adams county, Pa., January, 5th, 1794; graduated at Dickinson College, in 1814; studied theology three years at Princeton, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Carlisle, in 1817. The same year he accepted a commission from the General Assembly's Board of Domestic Missions to travel, as a missionary, in the West and South. As he was on his way down the Ohio river he received a call from the Church at Bedford, Pa., and after accomplishing his mission at Natchez, New Orleans, and Mobile, he returned, in the Summer of 1818, and accepted it. Besides preaching regularly in the Church at Bedford he preached occasionally at Schellsburg, and conducted a flourishing school the whole time he remained there.

In the Winter of 1822-23 he accepted a call to the Presidency of Centre College, at Danville, Ky., and, by a vigorous co-operation of several philanthropic individuals with himself, the Institution, then in an incipient state, was placed upon a firm basis, and the buildings filled with students. He preached regularly during the whole time of his residence in Danville, and in connection with his labors a powerful revival of religion took place in the college, which extended many miles in the country. In the Winter of 1824-25, he resigned the Presidency of Centre College, and removed to Jackson, La., having accepted the same office in a State Institution in that place. This office he resigned in 1828, and opened an academy, for the instruction of youth, in a church

* Mr. Bullard settled afterward, at St. Louis, as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of that city. He was eminent as a preacher and scholar, and was honored with the degree of Doctor of Divinity. While yet in the prime of his strength, honors and usefulness, he was cut down.

edifice which he had erected in the same place at his own expense. He preached regularly while he was connected with the college, and organized a Presbyterian Church, where none had existed before. In 1830 he was elected President of Oakland College, in Clairborne county, Miss., which was established through his influence, and was under the care and control of the Presbytery of Mississippi. Here he accomplished the most important work of his life, and prosperity attended his earnest, self-sacrificing, and persistent efforts, till Oakland College became a noble monument of his untiring zeal and Christian philanthropy. His eminently useful life was terminated by assassination, September 5th, 1850.

The manners of Dr. Chamberlain were courteous and easy. He was a man of more than ordinary intellectual power, and not only of incorruptible integrity, but of distinguished benevolence and public spirit. As a preacher he was clear and logical in the treatment of his subject, and set Christ forward always as the great Sun of the Christian System. In ecclesiastical bodies he was distinguished for his success as a queller of disturbances and a restorer of peace, and as President of a college he was most favorably known and most eminently useful.

Chambers, John, D. D., was born in Stewartstown, Ireland, December 19th, 1797, and was brought by his parents to this country while an infant. He was for a time employed in mercantile life in Baltimore. He prepared for the ministry under the direction of the Rev. John M. Duncan, of that city. In May, 1825, he was installed pastor of the Ninth Associate Reformed Church in Philadelphia. The congregation was then worshipping in a house built on Thirteenth, above Market street. In 1831 they removed to their present noble edifice, at the corner of Broad and Sansom streets. When Mr. Duncan, about this time, renounced the jurisdiction of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, into which the Associate Reformed, with Dr. Mason and others, had been merged, Dr. Chambers followed his example, from sympathy with his teacher. His church was known as the First Independent Church, till October, 1873, when he and his congregation were admitted to a connection with the Presbyterian body. By order of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, the style of the church was changed, in honor of the pastor, to "The Chambers Presbyterian Church."

In a historical sermon preached by Dr. Chambers in May, 1875, at the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of his pastorate, it was stated that he had received three thousand five hundred and eighty-six members into the Church, of whom one thousand two hundred then constituted the actual membership; that between thirty and forty young men had entered the gospel ministry; that he had married two thousand three hundred and twenty-nine couples, and had attended between four and five thousand funerals. He had preached, on an average, three sermons a week, which, for fifty years, would amount to a grand total (allowing necessary deductions) of more than seven thousand sermons.

Dr. Chambers had an extraordinary hold on the young people, and his week-night prayer meetings, with an attendance of three hundred, were a standing wonder. His conspicuous attribute was power. For the sake of that commanding influence which he exerted over the masses, he deliberately sacrificed book learning and minute criticism. Bold and frank in the expression of his opinions, even those who differed with him could not but respect and admire his courage. He fearlessly attacked the crying abuses, vices and errors of the day, and was sometimes threatened with personal violence, on account of his plainness of speech. He scourged the men of Succoth with thorns. Like John Knox, he called a spade a spade. His majestic person, his lionine mien, his clarion voice, his unquestionable sincerity, added weight to the fulminations of the pulpit. All who saw him, all who heard him, bore witness, voluntarily or involuntarily, that "this was a man." Like the prophets of the olden time, he only lived for the salvation of souls, and his sole concern was to preach the preaching that the Lord bade him.

The useful life of Dr. Chambers was brought to a close September 23d, 1875. His death was sincerely and deeply lamented by all classes of society and all denominations of Christians.

Chambers, Rev. Joseph H., was a native of Westmoreland county, Pa. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pennsylvania, in 1835, and studied theology at the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa. After being licensed, by the Presbytery of Redstone, in 1838, he supplied the Church of Sewickley for a few months. Then he became pastor of the Church of Cross Creek, in the Presbytery of Steubenville, where he spent twelve years in the faithful and successful discharge of pastoral duties. His labors were greatly blessed; he won universal esteem and confidence, and his memory is embalmed in the grateful hearts of many. For a considerable time he exercised his ministry in the Second Church of Steubenville, where he had the most favorable esteem of a highly cultivated audience. In the Spring of 1850 he was called to the Church in Wooster, Ohio, and, while only pastor elect, in obedience to the Master's call, "Come up higher," passed away from earth.

Chandler, David, died in Wilmington, Del., January 25th, 1883. He was long known as one of Wilmington's conservative, substantial and deserving citizens. He was an active and efficient business man, and prospered by Providence in his temporal interests. Mr. Chandler's relations to the Church of Christ were no less marked than the other features of his life. He was an honored and useful member of the First Presbyterian Church of Wilmington. Born and bred in its fold, he grew up wholly identified with it. From young manhood he took an active part in all that concerned it. At times in his life the burden of its affairs rested largely upon his shoulders alone. He was a ruling elder many years. Well-nigh all his life he was identified actively with its Sunday School, in faithful, laborious, teaching. In its pecuniary affairs he was a pillar to it. He was a thorough Presbyterian, and took a personal pride in the history and progress of the Presbyterian Church. His end was peace.

Chapman, Robert Hett, Jr., D. D., was born December 26th, 1806; graduated at Union College, N. Y., in 1828; studied law, and was admitted to the Bar, April, 1829, in Talladega, Ala., having for more than ten years an extensive practice. In 1836 he was ordained a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church of that place. October 18th, 1839, he was licensed by the Presbytery of South Alabama to preach the gospel. He was installed the first pastor of the Church at Talladega, and continued in this relation about six years, with a good degree of success. He then had charge, for more than five years, of the Church in Greensboro' Alabama, where his labors were also blessed. After preaching about a year to the churches of Asheville and Hendersonville, N. C., he became the first installed pastor of the former church, and during the eight years of his ministry there the little flock more than quadrupled. For one year he was an evangelist of Mecklenburg Presbytery; and for six years the stated supply of the three mountain churches of Hendersonville, Mills' River, and Davidson's River. He was subsequently Principal of the "Charlotte (N. C.) Institute for Young Ladies."

being at the same time pastor of Caldwell Church, near Charlotte. This was his last charge. Since September, 1883, Dr. Chapman has been entirely helpless, from a severe spinal affection, and awaits the time of his departure with peaceful resignation to his Heavenly Father's will. Though he has never been ambitious of distinction, his life has been one of active and extensive usefulness. He is a good man without guile, believing humbly in the religion which he has striven to teach, and guided by the precepts which he has striven to learn.

Chase, Rev. Benjamin, D. D., who was probably the first licentiate of the Presbytery of Mississippi, was for many years a beloved and valued member of it. He was born at Litchfield, N. H., November 20th, 1789, and graduated at Middlebury College, Vt., in August, 1814. After having labored for a series of years as a missionary in Louisiana, he assumed, in 1828, the charge of the "Carmel Church," in Adams county, ten miles south of Natchez, Miss. In connection with this church, he supplied, at different times, three or four contiguous congregations, including that at Pine Ridge. At this period it was his custom to ride forty miles and to preach three times on the Sabbath. This unsparing devotedness and energy of spirit was characteristic of Dr. Chase throughout his life. In 1830 he enlisted in the work of supplying the destitute regions of the Southwest with the Holy Scriptures. In this work the whole territory of Mississippi, Louisiana, and such parts of Arkansas and Texas as were accessible were visited by him, and furnished with the Word of God. The difficulties and perils of this enterprise were enough to make it heroic.

In 1840 Dr. Chase was attacked by an aggravated, and, as it proved, incurable bronchial affection; but though obliged to relinquish the use of his voice in public preaching, his labors in support of morals and religion continued to be abundant. He was the active and liberal friend of Oakland College, from its inception, and was for a while, after the death of Dr. Chamberlain, its acting President. His labors as a consoler of the afflicted were peculiarly appreciated, and these, with those of the peacemaker, and the helper of the friendless and the destitute, ran parallel with his life. As a preacher, his discourses were made effective, not by any high order of intellect, but by the depth of his convictions and the intensity of his love for the souls of his fellow men. His death occurred October 11th, 1870, and his memory is cherished by those who knew him with gratitude and veneration.

Cheeseman, Lewis, D. D., the son of Calvin Cheeseman, was born in Princetown, New York, October 27th, 1803; studied with some of the Tutors of Union College for about two years; studied divinity under the direction of the Rev. Mr. Whiting, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Bath. He commenced his labors at Angelica, N. Y., and in this missionary field, among the wild woods of the Alleghenies, his mental and physical labors were of the most arduous character. In 1826 he was called to Albion, N. Y., where his labors were bountifully blessed. In 1830 he settled at Byron, N. Y.; a revival ensued, and the little church grew rapidly. Subsequently he accepted a call to an enterprise in Scottsville, N. Y., and in this new field similar results followed. In 1842 he accepted a call to Groveland, N. Y., and there labored with success among an affectionate people. In 1845 he left his pleasant rural charge, and removed to Rochester, where he began his labors in a small frame building in Court street, and prosecuted them faithfully and with success. In 1848, he accepted a call to the Fourth Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, where he labored with his usual zeal for nearly twelve years, taking at once, and maintaining among his brethren in the ministry and all others who knew him, a high position as a scholar, a theologian and an earnest, eloquent and successful defender of "the faith once delivered to the saints." Dr. Cheeseman died December 21st, 1861, after a lingering illness, teaching his family and friends patience under suffering, by example, and both by precept and example pointing their faith to a glorified Saviour.

Cherry Valley Presbyterian Church, in Central New York, is among the oldest of the churches of the Denomination in the country. It came into existence in 1741. In 1738, George Clark, Lieutenant-Governor of the province of New York, granted a patent of 8000 acres of land, covering the site of the town, to four proprietors, one of whom, John Lindsay, a Scotch gentleman, bought out his associates and went to settle upon it. While in New York, preparing for the removal of his family, he formed a friendship with Rev. Samuel Dunlap, a young Presbyterian minister of Irish birth, but educated at Edinburgh, who had traveled over the South, and was arranging for a tour through the North. He persuaded him to join in colonizing the land, and while he went with his family to make their home upon it, Mr. Dunlap went to Londonderry, N. H., to persuade some of the Scotch-Irish, who in 1718 had immigrated there, to accompany him to it. Meanwhile, Mr. Lindsay and his family narrowly escaped starvation. No white inhabitants lived nearer to them than the Scholarie Creek, wheresome Germans made an abode in 1713. Ignorant of the winters of that region, Mr. Lindsay brought on scanty supplies, and at the point of their exhaustion he found himself and his family in impassable snow. Just then a friendly Indian came along, and by repeated visits, on snow-shoes, to the Mohawk, he kept them in stores until the opening Spring raised their blockade. In due time Mr. Dunlap and his party arrived, and distributing themselves about on the farms they selected, they became the fathers of the place, Mr. Lindsay retreating from the rigors of the climate and the roughnesses of pioneer life. A house of worship was a necessity with such people, and one of logs, used also as a school room, was immediately put up, the first, it may be remarked, of a series of five, the second being used likewise as a fort, and the third an erection of the returned fugitives from the world-wide known "massacre," and like themselves, stripped of furniture and totally bare, and the fourth a frame building, sufficiently pretty for a model, and actually performing the graceful and valuable part of spreading a tasteful ecclesiastical architecture. The fifth, now standing, and solid enough for all coming generations, has three varieties of stone in the composition of its walls, an interior finish of solid walnut, and, while plain and substantial, is of both cheerful and dignified air. Its distinction, however, is the fact that it is a gift to the congregation by a female communicant, in recognition of "the connection of her family with the town from its early settlement, and with the church for four generations, and as a memorial to her beloved parents and dear sister."

Composed of eight families, in 1752, by 1765 the colony consisted of forty. The French and Indian wars kept them perpetually exposed to inroads and slaughter, and at the same time trained them to arms. Then followed the Revolutionary struggle. No prophetic pen was needed to foreknow the side the Scotch-Irish of Cherry Valley would take. The Presbyterian tenacity of principles and devotion to liberty, combined with ancestral memories, committed and held them to the cause of the people. They were the sons of those Scotchmen who, at the earnest entreaty of the Stuarts, and with the most solemn promises of religious and civil prerogatives and privileges, went over to the north of Ireland to bring into bearing that then fertile waste, and who, when the tillage was done and rich harvests waved, were so restrained and robbed that many of them fled to this country, preferring the wilds of America, with freedom of conscience and civil liberty, to the culture of the beautiful Green Isle. The tyranny of the British king, so graphically described in our Declaration of Independence, awakened in Cherry Valley the spirit of besieged Londonderry and of the battle of the Boyne, and the signal from Lexington and Concord called every inhabitant to arms. Its church was the place of meeting of a county committee of the patriots, May, 1775, which declared "our fixed attachment and entire approbation of the proceedings of the grand Continental Congress, held at Philadelphia, last Fall; and that we will strictly adhere to and repose our confidence in the wisdom and integrity of the present Continental Congress; and that we will support the same to the extent of our power, and that we will, religiously and inviolably, observe the regulations of that august body." They obeyed the call of General Herkimer to fly to the relief of Fort Stanwix, but being at the eastern extremity of the country, their company could not reach Oriskany in time for the battle. Two of their number, however, a Major and Lieutenant-Colonel, participated in it, the latter of whom led off the field the regiment of Colonel Cox, who was killed. The leading men of the place were engaged in various parts of the land. "No less than thirty-three have turned out for immediate service and the good of their country," the whole population being less than three hundred, was the statement in a petition to the Provincial Congress, asking needful protection. One of the Indian paths, from Windsor, Broome county, to the Mohawk, passed through Cherry Valley, and so kept the inhabitants in apprehension of incursions from them. Early in the Summer of 1776 signs appeared of their coming, and a company of rangers was ordered to the place. Those of the people who had held military commissions, or had passed the age for military service, formed themselves into a military corps, and as scalping parties were prowling about, the farmers went to the fields in squads, some standing guard while others engaged in work. The house of Colonel Samuel Campbell, the largest in the place, and situated on elevated ground, was turned into a fortification, and the people gathered in it, bringing with them the most valuable of their goods, and there they remained during the most of the Summer, and then returned to their homes.

A regular fort was subsequently built by the order of General La Fayette, and manned by a Continental regiment, made up of Eastern soldiers, but little trained in Indian warfare. After the Indian massacre at Wyoming, in July, 1778, warning was given of a contemplated descent on Cherry Valley, but the inexperienced yet brave commander failed to give suitable heed to it, and refused the request of the people to be permitted to take shelter in the fort, or to deposit their valuables there, and he himself quartered outside, at the house of Mr. Robert Wells. On the morning of November 11th the savages swooped down from a hill top, in the evergreens of which they had lain concealed, and struck their talons into the ill-fated community. They consisted largely of the Senecas, then the most ferocious of the Iroquois, and were attended by still more brutal Tories. One party rushed into the house of Mr. Wells and murdered every inmate—Mr. Wells, his mother, wife, four children, brother, sister and three servants—and but one of the family escaped—John Wells, a youth at the time, who had been left the previous Summer with an aunt at Schenectady, to attend a Grammar school there, and who subsequently became one of the most eminent lawyers of the land. A Tory boasted that he had killed Mr. Wells while at prayer. Pursuing his sister Jane to a wood-pile, where she fled for safety, and in spite of her supplications, in his language, which she understood, and in spite of the entreaties of an interceding Tory, a savage, with a single blow of his tomahawk, smote her to death. The commander started for the fort, and refusing to surrender, and snapping a wet pistol at his pursuer, a tomahawk aimed at his head fatally struck it, and the scalping-knife followed. Similar scenes were enacted at other houses, and individual barbarities perpetrated, the thought of which horrifies and sickens the soul. Thirty-two, principally women and children, were slain, with all the horrors that demons could enact, and the terribleness of the scene was intensified by the fierce flames that burnt up every house and outhouse. A few escaped to the Mohawk, but between thirty and forty of the others who survived were carried away prisoners. Divided into small companies, they were placed in charge of different parties, and so commenced their journey for what parts they knew not and could not surmise. The first day Mrs. Cannon, an aged and infirm matron, gave out, and was killed at the side of her daughter, who was driven along with the bloody hatchet bathed in her mother's blood, and to whom three children clung, and in whose arms a fourth, eighteen months old, lay. On the second day the rest of the women and children were sent back, but Mrs. Campbell and Mrs. Moore and their children were taken, between two and three hundred miles, to near the site of the present town of Geneva, and here their children were torn from them and given to different Indians, and scattered through Canada. When recovered, years after, they had forgotten their mothers and their mothers' tongue, and learned the language, habits and tastes of their savage keepers.

The venerable pastor of the church, with one of his daughters, was permitted to live, through the interposition of a Mohawk, but his wife was murdered, and her mangled arm, torn from her body, was tossed into an apple tree, which stood long after as the monument of the fiendish deed. His house was razed to the ground, and his library scattered, and himself carried away as a prisoner. Released in a few days, he made his way to New York, and about a year after sank under his sufferings, and laid down in the grave.

One of his parishioners, having gone into the fields, saw a party of Indians and Tories approaching his house, but did not dare to go back. Secreting himself in the woods until they left, he returned to his house, which had been plundered and set on fire, and there he beheld the corpses of his wife and four children. One of his children, a little girl of ten or twelve years of age, showed signs of life, and while lifting her up he saw another party approach, and had barely time to hide himself beside a log fence, when they entered in, and he saw an infamous Tory lift his hatchet and butcher the child.

A reinforcement came the day after the massacre, but, instead of defending the living, it only remained to them to bury the dead. The inhabitants were exterminated, and their homes were burned up. The little church in the fort survived the otherwise universal ruin for two or three years, and then a party of marauders gave it, too, to the flames.

For seven years the place remained a desolation, and without a human denizen. In 1784-5 the old inhabitants began to return, and soon after a meeting was called to reorganize the society. But no Mr. Dunlap came back. It took till 1790 to erect another house of worship, and that stood in the barest plight, and only now and then, as some passing preacher stopped, did it echo a minister's voice. Mr. Solomon Spaulding, who amused himself by the writing of a fiction which, with no thought of the kind on his part, was adopted as the Mormon Bible, occasionally filled the pulpit, but no regular services were held until Rev. Eliphalet Nott, afterwards the distinguished President of Union College, established them, in 1795. In 1798 he was called to Albany, and the church was again left to casual supplies until 1802, when they were stately enjoyed for a year, and also again in 1806, and still again in 1810, when the Rev. Eli F. Cooley entered on the charge and remained in it for ten years; and, up to 1833, twenty-two pastors and stated supplies have served the church. The Rev. H. U. Swinnerton, PH. D., who is the present pastor, has prepared an "Historical Account" of the church, which is full of interest. It must be added, that frequent showers of the Spirit have fallen upon Cherry Valley, some of them of great copiousness, and that made it a "well watered garden."

Chester, John, D.D., was born at Wetherfield, Conn., in August, 1785. He graduated at Yale College in 1804. He studied theology under the direction of the Rev. Dr. Joseph Lyman, Hatfield, Mass., at which place he was at the same time engaged in teaching. In 1807 he was licensed to preach by the Association of Hartford county, Conn., and after preaching for a short time successively at Marblehead and Springfield, Mass., he was ordained and installed, November 21st, 1810, as pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Hudson, N. Y. Here he was eminently successful. He remained at Hudson, laboring with great acceptance, till his removal to Albany in 1815. From this period till 1828 he devoted himself with untiring assiduity to the best interests of his flock, and indeed to all the temporal and spiritual interests of humanity within his reach. He died January 12th, 1829.

Dr. Chester was Moderator of the General Assembly in 1823. He published several sermons. He was eminently characterized by sincerity as a Christian, and goodness as a man. He was large-hearted and public-spirited. He had few superiors in his day and generation, in the happy combination of the several qualities which, in our country, are best adapted to make a competent and useful minister of the gospel.

Chester, William, D. D., seventh Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Education, was born in Wetherfield, Connecticut, November 20th, 1795; graduated at Union College, New York, in 1815, and studied at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1816-17. He was licensed, it is supposed, by the Presbytery of Albany, in 1818. December, 1819, he was called to the pastorate of the church in Galway, New York. A most remarkable work of grace ensued upon his settlement, and in April, 1820, one hundred and four were added to the church; in the month of June of that year forty-six more were received into the communion of the church. He left Galway in 1822. On September 7th, 1824, he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Hudson, New York. His preaching and pastoral labors among the churches of that entire region were greatly owned of God. This, his last pastorate, was most happily and successfully continued until the Summer of 1832, when, on the 10th of July, at the earnest solicitation of the Board of Education, it was reluctantly dissolved, that he might occupy the States of Virginia and North Carolina as their representative. Dr. Chester thus entered the service of the Board of Education, and for three and thirty years, in the various positions of Agent, General Agent, Associate Secretary and General Agent, and finally as Corresponding Secretary, he labored most successfully throughout the entire Church in this arduous work, until, in the maturity of his days, and with the completion of most of his sagacious plans for the advancement of education, he ceased from his labors, with the harness of office upon him. The records of the Board evince that Dr. Chester co-operated most effectively, both in counsels and in personal efforts, with Dr. John Breckinridge, Dr. McFarland, Dr. Hope, Dr. Van Rensselaer, Dr. Wood, and, indeed, every other officer of the Board, from the days of Breckinridge until his service ended. Among the last educational schemes that enlisted his warm sympathies, in view of the alarming decrease of candidates for the ministry, was the satisfactory establishment of the Cortlandt-Van Rensselaer Memorial Institute, the Ashmun Institute, and the College for the Northwest. He raised more money and means for education in the Presbyterian Church than any of his coadjutors. He died May 23d, 1865, in the seventieth year of his age. He had the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Washington College, Pa.

Chestnut, Rev. Benjamin, came to this country from England; was licensed by the Presbytery of New York in 1749; was ordained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, October 30th, 1751, and settled at Woodbury and Timber Creek, N. J. In May, 1753, he resigned his charge, but for a time continued to supply the congregations. In 1756 he settled as the pastor of Charleston and Providence churches, Pa. In 1765 he visited the South on a missionary tour. At one time he taught a school about twenty miles from Philadelphia. Mr. C. was a laborious and faithful minister; besides his regular duties, he was untiring in fulfilling the appointments of Presbytery.

in missionary work, extending as far as Egg Harbor, N. J. and the adjacent country on the Atlantic coast. He died in 1775.

Chidlaw, Benjamin W., D. D., a descendant of a family of Huguenots who fled from France in 1685, and settled in North Wales, G. B., was born in Bala, July 14th, 1811. Emigrated with his parents to the United States in 1821. His early home was in Radnor, Delaware county, O., a large settlement from Wales. Here, in a log cabin school house, with a Webster's spelling book, for which he paid four pounds of butter, he commenced his education. He was converted in his childhood, and united with the Presbyterian Church of Radnor in 1829. In 1833 he graduated in Miami University, Oxford, O. He studied theology under Drs. K. H. Bishop, William McGuffey and J. W. Scott, at Oxford, and was ordained in May, 1836. In the same year he was installed pastor of a church in Butler county, O. Soon afterwards he entered the missionary service of the American Sunday-school Union in Ohio and Indiana, laboring earnestly and successfully in organizing schools and elevating the system of Bible teaching, and laboring for the conversion of the young, and their culture in the service of Christ.

In 1840 he visited Wales, and his preaching in the Welsh language was wonderfully blessed. In the church at Llanwchillyn, North Wales, over two hundred souls were led to Christ and gathered into its fold. In 1880 he represented the American Sunday-school Union in the Robert Raikes Centennial, in London, G. B., and also preached in many places in his native principality. In his missionary labors he established many Sunday Schools and churches in the Welsh settlements of Ohio, and the more distant West.

Dr. Chidlaw is still at work on the Sunday-school field, active and vigorous for a man of seventy-two years of age. In 1882 he preached eighty-four sermons, delivered one hundred and thirty-one Sunday-school addresses, and traveled 11,500 miles. For twelve years, appointed by the Governor of Ohio, and confirmed by the Senate, he was Commissioner of the Ohio Reform Farm School for Boys, at Lancaster, an important position, for which he was well qualified, and in which his labors of love in behalf of vicious, wayward and criminal boys were always acceptable and useful, in leading many of them from the evil of their way, and to a good, useful life.

In visiting County Poorhouses the condition of pauper children deeply impressed his heart and led him to labor in their behalf. Sunday Schools were established for their benefit, and in many counties "Children's Homes" were built, securing the complete separation of the children from the adult population of those institutions, and providing for them the social, intellectual and religious education needed to prepare them for an early transfer to a good and safe home outside.

On the platform and in the pulpit Dr. Chidlaw's

Welsh fire, clear and ringing voice, and earnest manner, have seldom failed to arouse and hold the attention of his hearers. In the sanctuary or in the grove, addressing adults or children, the gospel, man a sinner and Christ a Saviour was his theme, and his object the conversion of souls to Christ and a true Christian life. He has written several historical fragments and sermons, which have been published and widely circulated, and his contributions to the weekly religious papers have been well received and useful.

Childs, Silas D., was born at Conway, Mass., in 1793. Completing a New England common-school education, he entered upon a clerkship in his native town, but left for Utica, N. Y., in 1816. Here, after being for a time clerk and bookkeeper, he engaged extensively in business. Alive to the public welfare, he attended to the public interests in such stations as Bank and Factory, and Railway Directorships, and as a Trustee of the Female Academy, and the Orphan Asylum, and the Cemetery Association. Upright, faithful, honorable, kind and sympathizing, he was always the modest and quiet, and dignified gentleman, never suffering taint, or the suspicion of it. His sudden death was greatly lamented by the whole community. Among his liberal legacies was that of $30,000 for the Chair in Hamilton College which bears his name. Mrs. Childs breathed her husband's benevolent spirit, and by the addition of $60,000 to his gift, greatly enlarged his project, and added to the facilities of Hamilton College for imparting both a scholarly and practical education; and, not forgetting other objects, she erected, at her own expense, as convenient and beautiful a Chapel for the Utica Cemetery, as accommodates and adorns any similar place in the land.

Childs, Thomas S., D.D., was born in Springfield, Mass., January 19th, 1825; graduated at the University of New York in 1847, and at the Theological Seminary at Princeton, in 1850. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of New York, April 17th, 1850; and ordained and installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Hartford, Conn., June 30th, 1852. On February 7th, 1866, he was installed pastor of the First Congregational Church, Norwalk, Conn. He was elected Professor in Hartford Seminary in 1871; was stated supply at Windsor, 1871-80, and was chosen Professor in Wooster University, Ohio, in 1880, which position he has since resigned. Dr. Childs is a forcible preacher and an interesting writer. He has published several tracts and sermons. In 1857 he contributed to the Princeton Review, "Theology of John Robinson," and in 1863, "The Life of Edward Irving."

Christian, Rev. Levi Hunt, was born at Albany, New York, August 1st, 1817, and graduated at New Jersey College, in 1840. He was Principal of the Academy at Fredericksburg, Va., missionary at Lewinsville and Fairfax, 1845-8; ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Winchester, October 3d, 1846; pastor of Court Street Church, Rochester, N. Y., 1849-50; associate pastor of F. Street Church, Washington, D. C., 1850-51; pastor of the First Church, Camden, N. J., 1851-53; pastor elect at Hamilton, Ohio, 1855; and pastor of the North Church, Philadelphia, Pa., 1855-61. He died at Philadelphia, October 23d, 1864. Mr. Christian was an earnest and exemplary Christian. As a preacher he was able and faithful. He wrote with force, and several of his sermons, excellent in substance and style, were given to the public.

Christian Observer. The conception of the religious newspaper press, as it exists in this country, probably originated with the Rev. John Holt Rice, D. D., the founder of Union Theological Seminary, in Virginia. Impressed with the possibilities of its usefulness and its power, he had earnest conference with the late Dr. Archibald Alexander, of Princeton, who secured the establishment of the Religious Remembrancer, in Philadelphia. Its first number was issued September 4th, 1813, by Rev. John W. Scott. This was probably the first religious newspaper ever published in this country.

The following Spring the Rev. John Andrews started, in Chillicothe, Ohio, a paper modeled after this one, which was afterwards merged into the Presbyterian Banner, of Pittsburg, Pa. One of Dr. Rice's elders, David I. Burr, carried the idea to Boston, and organized there a joint-stock company, which commenced the publication of the Boston Recorder, about 1817, with Sidney E. Morse (who subsequently founded the New York Observer) as its editor.

Dr. J. H. Rice himself started a Presbyterian newspaper in Richmond, Va., in 1822. It was known as the Family Visitor. He conducted it for about five years; but, finding the labor too heavy in connection with his pastoral labor, the Rev. Amasa Converse, then laboring as an evangelist in Nottoway county, Va., took charge of it, in February, 1827, and changed its name to the Southern Religious Telegraph.

When the discussions were pending that resulted in the disruption of the Presbyterian Church, in 1837, the paper labored earnestly to prevent the division, but when it was accomplished, took its stand with the New School—not advocating the peculiar doctrinal views of leaders in the New School party, but earnestly contending for the principles of church government which it believed were violated in the disruption. In 1839 the Philadelphia Observer (the successor of the Religious Remembrancer) was united with the Southern Religious Telegraph, and the united paper, now known as the Christian Observer, with Dr. Converse as its editor, was published in Philadelphia. In consequence of difficulties growing out of the war, the Observer was, in 1861, transferred to Richmond, Va., where it grew steadily in favor with the Southern Presbyterian Church. It contributed its influence to effect the reunion of the Presbyterian Church in the South, in 1864. In 1869 it was united with the Free Christian Commonwealth, of Louisville, and since that time has been published in Louisville, Ky., occupying the position, not of a Synodical paper, but a paper for the whole Southern Presbyterian Church, in which ministers and others, in all parts of the Church, freely interchange views on questions of general interest.

The Christian Observer was edited by Rev. A. Converse, D. D., until his death, at the age of seventy-seven years. His eldest son, Rev. F. Bartlett Converse, became associated with him, as editor, in June, 1858. Rev. Amasa Converse died in December, 1872. At his death, his son, Rev. James B. Converse, joined in the editorial work. The paper, which has attained to a circulation surpassed by very few papers in the Southern States, is now edited and published by two sons of its old editor, Rev. F. B. and Rev. Thomas E. Converse.

Church of the Covenant, New York City. The first religious service which issued in the organization of the Church of the Covenant was held in the chapel of the Home for the Friendless, in Twenty-Ninth street, near Madison avenue, on the last Sunday in November, in 1860. In the Autumn of 1861 the place of meeting was changed to Dodworth's new studio building, on the corner of Fifth avenue and Twenty-sixth street. Here, on the evening of March 21st, 1862, at a meeting of the congregation, of which Dr. Skinner was the Moderator, and Benjamin F. Butler Secretary, eighty-three persons presented certificates of dismission from various churches. Herman Griffin, Gardon Buck, M. D., and Frederick G. Burnham, were then elected and set apart to the office of ruling elder.

At a meeting held on the Sabbath, March 30th, 1862, Rev. Thomas H. Skinner, D. D., presiding, the Rev. George L. Prentiss, D. D., was elected pastor of the new church, and was duly installed by the Fourth Presbytery of New York, on the 11th of May, 1862. The name, "Church of the Covenant," was adopted at a meeting held on Friday, April 4th, 1862. The corner-stone of the present edifice was laid on the 5th of November, 1863, and the chapel was first occupied for worship on the 23d of May, 1861. On the 30th of April, 1865, the church was dedicated, and two years later the parsonage was finished. On the 12th of February, 1873, Dr. Prentiss resigned the pastorate, to accept the Chair of Pastoral Theology, Church Polity, and Missionary Work, in Union Theological Seminary. On Wednesday evening, April 2d, 1873, the Rev. Marvin R. Vincent, D. D., pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Troy, N. Y., was elected to the pastorate, and was installed on Thursday evening, May 8th, 1873. In this relation he still continues.

The most noticeable public incident in the history of the church was the meeting here of the New School General Assembly, in May, 1869, the other Assembly meeting at the same time, in the Brick Church.

Church Mortgages. The following extract from an anniversary sermon of the Rev. S. F. Clark, on this subject, is well worthy of permanent record:—

"But somehow we never hear the last of that same mortgage. It is thought of. It is talked about. It frets and chafes continually the minds of, perhaps, nine men who are called trustees; by which we mean those who attend to the disagreeable and expensive part of the establishment, and who are expected never to speak of their troubles. The mortgage becomes, by and by, the most influential thing about the church. It is but a piece of paper. Not three men in the congregation ever saw it. It is stored away in some dark vault, and has a dozen curious bolts turned on it. It could escape from the dungeons of the Inquisition as easily as from its present place. And yet that same piece of paper becomes the terror of the community. It drinks up, like a sponge, the thoughts, affections and energies of the people. It stands at the church door, like the angel in Balaam's path, and makes the approaching worshipers pass on to some church where there is no mortgage. It builds itself a throne in the sanctuary, and thence looks down with stern eyes, which remind us of the New England tithing-man, who once kept order in the meeting-house. It puts its hands over the plates when missionary collections are taken up, and says, 'Not too much; that quarter's interest falls due next month, and you must have a subscription to raise it.' It reviews the card of benevolent collections, and strikes off what causes it will, that there may not be too many. It forbids enlarging the Sunday-school room, although that swarms with children; and it is opposed to mission schools, because these things are accomplished by that same money which the mortgage must have. This same piece of paper has a wondrous power of transmutation. It transforms itself into a heavy and impalpable mist, and floats off into the pastor's study. It affects his spirits. It clogs his brain. It hinders all his plans of usefulness for the church. It holds him, with inexorable force, on the very borders of a hundred useful projects— forbidding him to cross one of them until the debt is paid. It depreciates him in his own eyes, until it takes half his mental energies to keep his brain in working order. It at length depreciates him every where. And as to the changing of pastoral relations, it makes sport of them; and, like the centurion, says 'to this man, go, and he goeth; and to another, come, and he cometh.' The sacred affections which belong to those relations are no more, in his path, than so much flax before the flame.

"At length the pastor's vacation comes. He goes away to gather ideas and health among the mountains. He climbs the beetling crags, from which he scares the eagle, and then looks off upon God's world, and feels his soul growing larger with every breath. He forgets how long he has been a slave. He is a free man now. But very soon he thinks of his people. It is for them he studies in Nature's school. He looks around for them. He breathes in that mountain air, that he may breathe it out again upon them. He stores his mind, his imagination, his taste, with ideas and illustrations, which he dedicates to them. But see his countenance changing! His eye is less glowing. His heart less swelling. He muses. The great panorama ceases to charm him. The mind has gone in upon itself. It has found some gloomy associations. What are they? Ah, the mortgage is there! It has climbed the mountain with him. It has put its veil over his eyes, dimming the glories of nature. The thought of his dear people was one link in the chain of association; the next, and the next succeeded, and then came the great fact that he would go home only to be a slave again, and crouch beneath the sceptre of that same old mortgage."

Church, Second Presbyterian, Cleveland, O. This Church was organized June 12th, 1841, by the Presbytery of Cleveland, Rev. S. C. Aiken, D. D., officiating. Of the fifty-eight original members, all but five were from the First Presbyterian Church. Their first house of worship was purchased from the Congregational Church. It was a frame building, on the Northwest corner of the park, on the lot West of the County Court House. It was occupied by this church from September, 1844, to July, 1851, when it was sold to the Erie Street Baptist Church, and by them removed to the corner of Erie and Ohio Streets, where it now stands. The Second Church then occupied a new and substantial edifice which they had erected on Superior Street east of the park. To this a chapel was added in 1870. These buildings were destroyed by fire on the morning of the ninth of October, 1876, and for two years the congregation worshiped in public halls, first in the Opera House, afterwards in Case Hall. Meanwhile an eligible site had been secured up town, and a new, elegant stone edifice with chapel adjoining, was erected, which the church occupied for the first time on the twentieth of October, 1878.

Rev. Sherman S. Canfield, D. D., was installed the first pastor September 3d, 1844, and dismissed April 23d, 1854. Rev. James Eells, D. D., was installed January 24th, 1855, and dismissed April 3d, 1860. Rev. Theron H. Hawks, D. D., was installed April 24th, 1861, and dismissed April 7th, 1868. Rev. James Eells, D. D., was again installed December 16th, 1869, and dismissed June 21st, 1873. Rev. Charles S. Pomeroy, D. D., the present pastor, was installed June 22d, 1873.

The church numbers now (1883) more than seven hundred and fifty members, with a large and influential congregation, and is eminent for its unity, zeal and benevolence in all Christian and charitable work. The Woodland avenue Presbyterian Church and the Willson avenue Presbyterian Church are its prosperous offshoots.

Clark, Frederick G., D. D., was born at Waterbury, Conn., December 13th, 1819. He graduated at the New York University in 1842, and at the Union Theological Seminary of New York in 1845. Having preached a year and a half at Greenwich, Conn., he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Astoria, Long Island, N. Y. After six years' labor in this place, he was called to West Twenty-third Street Presbyterian Church, N. Y., where, under his ministry, an imposing house of worship was erected and a vigorous congregation gathered. From 1867 to 1871 he was pastor of the church in Greenwich, in which he commenced his ministry. In 1872 he was installed pastor of the Tompkins Avenue Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., where a substantial congregation soon gathered under his ministry. He is now the esteemed and useful pastor of the Second Street Presbyterian Church, Troy, N. Y.

Dr. Clark is a man of a noble, pious, consistent life, and one whose conversation and deportment are not less fascinating than useful. He is a very acceptable preacher, having nothing sensational in his style, but, on the contrary, leaning to the most rigid models of pulpit propriety. His sermons, which are able expositions of gospel truth, are written with clearness and pointedness, and with much scholarly finish. His gifted and devout mind and clear common sense give him great power as a preacher. Dr. Clark is the author of a memoir, entitled "The Life Work of Mary M. Maynard," and many published sermons. He is also a frequent and popular contributor to religious journals.

Clark, James, D. D., was born in Philadelphia, Pa., March 9th, 1812. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1830, and was ordained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, November 8th, 1837. He has been pastor of the Tennent Church, Freehold, N. J., 1837-9; pastor of Upper and Lower Mt. Bethel, 1839; pastor at Belvidere, N. J., 1840-50; President of Washington College, Pa., 1850-2, and pastor at Lewisburg, Pa., 1852-7. Since resigning the last charge, Dr. Clark has resided in Philadelphia, where he has been usefully engaged in writing occasionally for the religious press, assisting his ministerial brethren, and supplying vacant pulpits, as opportunity has offered. He is a gentleman of polished manners, of great personal dignity, an instructive preacher, a vigorous writer, and eminently conscientious in the discharge of what he regards as duty.

Clark, Rev. John Flavel, was born in Allentown, N. J., 1784. His father was Joseph Clark, D. D., one of the most prominent pastors of the Synod of New Jersey. He graduated from Princeton College, 1807, among the first of his class. He then engaged in teaching, in the State of Georgia. Commenced the study of theology in Andover, 1810. In 1812 he was chosen Tutor in Princeton, which position he held three years, pursuing his theological studies under Dr. Green. June 14th, 1815, he was ordained and installed pastor of Presbyterian Church, Flemington, N. J. His ministry there was very successful. In 1820 this charge was connected with the First Annapolis, and the two churches were under his care until 1836. He then resigned, and became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Paterson, N. J., 1836-42. Thence he went to the Presbyterian Church of Oyster Bay, Long Island, where he remained only a year. He then settled over the Presbyterian Church of Fishkill Village, N. Y., where he died, at the age of sixty-nine, in 1853. He was a kind, unselfish man; an exceedingly agreeable companion, full of talk and wit; an amiable and faithful minister. His person was large and portly, with a beaming countenance.

Clark, Rev. Joseph, was born at Carlisle, Pa., October 11th, 1825. He graduated at Marshall College, then located at Mercersburg, with the highest honors, in 1848; received his theological training at the Western Theological Seminary, and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Carlisle, June 11th, 1851. On the third of June, 1852, he was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Chambersburg, Pa. Here he labored with great acceptance till October 1859, when, in consequence of a disease of the throat, which made public speaking perilous, he resigned the charge, and engaged in secular business, with the hope of restoring his health. Mr. Clark's aim, as a pastor, was to instruct from the pulpit, and by disseminating among the people the publications of the Church; his time was therefore spent in pulpit preparation rather than in social visitations among them. He was very methodical in the distribution of his time, and set apart a large proportion to reading and writing. He was a forcible writer and a bold investigator of truth, and pushed his researches into every province of physical and moral science, as well as into theology. In 1862 he contributed to the Princeton Review an article on "The History and Theory of Revolutions," and in 1863, another article on "The Skepticism of Science," both of which attracted considerable attention at the time of publication. Mr. Clark died June 7th, 1865.

Clark, Joseph, D. D., was born near Elizabethtown, N. J., October 21st, 1751. He was trained to the carpenter's trade, but after he passed his twentieth year he resolved to become a minister of the gospel. He graduated at Princeton College, in 1781, and studied theology under the direction of the Rev. Dr. Woodhull, of Monmouth. He was licensed to preach, April 23d, 1783, by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, supplied the church at Allentown, N. J., for six months, was ordained by the same Presbytery, sine titulo, to the work of the ministry, June 15th, 1784, and was installed pastor of the church at Allentown, in June, 1788. In 1796 he took charge of the congregation in New Brunswick, where he continued till the close of life. By appointment of the General Assembly, in 1798 and 1799, Mr. Clark was agent to collect funds for destitute congregations in different parts of the country, and was very successful in the work. After the burning of the College of New Jersey, in March, 1802, he also made liberal collections to repair the extensive loss. In 1802 he was elected a member of the Corporation of the College of New Jersey, and continued so until his death. He was also, for many successive years, a member of the Committee of Missions, which acted by the appointment and under the direction of the General Assembly. He died, October 19th, 1813. Dr. Clark possessed a mind originally of superior order, and enlarged and accomplished by much reading and study. In the pulpit he was always solemn, dignified and instructive. In debate he had a remarkable talent both to scrutinize and to defeat the arguments and aims of his adversary. In the details of business few men probably have surpassed him. In all his walk through life, with the politeness and affability of the man of literature and the gentleman he mingled that purity of conversation and that savor of devotion which ought ever to characterize a minister of Jesus Christ.

Clark, Robert, the son of William and Margaret Clark, was born near Carlisle, Pa., July 2d, 1771, and there he died January 7th, 1856. He had been ordained a ruling elder in the First Church, in October of 1811, and when the Second Church was organized, in January of 1833, he was elected one of the first three elders. Among many of the ministry and eldership of our Church, as well as a large circle of personal friends, he was well known, and his life and character had secured for him no ordinary measure of esteem and admiration. For more than forty years he had been a ruling elder, and he discharged its functions with a vigor, efficiency and wisdom, which endeared him to all the pastors with whom he labored. His love for the Church was ardent and deep, and her interests always lay near his heart. His character was of the order sublime. He was a large-hearted, noble-minded, Christian man, combining firmness and strength with tenderness and generosity, and serious earnestness with great cheerfulness. His integrity was recognized by all who knew him as of the most sterling and unbending character. He was an admirable type of the men of a former age. His last illness was brief, and his summons sudden; but he was waiting for his Lord; shared largely in His grace, and to him it was permitted to be a beautiful exemplification of the language of the Temanite: "Thou shalt come to thy grave in a full age, like a shock of corn cometh in his season."

Mr. Clark was the honored father of honored children, and a father of whose memory his children and his grandchildren may be justly proud and emulous. Three of his sons became ruling elders in the Presbyterian Church, in as many different places, and one was the scholarly preacher and beloved pastor of the Falling Spring Presbyterian Church, in Chambersburg, Pa. "The memory of the just is blessed."

Clarke, Rev. Albert Brown, the son of John and Mary Clarke, was born in Schellsburg, Pa., July 11th, 1817. He was educated at Dickinson College, and studied theology in the Western Theological Seminary. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Carlisle, in 1841, and supplied the Church of Bedford six months. He then became pastor of the Church of Ligonier, Pa., and established, successfully, a Female Seminary. For nearly a year he acted as Financial Agent for the endowment of Washington College, Pa. Afterwards he took charge of the Church at Altoona, Pa. Here he spent his best days; for the building up and efficiency of this church he devoted his ripe experience and final effort; around it were gathered his last prayers and hopes, and in its order, harmony, strength, and love, he realized the tokens of his Master's presence, and the just reward of a faithful servant. He died July 5th, 1863. Mr. Clarke had a clear and well-balanced mind, a correct judgment, much practical wisdom, unbending integrity, and steadfastness of purpose. He was eminently characterized by self-control, dignity, courtesy and kindness. As a pastor he was ever faithful. As a pulpit speaker he was clear, methodical, Scriptural, earnest and practical. He delighted to "declare the whole counsel of God," and to see his charge grow in numbers, spirituality and efficiency. By the churches and brethren who knew him well, he was honored and beloved.

Clarke, David D., D. D., the son of Samuel and Mary (Dunnean) Clarke, was born near Shippensburg, Pa., in October, 1810. Graduated at Jefferson College, in 1831, and at Princeton Theological Seminary; was licensed by Carlisle Presbytery, in 1837, and was installed pastor of the Church in Schellsburg, Pa., where he was quite successful. He became pastor of Lower Marsh Creek Church, Adams county, Pa., in 1843, where he remained thirteen years. In 1856 he was installed pastor of the churches of Waynesburg and Newton Hamilton, Huntingdon county, Pa., where his labors were much blessed. This relation continued until his death December 30th, 1865. Dr. Clarke was an eminently devoted and conscientious minister of the gospel. His character was strongly marked by humility and dignity. He left a stainless reputation, and a memory of unwonted fragrance, in every congregation he served. The faithfulness and earnestness of his preaching, the point and tenderness of his pastoral counsels, made a deep impression, while his gentleness, firmness, prudence and wisdom in presbyterial and ordinary social relations endeared him to all who knew him.

Clarke, Henry Steele, D. D., was born in Somers, Conn., in 1818. His literary education was begun in Hamilton College, N. Y., and was continued at Yale College, Conn., where he graduated in September, 1841. His first charge was at Willoughby, Ohio. He was installed pastor at Manchester, N. H., September 20th, 1849, and his ministry in that congregation continued until 1852, when he accepted the cordial and unanimous call of the Central Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, where he labored with great zeal and success until his death, January 17th, 1864. Dr. Clarke's abilities as a preacher were always acknowledged to be of a high order. He had a graceful presence, a persuasive manner and exact and careful taste, good judgment, a quick fancy, an acute and discriminating intellect. As a pastor he was no less efficient and successful than as a preacher. He was an accomplished gentleman, an earnest Christian, a faithful friend, and greatly beloved by his brethren and the people of his charge.

Clarke, Hon. Hovey Kilburn, son of Hovey and Sarah (Kilburn) Clarke, was born in Sterling, Mass., July 11th, 1812. His school days were spent mostly in the academies at Utica and Clinton, N. Y., and in Phillips Academy, at Andover, Mass., from 1821 to 1828. From 1816 to 1831 his home was in Utica; then five years in Canandaigua, N. Y., where he studied law. He removed to Michigan in 1836, and was admitted to the Bar in 1839. He was Prosecuting Attorney for Allegan county, Mich., in 1842-43, and for Calhoun county in 1851-52. He was a member of the House of Representatives, for Calhoun county, in 1850. In 1852 he removed to Detroit, and a few years afterward was appointed, by the Governor of Michigan, one of the Commissioners to compile the general statutes of the State. He was also one of the Board of Control of Railroad Land Grants, from 1861 to 1865. In 1867 he was appointed United States Registrar in Bankruptcy for the Eastern District of Michigan. He was first elected an elder in 1837, in the Presbyterian Church at Allegan, Mich. Since that time he has held the office in the Reformed (Dutch) Church in Allegan, in the Presbyterian Church in Marshall, in the Second (now Fort Street) Church, in the Westminster Church, in Detroit. He has been a Commissioner to the General Assembly in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1857; in Rochester, N. Y., in 1860; in Philadelphia in 1861; in Columbus in 1862; in Peoria, Ill., in 1863; in St. Louis in 1866; in Cincinnati in 1867; and in Springfield, Ill., in 1882. He was elected a member of the Board of Domestic Missions in 1860, 1861, and 1868; and of the Board of Publication in 1867, to fill a vacancy, and in 1868. In 1866 he was appointed a member of the Joint Committee on the Reunion of the Presbyterian Church. He was a member of the Board of Directors of the Theological Seminary of the Northwest from 1865 to 1869.

Mr. Clarke deserves to be remembered, both for his character and his usefulness. He is a man of very clear convictions and positive opinions. By his unquestioned ability, unblemished integrity and affectionate nature, he inspires the unqualified respect and affection of his friends, and he is as faithful to them as they are attached to him. Few men in the city where he has long resided have gained so completely the confidence of their fellow citizens.

As a lawyer he is exact and thorough, and exhaustive in all his work. He has been employed in some very important cases. His mental habits are so judicial, that, in the judgment of his professional brethren, he should have been elevated long since, to the bench of one of the highest courts.

He has taken much interest in the ecclesiastical affairs of the Presbyterian Church, both in the lower and the higher judicatures. Very few laymen have been elected so often to the General Assembly. He has been a commissioner to the Assembly eight times, and has been most efficient and useful as a member of important committees. In the Assembly of 1882, he was chairman of the Judicial Committee, a position not often assigned to a layman. He has been greatly interested in "systematic beneficence," and has collated and published some exceedingly valuable statistics, and has written some very able, practical, and convincing articles on the subject. These ecclesiastical services of Mr. Clarke illustrate how much more useful and influential our ruling elders might be, if their office and influence were more frequently recognized.

Mr. Clarke has been very greatly interested in Westminster Church, Detroit, since its foundation, in 1857. In 1882, the quarter centennial of the church was celebrated. Mr. Clarke delivered an Historical address, and on the occasion, received tokens of esteem and affectionate regard from the congregation, which were as gratefully and sincerely given, as they were unusual and unexpected.

Clemens, Rev. William, was born in Wheeling, Virginia, September 13th, 1825. Graduated at Washington College, Pa., with the honors of the Institution, in 1849, studied theology at Princeton, and was licensed and ordained as an evangelist by the Presbytery of Washington, June 14th, 1853. Our Board of Foreign Missions then appointed him to the mission, then recently commenced, at Corisco, on the western coast of Africa, which he reached, December 23d. Here he shrank from no service or self-denial, or exposure of health or life, that duty seemed to demand. In 1857 an attack of malignant African fever so shattered his constitution that a visit to America was deemed necessary to his restoration, and during his sojourn in this country he published, for the use of the mission, the gospel of Matthew and the Shorter Catechism in the Benga language, besides often pleading the cause of the poor heathen in public. In January, 1859, with greatly improved health, he again sailed from New York for his chosen and much loved field of labor, and arrived at Corisco, April 25th. He died, June 24th, 1862, whilst prosecuting, on a voyage, his missionary work, and his corpse was committed to the sea. Mr. Clemens was a practical man, able to turn every executive power to good advantage. He was distinguished by great humility. He was fearless; the course of duty was always in his view a safe course. He was wholly devoted to his work as a missionary, having no other object in view, and he was successful in promoting the great cause. His faith was strong. This was his victory over the world. By faith he walked with God, by faith he served his generation according to the will of God, and then received a conqueror's crown.

Cobb, Rev. Archibald Parritt, was born at Parsippany, Morris county, N. J., November 9th, 1821. He graduated at the College of New Jersey, in 1850, and at Princeton Seminary in 1853. For one and a half years, 1853-55, he was a Tutor in Princeton College. He was licensed by Newark Presbytery, April 20th, 1853, and was ordained an evangelist by the same Presbytery, April 19th, 1854. While a Tutor at Princeton, he served, as stated supply, the Wither- spoon street (colored) Church in that place. Becoming pastor of the South Church, Philadelphia, December 23d, 1855, he labored faithfully at that post until released, October 10th, 1861. He was installed pastor of the Tenment Church, near Frechold, Monmouth county, N. J., August 8th, 1863, and labored there with remarkable assiduity and success for seventeen and a half years, until his death, which occurred February 26th, 1881, and which was marked by perfect submission to the divine will, and the enjoyment of great faith, peace and hope in Christ.

Mr. Cobb was a most godly and useful man. All acknowledged his extraordinary talents, enjoyed his preaching, and admired him as an earnest and devoted minister. He was an indefatigable worker, toiling unceasingly, even when weak in body, and exhibiting an apostolic consecration to the duties of his ministry. His people loved their pastor devotedly.

Cobb, Thomas R. R., was born at Cherry Hill, Jefferson county, Georgia, April 10th, 1823. He graduated at the State University of Georgia, in the class of 1841, foremost among his classmates in the roll of merit. He studied law, and no sooner was he admitted to the Bar, than he attracted the attention of the members of the profession by the breadth and accuracy of his legal knowledge, the resoluteness of his purpose, the thoroughness of his preparation in every case he undertook, and, above all, his fidelity to the ethics of his high vocation. To be a great lawyer, a Christian lawyer, was the height of his aspiration; and to attain this end,—supreme to his ambition among earthly things—his acute instincts taught him to be a man who feared God and wrought righteousness in all his public and private relations. The basis of his reputation was the appreciative opinion of his professional brethren. On no other foundation would he build. On this he did build. And the superstructure, which rose so rapidly within less than twenty years, is the monument that perpetuates his worth in Georgia.

As a member of the Presbyterian Church, he was a man of strong convictions, liberal sympathies, and large views as to Christian energy and enterprise. No interest of the Church escaped his attention; none stopped short of the central warmth in his generous heart, and in all he was the accredited leader, to whom, every one looked without a taint of envy or rivalry. Often, after a day of hard work in the Court-room, he would be found at a village prayer meeting, or in some other ministry of self-sacrificing piety, intent on doing good, intent only on that, and never consulting his own tastes and gratifications in the work that he did for Christ's sake. And into all and each, what a heart of truthful and ardent sympathy went with the blessed assurance that it would have "free course" and be "glorified!" And "glorified" it was in many a glad result.

Outside of the immediate sphere of the Church he was untiringly active in behalf of education and other philanthropic objects. Whether at work on a Digest of the Statutes of the State, or writing essays in behalf of a State System of Education, or proposing a scheme to enlarge the University, or contributing largely of his means to build the "Lucy Cobb Institute," or laboring in revivals, he was the same earnest and energetic worker; cheerful, genial, buoyant, under tasks to which few men are adequate. The force of his temperament seemed well nigh inexhaustible. Such a mass of spontaneity,—semper paratus—we have never known. More than most men who have had the helps of a fine temperament and a happy nature, he had the capacity for versatile and manifold industry with a great-heartedness that made his work its own joy and reward. Only let this be added; Thomas R. R. Cobb was a man of profound domestic nature, and in a Christian home of rare beauty and blessedness, he found the cheer and refreshment he needed for his active and useful life. He died December 13th, 1862.

Coffin, Prof. James Henry, LL. D., was born in Williamsburg, Mass., September 6th, 1806, and, at the age of sixty-six, died, at Easton, Pa., February 6th, 1873. Being early left an orphan he gained an education by his own exertions, and graduated at Amherst College, in 1828. He then established the Fellenberg Academy, at Greenfield, Mass., one of the first manual labor schools organized in this country, and conducted it with success until 1837, when he was appointed Principal of the Ogdensburg Academy, in New York, the late eminent Greek scholar, Professor Tayler Lewis, LL. D., being the Assistant Principal. Here he became interested in science, and commenced the publication of The Meteorological Journal. From 1839 to 1843 he was a member of the Faculty of Williams College, where, besides some publications in geodesy, he wrote a treatise on "Solar and Lunar Eclipses" and "The Moon," and erected the Greylock Observatory on Saddle Mountain. For this observatory he devised the first combined, self-registering instrument to determine the direction, force, velocity and moisture of the winds ever constructed. The last work of his life was to make an improved instrument, for the same purpose, for the National Astronomical Observatory, at Cordova, Buenos Ayres. In 1846 Professor Coffin accepted the Professorship of Mathematics and Astronomy in Lafayette College, in which position he remained until the end of his life, winning much celebrity; but perhaps more widely known for his contributions to the publications of the Smithsonian Institution. In his investigations on the subject of winds and atmospheric changes he was a pioneer. His "Winds of the Globe," in seven hundred and eighty-one pages quarto, and twenty-six plates, is the largest collection of numerical tables ever issued from the American press. He wrote nine other works on mathematics and science.

The merits and learning of Dr. Coffin were not unrecognized. He was a member of the National Academy of Science, and a Vice-President of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, at the sessions of which he frequently read papers announcing discoveries. He was a ruling elder in the Brainerd Church (Easton). He united with the Church at an early age, and lived a sincere and devout Christian. He was fitted for his work as an educator and an investigator by the best gifts of heart and head. A man of clear, strong and candid mind, of scrupulous integrity of character, of conscientious regard for accuracy, and, above all, a lover of truth for its own sake. His monument in the cemetery at Easton bears, as a symbol of his discovery of the law of the winds, a representation of the Western Continent, divided into zones, in each of which groups of arrows show the course of the atmosphere. His life was written by his son-in-law, Rev. John C. Clyde, 370 pages, 1881.

Coffin, Rev. Selden Jennings, Ph. D., was born at Ogdensburg, N. Y., August 3d, 1838, and graduated at Lafayette College in 1858. He studied theology at Princeton. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Lehigh, January 6th, 1874; was Tutor in Lafayette College in 1864-66; Adjunct Professor of Mathematics, 1866-72, and has been Professor in the same institution since 1872. He has a fine reputation as a scholar, especially in the department of Mathematics.

Cogswell, Jonathan, D. D., was born in Rowley, Mass., September 2d, 1782; graduated, in 1806, at Harvard College; pursued his theological studies while Tutor at Bowdoin College, Maine, and, October 24th, 1810, was ordained to the full work of the gospel ministry. He was settled for eighteen years in Saco, where he preached with great fidelity and marked success, until impaired health required a resignation of the pastorate. In April, 1829, he became pastor of the Church in New Britain, Conn., and continued so five years. In 1834 he was elected Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the Theological Institute of Connecticut, at East Windsor. He died August 1st, 1861. Dr. Cogswell's whole life was signally marked by Christian beneficence. As a preacher, he was peculiarly zealous for sound doctrine. Religion was to him a life, and faith an abiding principle. When memory lost the record of other familiar things, Jesus and His love remained deeply graven upon her tablet.

Coit, Rev. J. C., was born in New London, Conn., March 17th, 1799. When about twenty-four years of age he removed from his native State to Cheraw, South Carolina, where he commenced the practice of law, and rapidly rose to eminence in his profession. In 1834 he commenced the study of theology, and in 1837 he was licensed, by Harmony Presbytery, to preach the gospel. Soon after he was elected and ordained pastor of the Cheraw Church. He was the first pastor of this church, all who preceded him having been supplies. His pastorate continued for twenty years consecutively. In 1857 his health suddenly failed, and he never recovered sufficiently to preach. He died in Cheraw, in the Spring of 1863, in the sixty-fourth year of his age.

Mr. Coit's chief excellence, as a preacher, was in the exposition of Scripture. His explanations of Bible truths and doctrines were clear and lucid. He was, indeed, mighty in the Scriptures. His manner in the pulpit was generally sedate, seldom indulging in pathos or flights of fancy. His sermons, for the most part, were characterized by close logical reasoning. In the social relations of life he was one of the most attractive of men, a polished, courteous gentleman. By his agreeable manner and entertaining and instructive conversation he exerted a wide and wholesome influence, even outside of his own church and congregation.

Mr. Coit's zeal for the great schemes of the Presbyterian Church was worthy of all praise. For many years he gave his whole salary to Foreign and Domestic Missions. His example had also a very beneficent effect on his flock; the Cheraw Church became noted, under his pastorate, for its liberal contributions to the beneficent schemes of the Church. He was not, however, so much absorbed with these great schemes, as to forget the poor around him. He was always ready to minister to their temporal as well as their spiritual necessities. His hand was always ready to help the needy.

Cole, William Henry, was born in Oxford, Chenango county, N. Y., in 1820. From 1838 to 1843 he was employed with a corps of civil engineers on the Erie Canal enlargement, at and near Schenectady. About four and a half years were afterwards devoted to farming, near Sterling, Ill. He became a member of the Presbyterian Church of Sterling, at its organization, December 1st, 1844. Removing to Baltimore, Md., in 1847, he united with the Third Presbyterian Church, of which the Rev. Dr. Musgrave was then pastor. For the past fifteen years he has been agent of the Maryland Bible Society, having in that time directed the distribution of nearly 300,000 copies of the Scriptures. He became a Ruling Elder during the Rev. Griffith Owen's pastorate, in 1856. On the dissolution of the Third Church, in 1870, his membership was transferred to the Central Presbyterian Church, in which he had worshiped from 1861. Soon after he was elected and installed a member of the Session, and so continues.

Mr. Cole, from the time he made a profession of faith, has been identified with the Sabbath schools of the churches with which he has been successively connected. He was Treasurer of the Board of Trustees of the Third Church for a number of years, and has held the same position in the Central Church since February, 1876. As Treasurer of the last named church and member of the Building Committee, his services in the erection of the new edifice on Entaw place were invaluable. As an elder, and in all the duties which pertain to his office, he has shown marked devotion. He keeps a private list of all the members of the church and families of the congregation, and is almost as familiar with them as the pastor. His intelligence and experience make him a wise counsellor. He is ready for every good work, abundant in labors, and faithful to his Master.

Coleman, Lyman, S. T. D., was born in Middlefield, Mass., June 14th, 1796. He graduated at Yale College in 1817, and for three succeeding years was Principal of the Latin Grammar School at Hartford, Conn., and subsequently a Tutor at Yale for four years, where he studied theology. In 1828 he became pastor of the Congregational Church in Belchertown, Mass., and held the charge for seven years; afterwards Principal of the Burr Seminary, Vermont, for five years; then Principal of the English Department of Phillips Academy for five years. The years 1842-3 he spent in Germany, in study and in travel, and on his return was made Professor of German in the College of New Jersey. He continued here, and at Amherst, Mass. and Philadelphia, the next fourteen years, in connection with different literary institutions. He again visited Europe in 1856, and extended his travels to the Holy Land, the Desert, and Egypt, and after his return he became Professor of Ancient Languages in Lafayette College, in discharging the duties of which position his earthly labors ceased. Dr. Coleman's principal published works are: 1. "The Antiquities of the Christian Church." 2. "The Apostolical and Primitive Church." 3. "An Historical Geography of the Bible." 4. "Ancient Christianity." 5. "Historical Text-Book and Atlas of Biblical Geography."

Colfelt, Rev. Lawrence Maclay, was born at Reedsville, Mifflin county, Pa., December 23d, 1849. He joined the Church at thirteen years of age, under the pastorate of the Rev. Robert F. Sample, then of Bedford, Pa. He entered the Junior Class in Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa., at the age of seventeen, and graduated, in good standing, in 1869. He was matriculated the same Fall as a student at Princeton Theological Seminary, where he graduated in 1872. Three months before graduation, he was called to the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church in Allentown, New Jersey, and was ordained and settled as pastor, May 9th, 1872. Here he labored two years with great success and continuous revival. He was called to succeed Herrick Johnson, D. D., by the First Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, and in the Spring (March 28th) of 1874 was installed pastor. In this important field, associated with which are so many historic and renowned memories, Mr. Colfelt has since labored with great fidelity and marked success. In the Spring of 1881 the congregation, with entire unanimity, gave him leave of absence for a year and a half, on account of the condition of his health, the pulpit being, in the meantime, supplied mainly by the Rev. F. L. Patton, D. D., LL. D., of the Princeton Theological Seminary. The principal part of this time was spent in foreign travel, and on his return he resumed his regular labors, with renewed health and strength.

Mr. Colfelt is an eloquent and impressive preacher, and quietly, but earnestly and successfully, devoted to his work. He preaches without notes, but with thorough preparation, and presents truth with such fluency, vividness, freshness and force, as have won for him special popularity, and always secure him large and appreciative audiences. He is firm and fearless in his convictions, and shuns not to declare the whole counsel of God. Though a regular attendant of Presbytery, he seldom takes an active part in its proceedings, which is probably attributable to the fact that, by reason of health that is not very vigorous, he finds the demands of his pastoral relation upon his strength sufficient, without any additional service.

Colleges. There were nine colleges in the American Colonies in 1775. Harvard, at Cambridge, Mass., founded in 1638; The College of William and Mary, Williamsburg, Va., 1693; Yale, New Haven, Conn., 1701; The College of New Jersey, Princeton, 1746; Columbia, New York, 1754; University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, 1775; Brown University (originally Rhode Island College), 1764; Dartmouth, New Hampshire, 1769; Rutgers, New Jersey, 1770. Five of these were Congregational and Presbyterian institutions, one was Baptist, one Episcopalian, and two were undenominational.

Collier, Daniel Lewis, was born in Litchfield, Conn., January 19, 1796. He was the son of Thomas Collier, of Boston, a man of fine literary culture and prominent as an editor. He was first an apprentice to the printing business, afterwards a clerk. Starting in his twentieth year for the West, to seek his fortune in what was then a wilderness, he stopped at Steubenville, O., where he studied law, and was admitted to the Bar in August, 1818. He soon rose to eminence in his profession, and secured a large and lucrative practice. Removing to Philadelphia in 1857, he retired from professional life, and devoted his time to works of benevolence and religion. He was a member of the Board of Managers of the House of Refuge, the Blind Asylum, and the Colonization Society, Vice President of the Presbyterian Board of Publication, and a member of its Executive Committee. In the latter years of his life he was a Ruling Elder in the West Spruce Street Church, and frequently appeared in the Presbytery, Synod and General Assembly. Mr. Collier died March 30th, 1869, and left a large circle of friends, both in the Eastern States and the Valley of the Ohio, to cherish his memory as that of a just and able advocate and a kind friend.

Collier, Rev. Francis James, was born at Steubenville, Ohio, July 21st, 1838. He graduated at Jefferson College, in 1858; studied theology at Princeton, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Ohio, April 27th, 1864. He was stated supply at Centre, Pa., in 1863, and pastor, 1864-71. Since 1872, he has been pastor of the Church at Downingtown, Pa. Mr. Collier is somewhat retiring in his disposition, calm in his temperament, and dignified in his bearing. He is an instructive and earnest preacher, a devoted pastor, blessed in his ministry, and beloved by his people. In Presbytery and Synod he is faithful in the discharge of duty.

Collins, Hon. Oristus, was born in Marlboro, Conn., September 23d, 1792. He accompanied his parents, early in life, to Wayne county, Pa., where his early education was obtained. Promise of his future attainment was shown by the rapid progress displayed in his studies. In 1817 he entered, as a student of law, the office of Garrick Mallory, Esq., of Wilkesbarre, Pa. While pursuing his legal studies at this place he confessed Christ, and united with the Congregational, then the only church in Wilkesbarre. He was the first to suggest, and among the most influential in effecting, a change in the church's ecclesiastical organization. In that change Presbyterianism had its introduction into northern Pennsylvania.

In this Church Mr. Collins early became an elder, and has continued such, through all its pastorates, down to the present time. His unswerving loyalty to the Standards of the Church, and to his own convictions of truth and duty; his outspoken sentiments on questions affecting the good or evil of the community; his unbending integrity and unquestioned piety, coupled with great intellectual attainments, were always a tower of strength to the body, and gave great weight to his counsels in the courts. He was an earnest advocate of Temperance, and a plea made by him was the first published Temperance document in that portion of the State.

In 1837 he was called to the Bench, and became Judge of the Courts at Lancaster, Pa. While residing here he was elected an elder in the First Presbyterian Church, and exerted an important influence in every good cause of both Church and State. Along with Hon. Thomas H. Burrowes and Hon. Thaddens Stevens he was privy counsellor to the administration of Governor Joseph Ritner. Though frequently importuned to allow his name to go before the people as a candidate for political preferment, he always modestly declined. Upon the transition of the Judgeship in Pennsylvania from the life tenure to periodic election he returned to Wilkesbarre, Pa., where he resumed the practice of the law, and took rank as a leading attorney of northern Pennsylvania.

In 1874, owing to diminished acuteness of hearing, being then eighty-two years of age, he retired from the courts. The last ten years have been passed in the family of his son, Rev. C. J. Collins, at Rye, N. Y. And now, at the advanced age of ninety-two, he awaits the summons to higher courts and more extended spheres of usefulness. With latest days have come deepening convictions in all those themes of Church and State in which he has stood firm and uncompromising for three-quarters of a century.

Collins, Rev. Charles, the second son of Charles Collins, who was for many years an elder in the Second Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, was born February 1st, 1823. He pursued a regular classical course at the Philadelphia Collegiate Institute. On account of delicate health, he was obliged to visit the West Indies and reside there. Returning to Philadelphia, he engaged in mercantile affairs. After studying theology under Rev. J. F. Berg, D. D., he was licensed, May 29th, 1858, by the Classis of Philadelphia (Reformed Dutch), to preach the gospel. He then established the "Whitefield Mission," and labored there for several years. He subsequently supplied the Second Presbyterian Church of Norristown.

town, the Manayunk Church, and in 1861 he spent some time as an evangelist in Western Pennsylvania. In 1866 he began to supply the Presbyterian Church at Jeffersonville, Pa., and was soon after called to be its pastor, in which relation he still continues, popular with his congregation, and greatly blessed in his labors. Mr. Collins has published several excellent works on the subject of music. He is also the author of many evangelical hymns of much merit. As a preacher he is popular. He is always solemn and impressive in manner, usually extemporizing from a text employed to enforce a particular doctrine, or used as a motto to illustrate some point in morals.

Collisson, Rev. Henry Matthew, is the oldest son of the late Rev. M. A. Collisson, M.A., pastor of Christ Church, Highbury, London, England, an eminent member of the Evangelical and Calvinistic party of the English Church. He united with the Church on profession of faith, at the age of seventeen, in London. He was educated in London, England, and Paris, France, and studied theology at Kings' College, London, under Professor Plumtree, D.D. In 1869 he came to reside in this country, and united with the Presbyterian Church, which he found in accord with his theological convictions. He completed his theological studies in the "Seminary of the Northwest," at Chicago, where he graduated in 1873.

Mr. Collisson was licensed to preach in 1872, by the Presbytery of Chicago. His first charge was Willow Creek Church, in the Presbytery of Freeport, Ill. In 1879 he was installed in the pastorate of Fullerton Avenue Presbyterian Church, close to the Seminary, in Chicago; a church which since its foundation by Dr. Willis Lord, in 1864, has always been closely affiliated with the Seminary. Of this church he still has charge. He is a preacher of ability, faithful as a pastor, blessed in his ministry, and held in high esteem by his brethren.

Colwell, Stephen, Esq., was born in Charlestown, now Wellsburgh, Western Virginia, March 25th, 1800; graduated at Jefferson College in 1818, was admitted to the Bar in his native State in 1820, and pursued his profession closely in a circuit embracing two counties in Virginia, two in Ohio, and two in Pennsylvania, for fifteen years, residing during that time seven years in Ohio, and lastly, for eight years, in the city of Pittsburg. In 1836 he removed to Philadelphia.

In Philadelphia Mr. Colwell engaged in the manufacture of iron, and spent nearly all his leisure hours for thirty years in the study of Political Economy, and in studies connected with it, and in process of that time collected the largest library, perhaps, in the country, upon these topics. He wrote much on this subject, beginning with a pamphlet on the "Removal of Deposits of the United States from the Bank of the United States, by order of the President," in 1834. In 1851 he gave to the public "New Themes for the Protestant Clergy;" in 1852, "Politics for American Christians;" in 1854, "The Position of Christianity in the United States," and in the same year his great work on "The Ways and Means of Commercial Payment." Many of his publications were chiefly directed to passing events, and did good service in their day; the above will be permanently useful. He made a gift of his library to the University of Pennsylvania, in view of a chair of Social Science being created in that Institution. Mr. Colwell was an active member of the Presbyterian Church, and President of the Board of Trustees of the General Assembly.

Comegys, Benjamin B., a member of the Board of Directors of City Trusts, Philadelphia, was born in Dover, Delaware, May 9th, 1819, where the first ten years of his life were spent. The next seven or eight years were passed on his father's farm, going every day two miles to the public school, except when doing such work on the farm as a lad of his age could do. When between seventeen and eighteen years of age he went to Philadelphia, and found employment in the house of O'Brien, Dunbar & Co., where he worked three years. Shortly after this he was employed by the house of Rockhill & Co., at that time one of the oldest and best of the Market street dry goods houses. Here his real business education was acquired. For about six years he was the confidential bookkeeper of this house, holding their power of attorney to sign checks in the banks where their accounts were kept. He also traveled extensively in the West for the house, collecting money and securing debts. Promises of an interest in a firm recently established induced him to leave Rockhill & Co., but not being pleased with his new position, he sought and obtained a situation in the Philadelphia Bank. On the 11th of May, 1848, he entered the bank as assistant to the general bookkeeper and general clerk, at that time the lowest position in the bank, except the janitor. A week later his principal died, and the changes which occurred in consequence put Mr. Comegys into the Cashier's room as the Cashier's clerk, a position he held for more than three years, and gave him advantages through which he prepared himself for the position of Cashier, which became vacant August 28th, 1851, when Mr. Comegys was elected Cashier of the bank. This place he held until 1867, when he was made Vice-President, holding the office of Cashier at the same time, until 1871, when Dr. Chatham was elected Cashier of the bank, and Mr. Comegys continued as Vice-President. In January, 1879, Mr. Comegys was elected President of the bank, a position which he now holds.

Mr. Comegys has been interested in Church work, having been a Sunday-school superintendent and an elder, for a number of years, in the Clinton Street Presbyterian Church. For the last ten years he has been an active Manager of the House of Refuge, having been appointed to represent the City by Mayor Stokley. To this work he has given much time and thought, and is still a member of that Board. He has been a Manager of the American Sunday-school Union for more than twenty-five years; a Director of the Philadelphia Trust Safe Deposit and Insurance Company since its foundation; a Trustee of the Jefferson Medical College, and a Manager of the Western Saving Fund for several years. In January, 1882, he was elected by the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas a Director of the City Trusts, and was Chairman of the Infirmary Committee, and a member of the Committees on Girard Estate within the city, Household of Girard College, Instruction and Library of Girard College, and Property and Administration of Wills Hospital. Mr. Comegys is the author of several valuable works published by the American Sunday-school Union. He is a gentleman of superior business ability, genial manners, sterling worth, eminent Christian activity, and very highly esteemed in the community in which he has so long lived.

Comingo, Henry G., D. D., was, by birth and education, a Kentuckian, born near Harrodsburg, February 26, 1809. He graduated at Centre College, Danville, Ky., in 1832, and was the valedictorian of his class; pursued a regular course of Theological training at Princeton, and in February, 1836, was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick; May 24th, 1837, he was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Steubenville, Ohio, which relation he sustained twenty-five years, until his death; universally beloved and greatly blessed in his labors.

Dr. Comingo, as a man, was distinguished by a rare assemblage of fine qualities. He was amiable in his disposition, accomplished in his attainments, pleasing in his address, open, frank, ingenuous, kind, cordial, cheerful, often facetious, giving life and enjoyment to every circle he entered. As a preacher, he always spoke as under deep conviction of evangelical truth, and from the heart, tenderly, solemnly, and with manifest desire to do good. His social qualities were of a high order, considered either with respect to qualification or usefulness, and they appeared in every class of society, though it was Christian association that brought them into happiest exercise. "He was," says one who knew him long and well, "everywhere and in all things a living Christian, and an earnest minister of the gospel of Jesus Christ. He taught us, by the loveliness and usefulness of his life, how to live, and by the peace, the joy, the triumph of his death, how to die."

Conrad, Rev. Louis L., was born in the Rhine Province, Prussia, June 24th, 1817. His parents emigrated to the United States in 1829, settling near Columbia, Pa. He entered Lafayette College, Easton, Pa. Providential circumstances led him to Charlottesville, Va., where he enjoyed the advantages of the University of Virginia. Afterwards he went to Hampden Sidney College, where he graduated. He entered the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa., in the Fall of 1843, where he completed his theological course. He was licensed and ordained by Allegheny Presbytery, and soon afterward settled as pastor of the churches of Brady's Bend, Scrubgrass and Lawrenceville, Pa. After laboring in that charge for several years, he accepted an agency for the Presbyterian Board of Publication. He then received an invitation to the Church of Mount Vernon, Ohio, but did not remain long. His next call was to the churches of Murraysville and Cross Roads, Pa., in Blairsville Presbytery, of which he was pastor for two years. Then he was called to Manchester, now a part of Allegheny, Pa., where he labored for fifteen years, and where he died, November 11th, 1867. Mr. Conrad was a man of talents, a forcible thinker and a sound theologian. He possessed great openness of character, entire freedom from all disguise. He was a faithful and earnest preacher, not "shunning to declare unto men all the counsel of God." He was a faithful and devoted pastor, a warm and sympathizing friend, and was highly esteemed and very much beloved by all his co-presbyters.

His labors in his different charges were owned of God. In the Church courts his opinion was always received with deference, and allowed that weight which belongs to the judgment of a man of clear intellect and candid, godly spirit. Admonished, by frequent attacks of hemorrhage from the lungs, that he might be suddenly called away, he made death the subject of his daily meditation, and had carefully scanned his preparation to meet it. His end was peace.

JOSEPH R. WILSON, Stated Clerk.

Condit, Rev. Ira, was a native of New Jersey. He was born near Morristown, March 6th, 1772. His early life was that of a farmer. In 1798 he removed to Western Pennsylvania, settling first in Mercer county, and then in Washington county. In 1808 he graduated at the Academy at Canonsburg, and after completing the study of theology under Dr. McMillan and his pastor, Rev. George M. Scott, he was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Ohio, October 15th, 1811. The first year of his labor was spent as a missionary, itinerating amongst the vacant churches and destitute settlements of Washington county. On November 8th, 1814, he was installed pastor of the congregations of Fairfield and Big Sugar Creek, Mercer county. In April, 1827, he accepted a call to the congregation of Georgetown, or Upper Sandy, as it was then called. He was afterwards installed, for a portion of his time, over the congregation of Amity. This charge was relinquished April 23d, 1829. In June of the same year he was installed over the congregation of Cool Spring, for one-third of his time. In this united charge, Fairfield, Georgetown and Cool Spring, he labored until his death, which occurred October 24th, 1836. Mr. Condit has left behind him a name that is like precious ointment, and his memory is dearly cherished by all who knew him. As a preacher he was not eloquent. Nor was he gifted in the art of sermonizing. He was, however, very solemn and impressive in his manner, which gave great weight to his words. On his monument, in the cemetery of Fairfield Church, are the following homely, yet terse, lines:—

"In yonder sacred house I spent my breath,
N'w slumbers here I lie in death.
This sleeping dust shall rise and I yet declare
A dreadful amen to doctrines published there?"

Condit, Rev. Jonathan Bailey, D. D., was born at Hanover, N. J., December 16th, 1808. He graduated at Princeton College in 1827, and the next year entered the Theological Seminary in the same place. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Newark, in 1830. In addition to the pastoral relations he sustained to a Congregational Church at Long Meadow, Mass., and to the Second Presbyterian Church, of Newark, N. J., he was, from October, 1851, to June, 1855, Professor of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral Theology, at Cincinnati, Ohio, and from June, 1855, until January, 1874, Professor in Auburn Theological Seminary, where he taught the same branches of knowledge. In May, 1871, he formally resigned his Professorship in the latter Institution, but, under the title of Emeritus Professor, continued to perform its duties until 1874. In 1861 he was elected Moderator of the General Assembly (New School). His death occurred at Auburn, N. Y., January 1st, 1876, in the sixty-eighth year of his age; and in his final hours his faith and patience were exhibited, to the glory of divine grace. Dr. Condit was a man of the loveliest type of Christian character, reminding one of the disciple John, by his gentleness, sweetness, and serenity of spirit. He was eminently courteous and judicious. As a preacher, he was tender, sympathetic and solemn. As a Professor, he was able, instructive, conservative and safe in his teachings. His death was widely and deeply lamented.

Condit, Robert W., D. D., was born at Stillwater, N. Y., September 17th, 1795, and graduated from the College of New Jersey. Licensed in 1818, he spent a year in horseback travel through Virginia and other parts of the South, preaching as opportunity offered. Returning North, he was settled at Montgomery, Orange county, N. Y., from December 13th, 1820, to April, 1830. He then spent a year principally in recuperating his strength, after which, in April, 1831, he undertook the care of the First Presbyterian Church, Oswego, N. Y., and kept it for nearly forty years, and until his death, February 11th, 1871. His excellence was his power. Courteous and kind, devoted to the Saviour and His cause, sincerely anxious for the welfare of his people, a good counsellor and manager, he stood before the public in the front ranks of the ministry, and was highly esteemed by his congregation. Eschewing display and sensationalism in the pulpit—never dazzling by genius, or striking or straining by intellect, or imposing by learning,—he was so devout and sedate, and dealt so uniformly in the marrow of the gospel, that his preaching was weighty and profitable, and disarmed criticism and opposition. He conscientiously discharged his duties in ecclesiastical bodies, long sat in the Board of Trustees of Hamilton College and Auburn Theological Seminary, and was a corporate member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. His conservative temperament disinclined him to novelties and violence, but positive in his convictions and actions, though never controversial and aggressive, he helped to form a bulwark against new doctrines in theology and new measures in religion, and against destructiveness in reform.

Conkling, Nathanael W., D. D., was born in Coshocton County, Ohio, December 21st, 1835. He graduated at the College of New Jersey, and at the Western Theological Seminary. In 1861 he was ordained and installed as pastor of the Scots Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. This relation continued a year and a half. He then became pastor of the Arch Street Presbyterian Church, in the same city, where he officiated for five years. In both these charges his ministry had a large success. In February, 1868, he was installed pastor of Rutgers Presbyterian Church, New York city. This pastorate, in which the divine blessing attended his labors, he recently resigned, and has not since accepted any other pastoral charge.

Dr. Conkling, in manner, is courteous and agreeable. He has great regard for clerical dignity and propriety. He is a diligent student. His mental perceptions are very clear and comprehensive, and his investigations are always of the most thorough character. He is a popular and profitable preacher, dealing much, and with ability, with the exposition of the doctrines of Scripture, and making a practical application of the duties resulting from them, to the understanding and the heart. He makes the services of the House of God serious and solemnly impressive. He is evidently intent upon winning men to the way of salvation, and makes all personal aims and ends subordinate to this grand result.

Conn, Samuel, D.D., was born at Steubenville, Ohio, March 4th, 1838. In his sixteenth year he entered Washington College, Pa., where he graduated with considerable eclat. After his graduation he spent three years in teaching at Lawrenceville, N. J., then for one year had charge of the Latin Department in Washington College. He pursued his theological studies at Princeton Seminary, where he graduated in 1865. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Sangamon, July 21st, 1867. He was stated supply of the First Presbyterian Church, Decatur, Ill., in 1866, and pastor of it 1867-8; stated supply of the Presbyterian Church in Carrolton, Ohio, 1868-70, and took charge of the First Presbyterian Church, New Albany, Indiana, in July, 1870. In 1878 he accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church, St. Paul, Minn., of which he is still (1883) the pastor. Dr. Conn is an earnest and eloquent preacher. He is clear in the presentation of his theme, and always consecutive in his thoughts, adorning his discourses with attractive imagery, but shunning affectation, and never straining for effect. His themes are various, but never sensational. He is an extensive reader and thorough scholar. In doctrine he is sound and conservative. He is no trimmer, but is inclined to call a "spade a spade." No coward in the expression of his religious convictions, he is jealous ever for the authority and inspiration of Scripture, and the sovereignty of God.

Converse, Amasa, D.D., was born in the township of Lyme, New Hampshire, August 21st, 1795. After teaching for a time, to secure means to obtain a thorough education, he entered Dartmouth College, in September, 1818, and closed his collegiate course, with honor, in 1822. On quitting college he resumed his work as a teacher, at Chelsea, and in the Sanderson Academy, at Ashfield. His theological studies were pursued, in feeble health, mainly at Princeton Seminary, and he was licensed to preach by the Franklin Association of Congregationalists. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Hanover, May 5th, 1826; was missionary in Virginia, 1826-7; editor of the Visitor and Telegraph, Richmond, Va., 1827-1839, and editor of the Christian Observer, at Philadelphia, Pa., 1839-1861; at Richmond, Va., 1861-69, and at Louisville, Ky., 1869-72. He died at Louisville, December 9th, 1872. His last words were: "I shall not want."

The character of Dr. Converse is one upon which the mind dwells with satisfaction. His industry, evinced early in life and continued down to the evening of his days, his perseverance, even in the face of difficulties, his devotion to principle, his mingled moderation and firmness, and his love of knowledge, are qualities worthy of imitation by the young men of our country, who, like him, are beginning life poor. His Christian example was not less admirable. While the gentleness of his manner, his great courtesy, his respect for the feelings of others, gave the idea of a yielding temper, he had in his nature a firmness of purpose equal to any moral pressure that ever was brought to bear upon it. He was eminently a man of faith and prayer, and devotion to duty. In every event he saw the hand of God. Even when most pressed with business, he still found time to visit his closet, and regularly as the morning came round, spent a season there in secret communion with God, before going to the work of the day. He was one of the Church's prominent men, and in his good name and godly example his children have a legacy which is above riches.

Converse, Rev. John Kendrick, was born at Lyme, N. H., June 15th, 1801. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1827; was editor at Richmond, Va., 1828-9; pastor of Congregational Church, Burlington, Vt., 1832-44; President of Burlington Female Seminary, 1845-50; stated supply at Colechester, 1850-55; at Winooski, 1855-61, and in 1868-80, was 188-trict Secretary of the American Colonization Society. He died October 3d, 1870. He was a gentleman of fine literary culture, and filled the measure of his days with usefulness.

Converse, Rev. Francis Bartlett, was born in Richmond, Virginia, June 23d, 1836. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1856. He was stated supply of Christ Church, New Kent county, Va., 1861-2. He was ordained by the Presbytery of East Hanover, October, 1862. He is at present editor of the Christian Observer, etc., and resides at Louisville, Ky. Mr. Converse, being a son of the Rev. Amasa Converse, D.D., whose sketch precedes his own, inherits his father's taste and talent for editorial life. He is a vigorous writer, and by his sound judgment, great energy, and indomitable perseverance, has made the Observer a grand success.

FRANCIS BARTLETT CONVERSE

Cook, Col. Edward, whose name appears the first on the list of elders of Rehoboth Church, Presbytery of Redstone, was one of the distinguished men of his day. He was born near Chambersburg, Pa., January 1st, 1741. In 1768 settled in the Forks of Yough on the farm now owned by his descendants. As early as 1772 the log cabin was superseded by a stone mansion, which still stands and is occupied by a grandson. He was a man largely engaged in public affairs. He presided at a meeting held by the Indians and whites at Pittsburg, June 29th, 1774, was the first sub-lieutenant of Westmoreland county, and on January 5th, 1782, was commissioned lieutenant in place of Col. Alexander Leitch, captured by the Indians. He was a member of the Provincial Conference, which met at Carpenter's Hall, June 18th, 1776, and signed the first Declaration of Independence as issued by that Conference and presented to Congress, June 25th, 1776. He was also a member of the first Constitutional Convention of Pennsylvania. He aided in fixing the boundary of Fayette county, and was one of the commissioners appointed to purchase land and erect a court-house and prison for said county. He was president of the Court of Common Pleas and Quarter Sessions in 1789. His military title was derived from having served as colonel under General Washington. In the troublous times of the insurrection, he came to the front conspicuously as a leader. At all the great meetings of the people he was present and most frequently presided. In zeal for the cause of religion Colonel Cook was scarcely less conspicuous than in civil life. He represented Session in Presbytery four times, from 1786 to 1804, and was appointed commissioner to the First General Assembly, 1789, and twice subsequently. He died November 6th, 1808, and his remains were interred in Rehoboth graveyard.

Cook, Hon. Isaac, was born in Chester county, Pa., November 11th, 1819. In his twenty-third year he left his native place for Washington, Pa., where he began the study of law with the Hon. T. McKennan. In 1844 he went to Palmyra, Mo., where he resumed the study of law, and was admitted to the Bar. In 1846 he came to Dubuque, but as there was little legal business in that city at that time, he engaged in teaching school and mining. In the Spring of 1848, he was persuaded to remove to Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and engaged in the practice of law.

In August, 1851, he was elected to the offices of County Treasurer and Recorder, and removed to Marion. He held these offices till August, 1855. He was appointed by the Governor to fill the unexpired term of the Hon. Wm. Smyth, as District Judge, and entered upon his judicial duties in January, 1857. At the close of this term, he was elected to the same office, but resigned in December, 1858, and removed back to Cedar Rapids, where he resumed the practice of his profession. In 1862 he retired from the practice of law to his farm, near Marion, where he remained until May, 1866, when he was employed as the General Solicitor of the Cedar Rapids and Missouri River, the Sioux City and Pacific, the Iowa Falls and Sioux City Railroad companies, and the several Land companies connected with them, which office he resigned in February, 1874, on account of failing health. It is the testimony of those associated with him at the Bar that, during the last eight years of his practice he delivered many very able arguments before the Supreme Court of the State, and also one before the Supreme Court of the United States, and that the impression made upon both the Bench and Bar is that he was both a great and good man. He was of Quaker parentage, but united with the Congregational Church in Dubuque, and in 1857 he was elected, ordained and installed elder in the First Presbyterian Church in Cedar Rapids, and after his return to Marion, in 1862, he was elected and installed in that office in the Presbyterian Church of that city.

Mr. Cook possessed a literary taste, and was well posted in the standard literature. He was well read in law and an excellent counsellor. He detested shams, and was unostentatious to a fault. He shrank from official responsibility. He had very positive convictions. But perhaps his most distinguishing traits of character were honesty, truthfulness and liberality to the poor. Honesty, that rare jewel in our day, was possessed by him in a very high degree. His public and official obligations were as sacredly discharged as his individual. His truthfulness was so well known that his testimony to any matter of fact, among honest men, was the end of all controversy, and so great was his liberality to the poor that he denied himself and family many of the conveniences of life for their sake.

He died at his late residence, near Marion, August 8th, 1878.

Cooley, Professor Le Roy, an Elder of the Presbyterian Church in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., was born in Point Peninsula, N. Y., October 7th, 1833; graduated at Union College in 1858, and received the honorary degree of Ph. D. from the same college. He was Professor of Mathematics in Fairfield Seminary, N. Y., 1858-59; Professor of Natural Science in Cooperstown, N. Y., 1859-60; and Professor in the New York State Normal School, Albany, N. Y., 1861-74. In 1874 he was elected to the Professorship of Physics and Chemistry in Vassar College, which position he still holds. He is the author of a series of text-books on Physics and Chemistry, and numerous papers on scientific subjects, of a high order. Professor Cooley is a profound and accurate scholar, and ranks with the highest in his profession. His past and present give promise of a brilliant future. He was an elder in the First Presbyterian Church in Albany, 1868-74. With all his attainments, he is singularly modest, but firm and decided as a Christian scientist. Simple in his faith, and unwavering in his attachment to Biblical truth, he is thoroughly loyal to the Lord Jesus Christ—a model Christian student.

Cooper, Jonathan K., was born near Shippensburg, Pa. He passed his earlier studies, to great advantage, under the tuition of his father, who was Principal of Hopewell Academy, and a prince among educators. He graduated in 1835, at Jefferson College, Pa., where he stood high in his class, sharing the second honor, high in the Philo Society, high as a writer particularly, and high in the esteem of his companions. After graduating he spent the first Winter with his father, probably assisting him as a teacher, after which he taught over a year in a private family near Winchester, Va. Then taking a regular course of study in Judge Reed's Law School, at Carlisle, Pa., he was admitted to the Bar in 1839. Soon afterwards he removed to Peoria, Ill., where he entered upon the practice of his profession, which he still continues with success. As a sound, honest, faithful, able counsellor, he is not excelled in the State. Mr. Cooper is an active and efficient elder of the First Presbyterian Church of that place.

Cooper, Rev. Robert, was born in the north of Ireland, in 1732, and at the age of nine accompanied his widowed mother to America. With no little struggling he prepared for college, and graduated at the College of New Jersey, under Dr. Finley, in 1763. He studied theology privately, and was ordained pastor of Middle Spring Congregation, near Shippensburg, Pa., November 21st, 1765. Here he remained thirty-one years. In consequence of declining health he resigned, April 12th, 1797, and died April 5th, 1805, in his seventy-third year.

Although he entered the ministry late (at the age of thirty-three), he proved himself a wise master-builder, skillful in "the orthotomy of truth." Prior to the era of theological seminaries he had a little private Divinity school of his own, to which many young students repaired with profit, as Dr. McKnight, Dr. Joshua Williams, Dr. Francis Herron, etc. As a preacher Dr. Cooper was solid and instructive, without any pretensions to the graces of delivery. He wrote his sermons, but did not use the manuscript in the pulpit. He was unhappily subject to hypochondria, which finally put an end to his public ministrations. It is gratifying to know that this calamity was not permitted to darken his last hours.

His printed writings were a tract on "The Signs of the Times," and a sermon preached before the troops.

Cooper, William H., D. D., was born in Pittstown, Rensselaer county, New York, June 27th, 1808. He graduated at Rutgers College, with honor, in the class of 1830, and was a student for two years in the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Dutch Church, in New Brunswick, N. J. He was installed pastor of the Church at Wampsville, N. Y., November 23d, 1833, where he labored with diligence, faithfulness and spiritual prosperity during a period of twenty-four years, and under his pastoral care the church increased more than tenfold. On the 23d of September, 1856, he became pastor of the congregations of South Haven and Bellport, Long Island, N. Y. There his labors, continued for twenty-three years, were also much blessed. Dr. Cooper died in February, 1880, and a sermon preached at his funeral, by the Rev. Ephraim Whitaker, was published. He was a preacher of more than ordinary excellence. His sermons were marked by clearness, strength, spirituality, tenderness and eloquence. He faithfully fulfilled all the various, manifold, confidential and responsible duties of the pastoral office. No man more largely possessed the confidence and hearty affection of his ministerial brethren, with whom he was most closely associated.

He was at the head of the Presbytery when he ceased from his labors—the longest in ministerial service, and unsurpassed for congeniality of spirit and Christian faithfulness.

Copes, Rev. Joseph, was born October 3d, 1765, in Broad Creek Hundred, Sussex county, Del. When about twenty-six years of age, he became an active and exemplary member of the Presbyterian Church, and in 1795 was chosen and ordained a ruling elder in the Broad Creek Church, at Laurel. About 1804 he decided to enter the ministry, and studied theology under the Rev. James P. Wilson, D. D. When Dr. Wilson, who was pastor of the churches of Lewes, Cool Spring and Indian River, was called to the First Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, Mr. Copes became his immediate successor, and continued at his post until removed by death to the reward of the faithful, April 6th, 1822, a period of fourteen years. He was eminent for his piety, learning, ability and zeal. He was an impressive preacher, and a faithful, skillful, and affectionate pastor. To the young he especially devoted himself. His catechetical instructions, conducted every Sabbath morning by himself, in the church edifice where he was to preach that day, combined with Scriptural recitations to him, afforded the opportunity of manifesting to them the depth of his affection for them personally, and his yearning desire for their salvation. He wielded a strong and permanent influence for good in the sphere of his labors.

Copes, Joseph S., M. D., son of Rev. Joseph Copes and Jenny Wilkins White, was born near Lewes, Del., December 9th, 1811. He was graduated from the Jefferson Medical College of Philadelphia, in March, 1833, and while in college held the position of assistant to the Professor of Chemistry. After a brief residence in Pittsburg, Pa., he settled at Tehula, Holmes county, Miss. He was one of the founders and main supporters of the first Mississippi State Agricultural Society. In 1839 he removed to Jackson, the State capital, where he obtained a large practice. While in Jackson he actively aided in establishing Sharon College, was a director of Oakland College, Inspector of the State Penitentiary, and his zealous efforts, with the assistance of a few scattered Presbyterians, resulted in securing a church membership of over one hundred, and a handsome brick edifice, in the heart of the city.

In 1849 Dr. Copes removed to New Orleans, where he devoted himself to his profession, not only as a general practitioner, but in its associations, hospitals and sanitary enterprises, was a very active and laborious worker. For many years he has given his attention to cotton factorage and underwriting. He was, from his twenty-seventh year, an elder in the Presbyterian Church, and has long been a prominent member of various city, State and national enterprises and associations for educational, commercial, professional and missionary work. He was Vice-President of the Mississippi State Medical Society, President of the School Board, and Administrator of the University of Louisiana, and has for many years been Superintendent of Mission Sunday Schools. Dr. Copes' active and successful life has been largely devoted to the interests of religion and humanity. He excels as a writer and speaker, always ready and choice in his language, easy in manner, and logical in the treatment of his subject. His speeches have ever been sought in the interest of causes he was willing to advocate. He has also been a valuable contributor to medical journals.

JOSEPH S. COPES, M. D.

Corliss, Rev. Albert H., from the Church in Union Village, N. Y., was a student at Auburn Theological Seminary, 1846-8. He was ordained and installed at Western, N. Y., October 3d, 1849. He was pastor at Western till 1852; Marshall, 1852-4; Holland Patent, 1854-70; Lima, 1870-5; Waterville, 1875-82. He died at Cambridge, November 10th, 1883. He was called to that place by the illness of his son, Sheldon Corliss, who died of pneumonia, and during his visit was taken with the same malady and soon passed away. Mr. Corliss was a diligent and faithful minister of Christ. A short time previous to his decease he resided in Utica. He was a member of the Presbytery of Utica. One of his brothers is George Corliss, of Providence, the manufacturer of the "Corliss Engine."

Cortelyou, Rev. Thomas Foster, son of Albert and Chloe (Foster) Cortelyou, was born near Reading, Ohio, August 25th, 1832. He graduated at Miami University, with the first honors of his class, in 1851, and at Danville Theological Seminary, in 1857. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Cincinnati (O. S.), in April, 1856, and ordained and installed pastor of the Church at Williamsburg, in 1857. This relation was dissolved in 1861. In December of the same year he became pastor of the churches of Montgomery and Somerset, in the Presbytery of Cincinnati, and after serving the latter for ten years, resigned the charge of it, and gave his entire time to the Church at Montgomery. During his pastorate at Williamsburg the Church of Monterey was organized, in the former bounds of Williamsburg congregation; and during the pastorate at Montgomery the Church of Madeira was organized in the same way.

Mr. Coulter's brethren, on various occasions during the last twenty-two years, have, by their repeated elections, declared him pre-eminently fitted to fill the office of clerk in ecclesiastical bodies. His clear, distinct, ringing voice, his obliging, courteous manner, his knowledge of ecclesiastical law, and his orderly methods, all unite to make him remarkably efficient and successful in this work. His hands are full of labor and God is owning and blessing it. In addition to all his extra work in Synod and Presbytery, he writes frequently for the religious press, and has had some occasional discourses printed. For ten consecutive years he has been an officer of the Presbyterial Sabbath-school Association. He has also been very active in Home Missionary work in the bounds of the Presbytery.

Coulter, David, D. D., was born November 8th, 1808, on a farm about ten miles East of Georgetown, Sussex county, Delaware. He graduated at Lafayette College in 1838, and at Princeton Seminary in 1841, and was licensed to preach by Newton Presbytery, April 28th, 1841. For about two years, 1841-43, he preached as stated supply, most usefully, and with large and blessed results, to Anxvasse Church, Mo. He was installed by Missouri Presbytery, July, 1843, pastor of the churches of Rochefort and Fayette, where he labored zealously and usefully until August 18th, 1848. He labored as stated supply for the churches at Round Prairie and Millersburg, in the same Presbytery (Missouri), from 1848 to 1853; became pastor of Round Prairie Church, December 10th, 1853, and continued so until April 3d, 1856, after which he was installed, April 22d, 1856, pastor of Hopewell Church in Lafayette Presbytery, in which church he toiled for eleven years, faithfully and earnestly, until he was released, April 20th, 1867. At the same time he served the Prairie Church, as stated supply, from 1856 to 1867. After preaching at Columbia, Mo., a little over a year, he served as stated supply the churches of Liberty and Bethel, Mo., from 1868 to 1871. Amid the infirmities of advanced age, he loved and tried to preach, even to the last. He died, August 20th, 1878. His last words were, "I know whom I have believed." "I am wrapped in the righteousness of Christ."

As a preacher, Dr. Coulter was sound in doctrine, a full believer in the Pauline doctrines of grace. He was also eminently practical, earnest and tender. He was a faithful workman, and his labors were crowned with more than ordinary success.

Coulter, Rev. John, the son of John and Abigail (Parshall) Coulter, was born near Sunbury, Pa., June 26th, 1784. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1819; studied theology with Dr. John McMillan, and was licensed by Ohio Presbytery. He died December 6th, 1867, in the eighty-fourth year of his age. He was the first man ordained by the Presbytery of Allegheny. This Presbytery, in the record of his death, said, "He was ordained, A. D., 1823, and installed over the churches of Butler, Concord and Muddy Creek. In the year 1833 he was, at his own request, released from the Church of Butler and devoted his labors to the other two churches. In the Church of Concord his pastoral labors extended through a period of forty-one years. Father Coulter's earnest labors, his noble Christian character, his unswerving integrity, his great kindness of heart, his eminent purity of life, and consequently his very extensive usefulness, made his death a public calamity. The promotion of religion in the very centre of this Presbytery, in the bounds of what are now the congregations of Butler, Concord, Muddy Creek, North Butler, Summit, Sunbury, Pleasant Valley, New Salem, and parts of other churches in our bounds, is owing, under God, greatly to his faithful and arduous labors. The symmetry of his character was such that one hardly knows whether to admire most his punctuality, his sound judgment, his generosity and his kindness, his fervent piety, or his conscientious discharge of duty, all of which went to make up a character of rare excellence."

Cowan, Rev. John F., the son of Adam and Elizabeth Cowan, was born in Chester county, Pa., May 8th, 1801; graduated in Jefferson College in 1824; studied Theology in Princeton Seminary, where he graduated in 1828, and was licensed by Lancaster Presbytery, Pa., in December, 1829. Commencing his labors in Missouri, he was ordained by Missouri Presbytery in 1830, over the churches of Apple Creek and Brazeau, Mo. In 1833, the Church of Cape Girardeau was added to his charge. Here he labored faithfully until 1839, when he became pastor of the churches at Potosi and Belleview, in Washington county, Mo.; here he labored faithfully and successfully until 1852; for a year he was without any pastoral charge, but acted as agent. In 1853 he became stated supply for the Church at Washington, Mo., and became a member of St. Louis Presbytery; this arrangement lasted until 1856, when he took charge of the Church at Carondelet. His death occurred September 29th, 1862. Mr. Cowan was respected by all who knew him—loved by those who knew him best. He was an eminently pure-minded man; single-hearted Christian, and laborious minister of the gospel. His life evinced his firm faith in the inspired declaration, "he that winneth souls is wise." An early pioneer in the State of Missouri, he was honored by God with many souls as seals of his ministry, and was instrumental in founding and strengthening a number of churches.

Cowan, Edward P., D. D., pastor of Third Presbyterian Church, Pittsburg, Pa., the fifth child and fourth son of Rev. John F. Cowan, was born at Potosi, Missouri, in 1840. He graduated at Westminster College in 1860, and from the Princeton Theological Seminary in 1861. He preached in one of his father's former charges, at Washington, Mo., from 1864 to 1867, and subsequently, a year at St. Joseph, Mo., and a year and a half in St. Louis. He was called to the Market Square Presbyterian Church, Germantown, Philadelphia, where he remained twelve years and a half, greatly strengthening and extending the usefulness of his church, to whose interests he devoted himself entirely. In the Fall of 1882 he received a unanimous call to the Third Church, Pittsburg, Pa., and entered upon his work in his new and greatly extended field of labor, encouraged by the hearty support of this strong, influential and historical church. During the one year of his pastorate his labors have been greatly blessed, and the church strengthened by the addition of seventy-five new members. Dr. Cowan is an earnest, direct and impressive preacher, a faithful pastor, and always stands ready for every good work.

Cox, Samuel Hanson, D. D., LL. D., was born at Leesville, N. J., August 25th, 1794, and was of Quaker extraction, on his father's side. After he had commenced studying law, he came to the conclusion that God had called him to the work of the ministry, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New York, October, 1816, and ordained by the same body, July 1st, 1817. In 1818 he was enrolled among the honorary graduates of the College of New Jersey. In 1820 he became pastor of the Laight Street Presbyterian Church in the city of New York, a charge which he held for thirteen years. In 1834 he removed to Auburn, N. Y., and during the next two years was Professor of Sacred Rhetoric in the Seminary. In 1837 he accepted a call to the First Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., of which he continued to be pastor till 1854, when he was obliged, by loss of voice, to desist from public speaking. Subsequently he was President of the Ingham University for several years. For a short time before his death he lived in retirement in New York city.

In 1823 the degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by Williams College, and in a communication to the New York Observer he ridiculed the honor, facetiously denominating its symbols "semi-lunar fardels." This epithet obtained a world-wide celebrity; but the Doctor, except by an occasional hucresca referens at the mention of the name, bore the honor thrust upon him mockly, and the additional one of LL. D. from Marquette College, in 1855, and Columbia College, in 1863. Dr. Cox presided as Moderator of the New School General Assembly, in 1846. He was a successful preacher, and an able writer. In addition to several interesting volumes he published numerous pamphlets and sermons. He was one of the originators of the New York Observer, and a valuable contributor.

Coyle, Rev. Robert F., was born in the county of Northumberland, Province of Ontario (Dominion of Canada), July 28th, 1850. He graduated from Wabash College, Ind., in the class of 1877, and filled the position of Tutor in the same Institution for one year. He studied theology at Auburn Seminary; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Crawfordsville, April 12th, 1879; was ordained by the Presbytery of Fort Dodge, Iowa, October 1st, 1879, and was installed pastor over the Church of Fort Dodge, in October, 1881. Here his labors have been signally blessed. Mr. Coyle's sermons bear the mark of scholarly preparation, yet he preaches without manuscript. His presentation of truth is doubly powerful, because along with eloquent, aggressive, logical argument, there is ever manifest the deep pathos and tender love and interest of the speaker. He preaches from the heart as well as from the intellect. He has the strong attachment of his people.

Craig, Rev. John, was born in Ireland, September 21st, 1710, but educated in America. He was licensed by Donegal Presbytery, August 30th, 1738, and was sent to Deer Creek (now Churchville, Md.), and to West Conococheague. He spent the Summer in those places, and Conewago and Opequhon. West Conococheague called him, in the Fall of 1739, but he declined a settlement in that charge. Mr. Craig was sent, at the close of 1739, to Opequhon, Irish Tract, and other places in Western Virginia. He was "the commencer of the Presbyterian service in Augusta." He gathered two congregations in the south part of the Manor, now Augusta county, and in April, 1740, received a call from the congregation of Augusta and Tinkling Spring, where he was ordained and installed, September 3d, 1740. He resigned the charge of Tinkling Spring, in November, 1754, but remained pastor of Augusta till his death, April 21st, 1774. Mr. Craig was a man mighty in the Scriptures, "in perils oft, in labors abundant," for the gospel. Those who knew him held his memory in the highest veneration.

Craig, John Newton, D. D., son of George Evans and Matilda Guthrie Craig, was born in Rockingham county, Va., May 11th, 1831. Though born in Rockingham county, his family, on both sides, have been for more than a century identified with Augusta county, Va. In his boyhood he had for several years a business training. Having graduated at Washington College (now Washington and Lee University) in Va., he was for one year Principal of a male academy at Baxter Brook, Va. His studies were then pursued for two years in the University of Va., for two years in Union Theological Seminary, Va., and for one year in the Theological Seminary in Columbia, S. C. Leaving the Seminary in 1869, he became pastor of the churches of Lancaster C. H., Waxhaw and Douglass, an intelligent and influential charge in Lancaster county, S. C., and continued there, with the exception of a brief interval of absence on duty, until called to the pastorate of the Church at Holly Springs, Mississippi, in 1870. From that pastorate he was unanimously elected by the Southern General Assembly, in session at Lexington, Ky., in 1883, to be its Secretary of Home Missions.

As a preacher, his controlling thought has been to teach the truth, and this he does with directness and power. As a pastor, his genial manner and sympathetic nature endeared him, not only to the congregation, but to the community, daily widening and strengthening an influence extending to all classes of the people. He enters upon his new field of labor in the prime of life, in robust health, and in command of that zeal and industry which should surely work to the extension of "the kingdom."

Craig, Willis Green, D. D., son of William Craig, M. D., who had served as a Surgeon in the U. S.

WILLIS GREEN CRAIG, D. D.

Army in the war of 1812, was born on his father's plantation, near Danville, Kentucky, September 21th, 1834. While yet a mere lad, he entered Centre College, at Danville, Kentucky, and was graduated in June, 1851, three months before he was seventeen. For the next seven years he was associated with his brother in the management of a large plantation. In the Fall of 1858 he entered Danville Theological Seminary, where he enjoyed the instructions of Drs. Breckinridge and Humphrey. He was licensed in the Spring of 1861, and commenced his ministerial labors in Keokuk, Iowa, April 1st, 1862, with the First Westminster Presbyterian Church, as pastor of which he was ordained and installed the following November. His pastorate at Kookuk extended over a term of twenty years, and was eminently prosperous. His church grew and flourished, and enjoyed many precious seasons of revival.

After the union of the Old School and New School Denominations in 1850, the New School Church of Kookuk united bodily with Dr. Craig's Church, without the change of pastor, and thereby deemed necessary, in its opinions, and its members soon became as warmly attached to him as the others. A commodious parsonage was built in the early part of his ministry, and soon after the union of the two congregations a new church was erected, a large and handsome stone structure, in the Gothic style of architecture. Dr. Craig exerted a wide influence, in the cause of religion and education in Iowa, and took an active part in laying the foundations of society in that young and growing State. He was especially active in the founding of Parsons College, at Fort-stead, Iowa, of whose Board of Trustees he is still (1884) President. He also gave much labor to the interests of the Theological Seminary of the Northwest, of which he was a director, and lent important aid in piloting that Institution through the financial difficulties consequent upon the Chicago fire and the panic of 1873.

In 1881 Dr. Craig was elected to the Chair of Biblical and Ecclesiastical History in the Seminary. His congregation at Kookuk strenuously resister his removal from them, and his Presbytery, unwilling to part with one whose influence was so potent for good throughout the State, declined to release him. The following year, however, upon the renewed and urgent application of the friends of the Seminary, his congregation and Presbytery consented to his transfer to the Professor's Chair. He entered upon the duties of his Professorship in September, 1882.

Craighhead Rev. Alexander, was probably the son of the Rev. Dennis Craighhead. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Donegal, October 8th, 1744, and was sent to Middlebury, and, after a short time, being the first to whom that duty was assigned. He was installed pastor of Middlebury in October, November, 18th, 1746. A vigorous proponent of the cause of the unimpaired Whiteman, who in Chamberlain's day had made the woods ring as the trees were felled for peace. He obtained possession of the land from the colonial government, which had been reserved for the Indians, and which involved a long and costly litigation.

Mr. Craighhead was the first settler on the Ward-Crofton township, and was the first to erect a Village in 1746. A large tract of land was given to the new land marks by the Government, and he made a claim. About half a century ago the land was abandoned and his people removed. He had a church, but it was equipped to meet only a few of the congregation. He founded New Castle, Pa., and was the first to settle there. On Braddock's defeat at Fort Mifflin, he fled to the frontier, and a portion settled in North Carolina. Mr. Craighhead met with Hanover Presbytery, September 2d, 1767, and in January was sent to Rocky River in North Carolina, and to other vacancies. He was called, in April, to Rocky River, and Mr. Richardson, on his way to labor among the Cherokees, was directed to install him. He died in March, 1766, leaving behind him the affectionate remembrance of his faithful, diligent and useful labors.

Craighhead, James Geddes, D. D., was born in the county of Caruso, Pa., in March, 1823, studied at Dickinson College, Pa., and graduated at Delaware College in 1844. He graduated at the Union Theological Seminary, New York city, in 1847, and was licensed by the Fourth Presbytery of New York, in April, 1847. In the Fall of that year he became a Home Missionary in Wisconsin, and was stated supply of the Church in the city of Watertown, Wis., 1849. His health failing, he returned east, and was pastor of the Presbytery in Church at Northumberland, Pa., 1850-1. Subsequently, he was editor of the New York Evangelist, 1856-70, traveled for health in foreign countries, 1859-66, was Secretary of the Presbyterian Historical Society, 1876-8, and now is Professor of Systematic Theology, New Testament Greek, and Dean of the Theological Department of Howard University, Washington, D. C. Dr. Craighhead was faithful as a pastor, and very successful as editor. He fills his present important position very acceptably. He is a gentleman of ability, of great force of character, and ready to help any good cause. He is the author of several excellent and popular volumes.

Craighhead Rev. John was born near Carlisle, Pa., in 1742. He graduated at the College of New Jersey, in 1763, studied theology with Dr. Robert Smith, at Princeton, received ordination from Donegal Presbytery, about 1767, and was installed as pastor of Rocky Spring Church, near Chambersburg, Pa., April 13th, 1768, continuing to be so until 1798. He died April 29th, 1799.

The old church of Rocky Spring is still extant. Though somewhat altered, it retains substantially the primitive features. The vesels are paved with brick, the pews are straight backed and of unpainted oak, the narrow pulpit, with its sounding-board, is painted light blue, the readers' bench a tuck slide of wood, the communion table is supported from London, and brick with age. Two ten plate stoves of the most primitive form warmed the house, the stove pipes ascended to the chimney on the ceiling into the gable, where they were capped without any chimney to be seen above the roof. The side door is still shown, where Mr. Craighhead and his congregation were on their knees, and so stirred up the patriots to be seen, and they organized themselves into a regiment, and with the Revolutionary War, with their pikes, bayonets, and chaplains.

Mr. Craighead was a humorist. One day, going into battle in New Jersey with his friend and classmate, the Rev. Robert Cooper, a cannon ball struck a tree near him, a splinter of which nearly knocked him down. "God bless me!" exclaimed Mr. Cooper, "you were nearly knocked to staves." "Oh, yes," was his reply, "and, though you are a cooper, you could not have set me up."

Craighead, Rev. Thomas, was born in Scotland, and studied medicine there, but soon became a preacher, and was settled for ten or twelve years in Ireland. His name occurs first, in this country, in 1715, among the ministers of New England. Mather, in entreating the people at Freetown, about forty miles south of Boston, to encourage Mr. Craighead in his work, describes him as "a man of singular piety, meekness, humility and industry in the work of God." He is said, by President Stiles, in 1723, to have "gone to the Jerseys." In 1724 (January 25th, he became a member of New Castle Presbytery, which then included portions of Delaware, Pennsylvania and New Jersey. He was called both to Elk and to White Clay, but he accepted the invitation to the latter place, under the condition that he should give a portion of his time to Brandywine.

In 1733 Mr. Craighead removed to Lancaster county, Pa., and in September of that year he received and accepted a call to Pequea, where he was installed October 31st. Donegal Presbytery, of which he now became a member, always speak of him as "Father Craighead," and appear to have had a peculiar veneration and love for him. He was very active in planting and building up churches in that region. On the 15th of November, 1737, he accepted a call from the people of Hopewell, whose place of meeting was at "the Big Spring," now Newville. His pastorate there was of only a short duration. He was now an aged man, though his earnestness and power remained unabated. Under his impassioned discourses his hearers were often melted to tears. Near the close of April, 1739, whilst pronouncing the benediction in the pulpit, he waived his hand, exclaimed "Farewell! farewell!" and sank down and expired. His remains are said to lie, without a monument, under the corner-stone of the present house of worship at Newville.

Craighead, Rev. Thomas B., was a son of the Rev. Alexander Craighead, of Sugar Creek, North Carolina. He graduated at Princeton College in 1775, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Orange in 1780. For a few months he preached at Sugar Creek, his native place, and then removed to Tennessee. Here he was brought to trial before the Presbytery for holding certain Pelagian views, and the controversy which arose lasted for many years. Mr. C. was one of the founders of Davidson Academy, which afterwards became Nashville University. It originated in his little congregation, six miles east of Nashville, and he became the first President, holding the position for two years and three months. Mr. Craighead excelled as an extemporaneous orator, but not as a writer. His eloquence was of that fervid kind which captivates and carries away the hearer, even in spite of himself. He died in 1825.

Cranbury (N. J.) First Presbyterian Church. This is one of those churches in our country whose beginning runs back into the dim and shadowy past. "Whatever else our fathers did or did not do," says Dr. Joseph G. Symmes, in his "Historical Sketch of Monmouth Presbytery and its churches," "they failed to keep accurate records." Joseph Morgan, the pastor for twenty years of Freehold (Tenent), writes to Cotton Mather, in 1733, that "formerly there had been no Presbyterian congregations within twenty miles of Freehold on the north. Our ministrations were as little desired as enjoyed; but now congregations are formed, Allentown and Cranbury, where formerly the people thought us as bad, almost, as the Papists."

The first settlers of Cranbury came principally from England, joined very early by others from Scotland and Holland, and also by some of that precious cargo of Presbyterian slaves from Scotland. Settlements began as early as 1680. In 1736 a mill was built on Cranbury brook, which was the nucleus of the village. But some time previous to this, when cannot be ascertained, a house of worship had been erected higher up the stream, four miles east of the site of the village. In this, probably, the Episcopalians took the lead. But, however this may be, fraternity or necessity induced them to unite, in the building and the occupancy, with the Presbyterians. This house has long since disappeared, its only memento a neglected cemetery. In 1740, by advice of Presbytery, an amicable separation was arranged, and the Presbyterians built a new house near where the building of the First Church now stands. There seems to have been a fully organized church as early as 1734, for in that year a call was extended to the Rev. Samuel Blair. The next appearance of the people of Cranbury was as suppliants for supplies, at the first meeting of the Presbytery of New Brunswick, in 1738, when Gilbert Tenent was sent to them. And they constantly appear in the same character until 1744, when the Rev. Charles McKnight was settled over the united congregations of Cranbury and Allentown, Mr. McKnight residing at Cranbury, probably in the house still standing there. But he could not reside here in peace. There was a contest for his residence between the two places, which was only ended, in 1756, by Mr. McKnight taking sole charge of Allentown.

Cranbury depended upon supplies until 1762, when Rev. Thomas Smith became the pastor. Since that time, for one hundred and twenty-one years, the pastoral office has been vacant but two and one-half years, all the vacancies put together. Another remarkable fact—who will say it is not directly related to the other years, that the growth of this church has been constant and steady, new accessions being made from year to year. In addition to this steady growth, there have been several periods of large ingathering, notably in the years 1828, 1858, 1870, and 1875.

In 1758 the property where Mr. McKnight had resided was purchased for a parsonage, together with one hundred and fifty acres of land. The parsonage and half the land is still owned by the congregation. A new house of worship was built in 1789, which, much enlarged, is the one now occupied. Revs. Gilbert F. Snowden, George S. Woodhull and Symmes C. Henry, D. D., were the successive pastors—Mr. Snowden from November 24th, 1790, to February 20th, 1797; Mr. Woodhull from June 6th, 1798, to May 4th, 1820; and Dr. Henry from August 8th, 1820, to March 23d, 1857. The history has been marked by long or peaceful pastorates. Counting the present, there have been but six pastors in one hundred and thirty-six years, and three of them are buried among their people. The present pastor, the Rev. Joseph C. Symmes, D. D., was installed in May, 1857.

The old Cranbury Church has been a prolific mother of churches, no less than eight having been formed, in whole or in part, out of her membership. Her roll now embraces 330 names.

Craven, Elijah Richardson, D. D., was born at Washington, D. C., March 28th, 1821, and graduated at New Jersey College in 1842. After his graduation he studied law. He was stated supply of East Hampton, L. I., New York, 1849; ordained by the Reformed Dutch Classis, New Brunswick, February 27th, 1850, pastor of the Second Reformed Dutch Church, Somerville, N. J., 1850-51, since which time he has been the esteemed and successful pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church, Newark, N. J. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from New Jersey College, in 1879, and was elected a director of Princeton Seminary in 1865. Dr. Craven is an attractive and impressive preacher. His familiarity with the law of the Church makes him a useful member of Presbytery and Synod. He has discharged all the service to which the Church has called him with ability and fidelity.

Crawford, Rev. Edward, received his license to preach from the Presbytery of Hanover in 1777. On the 27th of October of the same year he was settled as pastor of the Sinking Spring and Spreading Spring congregations, Virginia. Some time after 1786 he removed to Tennessee, and took charge of Glade Spring and Rocky Spring churches, where he remained until 1803. Mr. Crawford was one of the original Trustees of Washington College, Tenn. He graduated at Princeton College in 1773.

Crawford, Rev. John Agnew, D. D., is the oldest child of Rev. S. W. Crawford, D. D., and Mrs. Jane Agnew Crawford. His father, born in South Carolina, in 1796, was a distinguished minister of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, and successively pastor of churches of that denomination in Conococheague, near Chambersburg, Pa., and the Second and Fourth Reformed Presbyterian churches in Philadelphia. He was eminent as an educator, and for many years Principal of the Academical Department of the University of Pennsylvania, as well as Professor in the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. He died at Allandale, near Chambersburg, 1876. His son, J. Agnew Crawford, was born in Philadelphia, 1822, and was educated under his father's care until he entered the University of Pennsylvania, where he graduated, 1841. After studying in the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, he was licensed to preach by the Philadelphia Presbytery, August 15th, 1844, and was ordained at Milton, Pa., 1847, becoming pastor of the Reformed Presbyterian Church in that place, and afterwards, of the Reformed Presbyterian churches in Xenia, O., and Brooklyn, N. Y. In 1867 he accepted a call to the Falling Spring Church, Chambersburg, Pa., of which he is now 1883 the pastor.

Dr. Crawford is generally considered a preacher of remarkable excellence. His style of composition is terse, luminous, energetic, and sparkling with fresh and brilliant thought. The views of truth and duty which he presents are thoroughly evangelical. Although frequently called upon to preach on public occasions, he has given but little to the press. Among the productions of his pen may be mentioned, "A Thanksgiving Sermon," "The Nation and the Church Congratulated," "The Royal Burial."

Creed, The Apostles'. This was not written by the Apostles, but was gradually formed, by common consent, out of the Confessions adopted severally by particular churches, and used in the reception of members. It reached its present form and universal use among all the churches, about the close of the second century. This Creed was appended to the Shorter Catechism, together with the Lord's Prayer and Ten Commandments, in the first edition published by order of Parliament, "not as though it were composed by the Apostles, or ought to be esteemed canonical Scripture, . . . but because it is a brief sum of Christian faith, agreeable to the Word of God, and anciently received in the churches of Christ." It was retained by the framers of our Constitution as part of the Catechism. Assembly's Digest, p. 11. It is as follows:—

"I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ His only Son our Lord, who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary, suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried, He descended into hell, Hades, the third day He rose again from the dead, He ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty, from thence

He shall come to judge the quick and the dead. I believe in the Holy Ghost, the Holy Catholic Church, the communion of saints, the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting. AMEN."

Creigh, Thomas, D. D., was born at Landisburg, Perry county, Pa., September 9th, 1808. He graduated at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., in 1828, and studied theology under the care of his pastor, Rev. George Duffield, D. D., and at Princeton Seminary. After being licensed by the Presbytery of Carlisle, April 12th, 1831, he continued his studies, and for a time supplied the pulpit of his pastor in his absence. Having accepted a call to the pastorate of the Upper West Conococheague Church, at Mercersburg, Pa., he was ordained and installed in that place, by Carlisle Presbytery, November 17th, 1831. This was his first, his last and his only charge. He continued to be pastor of this church until he was released by death, after more than forty-eight years of constant, assiduous, faithful labor. His death occurred April 21st, 1880, in the seventy-second year of his age.

Dr. Creigh was a singularly pure man, exemplary in life, devotional in spirit, earnest and faithful in pulpit and pastoral duty, content with his place and his work, seeking no higher honor or reward than to bring souls to Christ and to build up the church in a true faith. And this honor he received. His labors were largely blessed. In ecclesiastical judicatories he was wise in counsel, and had acquired large influence. Take him all in all, he was as nearly a model pastor and preacher as can anywhere be found.

Critchlow, Benjamin C., D. D., was the son of David and Margaret Coe Critchlow, and was born December 14th, 1807, in Butler county, Pa. His classical education was commenced in Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa., and finished in the Western University, Pittsburg, by which institution he was graduated, in 1834. His theological preparation was had in the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny. He was licensed in 1837, by the Presbytery of Ohio, in Pittsburg, and ordained in 1838, by the Presbytery of Beaver, and installed pastor of the Church of Slippery Rock. From 1841 his time was divided between the churches of Slippery Rock and New Brighton, and for seven years from 1843 his time was divided between the churches of New Brighton and Beaver. In the former of these churches the greater portion of his ministerial life was spent. For thirty-three years it was the field of his zealous and efficient labors. In 1875 he removed to Greenville, Mercer county, Pa., and continued to serve the church in that place for five years, when the infirmities of age constrained him to resign. He continued, however, to preach occasionally in vacant and feeble churches until his death, which occurred at the residence of one of his daughters, Mrs. N. J. Chandler, Rochester, Pa., Friday, April 21st, 1882, in the seventy-fourth year of his age.

Dr. Critchlow was scrupulously neat in dress, a little above the average height, of impressive presence, with a sympathetic heart, the tenderness of his prayers always engaging the feelings of the worshiper. Though his sermons were methodic and instructive, he used no notes in the pulpit. Indeed, he would labor in revivals of religion in churches adjacent to his own, for ten days or two weeks, preaching twice each day, without having taken a single manuscript from home. At such times his sermons were eminently earnest, spiritual and searching. He was an excellent singer, possessing a voice of great sweetness and compass. Having had experience as a leader of a prominent choir in his early days, his knowledge of music gave him an advantage which his ministerial brethren often envied. Some will remember how, in revival services, after having preached on the blind man's prayer, he intensified the impression by singing, while still standing before the people, the old hymn, commencing—

"Mercy, O thou son of David;
Thus the blind Bartimæus cried."

Crosby, Howard, D. D., LL. D., was born, February 27th, 1826, in the city of New York. He graduated at the New York University, in 1844, and studied theology privately. In 1859 he was elected to the Professorship of Greek in the New York University, and in 1861 to the Professorship of the same language in Rutgers College, New Brunswick, N. J. He was ordained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, in 1861, and added the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church to his duties at the College.

He was called to the Fourth Avenue Presbyterian Church (formerly the Blocker Street Church), New York, in March, 1864, where he still continues, faithful, useful and beloved.

Dr. Crosby is a gentleman of kind spirit, and dignified, yet cordial manner. He is frank and fearless in the utterance of his sentiments and in the discharge of duty. He is extensively known for his varied and profound learning. As a Professor of Greek, he was a most successful teacher, and his attainments in this particular branch of study are of the first order. As a preacher, he is solemn, instructive, impressive. He aims not at display, but vigorously grapples with the reason of his hearers. His power is in systematic argument, in the irrefutable maxims of logic, and in Christian zeal. He is deeply in earnest, and it is evident to his audience that his constant and controlling aim is to bring men to, and build them up in, the saving knowledge of the truth. His ministry has been signally blessed.

Dr. Crosby has had the advantage of travel in foreign lands. He published, in 1840, a book of Oriental travel, entitled "Flands of the Moslem," in 1844, an edition of one of the plays of Sophocles, and in 1863, his "Commentary of the New Testament." He has been a constant contributor, for forty years, to the leading reviews and periodicals and the religious press, and has issued numerous valuable pamphlets on theological, classical and educational subjects. In 1870 he was elected Chancellor of the University of New York. In 1873 he was chosen Moderator of the General Assembly, at Baltimore, and presided over the deliberations of the body with great dignity, efficiency and acceptableness. He is very faithful in his attendance upon the judicatories of the Church, takes a prominent part in their transactions, and by his courteous manner, sound judgment and admirable power of discussion, wields a potent influence.

Cross, Rev. Andrew Boyd, is the descendant of a faithful Presbyterian ancestry. He was born in Baltimore, Md., November 12th, 1810; graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1831; studied theology at Princeton, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Baltimore, August 31st, 1837. His spheres of labor have been as follows: Missionary in Maryland and Delaware, 1831; Associate Editor of the Baltimore Literary and Religious Magazine, 1835-41; pastor at Bethel, Md., 1837-45; Editor of Maryland Temperance Herald, 1845-49; stated supply at Ashland, Phoenix, Parkton, New Market, etc., 1848-63. Mr. Cross is still a missionary, and resides in Baltimore. He is the friend of all sound reforms, and specially active in promoting the cause of Sabbath observance. He is a faithful Presbyterian. As a preacher, he is earnest and impressive, and fearless and forcible in proclaiming the whole counsel of God.

Cross, Rev. Robert, was born near Ballykelley, Ireland, in 1689. He received both his academical and theological education in his native country, and came to America when he was not far from twenty-eight years of age. March 17th, 1719, he was ordained and installed pastor of the Church at New Castle, by the Presbytery of New Castle. On the 18th of September, 1723, he received a call to settle over the Presbyterian congregation at Jamaica, L. I., and between that date and October 10th following, he took charge of the Church in Jamaica. Here his ministry was highly successful, and attended by a considerable revival of religion. The Rev. James M. Macdonald, subsequently a pastor of the same church, says, "it is evident that he was very highly esteemed," and "was one of the most prominent and influential ministers of the day in which he lived." Mr. Cross accepted a call to the First Church in Philadelphia, joined the Philadelphia Presbytery, May 29th, 1737, and was installed on the 10th of November following. The installation sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Andrews, with whom he was settled as a colleague. Mr. Cross resigned his pastoral charge June 23d, 1758, and died in August, 1766. The following testimony to his character appears on his grave-stone: "He ex-celled in piety and gravity, and a general deportment, was esteemed for his learned acquaintance with the Holy Scriptures, and long accounted one of the most respectable ministers in the Province."

Crothers, Samuel, D. D., was born near Chambersburg, Franklin county, Pa., October 23d, 1781. In 1787 his father removed to Lexington, Ky. He was educated at the academy in that place, and united with the Associate Reformed Church there. He studied theology in the New York Theological Seminary, then under the superintendence of Dr. Mason. Licensed by Kentucky Presbytery, November 9th, 1809. The next year he spent in missionary labors in Ohio, Kentucky and Illinois. From 1810 he was settled in the churches of Chillicothe and Greenfield, between two and three years. In 1813 he left Chillicothe, and gave Greenfield all his labors, for five years. In 1818 he removed to Kentucky, but, in 1820, returned to Greenfield, where, from most of his old parishioners, who, like himself, wished to change their ecclesiastical relations, he organized the Presbyterian Church, of which he remained pastor until his death (July 20th, 1856), a period of more than thirty-six years. As a man of intellect Dr. Crothers stood with a very high order. As a writer he was neat, concise and vigorous. As a preacher he was eminent. There was a wonderful richness in his discourses. It was impossible to hear him without feeling the conviction that his soul basked in the light of and drew its life from the Cross, and that he esteemed it his highest honor to unfold its glories to his fellow-men.

Crowe, John Finley, D. D., the second son of Benj. Crowe, a soldier and officer in the Revolutionary War from Virginia, was born June 16th, 1787, in Green county, Tenn., then a frontier settlement of North Carolina. In 1802 his father removed to Bellevue, Mo. He attended Transylvania University, Ky., 1811-12; was a student at Princeton Seminary 1814-15; licensed 1816, and ordained to the ministry in 1817 by the Presbytery of Louisville. He labored as pastor, editor and teacher in Kentucky till 1823, when he removed to Hanover, Ind., and became the pastor of that church. Was pastor there from 1823 to 1831, and stated supply from 1838 to 1847.

In 1827 he founded Hanover Academy, under the auspices of Madison Presbytery, which in 1833 became Hanover College. He continued in connection with this Institution as teacher, Professor and Vice-president till his death, January 17th, 1860. He was the editor and manager of the "Abolition Intelligencer and Missionary Magazine," published at Shelbyville, Ky., one of the earliest magazines of the kind published in this country, in 1822-23; and left a MS. History of Hanover College.

Dr. Crowe was a faithful, humble and successful preacher and pastor, was devoted to his work, and his labors were frequently blessed with revivals. He was a worthy companion of Johnson, Dickey, Martin, and others in the pioneer mission work in Southern Indiana. His great work was the founding and fostering of Hanover College, to which institution he gave all his energies and wisdom for a third of a century. During his last sickness he frequently repeated the words of 2 Tim. i, 2, "I know whom I have believed," etc., and by the faith of the gospel gained a triumph over death. Two of his sons became ministers, and four of his daughters became ministers' wives, one of whom was a missionary to China.

Crowell, James M., D. D., is a son of Elisha Crowell, who was for about thirty years a druggist and apothecary in Philadelphia. He was born in that city, June 9th, 1827. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1848, about fourth in a class of eighty students. While in college he was elected by his classmates editor of the Nassau Literary Magazine, and by the American Whig Society was chosen one of four Junior Orators to represent the Society, in competition with four from the Cliosophic Society, at the Centennial Commencement of the college. After his graduation he taught for a year in the Academy at West Chester, Pa., and then entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton, where his course of study was ended in May, 1851. On June 3d, 1851, he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Upper Octorara, Chester Co., Pa., where he remained for nearly six years, greatly beloved by his congregation and prospered in his labors. From May 10th, 1857, until May 5th, 1869, he was pastor of the Seventh Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, and labored with great fidelity, both as preacher and pastor, among an attached people. For about a year and a half from the date last mentioned he was pastor of St. Peter's Presbyterian Church, Rochester, N. Y., where his labors were blessed, and then accepted a call to the Woodland Presbyterian Church, West Philadelphia, where he remained for about twelve years, faithful in labor, and beloved by his flock.

Dr. Crowell is a cultivated gentleman, an exemplary Christian, a good preacher, and highly esteemed by all who know him. In 1861 he was elected a member of the Board of Trustees of the College of New Jersey, and has retained that position ever since. He has also been a member of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, of the Board of Education, and, for more than twenty years, of the Board of Publication, of which he has for several years been a Vice-President. Dr. Crowell is at present Secretary of Missions in the American Sunday-school Union.

Crowell, John, D. D., was born at Philadelphia, Pa., June 22d, 1814. He graduated at New Jersey College in 1834, and, after teaching elsewhere for a time, was Tutor in that Institution, 1836-7. He was ordained by the Third Presbytery of Philadelphia, June 5th, 1840, after which he was pastor and teacher at West Chester, Pa., 1840-50. Subsequently he was pastor of the Second Church, Orange, N. J., 1850-63, and pastor of Drawyer's Church, Odessa, Delaware, 1867-78. He now resides at Orange, N. J. Dr. Crowell is an earnest and exemplary Christian, and a forcible and faithful preacher. He has been blessed in his ministry, and is esteemed by his brethren, and by all the churches of which he has had charge.

Cryer, Rev. Samuel S., was born November 9th, 1850, at Rock Island, Ill. He graduated from Oberlin College in 1873, with the honor of the Greek oration of his class. Here he remained as Greek instructor for one year, after which he pursued his theological studies at Princeton Seminary, and the summary of the Northwest at Chicago. After graduating at the latter Institution, he accepted a call to the Church at Warren, Ill. He was licensed by Portsmouth Presbytery in the Spring of 1877, and ordained and installed by the Presbytery of Freeport, in October, the same year. With this church he remained the faithful pastor and minister till January, 1881. On November 9th 1881 he was installed over the Central Church of Rock Island, Ill., of which he still has charge. Mr. Cavers' ministry, thus far, in the several churches he has served, has been characterized by great earnestness, devotion, and success. He is a ready sermonizer, and a fluent, pleasant speaker. Deeply convinced himself of the truth he preaches, he carries conviction to others. He is a diligent student, and a conscientious, faithful pastor.

Culbertson, Rev. Matthew Simpson, was born in Chambersburg, Pa., January 18th, 1819. He was educated at the United States Military Academy, at West Point, New York, after serving a full course of years, and whilst engaged as a Lieutenant of Artillery, he made a profession of religion, and soon after laid down the sword, and took up the Cross. He entered the Seminary at Princeton, N. J., where he graduated in 1844, being regarded by his venerable instructor, Dr. Hodge, as among the foremost members of the Institution. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Carlisle in 1844, and soon after ordained by the same Presbytery as a missionary to China. His career as a missionary was marked by extraordinary devotion and ability. In the midst of his labors he was taken with cholera, and after a short illness, died, in August, 1867.

Mr. Culbertson was held in the highest esteem by all the Protestant missionaries, of all ecclesiastical connections in the community in which he labored and died. He was a man of a meek and quiet spirit, and remarkable for his singleness of aim and straightforward energy and industry in his Master's service. He set before himself the highest ends, and strove, both by preaching and example, to glorify God in the salvation of his fellow-men. He labored, in connection with the late Dr. Hodgeman, for several years, with assiduity and perseverance, in preparing a revised translation of the sacred Scriptures in the Chinese language, a work of which he regarded as the great work of his life, and it was a source of especial consolation to him, at the close of his departure, that God had ordered the work to be completed. He also wrote a volume entitled "The Mission of the Flowering Land." In the character of a scholar, and a Christian, his life, the details of which were an example, elicited great admiration and imitation.

Cumming, Rev. Alexander, was born at Freehold, N. J., in 1796. He was educated under his native ministry, Rev. Samuel Lewis, who studied theology with his pastor, the Rev. William Ferguson. Licensed by the New Side Presbytery, New Castle, in 1746 or 1747, he was sent by the Synod, in compliance with pressing requests, and spent some time, in Augusta county, Virginia. He was the first Presbyterian minister that preached within the bounds of Tennessee. He was a stated supply in Pennsylvania for some time. In October, 1750, he was ordained by New York Presbytery, and installed collegiate pastor with Mr. Pemberton, in New York. Here, his clear, discriminating mind, his habits of close study, his instructive and excellent preaching, his happy faculty of disentangling and exhibiting difficult and abstruse subjects, peculiarly attracted and delighted his more cultivated hearers. At his own request he was dismissed from this charge, October 25th 1753.

In feeble health and with little prospect of usefulness, Mr. Cumming remained without charge, till February 25th, 1761, when he was installed pastor of the Old South Church, in Boston. He died August 23d, 1763. Dr. Sewall, with whom he was joined as colleague in Boston, says of him: "He was full of prayer, with a lively, active soul, in a feeble body."

Cummings, Rev. Charles, was an Irishman by birth, and came to America in early manhood. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Hanover, April 18th, 1767. He was thoroughly educated, well acquainted with Latin, Greek and Hebrew, and possessed, for his day, a very large and valuable library. He was installed pastor of the Church at North Mountain, in Augusta county, Va., May 14th, 1767, and sustained this relation five years. In 1772 he accepted a call from the Sinking Spring and Elbling Spring congregations. From the year he commenced preaching at Sinking Spring, up to about the year 1776, such was the danger from the Indians that the men never went to church without being armed and taking their families with them. Mr. Cummings' uniform habit before entering the church was to take a short walk alone, whilst the congregation were seating themselves. He would then return, hold a few words of conversation at the door, with some one of the elders of the church, then would gravely walk through the crowd mount the steps of the pulpit, deposit his rifle in a corner near him, lay off his shot pouch, and commence the solemn services of the day. Mr. Cummings died, in March, 1812, in about the eightieth year of his age. He was, says the Hon. David Campbell, "a simple and exemplary Christian, and a John Knox in his energy and zeal in support of his own particular Church. He never lost sight of his object, and always marched directly up to it, with a full front and determined will. He performed a great deal of missionary labor through an extensive district of the country beyond his immediate field, which was of itself large, and, at least going into Kentucky. He was a Presbyterian of the old stamp, rigid in his faith, strict in the observance of the Sabbath, and faithful in teaching his children and servants the Catechism."

Cummins, Charles, D.D., the son of Charles and Elizabeth (Boyd) Cummins, was born in Strasburg, Lancaster county, Pa., July 15th, 1776; graduated at Dickinson College, in 1800; was licensed by New Castle Presbytery, in 1801, and soon after was ordained and installed, by the same Presbytery, over Chestnut Level and Little Britain churches. Here he labored from 1801 to 1808. In 1808 he became pastor of the Church in Florida, N. Y., and, with the exception of a year which he spent in Virginia, as agent for the American Colonization Society, he continued his labors in Florida until 1849, when he resigned his pastoral charge. In 1852 he removed to Muscatine, Iowa. Dr. Cummins was a man of excellent character. He possessed good mental powers, was a successful and laborious pastor, and a practical, instructive, and forcible preacher. He was, in the highest sense of the term, a Christian gentleman, and to the close of his life he never forgot the injunction, "Be courteous." His whole life was a proof that God is faithful to His promises, and to the last he was a living witness of the power of Christianity to make one cheerful and happy.

Cummins, Francis, D. D., was the son of Charles and Rebecca (McNickle) Cummins, and was born near Shippensburg, Pa., in the Spring of 1752. When he was in his nineteenth year, his father removed to Mecklenburg, N. C., where the neighboring college, then called "Queen's Museum," afforded him opportunity for his higher education. Here he was graduated, about the year 1776. After leaving college he was, for several years, engaged chiefly in the business of teaching. He was an active and zealous patriot in the war that gave us our independence. He was at different times in the army, and was engaged in several battles. He was present at all the Mecklenburg Whig meetings of 1775, and mingled in the exciting scene of the reading of the celebrated Declaration at Mecklenburg Court House.

While Mr. Cummins was engaged in teaching he prosecuted his theological studies, under the direction of the Rev. (afterwards Dr.) James Hall. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Orange, December 15th, 1780. During the year 1781 he preached at Hopewell and various other places, and in the Spring of 1782 accepted a call from Bethel Church, in the adjacent district of York, S. C., where he was ordained, toward the close of that year. In the Spring of 1788, while residing at Bethel, both as the pastor of a church and teacher of the youth, he was elected by the people of York, as a member of the South Carolina Convention called to decide upon the Constitution of the United States, and though all his colleagues were for rejecting it, he voted in its favor. Dr. Cummins died February 23d, 1832, expressing the utmost gratitude that he had been permitted to preach the gospel, and the most joyful confidence that he was about to enter into rest. He was an able and well-read theologian, and held the Calvinistic system with great tenacity. His kindness and sociability toward his junior brethren were a source both of enjoyment and profit to them. His great wisdom and experience made him very valuable in counsel. He published very little, and his influence will be transmitted to posterity chiefly through the living men whose characters he moulded.

Cummins, Rev. John L., the son of Rev. Charles and Sarah Lisle Cummins, was born in Florida, N. Y., in 1820. He attended Lafayette College a short time, and subsequently graduated at the Law School, New Haven, Conn. He studied theology under the care of his father, and passed one year at Princeton Theological Seminary. He was licensed by Hudson Presbytery, in 1850, and entered upon his duties as a minister in the Westminster Church, Keokuk, Iowa. Mr. Cummins was a man of remarkable talent and devoted piety. The church of which he took charge being feeble and surrounded by peculiar difficulties, he labored with it for a year without pecuniary compensation. He donated to the church the ground upon which a neat house of worship was erected, was a liberal contributor to the erection of the building, saw it dedicated and filled for a few Sabbaths, and then his brief but active and efficient work was done, and he was called to his rest, February 20th, 1852.

Cunningham, Rev. Alexander Newton, D. D., was born near Jonesboro, East Tennessee, March 16th, 1807. He graduated at Washington College, Tenn., in 1826, taught about one year afterwards, then entered Princeton Seminary, remaining there three years. He was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery, April 28th, 1830, and ordained by the Presbytery of South Alabama, January 5th, 1833. He was stated supply at Montgomery, Ala., from 1833 to 1836; pastor of Augusta, Ga., from November 18th, 1838 until May 14th, 1842, and then became stated supply at Franklin, Tenn., from 1844 to 1858, founding also the Franklin Female Institute, which became widely known and eminently useful. From 1857 until 1862 he preached in the Church at Shelbyville, Tenn., and at various neighboring places as he had opportunity, and from 1865 until 1872 he resided in Franklin, Tenn., a part of the time working as a Professor in the Female Institute he had founded, and a part of the time serving the Church of Harpeth, and afterwards that of New Hope, as stated supply. In 1872 he removed to Fayetteville, Tenn., where he preached as stated supply until about 1874, after which he removed to Aberdeen, Miss., where he supplied the pulpit until his death, which occurred September 5th, 1878.

Dr. Cunningham was a tall man, of fine presence, an excellent preacher, an industrious student and laborer, of gentle and attractive manners, warmly beloved by all who knew him, and successful in winning many souls to Christ. As an evidence of the regard in which he was held by those on whose which he labored, it may be mentioned that in the three years succeeding the close of the civil war he united in marriage very nearly a hundred of the young ladies who had been his pupils at some former period.

Cunningham, Robert M., D. D., settled within the bounds of the Presbytery of Alabama in the year 1826. He was, however, as early as the Spring of 1813, present at the meeting of Presbytery, and preached the opening sermon. At the organization of the Synod of Mississippi and South Alabama, which occurred by the appointment of the General Assembly, at Mableow, Choctaw Nation, November 11th, 1829, Dr. Cunningham also preached the opening sermon, and was chosen Moderator. Very few men ever exhibited more of clear and sound intellect, of tender and melting pathos, and of bold and manly eloquence, than did this patriarch of the Church, in proclaiming the news of salvation to a dying world. In the year 1839, worn down with years and toil, he slept with his fathers, and was buried, beloved and lamented by all who knew him.

Curtis, Eleroy, D. D., was the eldest of eight children of Joseph and Mary Jones Curtis, and was born in Paullet, Vt., April 17th, 1819. His father was of Scotch-Irish descent, his mother of the best Puritan stock. His early advantages were those afforded by the common schools of the time. His father removed to Warren, N. Y., then to Newfield, and in 1827 to Scipio, Seneca county, Ohio. Until eighteen years of age Mr. Curtis labored with his father on the farm; then became a student in Huron Institute, Milan, one of the best classical schools in Ohio. He was converted there in 1838. He taught two years in Milan, as assistant in the Academy, and principal of the village school. He entered Western Reserve College in 1841, and was graduated in 1845, was Principal of the preparatory department of the college three years, at the same time pursuing theological study in the Seminary, was licensed to preach by Portage Presbytery, July 28th, 1847; ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Middlebury, September 5th, 1848, became pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church at Fort Wayne, Ind., in September 1849 of the First Congregational Church, Sherburne, N. Y., in 1860, of the First Presbyterian Church, Newburg, (now South Presbyterian Church of Cleveland) in May, 1867. Frequent revivals were enjoyed in each of these pastorates, and some of them of great power, as at Fort Wayne in 1847, and in Cleveland in 1874 and 1874. He has been Stated Clerk of Cleveland Presbytery since 1879, and a Trustee of Western Reserve College since 1875. Mr. Curtis was made Doctor of Divinity by Middlebury College.

Curtis, Harvey, D. D., the son of Elisha and Resigna Clay Curtis, was born in Adams, N. Y., May 30th, 1806, educated at Middlebury College, Vermont, graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1834, was licensed by Troy Presbytery, and ordained by the Brandon Congregational Association, Vermont, in the Autumn of 1835, as pastor of the Congregational Church in Brandon. He subsequently removed to the West, and January 1st, 1842, he visited Cincinnati, Ohio, as Agent for the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions. He continued in this work until the Spring of 1843, when he accepted a call to Madison, Ind. He was a highly successful and popular pastor there for about eight years, when he was called to the First Presbyterian Church in Chicago. Here he labored with unusual acceptance and usefulness, until he was called to the Presidency of Knox College, Galesburg, Ill., in 1858. That position he filled with marked ability until his death, September 18th, 1862.

Dr. Curtis was one of the Church's ablest preachers, wisest counsellors, and most earnest workers. He was a man of unusually symmetrical mental development, a good scholar in every department, a vigorous thinker, a ready debater, an able sermonizer. He was modest and genial in his spirit. His ministerial brethren, and the people to whom he preached, not only admired, but loved him. His quiet humor, ready sympathy, tact, good sense, and warm interest in everything pertaining to Christ's cause and people made him one of the pleasantest of companions, and most estimable of friends.

Curtis, William Stanton, D. D., was born at Burlington, Vt., August 3d, 1829. His early years were spent in the then "far West," since his father removed to Missouri in 1820, and subsequently to Wisconsin Territory. He was graduated at Illinois College in 1838. His theological studies were then taken at New Haven, where he remained three years. After supplying for one year the First Congregational Church of Rockford, Ill., he became, in 1842, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Ann Arbor, Mich., which he served thirteen years, with such faithfulness and success that not one of their number was found willing to consent to his removal, when he was elected, in 1855 College Pastor and Professor of Moral Philosophy at Hamilton College, N. Y. A part of this time he was ailing Professor of Moral and Intellectual Philosophy in the University of Michigan. His marked success in teaching, and also in preaching to students led him to accept the call to Hamilton College. There he succeeded equally, but his heart was in the West, and in 1863 he resigned to become President of Knox College, Galesburg, Ill. There he remained five years, vainly striving to reconcile the conflicting elements which governed that institution. In 1869 he was installed pastor of Westminster Presbyterian Church at Rockford, Ill. After six years of successful labor, he resigned, to visit foreign lands. Since his return from abroad, residing among his own beloved people at Rockford, he has supplied vacant churches in the vicinity. As a preacher, Dr. Curtis is metaphysical and profound, yet lucid and popular in style. Of his teaching, his former pupil,

Dr. Herrick Johnson, says: "Order reigned conspicuously. The student that could not understand him was an idiot. He shot straight. He stated objections with scrupulous fairness. Occasionally he burst all barriers in a flood of eloquent talk." His integrity, simplicity and good judgment, with classical attainments and educational experience, render him a wise and valued counsellor in the management of the Institutions of the Presbyterian Church in Northern Ill., and for many years he has been a Director of the Theological Seminary of the Northwest.

Cushing, Rev. Jonathan Peter, was born at Rochester, N. H., March 12th, 1793; graduated at Dartmouth, in 1817; went to Virginia, and became connected with Hampden Sidney College, first as a Tutor, then as Professor, and, after the death of Dr. Hoge, in 1829, as President, in which office he continued till the close of his life, April 25th, 1835. He adorned every relation which he sustained.

Cutler, Carroll, D. D., was born January 31st, 1829, in Windham, N. H. He graduated at Yale College, in 1851, taking the third honor in a class of one hundred. After spending a year in the Union Theological Seminary, New York, he served as Tutor in Yale College for two years, at the same time pursuing his theological studies, and was licensed to preach in 1858, by the New Haven West Association. In the same year he sailed for Europe, and studied in Germany, at the Universities of Berlin and Halle. Returning in 1859, he entered upon his theological studies in New Haven, afterwards continuing them in New York and Princeton seminaries. He was appointed Professor of Mental Science and Rhetoric in Western Reserve College, Hudson, O., and entered upon his work there in April, 1860. On the death of President Hitchcock, he was elected to the office of President, in 1871, and retains this position at the present time. By virtue of his office, he has also been pastor of the College Church since 1873, when he was ordained by Cleveland Presbytery. The college was removed to Cleveland, under the modified title of "Adelbert College of Western Reserve University," and opened for instruction in the Fall of 1882. Dr. Cutler holds his position as President, and continues his work as an educator, with greatly increased facilities and large prospects of usefulness.

As a student and educator of young men, Dr. Cutler enjoys a national reputation for ability, culture and thorough scholarship. He is clear and forcible as a thinker and writer, and is always heard with great interest when he preaches. In his social intercourse and daily walk he shares the confidence of all his associates and acquaintances, and is much beloved by those who have been under his instruction. In his ecclesiastical relations and influence President Cutler has proved himself most worthy of confidence, and done much to honor Christ and advance His Church.

Cuyler, Theodore Ledyard, D. D., was born at Aurora, Cayuga county, N. Y., January 10th, 1822. He graduated at Princeton College in 1841, and from the Theological Seminary in 1846. He was ordained to the ministry in May, 1848, while acting as the stated supply of the Presbyterian Church of Burlington, N. J. Soon after, being called to the pastoral charge of the Third Presbyterian Church of Trenton (just organized), he was installed and labored there until May, 1853. From 1853 to 1860 he was the pastor of the Market Street Reformed Dutch Church, in the city of New York, and while there took a prominent part in the great revival work of 1858. In April, 1860, he was invited to become the first pastor of the Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church, of Brooklyn, which rapidly grew to be one of the largest in our communion, and has sent out two flourishing colonies. Their edifice, with the Sabbath-school and other rooms, is a model of spaciousness and convenience.

Dr. Cuyler, during his ministry, has received into church-fellowship 3450 members, of whom about 1500 were on confession of faith.

Although devoted untiringly to pastoral visitation, he has found time to contribute weekly, to the various leading religious journals, a greater number of articles than any settled pastor in our body. These articles, numbering over two thousand, have been widely republished in Great Britain and on the Continent, and translated into various languages. He has also published a large number of tracts, especially in advocacy of the Temperance Reform, in which he has always been deeply interested. In the pulpit, on the platform, and in the press, he has been perpetually active; and though of small and frail figure, has enjoyed remarkable health.

His best known volumes are the "Empty Crib," "Heart Life," "The Colar Christian," "Pointed Papers for the Christian Life," "God's Light on Dark Clouds," and a book of travel, "From the Nile to Norway."

During his vacation visits abroad he has addressed large congregations in London and elsewhere, and has been the delegate of the Presbyterian Church to the General Assemblies of Scotland and Ireland. The whole aims of his life have been intensely practical, and the style of his preaching and the spiritual character of his theology may be fairly judged from his contributions to the religious press, which, for more than a quarter of a century, have found admission into nearly all Christian households.

Cuyler, Cornelius C., D.D., was born at Albany, N. Y., of an honored Dutch ancestry, February, 15th, 1783. He graduated at Union College, in 1806, and studied theology under Drs. Livingstone and Bassett. He was ordained pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church in Poughkeepsie, January 2d, 1809. Numerous revivals occurred under his ministry. He declined several flattering invitations, but in obedience to the apparent call of Providence, he accepted a call to the Second Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, and was installed, January 14th, 1831. Here he continued, highly esteemed and beloved, till his death, which occurred, August, 31st, 1850, when he was in the sixty-eighth year of his age.

Dr. Cuyler was of noble appearance, being six feet, two inches in height. He had a manly, vigorous and well cultivated intellect. He was a man of great kindness of spirit, and delighted to do what he could to render everybody around him happy. He was zealous for what he believed to be the truth, while yet he had Christian sympathies large enough to embrace all the real followers of Christ. He was dignified yet affable, an elegant scholar, a perfect gentleman, an exemplary Christian. As a preacher, he was unaffected, earnest and persuasive. His discourses were written with care, and characterized rather by purity and correctness of diction than by imagination and ornament. His delivery was sober and free from extravagances. His death-bed was truly edifying. His published writings consisted of a number of occasional sermons and several tracts.

Dabney, Robert L., D.D., LL.D., was born in Louisa county, Virginia, March 5th, 1820. He was a student for a time at Hampden Sidney College, and graduated at the University of Virginia, after which he was engaged in teaching two years. He graduated at Union Theological Seminary, Va., was licensed by West Hanover Presbytery, May 5th, 1846, and ordained by Lexington Presbytery, in July, 1847. He was Pastor of Trunking Spring Church, Augusta county, Va., 1847-53; Professor of Church History and Government in Union Seminary, Va., 1853-1860, and of Theology, 1860-1883. He was copastor, with the Rev. Dr. Smith, of the College Church, 1858-1874. In 1883 he became Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Texas.

Dr. Dabney is an accomplished scholar, an instructive and forcible preacher, and a writer of marked ability. He is firm in his convictions of truth and duty, and always ready to maintain them. He was Moderator of the General Assembly in 1870. Among his publications are "Defence of Virginia and the South," "Life of Gen. T. J. Jackson," "Life of Rev. Dr. T. S. Sampson," "Sacred Theology," "Sensualistic Philosophy," and "Theology."

Dale, Rev. James W., D.D., was a native of Wilmington, Del., but was reared in the city of Philadelphia, where he graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, in 1831. He entered upon the study of law, but abandoned it in favor of the ministry of the gospel. He entered Princeton Seminary, in 1833, and studied theology there and in the Seminary at Andover, Mass. It was his ardent desire to spend his life as a missionary, in heathen lands, but in this, to his deep and lasting regret, he was hindered. In order to fit himself more fully for missionary work, he entered upon a medical course in the University of Pennsylvania, and received the degree of M.D., at the close of the course.

After entering the ministry Dr. Dale was, for some time, agent for the Pennsylvania Bible Society, in the eastern counties of the State; then he became pastor of the churches of Middletown and Ridley, Pa., afterwards changing Ridley for the new church at Media, but continuing in Middletown, in all, for the space of twenty-five years. In this time he preached in various parts of Delaware county, giving himself, with unreserved consecration, to the work of preaching the gospel wherever the opportunity offered. Several strong and growing churches started into life as the fruit of zealous efforts made outside of his own field of labor. In 1871 he became pastor of the Wayne Presbyterian Church, in Delaware county, and resigned the charge in 1874. In the latter part of his life he served the new church organized at Glen Riddle, in Delaware county, and preached here until within a few weeks of his death, which occurred, April 19th, 1881, in the sixty-ninth year of his age.

Dr. Dale wrote three volumes, entitled "Classic Baptism," "Judaic Baptism," and "Johannic Baptism," which exhibited great erudition, dialectic keenness, and the mastery of the whole literature of the Baptist controversy. They won for him a wide reputation, made him the first authority on his side of the question in the land, and have been the armory of disputants ever since their appearance.

The basis of Dr. Dale's character was honesty—honesty of thought and purpose, and an inflexible adherence to his convictions when fully formed. He was never carried about with every kind of doctrine, but, having formed his opinions with candor, and after patient consideration, he stood by them, without shrinking from any momentary unpopularity they might bring. He was for years a leader in the Temperance movement in Delaware county, and was instrumental in securing a law by which the sale of intoxicating liquors was prohibited within the limits of Media. But the business of his life, to which he gave himself without reserve, was preaching the blessed gospel of God. He loved this work, and went far and wide to declare unto sinful men the mercy of God in Jesus Christ. Many were led to the Saviour by his ministry who remember him tenderly now, and will be stars in his crown in the day that cometh.

Dana, Stephen, W., D. D., is a son of the Rev. J. Jay Dana, who has been a Congregational minister for nearly fifty years, and is now preaching at Alford, Mass. He was born in Canaan, N. Y., November 17th, 1810, from which place his father removed to South Adams, Mass., in 1818. He graduated at Williams College in the Summer of 1831, under the Presidency of the illustrious teacher, Dr. Mark Hopkins. For two years after graduation he was Principal of an Academy in Hinsdale, Mass. He spent three years, 1833-6, as a student in Union Theological Seminary, New York city. His first ministerial work was supplying the pulpit of the Presbyterian Church in Madison, N. J., for four months, during the sickness and absence of the pastor. In November, 1836, he received a unanimous call to the Second Presbyterian Church of Belvidere, N. J., where he labored with much zeal and success, for a little less than two years, when he was called to the Walnut Street Presbyterian Church, West Philadelphia, where he has been ever since, having begun his work here in July, 1838.

Dr. Dana has been greatly blessed in his present field of labor. His congregation, which is one of marked activity and influence, has, under his earnest and acceptable preaching, faithful pastoral visitation and excellent administrative ability, had a steady, large and solid growth, and abounds in good works. He is a diligent student, a gentleman of winning address, great conscientiousness in the discharge of duty, superior judgment, a faithful Presbyter, and justly held in high esteem by his brethren and the community in which his lot has been cast.

STEPHEN W. DANA, D.D.

Dana, William Coombes, D. D., was born at Newburyport, Mass., February 13th, 1810. He graduated at Dartmouth College, N. H., in 1828. After leaving college he spent several years in teaching at Thetford, Vt., Chesterfield, N. H., and Westborough, Mass. His theological studies were pursued at Andover Seminary, Columbia Seminary, and Princeton Seminary. He was licensed by Harmony Presbytery (S. C.) April 10th, 1835, and was ordained by Charleston Union Presbytery, February 11th, 1836. In December, 1835, he began to preach for the Central Presbyterian Church of Charleston, S. C., soon after accepted a call to become its pastor, and was installed on the day of his ordination, already stated. Here he found his life-work. He continued to be pastor of this one church until he died, a period of about forty-five years, of nearly unbroken ministerial labor. His death occurred November 20th, 1880, in the seventy-first year of his age.

Dr. Dana was a man of singularly pure and beautiful life, and was faithful, earnest and effective in his ministerial work. He was possessed of great gentleness and sweetness of spirit, of a warm and sympathetic nature, and of chivalric nobleness of spirit. He had exquisite literary taste and culture, was an accurate and elegant classical scholar, and a polished writer. He was eminent as a preacher, and tenderly loved as a pastor.

Danforth, Joshua Noble, D. D., was born in Pittsfield, Mass., in 1792; graduated at Williams College, with the full honors of the best of his class; graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1821, and was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery. He was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in New Castle, Del., where he remained until he accepted a call to Washington, D. C. In this field his labors were signally blessed. After three years he became an agent of the American Colonization Society. He was next pastor of a Congregational Church in Lee, Mass., which, during his ministry, was visited with a revival of religion of wondrous power. Subsequently he assumed the pastorate of the Second Presbyterian Church in Alexandria, Va., where his labors were abundant and successful. After fifteen years he resigned the charge, and again accepted an agency for the Colonization Society. He died November 14th, 1861. Dr. Danforth was a ready and graceful writer. Several volumes of his have been published, besides being a large contributor to the religious and secular press.

HENRY CHAFFIN, D. D., LL. D.

Darling, Henry, D. D., LL. D., was born in Reading, Pa., December 27th, 1814. He graduated from Andover College in 1842, and studied theology at Union Seminary, New York, 1842-43, and at Auburn, 1843-46. He received the degree of D. D. from Union College in 1860, and that of LL. D. from Hamilton College in 1881. He was ordained and installed at Hudson, N. Y., by the Presbytery of Columbia, December 30th, 1847. He was settled at Vernon, N. Y., 1846-47; at Hudson, 1847-53; pastor of Clinton Street Church, Philadelphia, 1853-61, an invalid, 1861-63; and pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, Albany, N. Y., 1863-81. In 1881 he was elected President of Hamilton College, which position he continues to hold.

Dr. Darling is an accomplished gentleman, and an earnest and exemplary Christian. His preaching is marked by dignity, fidelity and force. He has always been loved by the people of his charge. He is an active and useful member of the Church judicatories, and has served on some of the most important committees of the General Assembly. He has published "The Closer Walk," "Christian Unity," "Doing Nothing but Receiving," "Conformity to the World," with many pamphlets, sermons, addresses and articles. He was Moderator of the General Assembly in 1881, and is held in high esteem by his brethren in the ministry.

Davenport, Rev. James, was born in Stamford, Conn., in 1716, and graduated at Yale in the age of twenty-two. He seems to have preached in New Jersey in the close of 1737, but preferred to settle at Southold, Long Island, and was ordained by a Council, October 26th, 1738. Under his preaching and that of the Rev. Jonathan Barber, a revival occurred in East Hampton. Mr. Davenport preached for a season at Baskingridge. In the absence of Mr. Cross, the pastor, amid an awakening of extraordinary extent and power. The divine blessing also signally attended his labors during a visit to Connecticut. He became a member of New Brunswick Presbytery, September 29d, 1746, having probably for some time been preaching in their bounds. In 1748 he joined New York Presbytery, with a view to settle at Connecticut Farms, near Elizabethtown. Having recovered his health, which was for a season impaired, he spent two months, in the Summer of 1750, in Virginia, where his labors were highly acceptable and successful. The Winter of 1750-1 he spent at Cape May. On October 27th, 1754, he was installed pastor of Maidenhead and Hopewell, and that year he was Moderator of the Synod of New York. He died in 1757, and was buried in the graveyard, about a mile from Pennington, towards the Delaware. Mr. Whitfield said of Mr. Davenport, he knew no man who so close a walk with God. Mr. Davies spoke of him as "that pious Enoch," and Mr. Bostwick characterized him as one "whose zeal for God and the conversion of men was scarce to be paralleled."

Davidson, Rev. Edward Chaffin, was born in Maury county, Tenn., February 15th, 1832. He graduated in 1854, at the State University of Mississippi, with the reputation of being a fine scholar. After teaching a few years, his theological course was pursued for a while at Danville Seminary, but was concluded at Columbia, S. C., in the Spring of 1860. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Chickasaw. On leaving the Seminary he began to labor in Water Valley and Sand Springs churches, and in the Spring of 1864 he was installed as pastor of the Sand Springs Church for one-half his time. Whilst he was preaching at Sand Springs he continued to give the Water Valley Church one-half his preaching labors. In July, 1867, he was installed pastor of Water Valley Church for all his time, and the church greatly prospered under his ministry. During all these years he was the head centre of a large and flourishing school. His relation as pastor at Water Valley terminated in July, 1877. He then preached and taught for a year at Lexington, Miss., and subsequently settled in Oxford, preaching and teaching. In 1880 he was elected Moderator of the Synod of Memphis. In 1882 he supplied the churches of College Hill and Hopewell. In 1880 he was elected to an Adjunct Professorship in the State University, which position, as well as that of Stated Clerk of his Presbytery, he held at the time of his death, which occurred April 25th, 1883. Mr. Davidson was an admirable teacher, and his noble Christian character greatly impressed his pupils. As a preacher, he was an earnest, eloquent speaker, and many of his best sermons were delivered extempore, or with brief head notes, while many of his written sermons were productions of profound research and learning on Scriptural and doctrinal subjects.

Davidson, Robert, D. D., was born in Carlisle, Pa., February 23d, 1808, and was the only child of the Rev. Robert Davidson, D. D., the second President of Dickinson College. He was a graduate of this College, and of Princeton Seminary. In 1832 he became pastor of the Methodist (or Second) Church of Lexington, Ky., and in this relation became distinguished for his pulpit eloquence and his earnest pastoral work. In 1840 he was called to the Presidency of Transylvania University, in which position he continued two years. He entered on the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church in New Brunswick, N. J., May 1th, 1843, and there labored assiduously and successfully until October 4th, 1859. Subsequently he was pastor of the Spring Street Church, New York, from 1864 to 1868. His last pastoral charge was the First Church of Huntington, Long Island. Resigning this charge on account of impaired health, he afterwards resided in Philadelphia until his death, which occurred April 6th, 1876.

Dr. Davidson served the General Assembly as its Permanent Clerk, from 1845 to 1850. For a quarter of a century he was a member of the Board of Foreign Missions; for ten years preceding his decease a Director of Princeton Seminary; and in 1869 was one of our Assembly's delegates to the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland. He was a frequent contributor to the periodical literature of the day, throughout his ministerial life, and up to the time of his death. He published a large number of pamphlets, sermons, etc., and contributed several able articles to the Princeton Review. He was also the author of a number of volumes, the largest and best known of which is probably his "History of the Presbyterian Church in Kentucky." He was a man of fine culture, a scholar, and a writer of great purity and elegance. In private intercourse he was kind and courteous, but also dignified. As a minister of Christ he won, and maintained to the end, a high position. During the last years of his life he was a useful member of the Presbytery of Philadelphia.

Davidson, Robert, D. D., was born in Cecil county, Md., in 1750. He was educated in Newark Academy, Del., where he acted for a time as Tutor. At the age of twenty-four he was appointed Professor of History and Belles Lettres in the University of Pennsylvania, and at the same time (1774), was ordained by the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia, and acted as assistant to Dr. Ewing, in the First Church. In 1775 the young Professor composed a dialogue, in verse, which was recited at Commencement, before the Continental Congress. In July, of the same year, a month after the battle of Bunker Hill, he preached a spicy, patriotic sermon, before several military companies, from the significant text, "And many fell down, for the war was of God." (1 Chron. v, 22). This sermon was printed.

In 1785, being now thirty-five years of age, Dr. Davidson removed to Carlisle, as pastor of the church there, and continued in that connection the remainder of his life—that is, for twenty-seven years. His benignity of disposition and exemplary character helped to heal previously existing alienations, and consolidated all parties, both Old and New Lights, in uninterrupted harmony. At the same time, mainly through the influence of Dr. Rush, he received the appointment of Professor of History and Belles Lettres, and Vice-president in Dickinson College. He was chosen Moderator of the General Assembly in 1796. Upon Dr. Nisbet's decease, in 1804, Dr. Davidson discharged the duties of the office of President, for five years, when he resigned, to devote himself exclusively to his parochial duties. He died, December 13th, 1812, in the sixty-second year of his age.

His reputation as a scholar was equal to his integrity as a man. He was acquainted more or less familiarly with eight languages, was a proficient in music and drawing, and was especially fond of astronomy. He invented a cosmosphere, or compound globe, by which astronomical problems are easily solved. As a preacher, he was clear, didactic, and free from affectation, but not fluent, nor apt to rise to the highest flights of eloquence. As a wise counselor in the courts of the Church, he ranked fairly, if we may judge from the important committees on which his name is found in the minutes of the Old Synod. One of these was a committee of which Drs. Alison and Ewing and Messrs. Blair and Jones were also members, in 1785, to prepare a new and more suitable version of the Psalms.

Dr. Davidson's published writings were a variety of occasional sermons, orations and poems. Of the latter were a geography in verse, which the students committed to memory, and a metrical version of the Psalms, published in 1812.

Davies, David Owen, D. D., was born in the city of Baltimore, Maryland, October 10th, 1834, the youngest child of Thomas and Elizabeth Owen Davies. He was educated in Princeton College and Theological Seminary, and stood conspicuously high in the classes of 1856 to 1859. He was licensed in 1859 and ordained in 1860. He began his ministry in the "Old Duncan Church," which had enjoyed the preaching of the lamented Dr. Stuart Robinson. He next was called to preach in the Central Church, St. Louis, Mo., during the absence of the late Rev. S. P. Anderson, to go on an extensive European tour. He became pastor of the Fifth Street Presbyterian Church of Cincinnati, Ohio in 1860, and so continued until 1863. In the year 1863 he was called to the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church in Paris, Kentucky. From Paris, in 1868, he was called to the pastorate of the Church at Clarksville, Tennessee, where he continued his labors, with great success, until 1871. In that year he was called to the church in Henderson, Kentucky, of which he is now the pastor, and greatly beloved by his people, and highly esteemed by the whole community.

As a preacher Dr. Davies presents the truths of Scripture with great clearness and force. He blends vigorous logic with strong emotion. His sermons abound with marked originality and freshness, and with his clear enunciation he never fails to impress his audience. As a Presbyter, he is faithful and influential, so high toned and courteous as to command not only the respect, but the admiration of those who differ with him. As a writer he is clear, terse, logical, as many of his articles in the reviews and periodicals of our Church show. He is a cultured gentleman, a ripe scholar, an earnest Christian, and his labors have been greatly blessed.

Davies, Rev. Samuel, D. D., was born near Summit Bridge, in the Welsh Tract, in New Castle county, Delaware, November 3d, 1723. He was an only son. His mother, an eminent Christian, had earnestly besought him of heaven, and believing him to be given in answer to prayer, she named him Samuel. After being taught by his mother to read, at the age of ten he was sent to a school at some distance from home, and continued in it two years. Having experienced a change of heart, and made a profession of religion, at the age of fifteen, with the view of entering the ministry, he engaged in literary and theological pursuits under the Rev. Samuel Elton. He was licensed in New Castle Presbytery, July 30th, 1746, at the age of twenty-three, and ordained an evangelist in the same Presbytery, 1747.

Mr. Davies' fervent and glowing pulpit poetry, popular talents, and engaging and impressive address, soon excited general admiration. He went to Hanover,

Va., in April, 1747, and soon obtained of the General Court a license to officiate in four meeting-houses. After preaching assiduously for some time, and not without effect, he returned from Virginia, though earnestly invited to continue his labors. A call to him to settle at Hanover was immediately sent to the Presbytery, but he was about this time seized by symptoms which indicated consumption, and which brought him to the borders of the grave. In this enfeebled state, he determined to spend the remainder of his life in unintermitting endeavors to advance the interests of religion. Being among a people who were destitute of a minister, his indisposition did not repress his exertions. He still preached in the day, while by night his hectic was so severe as sometimes to render him delirious. In the Spring of 1748 a messenger from Hanover visited him, and he thought it his duty to accept the invitation of the people in that place. He hoped that he might live to organize the congregation. His health, however, gradually improved. In October, 1748, three more meeting-houses were licensed, and among his seven congregations, which were in different counties, Hanover, Henrico, Caroline, Louisa, and Goochland, some of them forty miles distant from each other, he divided his labors. His home was in Hanover, about twelve miles from Richmond. His preaching encountered all the obstacles which could arise from blindness, prejudice and bigotry, from profaneness and immorality. He, and those who attended upon his preaching, were denominated new lights by the more zealous Episcopalians; but by his patience and perseverance, his magnanimity and piety, in conjunction with his evangelical and powerful ministry, he triumphed over opposition. Contempt and aversion were gradually turned into reverence. Many were attracted by curiosity to hear a man of such distinguished talents, and he proclaimed to them the most solemn and impressive truths with an energy which they could not resist. It pleased God to accompany these exertions with the efficacy of His Spirit. In about three years, Mr. Davies beheld three hundred communicants in his congregation, whom he considered as real Christians. He had also, in this period, baptized about forty adult negroes, who made such a profession of faith as he judged credible.

In 1754 the Synod of New York, by request of the Trustees of New Jersey College, chose Mr. DAVIES to accompany Gilbert Tennent to Great Britain, to solicit donations for the college. This service he cheerfully undertook, and he executed it with singular spirit and success. He arrived in London, December 25th. The liberal contributions obtained from the patrons of religion and learning placed the college in a respectable condition. After his return to America he entered anew, in 1754 or early in 1755, on his beloved work of preaching the gospel, in Hanover. Here he continued till 1759, when he was chosen President of the college, as successor of Dr. Edwards. He resi-tated in his acceptance of the appointment, for his people were endeared to him, and he loved to be occupied in the various duties of the ministerial office. But repeated applications and the unanimous opinion of the Synod of New York and Philadelphia, at length determined him. He was dismissed from Hanover, May 13th, and entered upon his new office, July 6th, 1759. Here the vigor and versatility of his genius were strikingly displayed. The ample opportunities and demands which he found for the exercise of his talents, gave a new spring to his diligence, and while his active labors were multiplied and arduous, his studies were intense. At the close of January, 1761, he was bled, for a bad cold, and the next day transcribed for the press his sermon on the death of George II. The day following he preached twice, in the chapel. His arm became inflamed, and a violent fever succeeded, to which he fell a victim in ten days. He died, February 4th, 1761, aged 36. His venerable mother, Martha Davies, survived him. When he was laid in the coffin, she gazed at him a few minutes and said, "There is the son of my prayers and my hopes—my only son—my only earthly support. But there is the will of God, and I am satisfied."

Dr. Davies was endowed with the richest intellectual gifts, with a vigorous understanding, a glowing imagination, a fertile invention, united with a correct judgment and a retentive memory. He was bold and enterprising, and destined to excel in whatever he undertook. Yet he was divested of the pride of talents and of science, and, being moulded into the temper of the gospel he consecrated all his powers to the promotion of religion. As President of the College, he possessed an admirable mode of government and instruction. He watched over his pupils with the tender solicitude of a father, and secured equally their reverence and love. He seized every opportunity to inculcate on them the worth of their souls, and the pressing necessity of securing immediately the blessings of salvation.

Dr. Davies was a model of the most sterling oratory. As his personal appearance was august and venerable, yet benevolent and mild, he could address his auditory either with the most commanding authority, or with the most melting tenderness. When he spoke, he seemed to have the glories and terrors of the unseen world in his eye. He seldom preached without producing some visible emotions in great numbers present, and without making an impression on one or more which was never effaced. His printed sermons, which exhibit his sentiments, abound with striking thoughts, with the beauties and elegances of expression, and with the richest imagery.

Davis, Hon. James Lynn, son of Ignatius and Catharine (Lackland) Davis, was born in Montgomery county, Maryland, August 15th, 1809. In early life he removed to Frederick county, Md. He was educated in the Frederick educational institutions, after which he engaged in agricultural pursuits at Mount Hope, and afterward at Clifton, near Frederick City, Md., where he lived the rest of his life. In 1858 he was elected to the Maryland Legislature, in which position he served for some years. He united with the Presbyterian Church in Frederick City, in October, 1831, and was elected and ordained a ruling elder of the same church, in June, 1833, during the pastorate of his wife's brother, Rev. James Garland Hamner, D. D. He held this office for nearly forty years, and took an active interest in a large number of the meetings of his Presbytery and Synod, and served as a Commissioner to the General Assembly. For many years he was superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal and Methodist Protestant Sabbath-schools of Buckeystown, a village near his residence. His death occurred, July 19th, 1872.

Mr. Davis's life was one of honor and usefulness in the community in which he lived, and in both the Church and the State. With the Frederick City Presbyterian Church, in which he was the leading member and most eminent elder for twoscore years, his name is identified, and his fame, as a good man and devoted to good, is known throughout the whole community. He regularly visited every member of the congregation at least once a year, and by his faithful and devoted labors, accomplished much lasting good work for his church. One of his sons, Samuel Hamner Davis, became a Presbyterian minister.

Davis, Samuel S., D. D., was born July 12th, 1793, at Ballston Centre, N. Y. He graduated at Middlebury College in 1812, but afterwards received his first degree, ad eundem, from Union College. After his graduation he took charge of an Academy at Castleton, Vt. After spending a part of the year 1815 in Princeton Seminary, he was Tutor in Union College nearly two years; then returned to the Seminary, and after two years' further study, graduated in 1819. Licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Albany, October 12th, 1819; he soon afterwards was commissioned to collect funds to complete the endowment of a Seminary Professorship, which the Synod of South Carolina and Georgia had resolved to found in connection with the Synod of North Carolina, and for this object he raised a large amount; but before the whole sum was completed, the Synod had embarked in the new effort, to found the Seminary now located at Columbia, S. C. He was ordained to the work of the ministry by the Presbytery of Albany, August 12th, 1821; dismissed to the Presbytery of Harmony, September 13th, 1821, and installed, December 16th, 1821, pastor of the Church at Darien, Ga. This relation was dissolved April 5th, 1823, but during its continuance he had received a considerable accession to the church, to which he had given a decided impulse.

From Darien Mr. Davis went to Camden, S. C., where he supplied the Church then called Bethesda, from March, 1823, for nearly a year, after which he supplied the Church at Augusta, Ga., in connection with the Rev. Dr. Talmage. February 14th, 1827, he was elected pastor of the Church at Camden, S. C., and without accepting the call, served the church as a supply until January 10th, 1833. In that year he was appointed Agent of the General Assembly's Board of Education, and in this capacity raised considerable sums of money, both for the Board of Education and for the Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C. For about eighteen months, in 1841 and 1842, Mr. Davis was Professor of the Latin Language in Oglethorpe University, at Milledgeville, Ga. In 1842 he supplied the Presbyterian Church at his native place, Ballston Centre, about a year. On May 4th, 1845, he was recalled by his former charge at Camden; was installed as its pastor April 3d, 1847, and continued in this relation until April, 1851, with a strong and mutual attachment between him and his people. After his release, he resided in Augusta, Ga., where he took the care and supervision of Springfield Church, a large colored congregation in or near that city, numbering at one time fifteen hundred members, to which he gave a large amount of preaching and valuable counsel. He died June 21st, 1877.

Dr. Davis was a true man, of much generosity and nobleness of nature, and gifted with good judgment. In manners he was a thorough gentleman. He made many and warm friends. He was fond of books, a fair scholar, a highly respectable preacher, an assiduous pastor, and a truly pious man.

Davis, Rev. Samuel Taylor, A. M., M. D., was born in Washington, Pa., on March 4th, 1845. He is the son of John and Martha Davis. He entered the Freshman Class of Washington College in 1863, graduating in Washington and Jefferson College in 1867. Entered the Northwestern Seminary in 1867, remaining until Spring of 1869, taught school in first seminary vacation, and in the Summer of 1869 preached in the churches of Perry and New Salem, Presbytery of Schuyler, O. S.; graduated at Rush Medical College, Chicago, in the class of 1870, licensed by Schuyler Presbytery, on May 4th, 1869; was pastor of Lower Buffalo, Washington Presbytery, April, 1870, to April, 1872; ordained November 15th, 1870, was stated supply of the Hiawatha Church, Presbytery of Highlands, Kansas, from July, 1872, to October, 1874, re-entered Northwestern Seminary in 1874, graduating therefrom April 2d, 1874; became pastor at Hiawatha, Kas., in June, 1874, and continued to September, 1876; was stated supply at Aloha, Ill., from September, 1875, to November, 1877; was stated supply at M. U. C. from November, 1877, to July, 1879; he next stated supply at Mazonie, Ills., July, 1879; was installed pastor at Macomb May 4th, 1880, and continued such until July 31st, 1884, when, in consequence of the general health of his wife, he resigned and served as the pastor of that congregation.

For many years Dr. Davis has had a wife, and had several of his changes were made in consequence of improving it. At length, he became quite vigorous, when his beloved wife showed alarming symptoms of an early decline, and a change of climate became imperative. He parted with the people of Macomb with deep regret. The feeling was mutual. The separation was needed to by all parties, only because duty to his family demanded it.

Dr. Davis is a very warm-hearted, earnest, faithful gospel preacher. His soul is wrapped up in the work of winning souls for Christ and building them up in the faith. As a pastor he is very faithful and tender; none more attentive or sympathetic. He is in the prime of life, and, God willing, has many years of hard work for Christ before him.

Davis, Thomas Kirby, D. D., was born in Chambersburg, Pa., February 11th, 1826. His ancestry, on both sides, were Christian people, fearing God and serving Him, doing what they could to make the world better, and leaving an unsullied record. He graduated at Yale College in 1845, was stated supply in Fayetteville, Pa., 1849-50, ordained by Presbytery of Carlisle, October 20th, 1850; pastor at Bedford and Schellsburg, Pa., 1850-55; stated supply of First Church, San Francisco, Cal., 1855; missionary at Los Angeles, 1855-6; stated supply at Stockton, 1856-7; pastor at Middletown, Pa., 1859-62; stated supply at Minersville, 1862-3; at Mansfield, O., 1863, and pastor 1865-7; Professor in Vermilion Institute, Hayesville, O., 1867-70; stated supply at Hayesville and McKay, 1867, pastor 1868-71; financial secretary of Wooster University, O., 1871; stated supply at Mt. Gilead, 1875-6; stated supply at Loudonville and Perrysville, 1875-79, and pastor of Westminster Church, Wooster, O., 1879.

Dr. Davis still resides in Wooster. Since 1876 he has been a Trustee of the University there, and Secretary of the Board, also Secretary of the Executive Committee. Since 1877 he has been Librarian of the University, the duties of which office he finds congenial to his taste, and for their acceptable performance has admirable qualifications. He is a gentleman of superior scholarly attainments, of genial spirit, and of great energy, and had evident marks of the Divine blessing on his labors in all the congregations which he has served. To the chief work of his life—the promotion of the higher education under Christian influence—he has brought a tact, zeal and perseverance which have greatly added the good cause, and strengthened the institution with which his name is associated.

Day, Henry, Esq., was born in South Hadley, Mass., December 25th, 1820. His father, Phin Day, was one of the Pilgrims who settled in Hartford, Conn. He graduated at Yale College in 1845, had charge of the Classical Academy in Fairfield, Conn., from 1845 until 1847, and in the Fall of 1848 was admitted to the Bar of the city of New York. He was elected deacon of the Presbyterian Church, corner of 19th Street and Fifth Avenue, April 14th, 1853, and elder, February 16th, 1862, and has continued his official connection with the Church till this time.

Mr. Day was a member of the General Assembly which met at St. Louis in 1866, and of the Assembly which met at Albany in 1868, and there strongly advocated the union of the Old and New School Churches, and was appointed by the Assembly as one of the committee to proceed to the New School Assembly, then sitting at Harrisburg, and to lay before that Assembly the views of the Old School Assembly on the subject of union. As a member of the Old School Assembly, in New York, in 1869, he was appointed on the joint committee of the two Assemblies on the plan of union. This committee appointed him its secretary, and after its discussion upon the plan of union, he was directed to draft the articles for the basis of union. This plan was drawn up by the secretary and submitted to the joint committee, who accepted the same after slight modifications. This plan was adopted by the two Assemblies, and afterward, in October, 1869, was ratified at Pittsburg, by the joint meeting of the two Assemblies, amid the rejoicing and thanksgiving of the whole Church.

Mr. Day was for ten years Superintendent of the Sunday-school of the church with which he is connected, and has been earnest in aiding to establish mission churches in destitute parts of the city of New York. He is the author of "The Lawyer Abroad," "From the Pyrennees to the Pillars of Hercules," and of a small volume published by the American Sunday-school Union, entitled "Maria Cheeseman, the Candy Girl." He has for many years been a Director in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, and a Trustee in the Union Theological Seminary, in the city of New York.

Dean, Rev. William Hawley, was born at Patterson, N. Y., July 9th, 1833, and graduated from Lafayette College, Pa., in 1858. After teaching a few years, he graduated at Princeton Seminary in 1863, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Bedford (now Westchester), April 16th, 1862. From May to August of 1863 he preached as stated supply at Green Hill, Del. October 1st, 1863, he began to preach as stated supply at Amagansett, on Long Island, where he was ordained by the Presbytery of Long Island, May 3d, 1864, and installed pastor. This relation was dissolved October 28th, 1866, after which he preached successively in the following places: 1. To Bridgewater Congregational Church (Conn.) from November 4th, 1866, to August 28th, 1867, when he was installed as pastor. From this church he was dismissed June 25th, 1871. 2. To Orange Congregational Church (Conn.) from July 2d, 1871, to March 28th, 1875. 3. To Brooklyn (Cal.) Presbyterian Church, from May 2d, 1875, to November, 21st, 1875, when he was installed pastor. Here his influence was soon and powerfully felt. The Church was greatly strengthened, its membership was increased fourfold, and the affections of the whole people were centered in their pastor with a strength and unanimity seldom equaled. In 1879 and 1880 the gold mines of Arizona were gathering there a large, intelligent and important population. The Board of Domestic Missions was anxious to send an eminently well-qualified man to labor in that field, and Mr. Dean was selected as the man. He was released from his charge at Brooklyn, April 6th, 1880; went at once to Tucson, Arizona, where he arrived in April, having left his family behind him, and entered upon his work with characteristic diligence and vigor. Unused to the climate, he doubtless toiled beyond his strength. July 13th, 1880, he passed away to his heavenly home, his departure being profoundly lamented by the entire population of the town. He was industrious, conscientious, generous and confiding. As a preacher, he was able, solid and instructive. And he was a man of remarkable faith and prayerfulness.

Deerfield Church, New Jersey. A number of Presbyterian families, which came, as there is reason to believe, from New England and Long Island, settled in Deerfield about the year 1732. The names that appear among the earliest records of the church, are Leake, Foster, Davis, More, Garrison. About the year 1737 was erected the original Deerfield Church, an humble log house, standing south of the present building. The place where it stood has long since been filled with graves. The log church stood until 1771, when the present building was erected. In that humble temple precious seasons were enjoyed. Some of the most eloquent men of the day, such as Samuel Blair, Gilbert Tennent, supplied the pulpit at different times. Other ministers also assisted the little flock, and the work of God prospered in their hands. Such was the infancy of the church. With such a baptism was it baptized.

The first pastor of the church was the Rev. Andrew Hunter, who, having supplied the congregations of Greenwich and Deerfield for a period of time, was ordained and installed their pastor, September 4th, 1746. Mr. Hunter gave up Deerfield in 1760, and from this time these churches became two distinct organizations. For four years, from that date, Deerfield was without a pastor, and of that interval nothing is known. Then, in 1764, came the Rev. Simon Williams, whether as pastor, or not, is not known, as the minutes of the Session during his time are not to be found. There is a tradition that God graciously visited the church under his ministry. Once Mr. Williams is said to have ridden up to a certain house in his parish, on horseback, and, approaching the lady of the house, remarked, "Madam, I have selected your funeral text;" and, in reply to her inquiry, "What is it?" he answered, "You will find it in Acts, ix, 31: 'Then had the churches rest.'" It seems that he had heard about the mischievous talk of this woman, and determined thus to rebuke her. His stay in Deerfield was brief—only about two years.

The Rev. Enoch Green was installed pastor of Deerfield Church, June 9th, 1767. He was a man of superior learning and intellect. During his time the present church building, or rather the building of which it is the enlargement, was erected, in 1771. In the old brick parsonage, on the eastern side of the road, nearer the stream than the present building, he sustained a successful and somewhat celebrated classical school. He was pastor of the church over nine years; died December 2d, 1776, and was buried beneath the church. The Rev. John Brainerd of whom, and most others noticed here, there are sketches in this volume, took charge of the church in 1777. He was the brother of that devoted man of God, David Brainerd, and his successor as missionary to the Indians. He was an able preacher, a man of warm affections, and of eminent personal holiness.

Dr. Robert Smith, Mr. Law, Mr. Faintout, and Mr. Foster, at different times, supplied the pulpit, and Mr. Cowles for the Winter of 1792-93.

In 1810 the church was incorporated, and the names of the first trustees appointed are Josiah Seeley, Samuel Thompson, Jeremiah Parvin, Jonathan Smith, and David O. Garrison. The Rev. John Davenport, an amiable and excellent man, who had labored for many years in different parts of Long Island and Bedford, N. Y., was installed pastor at Deerfield, August 13th, 1795, and his ministry during his pastorate, which terminated October 16th, 1805, on account of feeble health, was quite successful.

The Rev. R. Hamill Davis, in a discourse delivered in connection with the Centennial exercises of Deerfield Church, in 1871, just a century from the laying

DEERFIELD PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, NEW JERSEY

After a brief pastorate of four years his dust was laid beneath the church in the faithful service of which he had passed away.

Rev. Joseph Montgomery, and others, officiated as supplies until June 25th, 1783, when the Rev. Simeon Hyde was ordained and installed. Only seven weeks after his installation he was cut down by the relentless hand of death, in the bloom of life, and his remains were buried in the churchyard, where a slab marks their resting place. Again the church depended on supplies, until June 20th, 1786, when a Mr. William Pickles was installed, an Englishman by birth, an eloquent preacher, but, according to the record, a bad man. Now follows a long period of time, from 1787 to 1793, in which the church was once more left without a pastor. Of this period but little can be gathered. Not a minute of sessional meetings is on record. It is generally known that of the corner-stone of the present church edifice, thus refers to "the fathers, as they lived and worshiped at the beginning of the present century"—

"The church was then a square building, with high galleries on three sides, a narrow octagonal pulpit elevated on a post, with a sounding board suspended by a rod overhead. There was a large double front door on the eastern side of the house, fronting the road, with a window on each side of the door. There was another door at the south end of the church, corresponding to the present front door, and aisles of brick leading from each door. In the centre of the church stood a large cannon stove. In one of the aisles lay a marble slab, over the remains of the Rev. Enoch Green. Under the same aisle, then unmarked by a slab, were also the remains of the Rev. John Brainerd. From all directions, when Sabbath morning arrived, the people would gather at the House of God. They came in homespun clothes. They spent their Winters in spinning flax for Summer, and in Summer they would prepare the wool for Winter. Every farmer had his flock of sheep and raised his flax. They would come to church, whole families, in their open wagons, or individuals on foot or horseback. Long distances would they come, in storm and in sunshine, as well in December as in June. It mattered not to them. God's House must not be neglected. If evening meetings were to be held, a walk of two or three miles was nothing. They came to church, each with his candle, and thus would they light the house. They brought with them to the sanctuary their foot-stoves in those old times. In a neighborly way they would occasionally accommodate one another, by passing them over the pews. Sometimes, after traveling many miles, they would replenish their little stoves from the old cannon stove in the centre of the church. Morning services would commence at ten o'clock. Two choristers, standing near the pulpit, would lead the music. At noon they would take a recess of fifteen minutes, and if it were Summer-time, gather round the spring, at the foot of the yard, partake of its refreshing waters, and enjoy their lunch; then repair to the church again, listen to another sermon, and return home to keep the Fourth Commandment; and they observed it strictly and conscientiously. They were "Keepees at home" on the blessed day. Parents gathered their children around them in the afternoon, and examined them about the sermon. They read the Word of God together, and recited the Catechism. Once a month the children were required to come forward in the church, and taking their stand before the pulpit, to say their Catechism to the pastor, in the presence of the congregation."

Returning now to the church's history, we find its records from 1805 to 1808 brief and unsatisfactory. October 20th, 1808, the Rev. Nathanael Reeves, who came from Long Island, was installed at Deerfield, and during his pastorate, which terminated April 17th, 1817, the church grew steadily in strength. The Rev. Francis S. Ballentine was pastor from June 23d, 1819, until June 8th, 1821, and during his ministry (1822) a season of refreshing came, as the result of which a large accession was made to the church. Mr. Ballentine was succeeded, April 25th, 1826, by the Rev. Alex. McFarland, who, after four years' service, was called to a Professorship in Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa. After him the Rev. John Burt supplied the pulpit acceptably for some months, but was never pastor. He went from Deerfield, it is stated, to edit "The Presbyterian," and was afterwards settled at Blackwoodtown. The Rev. G. D. McCueun was pastor of the church for five years, from November 9th, 1831, and it grew under his care. Next came the Rev. Benjamin Tyler, of Greenwich, who was installed October 18th, 1837, and after a successful pastorate, resigned the charge February 19th, 1842, on account of failing health. The Rev. Jacob W. E. Kerr became pastor August 16th, 1842, and continued so until May 1st, 1855. He was an able preacher, a faithful pastor, and God blessed his labors. The Rev. Thomas W. Cattell was installed pastor October 9th, 1855. During his connection with the congregation the church was enlarged to its present size, and in 1858 a precious revival of religion greatly strengthened the church. He resigned February 9th, 1860. On June 4th, 1861, the Rev. R. Hamill Davis was installed pastor, and after laboring earnestly and successfully until July, 1875, asked for a dissolution of the pastoral relation, that he might take charge of the Young Ladies' Seminary, Lawrenceville, N. J., of which he is still Principal. Mr. Davis was succeeded at Deerfield by the Rev. Mr. Dinsmore, Rev. E. P. Heberton, and the Rev. J. D. Hunter, the present pastor.

Deffenbaugh, Rev. George L., the youngest child of Jacob and Sarah (Hertzog) Deffenbaugh, of Fayette county, Pa., was born October 26th, 1850. Having completed the course at Waynesburg College, Pa., he spent two years (1873-75) studying in Europe. April 15th, 1874 he matriculated as a student of philosophy in the University at Leipsic, Germany, and in October of the same year he began the study of theology. After returning to this country he spent a year at home, and then entered the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny, whence he graduated in April, 1878. The course of lectures he attended at Leipsic was accepted as an equivalent for the first year in the Seminary, and he was admitted to the middle year. In the Fall of 1877, he was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Redstone, and on October 1st of the following year, being under appointment by the Board of Foreign Missions, he was ordained as an evangelist by the same Presbytery. A few days after his ordination he left for Idaho Territory, where he has since been laboring among the Nez Percés and neighboring Indian tribes.

Denny, Rev. David, was the third son of a Revolutionary soldier who fell in battle, when his eldest son, contending at his side, was captured by the enemy. He graduated at Dickinson College, during the Presidency of Dr. Charles Nisbet, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Carlisle, about the year 1792. He was first installed over two congregations in Path Valley, where he continued until the year 1800, in the enjoyment of the esteem and affections of a much beloved people. In the year just mentioned he was transferred to the pastoral charge of the Falling Spring Church, in Chambersburg, Pa., which he retained until the termination of his public ministrations—a period of thirty-eight years. His death occurred December 16th, 1845.

Mr. Denny possessed a mind of a strong and discerning order, always governed by candor and sincerity, and warmed by the love of truth. His views were expressed in the language of simplicity and earnestness, neither adorned nor obscured by the garish of imagery or the flashes of rhetoric. Modesty and humility were interwoven with the very texture of his heart, and its liveliest sympathies were always in expansion for the sick, the suffering, and the desolate. Neither inclemency of weather nor transient illness were sufficed to detain him from the exercises of the pulpit, and he enjoyed in no ordinary degree the esteem and affections of the people among whom he labored. He was actuated, in social intercourse, by a manly, tolerant and liberal spirit. In addition to his active interest in other Christian enterprises, he took a prominent part in the organization of "The Franklin County Bible Society."

Denny, Hon. Harmar, was born at Pittsburg, Pa., May 13th, 1791. He was the eldest son of Major Ebenezer Denny, of the Revolutionary War, a trusted friend of the Government, and the first Mayor of Pittsburg. His mother had been Nancy Wilkins, daughter of Captain John Wilkins, of Revolutionary memory, and sister of Quartermaster-General John Wilkins and the Hon. William Wilkins, United States Senator, Minister to Russia, Secretary of War, etc. The son was named for a bosom friend and a chivalrous brother officer, to whose staff the father had belonged, and the name ever sat gracefully upon him. His youth, with its preparatory studies, was spent in Pittsburg. Afterwards he entered Dickinson College and graduated in 1813. He then read law, and in November of 1816 was admitted to the Bar of his native city, after which he was taken into partnership by Henry Baldwin, Esq., who had been his law preceptor, and ultimately a Judge of the United States Supreme Court. Soon Mr. Denny became a public man, widely and favorably known. He faithfully represented his county in the State Legislature, and was the friend of internal improvements. He was a worthy member of Congress from December 7th, 1819, to March 3d, 1827, inclusive, and the staunch advocate of a protective tariff. He was also a member of the Reform Convention of 1827 and 1828 that formed the new Constitution of Pennsylvania, and he gave to that important work his close attention and best judgment. Afterwards, in the councils of his native city, and in other offices of trust and honor, he held a prominent and influential place, and encouraged whatever was for the welfare of the community. He greatly favored the construction and success of the Pennsylvania Railroad, and subsequently, was the efficient President of the Pittsburg and Steubenville Railroad. He also encouraged and benefited the farmer, by the introduction of improved implements of agriculture, and by the importation and raising of valuable stock. He was fully identified with the cause of education, was a trustee of the Western University of Pennsylvania at Pittsburg, as well as one of its Board of Inspectors, and likewise a director of the Western Theological Seminary, in Allegheny. And, as a recognition of his character, services and merit, in 1818, he was elected a member of the American Philosophical Society, at Philadelphia, founded by such men as Benjamin Franklin.

When a young man, Mr. Denny connected himself with the First Presbyterian Church in Pittsburg, under the ministry of the Rev. Dr. Francis Herron, and never was his Christian profession tarnished or discredited by any act of his subsequent life. His talents and piety, combined with an ample fortune, made his church relation one of great usefulness. In April 12th, of 1829, he was ordained a ruling elder in the same church, and this honorable and responsible position he very acceptably filled during the remainder of his life, acquiring and retaining the esteem and confidence of all who knew him. He was thoroughly in sympathy with whatever related to the material and spiritual prosperity of the church; kindly and generously sustained and encouraged his pastor; was the liberal friend of the benevolent operations of the church and of the day; and was privileged to share in some extensive and memorable revivals. As a member of the Church Session and higher courts his utterances commanded great respect and appreciation. Though unassuming, yet he was a decided follower of Christ. Hence, when a member of Congress, he was also a valued member of the Congressional Prayer Meeting—a meeting commenced and sustained by such reliable representatives as were acknowledged Christians, and who realized in their high position the duty and privilege and importance of prayer.

On the 25th of November, 1817, Mr. Denny married Miss Elizabeth F. O'Hara, the accomplished daughter of General James and Mary (Carson) O'Hara, of Pittsburg; and the children of this very congenial relation became successively members of the church, as have also several of the grandchildren, and some of them occupy responsible and leading positions in the church and community. Mr. Denny's home was filially and socially attractive, and he beautifully honored the family covenant. Morning and evening, day by day, he faithfully maintained the worship of God among the members of his household—fully and cordially supported by a faithful and loving wife—and his transparent life of Christian consistency commended the great importance of personal piety. His character was well established and symmetrical. No one ever questioned his rigid integrity, his profound sense of honor and honesty, the moral purity of his life, or the perfect sincerity of his religious professions. He was a person, too, of very prepossessing features; whose appearance, however, had become prematurely venerable. He was erect and gentlemanly in his bearing; and though somewhat reserved and dignified, yet a man of genuine modesty and amiability, entirely free from all pretension, and eminently kind and affable. In the several spheres of life—domestic, social, civil and ecclesiastical—he was truly and impressively a good man, and his entire life was without reproach.

His career was not a long one, but an active and useful one; and his is the longest that best answers life's great purposes. After a lingering and painful illness, which he was graciously enabled to bear with serene resignation, cheered by the precious hopes of the Gospel, and soothed by the affectionate attentions of those near and dear to him—he was removed, by the ministry of death, to a higher and better life, January 29th, 1852, in the fifty-eighth year of his age.

Denton, Rev. Richard. In the history of early Presbyterianism in this country the name of Richard Denton should have a permanent and prominent place. The Rev. Peter D. Oakley, of Springfield, L. I., N. Y., by whom this article was written, says: He was born in Yorkshire, England, in 1586. He graduated at Cambridge University in 1623, and then for seven years was the Presbyterian minister of Coley Chapel, parish of Halifax, in the northern part of England. By the intolerant spirit of the times which led to the Act of Uniformity, he felt compelled to relinquish his charge, and to emigrate to America. This was probably about 1630, and in company with John Winthrop and Sir Richard Saltonstall. The Rev. Mr. Alvord, speaking of the first settlers of Hempstead, says, "They were among the earliest inhabitants of New England, coming, as we have seen, through Wethersfield, from Watertown, in Massachusetts, and from that noted company who arrived with John Winthrop and Sir Richard Saltonstall." Mr. Denton first came to Watertown, Mass.; then in 1635 he commenced the settlement of Wethersfield; and in 1641 his name appears among the early settlers of Stamford; and then in 1641 he is recorded as one of the original proprietors of Hempstead, L. I. A part of his flock accompanied him from England, and also settled with him as their pastor; the descendants of some of them remain there to the present day. Thus a Presbyterian Church was established in Hempstead, L. I., in 1641. But if, as indicated above, a colony of Presbyterians came with him from the old country, and followed him till their final settlement on Long Island, he, as a Presbyterian minister with a Presbyterian colony, the inference can scarcely admit of a doubt that he preached to a Presbyterian congregation from their first arrival, in 1630, till their permanent settlement on the Island. Mr. Denton served the church till 1659, when he returned to England, and spent the latter part of his life in Essex, where he died, in 1662, aged seventy-six years.

Mr. Denton had a mind of more than ordinary gifts and attainments. He was from the very first noted as a man of "leading influence." Rev. Mr. Heywood, his successor in office at Halifax, speaks of him as a "good minister of Jesus Christ, and affluent in his worldly circumstances." In a report of the church of New Netherlands in 1657, by Revs. John Megapolensis and Drisnis, to the Classis of Amsterdam, occurs the following passage: "At Hempstead, about seven Dutch miles from here, there are some Independents; also many of our persuasion and Presbyterians. They have also a Presbyterian preacher, named Richard Denton, an honest, pious and learned man."

Gov. Stuyvesant, in a letter to the people of Hempstead, under date July 29th, 1657, says: "About the continuance of Mr. Denton among you we shall use all the endeavors we can." Cotton Mather speaks of him as "our pious and learned Mr. Richard Denton, a Yorkshire man who, having watered Halifax, in England, with his fruitful ministry, was, by a tempest, hurled into New England, where his doctrine dropped as the rain. Though he were a little man, yet had a great soul. His well-accomplished mind was an Iliad in a nutshell. He wrote a system, entitled 'Soliloquia Sacra,' so accurately describing the fourfold state of man that judicious persons who have seen it very much lament the Church's being deprived of it."

THE CHURCH OF JAMAICA, L. I.

"Jamaica was settled by Presbyterians." Before Mr. Denton left Hempstead the church was troubled with sharp contentions between the Independents and Presbyterians. In 1657 Governor Stuyvesant visited Hempstead, and used his influence to persuade Mr. Denton to continue his ministry there, his own Church affinities inclining him to favor the Presbyterian form of government. But, the troubles increasing, Mr. Denton left, and the Independents gained the control, and had a stated supply for a number of years. Then, through these continued dissensions, the large increase of Quakerism, and the establishment of Episcopacy under the English rule, the Presbyterian Church gradually declined, and passed out of sight as an organized body. The Rev. Mr. Jenney writes, September, 1729: "A few Presbyterians at Hempstead have an unordained preacher to officiate for them, whom they could not support were it not for the assistance which they receive from their brethren in the neighboring parish of Jamaica."

This, as far as the writer can ascertain, is the latest mention made of the existence of any Presbyterian church at Hempstead till after the lapse of many years, when the present flourishing church was organized.

But the Presbyterian tree planted by the hand of Richard Denton, through the Divine blessing, has never ceased to bear fruit. Two sons of Mr. Denton, Nathanael and Daniel, with a number of their Presbyterian brethren, formed a colony, and on the 21st of March, 1656, purchased from the Indians a large tract of land, now included in the village and town of Jamaica. As might be expected, they immediately established religious worship. In a memorial of the inhabitants of Jamaica, signed by Nathanael Denton and others, addressed to Governor Hunter, we find the following statement: "This town of Jamaica, in the year 1656, was purchased from the Indian natives by divers persons, Protestants, dissenters, in the manner of worship, from the forms used in the Church of England, who have called a minister of our own profession to officiate among them, who continued so to do during the time of the Dutch Government." This clearly indicates that they had preaching service from their first settlement in the town, and consequently the origin of the church at Jamaica dates back to 1656. They then, with commendable zeal, soon took measures for the erection of a parsonage, as the following extract shows: December 20th, 1662, a committee was appointed to "make ye rates for ye minister's house, and transporting ye minister." The exact date of the Rev. Zachariah Walker's call is not given, but on March 24, 1663, the parsonage was assigned to him and his heirs. From this date to the present day there is a clear record of every minister who has served the church, together with the time of their service. George McNash, the eighth pastor, was one of the original members of the Mother Presbytery of Philadelphia. That this church has always been a Presbyterian Church there seems no room for doubt. It is a denominational in all the records where it is named. It has had a bench of ruling elders from time to time. On November 25th, 1700, it was voted to continue Mr. John Hobbes, at that time among us in the way of the ministry, provided he be ordained "according to ye Rule & way of the Presbyterian way, & it is the unanomos mind of the towne that he be ordained Accordingly."

This church has ever been a fruitful vine. In 1702 there were more than a hundred families, noted for their intelligent piety and Christian deportment. They had a stone church worth £600 and a parsonage valued at £1500, the glebe consisting of an orchard and two hundred acres of land. Besides being the mother of other churches in the vicinity, it contributed families to build up the First Presbyterian Church in New York City, and subsequently Rutgers Street Church; also the founding of Elizabeth City, and largely the Presbyterian Church of Hopewell, N. J. Since 1816, twenty-seven have gone from the bosom of this church into the ministry of the gospel.

The above statement of facts, which I have verified by personal examination of the authentic sources here mentioned, seems to indicate that, laying aside all merely presumptive or inferential suppositions, and confining ourselves to documentary evidence, Richard Denton was one of the very first Presbyterian ministers in the country, and the Church of Jamaica, Queen's county, N. Y., is the oldest coastal Presbyterian Church in the United States. Sources of information; Thompson's His. of L. I.; Woodbridge's His. Discourse; Onderdonk's His. of Queen's County; McDonald's Ch. His.; N. Y. State Doc. His.; Moore's Early His. of Hempstead; Jamaica Town Records. (See Memoir, Francis.)

Derry Church. This venerable structure stands on the line of the Lebanon Valley Railroad, at Derry Station, within the present limits of Dauphin county, Pa. It is a weather-beaten log edifice, erected as early as 1729, the congregation having been organized previous to 1725. It is located on what was then termed, in the old Penn patents, the "Barrens of Derry." The building is constructed of oak logs, about two feet thick, which are covered over with hemlock boards on the outside. The inside is in tolerable preservation, the material used in the construction of the pews and floors being yellow pine, cherry and oak. The iron work is of the most primitive and antique description, and the heavy hand-wrought nails, by which the hinges are secured to the pews and entrance doors, are extremely tenacious and difficult to loosen. The window-glass was originally imported from England, but few panes, however, remain. In the interior, pegs are placed in the wall, and were used by the sturdy pioneers to hang their rifles upon, as attacks by the Indians, in the Provincial days, were of frequent occurrence, and there is still to be seen many a hostile bullet imbedded in the solid oak walls. The pulpit is quite low and narrow, crescent-shaped, and is cut red by narrow steps from the East side. Above it, on the south side, is a large window, which contains thirty-eight panes of glass of different sizes. The sash is made of pewter, and was brought from England. The communion service, which is still preserved, consists of four mugs and platters, of pewter, manufactured in London, and presented to the church by some Dissenting English friends one hundred and fifty years ago. At the main entrance lies a large stone, as a stoop, which is greatly worn by the tread of the thousand who have passed over it. About thirty paces northwest stands the Session House and pastor's study during the days of public worship. The burial ground is a few yards north of the study, and is enclosed with a stone wall, capped and neatly built. There is only one entrance, which is at the centre of the west side. The Rev. Robert Evans, Church missionary, ministered to the congregation during its early years, having founded the church. He died in Virginia, in 1727. Rev. William Bertram was the first regular minister. His remains lie in the graveyard, near the southwest corner. He died, May 24, 1746. His successor, Rev. John Roan, is buried near by, dying in October, 1775. Many ministers of note have preached at Derry, among whom were the Rev. David Brainerd, Rev. Charles Beatty, and that galaxy of early missionaries, Anderson, Evans, McMillan, Duffield, Gray, the Tenents, Carmichael, etc. At present no services are held in Derry Church.

OLD DERRY CHURCH.

De Veuve, Rev. Prentiss, the second son of Daniel De Veuve, of the Canton of Neuchâtel, Switzerland, and Julia M. Prentiss, was born on Staten Island, July 28th, 1833. He was educated at the High School, Lawrenceville, N. J., and graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1853; from the Princeton Theological Seminary in 1857. He was ordained and settled at Ewing, N. J., in October, 1857, and remained pastor until May, 1864, when he took charge of the Second Presbyterian Church, Germantown, Phila., Pa. Resigning that charge in the Fall of 1856, he succeeded Dr. Plummer in the Second Church of Pottsville, in the Spring of 1857, and in 1858, after serving the United First and Second churches of Pottsville for six months, he moved to Newark, N. J., and was settled over the Park Presbyterian Church, succeeding Dr. Joel Parker. His health failing in 1879, he resigned that church and was absent in Europe and the East for fourteen months. Returning home in 1880, he was called, in the Spring of 1881, to minister to the First Presbyterian Church of Dayton, Ohio, and accepted their call in October of that year. In this charge he still continues. Mr. De Veuve is a faithful and attractive preacher. As a pastor he is devoted to his work. He is of a quiet, retiring disposition, has enjoyed the Divine blessing upon his labors, and is highly esteemed by those who know him.

DeWitt, John, D. D., was born at Harrisburg, Pa., October 10th, 1812, and after graduating at New Jersey College in 1861, entered upon the study of law. He pursued his theological studies at Union Seminary, New York, and was ordained by the Third Presbytery of New York, June 9th, 1865. He was pastor at Irvington, N. Y., 1865-69; of the Central Congregational Church, Boston, Mass., 1869-76; pastor-elect of the Third Presbyterian Church, Pittsburg, Pa., 1876; and pastor of the Tenth Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, from 1876 to 1882, when he accepted his present position—Professor of Ecclesiastical History, in Lane Seminary, Cincinnati. Dr. DeWitt is a cultivated and genial gentleman; his gifts, as a sermonizer, are of a high order; he is a graceful and forcible writer. His paper before the Second General Presbyterian Council, in Philadelphia, in 1880, on "The Worship of the Reformed Churches," was prepared with great skill, and received with marked favor. His qualifications for the important chair he now fills are undoubted.

De Witt, William R., D. D., was born at Rhinebeck, N. Y., February 25th, 1792. His ancestors were among the first immigrants from Holland to New Netherlands, in 1623. His early years were spent in commercial pursuits, but, becoming a subject of Divine grace when eighteen years of age, he studied for the ministry with Dr. Alexander Proudfit, of Salem, N. Y. His studies were, however, interrupted by his patriotism, which led him to volunteer in the War of 1812 against Great Britain. He witnessed Commodore McDonough's victory on Lake Champlain, September 11th, 1814. After the close of the war he graduated at Union College, and completed his theological studies under Dr. John M. Mason, of New York. In 1818 he was called to the Presbyterian Church of Harrisburg, Pa., and installed the following year by the Presbytery of Carlisle. Though invited to settle elsewhere, he preferred not to change. His ministry was highly successful, and the church, under his care, grew in numbers, efficiency and influence. For half a century he was a power in the surrounding region. "His name was a tower of strength." In 1854 he felt the necessity of taking a colleague, Rev. T. H.

Robinson, D. D., now his successor, and in 1865 was obliged to give up all active duties. Two years afterward, December 23d, 1867, he quietly breathed his last, in the seventy-sixth year of his age.

Dr. De Witt was a model preacher and pastor. He did not believe in zeal without knowledge, and while he gathered large numbers into the Church he was careful to indoctrinate them thoroughly, not only from the pulpit, but by patient drilling in the Shorter Catechism. He was of a dignified presence; his voice was mellifluous, and his manner was bland, persuasive and deferential. He knew how to conceal the iron hand beneath the velvet glove. His position was peculiarly trying. Placed in the capital of a great State, he was called to preach, not before an intelligent congregation only, but also before multitudes of strangers from all parts of the country—before legislators, high officers of government and members of the learned professions. But his pulpit preparations were always so carefully made that he commanded the respect and esteem of all classes. In consequence of his peculiar traits of character he was able to exert a quiet but potent influence over the leading minds with which he was brought in contact. The Rev. Dr. John DeWitt, of Lane Seminary, is his son.

Dibble, Rev. Sheldon, was born in Skaneateles, New York, January 26th, 1809. He graduated at Hamilton College, in 1827, and was ordained at Utica, N. Y., by Oneida Presbytery, October 6th, 1830. He was a missionary at Hilo, Sandwich Islands, 1831-36, and Professor in the Theological Seminary, Lahainaluna, Sandwich Islands, 1836-45, at which place he died, June 23d, 1845. Mr. Dibble published "Lectures on Missions," about 1837; "History of American Missions in the Sandwich Islands," 1839; "Thoughts from Abroad," 1841.

Dickey, Charles Andrews, D. D., son of John R. Dickey and Margaret De Hass Dickey, was born in Wheeling, Virginia, December 25th, 1848. He graduated at Washington College, Pa., in 1868, and studied divinity at the United Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa. He was pastor of the Fourth United Presbyterian Church, Allegheny, Pa., from 1869 to 1867, where he was greatly beloved by his congregation, and his labors were largely blessed. In the latter year he received a unanimous call to the First Presbyterian Church, St. Louis, Mo., which he accepted. This pastorate, which continued eight years, was a very happy one, and fruitful of good results, in the enlargement and strengthening of the congregation. In 1875 he was unanimously called to the Calvary Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, where, under his ministry, the church has sustained its previous character and reputation. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by Princeton College, in 1874.

Dr. Dickey is a gentleman of attractive social qualities. As a preacher he follows the "old paths," and is solemn, instructive, impressive, always making it a point to unfold and enforce gospel truth, instead of indulging in sensational display or vain speculations. As a pastor he is eminently faithful. As a Presbyter he is active and earnest. He is largely identified with the general work of his Denomination. He is a Director of the Union Theological Seminary, of New York, and a member of the Presbyterian Board of Publication. He has several times been a Commissioner to the General Assembly. From its organization he has been a Trustee of the Presbyterian Hospital, and is, at present, President of its Board.

Dickey, Dr. Ebenezer, was born near Oxford, Chester county, Pa., March 12th, 1772. He graduated in the University of Pennsylvania in 1792. He was settled over Oxford and Octorara churches by the Associate Reformed Presbytery, but in May, 1822, came into connection with the General Assembly, along with Dr. Mason, Dr. Junkin and others. He remained pastor of Octorara till 1800, and of Oxford, though tempted by other and more lucrative calls, until his death, May, 31st, 1831.

'A man he was to all the country dear,
 As Laysan's, and his pipe and shawl;
 None to him was he, nor his gaily crew
 None to him, for he wished to change his place.'

As a preacher Dr. Dickey was clear and well informed, preaching with solemnity and unctious, without any straining after oratorical effect. His manners were genial and unassuming. He was esteemed as a wise and safe counsellor, and his opinions had great weight in the Church courts. In short, he filled his niche well, as a useful and respected rural divine. He published little, only a tract, an essay and "Travels," in the Christian Advocate.

Dickey, John Miller, D. D., was a son of the Rev. Ebenezer Dickey, D. D., and Jane Miller, daughter of John Miller, Esq., of Philadelphia. He was born at Oxford, Pa., December 15th, 1806. He graduated at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., in 1821, and whilst a student there united with the First Church of that place, in his seventeenth year. In the same year in which he graduated he entered Princeton Seminary, and after taking a full course of study, graduated there in 1827. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle, May 17th, 1827. Under a commission from the Board of Domestic Missions, he spent the year 1828 in missionary work in the northeastern counties of Pennsylvania. The year 1829 was spent by him in labors in Florida and the southern part of Georgia. On May 19th, 1830, he was ordained by the Presbytery of New Castle, and installed pastor of the church at New Castle, Del. This pastoral relation was dissolved by the Presbytery April 8th, 1832, he having accepted a call to the pastorate of the two churches of Oxford, Pa., and Upper West Nottingham, where he was installed June 15th, 1832, and where he labored assiduously and successfully until April 9th, 1856, when he was released from the charge. For fifteen years, while pastor, he was also Principal of Oxford Female Seminary.

Dr. Dickey was largely instrumental in originating the Ashmun Institute, which afterwards developed into Lincoln University, at Oxford, and from the year 1851 to his death he was President of the Board of Trustees of that Institution. He always felt a profound interest in the African race, and was a zealous and efficient friend to a multitude of colored young men struggling for an education. He was a true benefactor whom many of these can never forget. In no small degree, Lincoln University, so long as it exists, will stand as a monument to his indefatigable zeal in their behalf. From 1858 until the time of his decease, Dr. Dickey was a member of the Board of Directors of Princeton Seminary, and for several years was Secretary of that Board. He died in Philadelphia, very suddenly, March 21st, 1878, in the seventy-second year of his age. He was an amiable, warm-hearted and genial gentleman, an excellent preacher, and was greatly loved and respected by all who knew him.

Dickey, Rev. William, was the son of Robert and Margaret (Hillhouse) Dickey, of York county, South Carolina. He was born December 6th, 1774. His parents removed to Kentucky, where he grew to manhood. With much self-denial and difficulty he obtained an education at Nashville, Tenn., and, October 5th, 1802, was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Transylvania. He was soon after ordained, and labored fourteen years with the churches of Salem and Bethany, in Kentucky. He thence removed to Washington, Lafayette county, Ohio, and soon after to Bloomingburg, in the same State, where he labored in the ministry exactly forty years. He organized the church there, November 22d, 1817, and preached his last sermon to it November 22d, 1857. Before removing to Ohio, and for some time after, he performed much missionary work, traveling through what was then the thinly-settled wilderness, to gather churches and preach the gospel wherever he found opportunity. Mr. Dickey served God in the ministry of reconciliation for fifty-five years. It may be truly said, as descriptive of his ministry, "that he knew nothing among men save Jesus Christ and him crucified."

Dickinson, Baxter, D. D., was born in Amherst, Mass., April 14th, 1795. He graduated from Yale College in 1817, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1821. He was pastor of the Congregational Church at Longmeadow, Mass., 1823-9; of the Third Presbyterian Church, Newark, N. J., 1829-35; Professor of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral Theology in Lane Seminary, 1835-39; Professor of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral Theology in Auburn Seminary, 1839-47, and acting Professor at Andover Seminary, in the same chair, in 1848. Subsequently he was Agent and Secretary of the American and Foreign Christian Union, at Boston, Mass., 1850-9. He resided at Lake Forest, Ill., 1859-68, afterward in Brooklyn, N. Y., where he died December 7th, 1875. Dr. Dickinson was an eminent scholar, an admirable instructor, and successful in his pastoral charges. He wrote the "Auburn Declaration," and was Moderator of the General Assembly at Philadelphia, in 1839.

Dickinson, Jonathan, D D, the first President of New Jersey College, was born in Hatfield, Mass., April 23d, 1688. He graduated at Yale, in 1706, and in 1708 was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Elizabethtown, N. J. Of this church he was for nearly forty years the joy and glory. The charter of the College of New Jersey, which had never yet been carried into operation, was enlarged by Governor Belcher, October 23d, 1746, and Mr. Dickinson was appointed President. The Institution commenced at Elizabethtown, but it did not long enjoy the advantages of his superintendence, for it pleased God to call him away from life, October 7th, 1747, aged fifty-nine. His last words were: "Many days have passed between God and my soul, in which I have solemnly dedicated myself to Him, and, I trust, what I have committed unto Him He is able to keep until that day."

Dr. Dickinson was a most solemn, weighty and moving preacher; a uniform advocate of the distinguishing doctrines of grace, industrious, indefatigable and successful in his ministerial labors. His person was manly and of full size; his aspect grave and solemn, so that the wicked seemed to tremble in his presence. As a friend of literature, he was also eminently useful. His writings possess a very high degree of merit. They are designed to unfold the wonderful method of redemption, and to excite men to that cheerful consecration of all their talents to their Maker, to that careful avoidance of sin and practice of godliness, which will exalt them to glory. "The most important are his "Discourses on the Reasonableness of Christianity," and on the "Five Points," in answer to Whitby. An octavo volume of his works was published at Edinburgh, in 1794. Dr. Erskine said the British Isles had produced no such writers on divinity in the eighteenth century as Dickinson and Edwards.

Dickinson, Rev. Richard Salter Storrs, eldest son of Professor Baxter Dickinson, was born in Longmeadow, Mass., April 3d, 1821. He graduated from Amherst College in 1844, and studied theology at Auburn and Union, N. Y., Seminaries. He was ordained pastor of Houston Street Presbyterian Church, New York city, by the Third Presbytery of New York, March 28th, 1849, and continued in this relation until 1854. He was associate pastor with the Rev. Albert Barnes, of the First Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, 1854-5. In 1856 he started on a tour of Europe, preparatory to taking charge of the American Chapel in Paris, which had recently been established by Dr. Kirk, acting for the American and Foreign Christian Union. He died at Edinburgh, Scotland, August 24th, 1856.

Dickinson, Rev. Richard W., D D, was born in New York, November 10th, 1804. He graduated at Yale College in 1825, and abandoning the purpose of studying law, entered Princeton Theological Seminary. He was ordained and began to study the Second Presbytery of New York, in 1827, and was settled over the Church in Lancaster, Pa., November, 1829. Here his ministry was highly successful. His preaching was pungent and powerful, and a revival ensued, but his voice failing he was compelled to resign, in 1831. He spent some time in foreign travel, and on his return a variety of offers were made him of pulpits and professorships. October 22d, 1830, he was installed over Canal Street Church, New York, but after a few years his health again broke down, and he resigned in 1845. After a rest of a dozen years, his health was so much improved that he felt justified in again putting on the harness, and accepted a call to the Mount Washington Valley Church, near Fordham, New York. Here he remained till his death, which occurred August 16th, 1871, in the sixty-ninth year of his age.

Dr. Dickinson was one of the rare examples of the gospel winning its trophies among "them of Caesar's household." Nature had done much for him, culture more. The accessories of family and fortune would have favored him, and had he chosen to enter the profession of the law, he might reasonably have anticipated its highest honors and rewards. But he preferred the humble and less glittering path of the gospel ministry, and devoted himself faithfully and conscientiously to its self-denying duties, to which he sacrificed not only his prospects, but his health as well. "His record is on high."

Dr. Dickinson was a gentlemanly, courteous and dignified clergyman, and a sincere and honest man. He wielded a polished and graceful pen, and his sermons, which he read closely, were model compositions. His published works were, besides numerous contributions to quarterly reviews and other periodicals, "Religion Teaching by Example," "Life and Times of Howard," "Responses from the Sacred Oracles," "Resurrection of Christ," etc.

Dickson, Rev. Andrew Flinn, A. M., was born at Charleston, S. C., November 9th, 1825; graduated at Yale College in 1845, and studied theology at Lane and Yale Seminaries. He was ordained in 1852 by Charleston Union Presbytery. He was pastor at John's Island, S. C., 1850-55; District Secretary of the American Sunday-school Union, 1855-7; pastor at Orangeburg, S. C., 1857-68; Fourth Church, New Orleans, 1868-71; Wilmington, N. C., 1871-3; Chester, S. C., 1873-6, and in charge of the Southern General Assembly's Colonial Theological Institute, Tuskegee, Alabama, from 1876 till his death, 1879. He was a faithful and useful man in all the spheres he occupied, and died in the blessed hope of a crown of glory that fadeeth not away.

Dickson, Cyrus, D D, was born, December 20th, 1816, on the Lake Erie shore, Erie county, Pa. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1837, and was taken under the care of the Presbytery of Erie, as a candidate for the Christian ministry in October, 1838, and licensed to preach the gospel in the following year. He was ordained and installed, June 24th, 1810, pastor of the church at Franklin, Pa., where he had manifest tokens of the Lord's favor upon his ministry. In 1818 he accepted a call to the Second Church of Wheeling, Va. Here he labored for eight years, commencing with a membership of 11, which under his faithful and popular ministrations, together with gracious revivals, grew, until the church became one of the most influential churches in the Synod. His next charge was Westminster Church, Baltimore, Md., where he was installed November 27th, 1856, and his labors were here signally blessed, the membership of the church being doubled, and a new character of Christian consecration impressed upon it. The honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him by Washington College, in September, 1858.

CYRUS DICKSON, D.D.

In 1870, when the Old and New School branches of the Presbyterian Church were so happily united, Dr. Dickson was unanimously elected Permanent Clerk of the General Assembly, and soon after to the office of Secretary of the Board of Home Missions. This office he found to be very onerous, not merely because he needed to familiarize himself with the details of the new position, but especially because a largely increased amount of toil and care was superinduced by the necessary readjustment under one Board of the business which had hitherto been conducted by those of the separate Churches.

So filled, however, was he, with the grandeur of the field to which he had been called that, in addition to office duties, he felt constrained to visit even the remotest districts of the country, to gauge its extent, to know from personal examination its real wants, and to sympathize with and cheer on its pioneer preachers to electrify the General Assemblies with his own trumpet-toned eloquence, and thus wake up a slumbering Church to the ineffably solemn responsibilities which the great Head had committed to her care.

So much had the subject taken possession of him; he, and so successful were his efforts, to inspire others with his ardent enthusiasm, that he was chosen to represent the Home Mission Board at the Pan-Presbyterian Council in Edinburgh, in July, 1877. It is said that during his speech on this occasion "the entire audience was held, as though spell-bound, beneath the wonderful eloquence of the speaker, and a sigh of relief at its close showed how deep had been the impression made. Congratulations were showered upon him, not only by his own countrymen, but by the warm-hearted Britons and strangers from afar."

But the strain of overwork began to show its effect in declining health, and in 1880 Dr. Dickson was compelled to accept a year's vacation, in hope that rest might restore lost vigor. The rest came too late, and he died, September 14th, 1881, in Baltimore, "as absolutely a sacrifice to his cause," said a secular paper, "as any Christian martyr who ever perished at the stake."

The Rev. Dr. Eaton has written, with rare good taste, skill and tenderness, a Memoir of Dr. Dickson, the wide circulation of which would be a great blessing to the Church; he so much loved, and for which he so zealously and successfully toiled.

Dickson, Hugh Sheridan, D. D., was born in County Down, Ireland. He graduated at Union College, N. Y., in 1839, and studied theology at Princeton Seminary. He was stated supply at Natchez, Miss., 1841-42; ordained by the Presbytery of Louisville, May 5th, 1843; pastor at Bardstown, Ky., 1842-4, and pastor at Fort Wayne, Ind., 1844-47. Subsequently he was pastor of the Westminster Church, Utica, N. Y., 1848-58; stated supply at Washington Heights, New York city, 1858-59, and pastor at Lewisburg, Pa., 1860-66. Dr. Dickson, after resigning his last pastoral charge, removed to West Chester, Pa., where he lived for several years; then changed his residence to Philadelphia, where he still resides. He is a member of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, and takes an earnest, active and useful part in its deliberations and operations, as well as in the promotion of the general interests of the Church with which he has been so long identified. He preaches frequently for his brethren, as he has opportunity. Dr. Dickson is a gentleman of genial spirit and sound judgment. He is an able theologian, an instructive and forcible preacher, a strong debater, and his ministry, in the several fields of labor which he has occupied, has been sealed with many evidences of his fidelity and acceptableness in the work to which his life has been devoted.

Dimond David, D. D., was born at Groton, N. H., April 26th, 1819. He graduated at Dartmouth College, 1842, and at Andover Seminary, April 8th, 1845. Licensed by Andover Association, April 8th, 1845; ordained by St. Louis Presbytery, April 21st, 1846; supply pastor at Troy, Mo., until November 1st, 1850, when he went to Collinsville, Ill., where he labored four years; united with Alton Presbytery first, April 17th, 1852; Professor of Latin and Greek in Webster College, Mo., ten miles west of St. Louis, and supply pastor of Rock Hill Church, 1855-59. His next field was Brighton, Ill., where he remained until 1865; then to Shelbyville, and next to Anna, Union county, Ill. From thence he returned to Brighton, and was installed pastor there. This position he still retains. Dr. Dimond is a gentleman of scholarly attainments, great ability and rare worth. With talents and acquirements sufficient for the highest stations, he has occupied, for the most part, only the humblest. For several years past he has been nearly blind. But he still pursues his ministerial labors, drawing upon the resources of a thoroughly disciplined and well-stored mind.

Dinsmore, James, was one of the first members of the Session of Bethel Church, in the Presbytery of Redstone, Pa. He was present at the fifth, and five subsequent meetings of Presbytery, and also many times at the Presbytery of Ohio, from 1793 onward. His place of residence was within what is now Bethany Church. Afterward he removed to Buffalo Church, where, at an advanced age, he died and was buried. In his earlier life he had two sisters carried away by the Indians. He is spoken of as a burning and shining light—a man wonderfully full of the spirit of prayer. The following incident gives a glimpse into his home life and attests his piety. A young Irishman, who had been attending the college at Canonsburg, came to his house seeking a school. By Mr. Dinsmore's help he succeeded in his wishes, and became an inmate of the family. Up to this time the young man had been somewhat skeptical. Under the new influence thrown around him he soon became serious, and, as was so often the case in those days, his distress of conviction was intense and prolonged. Early one morning he left the house, supposing that no one else was astir, and wandered to a piece of woods close at hand, and, as he entered it, was startled to hear the voice of prayer. It was found to proceed from a young daughter of Mr. Dinsmore, who was seeking peace with God. The effect was such that the doubter himself was led to a life of prayer and ultimate consecration. The young man, in his future life, became Rev. John Rhea, D. D., of Ohio.

Dinsmore, John Walker, D. D., was born in Canton Township, Washington county, Pa., March 13th, 1839. He graduated at Washington College in 1859; at the Theological Seminary at Allegheny in 1862, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Washington, April, 1861. After a year's labor in the Church of Cambria, Wis., he took charge of the newly organized Church of Prairie du Sac, Wis., and was ordained in June, 1863. During the seven years of his first pastorate, a great work was accomplished for the general region, including the founding of an excellent academy, which was equipped and owned by the parish. In the Spring of 1870, he was called to the Second Church, Bloomington, Ill., of which, after a pastorate of more than thirteen years, he is still the honored, influential and successful pastor.

Dr. Dinsmore has brought to the taxing labors of the ministry great native boldness and energy. He is eminently fitted to deal successfully with affairs, and to conduct even the most difficult enterprises to a satisfactory result. His influence among men of eminent character and position is marked, arising from the force of his character and the justness of his general views. He is readily acknowledged as a leader among men, fitted for the formative state of society in which he found the West. As a preacher, he is independent in thought and method, energetic and forcible in delivery, and convincing in argument. His attachment to the distinguished doctrines which cluster around the blood-offering of Christ is displayed in all his preaching. He is at present a Director in the Theological Seminary of the Northwest, and also a member of the new Board of Aid for Colleges, etc. His field of usefulness is wide, involving great responsibility, and he is giving the maturity of early middle life to the service of the Church which he loves, and which he can say truly is "the Church of his fathers." Dr. Dinsmore was Moderator of the Synod of Illinois in 1883.

Dinwiddie, Rev. William, was born March 7th, 1830, in Campbell county, Va. Studied at Hampden Sidney College, 1845-7, and afterwards taught school in Botetourt and Buckingham counties. He was then associated with Rev. J. Henry Smith, in conducting the Samuel Davis Institute, at Halifax Court House, Va. From this position he entered the University of Virginia in 1851, and in 1854 took the degree of Master of Arts. For two years he was assistant Professor of Mathematics in the University, and for one year assistant Professor of Greek. In 1856 he established Brookland School, in Albemarle county, which he conducted for twelve years, with signal ability and success. During this period he was made ruling elder in Lebanon Church, and began to study with a view to the ministry. He studied systematic theology with the Rev. W. H. McGuffey, D. D., with whom he had been brought into most intimate relations during his residence at the University of Virginia. In 1864 he was licensed by the Presbytery of West Hanover, and in 1866 was ordained and installed pastor of Lebanon Church. He was for some years stated clerk of West Hanover Presbytery, and was also made clerk of the Synod of Virginia. In 1870 he became pastor of the First Church, Lexington, Ky., and in 1874 took charge of the Second Church, Alexandria, Va., which position he still holds.

Mr. Dinwiddie combines an unusual number of the elements which make an attractive and useful preacher. In addition to his well-trained mind and thorough scholarship, he has a warm, responsive heart, a commanding presence, a fluent and pleasing utterance, naturalness and simplicity of manner, and, best of all, consecration to his Master. It may be truly said that he seeks not his own, but the things which are Jesus Christ's. He is strictly an expository preacher, and has the rare gift of holding the interest of a congregation throughout extended expositions of Scripture. His preaching is characterized by great simplicity. He speaks in a conversational tone, but with an unction which rivets attention, and frequently raises him into strains of real and overpowering eloquence. He possesses the gifts of an evangelist to an eminent degree, and his frequent labors in this direction have been greatly blessed. He is an earnest believer in the pre-millennial coming of Christ, and was a member of the Prophetic Conference in New York, in 1878.

Dirck, Cornelius Lansing, D. D., was born in Lansingburg, N. Y., March 3d, 1785. He was ordained pastor at Onondaga, N. Y., December, 1807; this relation continued eight years; Stillwater, 1814-16; Park Street Church, Boston, Mass., 1816; Auburn First Church, 1817-29; Utica Second Church, 1829-33; Houston Street Presbyterian, New York, 1833-5. He resided at Auburn, 1835-8; in Illinois, 1838-9; he was pastor at Utica, Syracuse and Auburn, 1839-46; of Chrystie Street Church, New York, 1846-8; of Clinton Avenue Church, Brooklyn, 1848-55; he was Trustee of Auburn Seminary, 1820-30 and 1835-57; Vice-President of the Board of Trustees, 1820-4, and Professor of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral Theology, 1821-6. He served without salary, and, as financial agent, raised large sums for the seminary. He died March 19th, 1857. Dr. Dirck published "Sermons on Important Subjects," 1825.

Doak, Samuel, D. D., was born within the bounds of the New Providence congregation, Virginia, in August, 1749; was admitted to the degree of Bachelor of Arts, in the College of New Jersey, in 1775; taught for a short time in the school of the Rev. Robert Smith, of Pequea, Pa., then became Tutor in Hampden Sidney College, where he remained about two years, pursuing the study of theology under the Rev. John Blair Smith, which he subsequently continued for some time under the Rev. William Graham. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Hanover, October 31st, 1777, and having preached for some time in Washington county, Va., he removed to the Holston settlement, in what was then a part of North Carolina, but is now a part of East Tennessee. After residing in this settlement a year or two, he removed, in the hope of finding a more promising field of usefulness, to the settlement on Little Limestone, in Washington county, and there purchased a farm, on which he built a log house for purposes of education, and a small church edifice, and founded a congregation known as the "Salem Congregation." The literary institution which he here established was the first that was ever established in the great Valley of the Mississippi, and he presided over it from the time of its incorporation, in 1785, till the year 1818, when he removed to Bethel, and opened a private school, which he called Tusculum Academy. Dr. Doak organized a number of churches in the county in which he lived. His ministry was attended with no small success. His style of preaching was original, bold, pungent, and sometimes pathetic. He was eminently successful in training up young men for the ministry. J. G. M. Ramsey, M. D., one of Dr. Doak's pupils, says: "it may safely be affirmed that he was one of the most useful men of the period in which he lived."

Dod, Albert Baldwin, D. D., was born in Mendham, N. J., March 21th, 1805, and graduated at Princeton College in 1822, immediately after which he became a teacher in a private family in Fredericksburg, Va., where he remained between three and four years. On his return from Virginia he remained at home a few months, and in the autumn of 1826 he became a member of the Theological Seminary at Princeton. The next year he accepted a Tutorship in Princeton College, still continuing his theological studies, as he had opportunity. He was licensed to preach, in the Spring of 1828, by the Presbytery of New York, but retained his office as Tutor till 1829. In 1830 he was appointed to the Mathematical Professorship in the College, a place that was eminently congenial with his tastes and habits. This appointment he accepted, and discharged the duties of the office with signal ability and fidelity. Here he continued till his death, which took place November 20th, 1845. During his last illness he maintained the utmost serenity of spirit.

Professor Dod, during his connection with the College, preached a great deal, and frequently supplied destitute pulpits in both New York and Philadelphia. He published nothing except a few articles in the Biblical Repository, which were marked with ability. One of those articles, on Transcendentalism, was printed in a separate pamphlet, and attracted great attention. He had great success and power as a teacher. There was nothing in mathematics he could not make plain. Under his tuition his students became enthusiastic in their admiration of himself and in their love for the science. He was fond of discussion, and was remarkably able in debate. As a preacher, his chief aim was to lodge in the understanding some fundamental principle of truth or duty, which should become part of the governing convictions of the mind. In the judgment of Dr. Charles Hodge, he was "one of the most gifted men of the Church."

Dod, Rev. Thaddeus, was born near Newark, N. J., March 7th, 1740. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1773; studied theology under the direction of the Rev. Dr. McWhorter, of Newark, and the Rev. Timothy Johnes, of Morristown; and was licensed to preach by the New York Presbytery in 1775. In March, 1777, he made a tour of the West. After preaching in parts of Virginia and Maryland he crossed the mountains, and visited the settlements of George's Creek, Muddy Creek and Dunlap's Creek, and proceeded thence to Ten-mile, at which latter place there were a number of families who had removed from Morris county. After preaching for some time in that comparatively desolate region he returned to New Jersey. Being earnestly solicited by the people at Ten-mile to become their minister, he determined to yield to their wishes, and accordingly he was ordained by the Presbytery of New York, sim titulo, in October, 1777, with a view to finding his home in that then distant part.

Arriving, November 10th, with his family, at Patterson's Creek, in Hampshire county, Va., and hearing of a then recent and formidable attack by the Indians on the fort at Wheeling, and of the consequent confusion and terror prevailing throughout the West, he remained a few days with his family, then left them, crossed the mountains alone, proceeded to Ten-mile, where he preached in the forts, and baptized the children, and after a week returned. For nearly two years he preached at Patterson's Creek, and in the adjacent counties in Virginia and Maryland, and his labors were attended with a manifold blessing. In September, 1779, he proceeded, with his family, to Ten-mile, entered upon his labors there with great zeal and self-denial, and organized, August 15th, 1781, a church, consisting of twenty-five members. Under his ministrations, in the midst of the perils incident to frequent hostile demonstrations, and while the people, during part of the time, were shut up in the fort, there was a revival of religion, as the fruits of which upwards of forty were admitted to the Church. The first house of worship was erected in the Summer of 1785.

Mr. Dod opened a classical and mathematical school near his own dwelling in 1782, which was in operation about three years and a half. Through his influence, and that of Messrs. Smith and McMillan, an academy was instituted at Washington, Pa., of which, by urgent request, he became Principal, April 1st, 1789, for a single year, at the same time preaching at Washington and Tennile. He died, May 26th, 1793, in the full experience of the joys of salvation. Mr. Dod was an earnest, able and faithful preacher. He took great delight in religious conversation, and urged this practice upon his people. Throughout his whole ministry, his labors seem to have been attended with much more than an ordinary blessing.

Dodge, Hon. William E., prominent elder of the Presbyterian Church, was born in Hartford, Conn., September 4th, 1805, his father being a cotton manufacturer, near Norwich, in that State. After attending the common school, he worked awhile in his father's mill, and then, the family having removed to New York, the lad of thirteen entered a wholesale dry goods store, where he remained until he attained his majority. He then engaged in the same business on his own account, and continued in this line until 1833, when he became a member of the firm of Phelps, Dodge & Co. The firm were engaged in the importation of tin plate, pig tin and copper, and soon became the largest establishment in the country pursuing this line of business. The firm continued in existence until 1879, new members of the families concerned joining it as the older ones dropped out, and its success is still prosecuted, under a new name, by descendants of the original partners. Mr. Dodge himself retained an active interest in the house until January 1st, 1881, and up to the time of his death frequently visited his old office. Mr. Dodge was both shrewd and industrious, and his business career was one of almost unbroken prosperity. As time progressed he became interested in many other enterprises, and was director in a number of railroad and insurance corporations. He was one of the largest owners of lumber lands, lumber and mill interests, in the United States, possessing large tracts in Wisconsin, Michigan, Georgia, West Virginia, Texas and Canada, which in some instances exceeded 30,000 acres in area. He was also extensively interested in the development of coal and iron interests throughout the country. His fortune grew steadily, until it was estimated to have reached five millions.

Mr. Dodge's business sagacity was recognized by his fellows, and he was elected President of the Chamber of Commerce for four terms in succession, being the only man ever so honored. President Lincoln appointed him a member of the famous Indian Commission, which included A. T. Stewart, Mr. Brunot, and other well-known merchants. He was elected from New York city to the Thirty-ninth Congress, in which he served as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. He retained his active interest in public affairs to the last, and his fatal illness dated from a cold contracted at the Protective Tariff meeting in the Cooper Union, where he made a speech.

It was, however, as a Christian and philanthropist that Mr. Dodge was most distinguished. His early became interested in the Temperance movement, and his consistency was proved by his resignation from the Union League Club, because it served wine at its banquets. He was President of the American National Temperance Society, the Temperance Christian Home for Men, and the Ladies' Temperance Home. He was also a Trustee of the Union Theological Seminary, a Director of the Presbyterian Hospital, Trustee of Lincoln University, and Vice-President of the American Board of Foreign Missions. He was a devoted friend of the Sabbath, and resigned his directorship of the Central Railroad of New Jersey because the company began to run trains on that day. Benevolent enterprises of every sort received his cordial support. The education of the freedmen greatly interested him, and he assisted many societies, working in their behalf. Special charities, whether local or remote in their sphere of operation, appealed with confidence to his generous purse, and his contributions in some years averaged $1000 a day, while for several years before his decease they never fell below $200,000 annually. His life was one of cheerful industry. Nothing in the way of duty was irksome—rather, it was a pleasure to be enjoyed, and the smile, so genial and loving, with which his friends were always greeted, was merely the sunshine reflected from his glowing heart. Immersed in business that assumed wide range and vast proportions, he kept his soul serene in the light of heaven, so that the cares of the world, the love of money, and sordid greed had no dominion over his buoyant spirit. More than the Presidency of the Chamber of Commerce, he loved the Sunday-school room, the House of God, the prayer meeting, and the chamber of the suffering, whose wants he might relieve. His delight was in making glad the hearts of the poor.

Mr. Dodge's whole career was exceptionally one of success, honor and usefulness. He died at his residence, in New York, February 9th, 1853, leaving, by his will, $360,000 for religious and charitable purposes. His demise was greatly lamented, not only by his own Denomination, but by the friends of education, virtue, morality and religion, of every name, and he left a record that is lustrous with all that is noble and excellent in human character in its highest development.

Donaldson, Alexander, D. D., was born in Ligonier Valley, Westmoreland county, Pa., August 30th, 1808. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1835, and was engaged as Tutor in the college, for a year. During 1837 he pursued his theological studies, under the direction of his pastor, Rev. Samuel Swan, spending only the last year of his course in the Western Theological Seminary. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Saltsburg, April 4th, 1838. After laboring as a supply for a year he was, June 30th, 1839, ordained and installed as pastor over the churches of Eldersridge and Curriesrun, whose houses of worship were ten miles apart. In May, 1853, he was released from Curriesrun, to be installed over a church, newly organized, in West Lebanon, only four miles distant from Eldersridge. Besides a faithful pastorate of nearly forty-five years, the Church and the world are largely his debtors for the help he has given to the cause of Christian education, through the establishment of Eldersridge Academy. This Institution was formally organized in 1847, and under his able and judicious management has been a great success. During the more than thirty-six years of its existence, over two thousand persons have shared its privileges, and, besides its assistance to the other learned professions, over one hundred and fifty of its students have entered the gospel ministry. In order to make more certain the perpetuation of the Institution when he should be taken from it, in 1856 he selected a Board of Trustees, to whom, for a merely nominal acknowledgment, he gave the buildings and all the perquisites. Since that time, by their appointment, he has continued to preside, and, as before, to teach the Classical Department.

Dr. Donaldson is an honest, straightforward man. He is a forcible writer. His style is simple, chaste and strong. Thinking and feeling his way far into gospel themes, he is always an instructive preacher. Without any of the arts of the orator, yet, with an earnest nature and a soul of quick sensibility, he is alive to the stimulus of any great occasion, and is at times a deeply impressive speaker. He is highly esteemed by all who know him, and though, by age, his physical force is somewhat abated, his spirit neither faints nor grows "weary in well doing."

Donaldson, Rev. Alexander Hassettine, sixth child of Dr. Alexander Donaldson, was born March 12th, 1849. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1869. Seeming too delicate to continue at study, he engaged for over seven years in other pursuits. His health improving, he resumed study at the Western Theological Seminary in 1876, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Kittanning in April, 1878. He completed his theological course in another year, and was ordained July 1st, 1879. Having decided to go as a missionary to the Navajo Indians, on August 20th, he set out for his chosen field at Fort Defiance, Arizona, with his wife Miss Dora E. Donaldson, of Minnesota, and three little daughters. Passing by way of Minnesota, he reached his destination October 13th, after a very toilsome travel, in a mule wagon, of over 300 miles. There, though without any kind of vegetable to eat, or any milk or butter, he wrote back, "we are happy." In the Spring, when he was 90 miles from his family, at Fort Defiance, he heard that the Indians at the fort intended to cut down all the whites on the distribution day, April 11th, and that already six of the most prominent persons had fled for their lives. On the next two days he rode all the way home, arriving on the evening of the 13th, and proposed also to send his family away for safety. They would not go, preferring, as they said, to "die, if necessary, all together." Next morning, as most of the men needed in the distribution were gone, he assisted and did the work of two or three men. It turned out to be an "unusually quiet day," as he wrote on a postal, the following day. But he was altogether overdone, soon after he was taken with a congestive chill, and died, April 30th, 1880.

Fragile in form, frail in constitution, Mr. Donaldson was still a man of highly courageous spirit. His strength of purpose brushed aside all ordinary hindrances, and his energy of will easily surmounted difficulties that would have blocked up the way of a man of less determination. His heart was warm with missionary zeal. He was eminently qualified to be a pioneer in the difficult field he had chosen. One who had the privilege of knowing him well, says, "I never knew a life more consecrated to the Master's service." Such a life, however sad its termination may appear, is a legacy of precious and honorable remembrance to his bereaved friends and to the Church at large.

Donaldson, Rev. James Henry, oldest son of Alexander H. and Mary (Bracken) Donaldson, was born at Eldersridge, Indiana county, Pa., May 18th, 1840. He graduated at Jefferson College, in 1858; taught two years in Eldersridge Academy, and graduated at the Western Theological Seminary, in 1863, having been licensed by the Presbytery of Saltsburg, in the Spring of 1862, and supplying neighboring churches for a year and a half. He then settled at Schellsburg, Pa., where he was ordained, that Fall, by the Presbytery of Carlisle. There he continued just four years, and in the first week of December, 1867, he came home, suffering with consumption, of which he died, at Eldersridge, October 1st, 1868.

Tall, slender, and graceful in every movement, with a sweet voice, trained in elocution and cultivated in song, he was a pleasant speaker, and gave promise of becoming a pulpit orator of more than usual power. His sermons were prepared with conscientious care. He had good conversational powers, high social qualities, warm affections, and a heart tender and sympathizing. He was cheerful, modest, and unassuming, with qualities of mind and heart such as gave promise of great good, and have left his name tenderly cherished by a wide circle of friends.

Donaldson, Hon. William, was born in Danville, Pa., July 28th, 1799. His father was John Donaldson, and his grandfather William Donaldson, a soldier of the Revolutionary War throughout its entire continuance. When a youth he learned the business of a merchant, in Philadelphia, and soon afterwards started business in his native town, where his extensive operations made him widely and favorably known to all the leading merchants and dealers in the Valley of the Susquehanna. In 1837 he became the principal owner of a very large body of coal lands in the western part of Schuylkill county, Pa., the development of which was soon commenced. The Swatara Railroad was commenced with him as President. The Donaldson Improvement and Railroad Company was organized with the same President. The town of Donaldson was laid out on the property. He remained in the control of the Swatara Railroad Company and of the Donaldson Improvement and Railroad Company until 1863, when he retired from their management. While at Danville, he was appointed an Associate Judge for Columbia county, entirely without solicitation on his part or that of mere personal friends. Judge Donaldson is a gentleman of very active mind and temperament, genial in disposition and pleasing in address. He is ardent and firm in his friendships, and unyielding and uncompromising in the defence of what he believes to be right. He is an active participant in the affairs and management of the Second Presbyterian Church of Pottsville, and it receives his special interest and support.

Donegal Church. Of the several Scotch-Irish settlements in America, in the latter part of the seventeenth and the beginning of the eighteenth centuries, the one in Donegal township, Lancaster county, Pa., was the most notable. It became the nursery of Presbyterianism in Middle, Western and Southwestern Pennsylvania, Virginia and North Carolina.

Donegal Church was organized in 1719, or very early in 1720. Andrew Galbraith, Esq., son of James Galbraith, who came to America with William Penn, from Queenstown, upon his second visit, and whose remains are buried at Derry graveyard, settled upon the land adjoining Donegal Church on the south, in 1718, for which he received a patent from the Penns in 1736, for two hundred and twelve acres. He was the first ruling elder of this church, and to him belongs the credit of organizing the congregation, and the selection of one of the most admirable and attractive sites for a church edifice within the broad limits of the State.

The first meeting house was erected with logs, and stood a few yards south of the present structure. After it had been used for a dozen years, the present edifice was erected. Loose stones were collected from the surface of the ground in the surrounding woods, with which the walls were built. There was no effort made by the masons to dress the stone; they were simply laid in mortar, to a line. The edges were craggy and rough. And there were no stone in the building that one man could not conveniently handle. The walls were plastered on the inside, but the outside was left in its rough state until the remodeling of the house in 1850.

The front of the building was the south side, facing the graveyard, with a double doorway, the only entrance into the house. The door frame and windows had a circular head. The pulpit stood against the northern side and immediately opposite the doorway. A broad aisle led from the door to another one running lengthwise of the building in front of the pulpit. Upon each side of the pulpit, and facing it, were nine pews. Upon each side of the aisle running from the entrance door were seven pews.

DONEGAL CHURCH.

There was also a small aisle near each end of the room, which ran at right angles to the main aisle, from which entrance was had to corresponding seven pews already mentioned. These pews faced the pulpit. There were four pews facing this small aisle, and between it and the end walls. For some years after the church was built, the floors of the aisles were composed of earth; no stoves were admitted; an innovation of that kind was considered incompatible with the worship of a true Christian; gradually, however, two large stoves, cast at Cornwall, were introduced, and the aisles paved with brick. The seats and backs of the pews were made of yellow pine and oak. The backs came to the neck of an ordinary person, and were perpendicular. At the corners of the pews were corner boards rounded out to fit the backs, and which really made it more uncomfortable to sit.

Two or three rows of pews in front of the pulpit had inclined shelves, upon which the hymn-books were placed. Of course, there was no paint upon any of the wood-work. Thus the building stood until 1772, when it was re-modeled.

The Rev. David Evans supplied the Donegal Church in 1720, and the Rev. George Gillespie and the Rev. Robert Cross were among the supplies in 1721, probably for the year 1722 also. In the Fall of 1723 the Rev. Messrs. Alexander, Hutcheson, and Daniel McGill were sent by New Castle Presbytery. In 1725 the Rev. Adam Boyd of Octorara gave Donegal the one-sixth of his time. On the 24th day of September, 1726, the Rev. James Anderson was called to the pastorate of the church, and on the last Wednesday in August, 1727, he was installed. He died July 16th, 1740. Rev. Hamilton Bell had charge of the church from 1742 until the fall of 1743. The pulpit was supplied by Presbytery until November 23d, 1748, when the Rev. Joseph Tate was installed as pastor, in which relation he continued until his death, October 11th, 1774, a period of twenty-six years.

The history of the church during the colonial period was an eventful one, and particularly during the French and Indian War of 1755-8, and the subsequent Indian wars. Many members of the congregation were driven from their homes on the Conoy and Conawago creeks, by the Indians. But there were also many members who shouldered their guns and marched to the frontier settlements, to aid in terminating the Indian incursions, depredations and massacres.

Early in the Spring of 1776 the Rev. Collin McFarquahr took charge of the church at Donegal. He came to this country from Scotland, to seek a home and settlement, and left his family behind him, expecting to send for them as soon as he was settled, but on account of the interruption of travel occasioned by the prevailing war, he did not see them for ten years thereafter. Mr. McFarquahr continued to be the diligent and faithful pastor of Donegal until 1805, when, his wife having died, he was bowed down with sorrow, and concluded to resign the charge and live with his daughters, Mrs. Wilson, in Lancaster, and Mrs. Cook, in Hagerstown, where he died, August 27th, 1822, aged ninety-three years.

As a part of the history of the times, we give the following verses, by Mrs. Sally Hastings, who resided at Maytown, and removed to Washington county, in 1808. They are contained in a book of poems, published by her, in 1808, at Lancaster, William Dickson being the printer.

ON THE REV. C. M. F. — R. JANUARY 1, 1806.

Stranger, behold you venerable man,
Whose revered form no earthly man
With native grace, along the silver plains,
Before the little flock he dearly loves

He, from the famous isle of Scotland fair,
Embark'd, early, for our peaceful shore,
And left the tender partner of his care,
With three sweet babes, his absence to deplore.

Columbia's fertile regions to explore
Was his design; then homeward to repair,
And bring those darling treasures with him o'er,
And come and preach a free salvation here.

'Twas now the arduous conflict first began Between Columbia and Britannia's isle;
Altrighted peace forsook the bleeding land,
And armed hosts contended for the soil.

No more the cheerful song of lab'ring swains
Thro' sylvan groves resch'd, from afar;
But groans of dying anguish fill'd the plains,
And all the mingled sounds of wasting war.

Now blood and slaughter marked their crimson way,
And martial fleets invested ev'ry shore;
Confusion rag'd, and thund'ring o'er the sea,
Bellona dy'd the waves with crimson gore.

Fair peace, at length, her olive-branch display'd,
And o'er Columbia's coast bad freedom reign;
The war-worn hero sheath'd his reeking blade,
And tranquil happiness return'd agan.

For ten long years no wife or child saw he,
Far separated by the foaming flood;
At length his pray'r was heard; they o'er the sea
Were safely wafted, by a faithful God.

Full thirty years, from yonder sacred dome,
Did he proclaim Salvation's joyful sound;
To train immortals for a life to come,
A teacher from his God, he yet is found.

Threescore and ten revolving summers shed
Their silver dews, to deck his locks with gray;
Their hoary influence upon his head,
Has ripen'd age to full maturity.

Smoothly he glides down life's tempestuous sea,
Enjoying health, and happiness, and ease,
And finds his strength proportion'd to his day,
And ends, beloved, his spotless life in peace.

Where are the crowds which once did throng those pews?
Go ask you marble tombs; they will not veal
That they, in mournful state, do now enclose
The faded forms which once those walls did fill.

Yet still their pastor lives; while, one by one,
Survivors own the awful Monarch's sway;
He still proclaims salvation's joyful sound,
Directs their flight to heav'n, and leads the way.

Father of light and life, Thon God above,
O, may Thy Spirit and his feeble breath;
O may Thy arms of everlasting love
Support, defend him, in the hour of death.

And, when consign'd to the peaceful tomb,
May guardian angels watch his crumbl'ing dust,
Till the last trumpet calls the faithful home;
Then wake to joys immortal, with the just.

After the resignation of Mr. McFarquahr, Donegal Church was supplied occasionally, in 1806, by the Rev. Nathaniel R. Snowden, then settled in Lancaster, and served by Rev. Robert Cathcart, of York, as a stated supply. The Rev. William Kerr succeeded Mr. McFarquahr as pastor. Mr. K. also preached in Marietta, where he died in 1821. He was succeeded in the pastorate of Donegal by the Rev. Orson Douglass, the Rev. Thomas Marshall Boggs, the Rev.

James L. Rodgers, the Rev. John J. Lane, the Rev. John Edgar, and the Rev. William Blays Brown, who took charge of the church in 1871. Brief sketches of most of these ministers will be found in their appropriate alphabetical position in this volume.

Dorrance, John, D. D., the son of Benjamin and Annie (Buckingham) Dorrance, was born in Kingston, Luzerne county, Pa., February 18th, 1800. He graduated at Nassau Hall in 1823; graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1826; was licensed by Susquehanna Presbytery, and spent some time in laboring in the destitute regions of Luzerne county, then a comparative wilderness. In the Summer of 1826 he entered upon his missionary labors in the South, under a commission from the Board of Missions. His field of labor was Baton Rouge, La., and vicinity. He was installed pastor of the Church at Baton Rouge in 1827, and his four years' labor there was eminently successful.

Returning to Pennsylvania, he settled at Wysox, where he performed much self-denying labor, both as pastor and missionary, and greatly endeared himself to the people. In 1833 he removed to Wilkesbarre, where, as pastor of the large and intelligent congregation of that place for twenty-eight years, he maintained an unblemished reputation and a growing influence until his death, April 18th, 1861.

Dr. Dorrance possessed rare intellectual endowments. His mind was not brilliant, but admirably balanced, and capable of a prodigious grasp. Few men were better informed on all the living issues of his time. He was pre-eminently a wise man. Prudence was with him a cardinal virtue. His counsel was much sought, and his advice always judicious. In the several fields of his labor he exerted a blessed and enduring influence. His end was peace.

Drake, Charles Daniel, LL.D., was the second child of Daniel Drake, M.D., and Harriet Sisson, of Cincinnati, O., where he was born, April 11th, 1811. His education was received in the ordinary schools of Ohio and Kentucky, except a period of fourteen months, in 1823-4, spent at "St. Joseph's College," (Roman Catholic), Bardstown, Ky., and a period of eight months in 1826-7, at Captain Partridge's military Academy, Middletown, Conn. April 1st, 1827, he was appointed a midshipman in the United States Navy, in which he remained until January, 1830. In May, 1833, he was admitted to the bar in Cincinnati; in 1831 removed thence to St. Louis, Mo.; where, in January, 1840, he united with the Second Presbyterian Church. In June, 1847, he returned to Cincinnati. In July, 1849, he was appointed Treasurer of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church, which position he held till October, 1850, when he returned to St. Louis and resumed law practice. In 1856 he was elected a ruling elder of the Second Church. In 1859 he was elected a member of the Missouri House of Representatives. In 1863 he was elected a member of the Missouri

State Convention. While in attendance on that body the honorary degree of LL.D. was conferred on him by Hanover College, Indiana. In 1864 he was elected a member of a new Convention to revise the Constitution of Missouri, of which body he was the Vice-president. In January, 1867, he was elected United States Senator from Missouri, for six years from the ensuing 1th of March.

In 1869 he was a member of the (O. S.) General Assembly, from the Presbytery of St. Louis; was on the Committee of Conference on Reunion; and was appointed chairman of a committee to consider and investigate all matters of controversy in regard to the Theological Seminary of the Northwest; and at the adjourned session of the Assembly, in November following, he presented the report of that committee, settling all controversies, which was adopted by the Assembly. In December, 1870, he resigned the position of Senator from Missouri, to accept that of Chief Justice of the Court of Claims, at Washington, which he still holds (in 1883). In 1875 he received the degree of LL. D. from the University of Wooster; and in the same year, and afterwards, in 1879, was a member of the General Assembly, from the Presbytery of Washington City. In 1880, before the Second General Council of the Presbyterian Alliance, he read a paper on "Christianity, the Friend of the Working Classes," which has been published as a tract by the Presbyterian Board of Publication. In 1854 he published "A Treatise on the Law of Suits by Attachment in the United States," which has gone to a fifth edition.

Dripps, Rev. J. Frederick, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1811. He graduated from the University of the City of New York in 1833, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1838. After being licensed to preach, he supplied the First Church of Indianapolis, Ind., for six months, and the American Presbyterian Church at Montreal for eight months. From 1870 to 1880 he was pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Germantown, Phila., where he labored very acceptably and successfully until impaired health required his resignation of the charge. He became pastor of Clinton Street Immanuel Presbyterian Church in the same city, upon the death of Dr. Wadsworth, in 1882, where he still remains, prospered in his work and beloved by his congregation. Mr. Dripps is an earnest and impressive preacher and a devoted pastor. Several excellent tracts from his pen have been published by our Board of Publication. He is ready for every good work, and at present is Vice President of our Board of Education.

Du Bois, Robert Patterson, D.D., was a son of the Rev. F. Du Bois, founder and first pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Doylestown, Pa. He was born, August 19th, 1805, at Doylestown, and received his academical education under his father, and his collegiate in the University of Pennsylvania, where he graduated, in July, 1824. He first studied medicine, afterwards took charge of the Chester County Academy, and then of the Doylestown Academy, for several years. His ministerial education was received partly at Princeton Seminary and partly under his brother-in-law, Rev. Silas M. Andrews, D. D., pastor of the Doylestown Church. He was licensed by the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia, in October, 1835, and after a year spent in study, traveling and preaching, was called to New London, Chester county, Pa. This was his first and only pastorate. He continued to discharge its duties for a period of forty years, or until November 1876, when, feeling the pressure of advancing years, he resigned.

Dr. Du Bois was an excellent man. He impressed every one who met him with the thought that here was one of the men who are without guile. His goodness won all hearts. His piety shone in his face and illuminated his whole character. He won men's confidence, because he seemed to be so pure, so single-hearted, so unselfishly given to the service of his fellow-men. He was a pointed, instructive and impressive preacher, and a faithful and devoted pastor. He was a life-long advocate and worker in the cause of Temperance. In the Presbytery of Chester, of which he was a member, he was especially beloved. Whatever he undertook to do was so well and so thoroughly done, and he was so conscientious in his duties as a Presbyter, that he gained a large influence, and down to his latest days was a diligent and trusted member, to whom important offices were readily given. Few men have left a better record. He died, February 21st, 1883.

Du Bose, Hampden C., son of the Rev. Julius J. and Margaret E. Du Bose, was born in Darlington, S. C., in 1845. On the 31st of March, 1858, he was received into full communion in the Darlington Presbyterian Church. After graduating at South Carolina College, in 1868, he entered the Theological Seminary at Columbia, in the same year, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Harmony, in 1870. He filled the pulpit of the Second Presbyterian Church of Charleston, during the vacation of his second year in the Seminary, and, after completing the prescribed course of study, was ordained as an evangelist by the Presbytery of Harmony, at Darlington, April 6th, 1871. The ordination sermon was preached to a crowded house, by the Rev. Dr. Plumer, and the charge was delivered to the young evangelist by the venerable Dr. J. Leighton Wilson. Shortly after his ordination he was sent to China by the General Assembly of the Southern Presbyterian Church, to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ to the heathen. Mr. Du Bose was married to Miss Pauline McAlpine, of Talladega, Ala., who has rendered valuable service, by the side of her husband to the cause of Christ in China. In addition to his arduous labors of preaching three times daily in his street chapels, Mr. Du Bose has translated the "Rock of Our Salvation" into the Chinese language. He is a man of untiring energy and zeal, and is blessed with a sunny temperament, a warm, joyous heart, and a cheerful, hopeful disposition. He is held in universal esteem, and is generally regarded as one of the most efficient laborers ever sent forth by the Church into the vineyard of her Master. During a recent visit with his family to his native land, he awakened an unusual interest in the cause of foreign missions. He is now at work in Soochow, China.

Duffield, George, D. D., was born in Lancaster County, Pa., October 7th, 1732, and had Huguenot blood in his veins, the name having been originally Du Fable. He was educated at Newark Academy, Del., and graduated at Nassau Hall, N. J., in 1752. His theological studies were pursued under Dr. Robert Smith, of Pequea. After officiating for two years as Tutor at Princeton, he was ordained, September, 1759, over the united churches of Carlisle, Big Spring (now Newville), and Monaghan (now Billsburg). Carlisle was, at this time, a frontier town, and protected by a garrison, and the church at Monaghan was regularly fortified and watched by sentries, for fear of Indians. But Indian warfare was not the only warfare to which the young minister was exposed. He had warmly espoused the sentiments of the New Lights, and met with obstacles from the Old Side party, under the Rev. Mr. Steel. He encountered similar opposition when he removed, in 1771, to Old Pine Street Church, Philadelphia, over which the First Church claimed to have some jurisdiction. To such a degree did the disturbance rise, that the aid of the civil magistrate had to be invoked, and the Riot Act read. In the end, however, he was allowed to exercise his functions unmolested.

It is not to be supposed that a man of such a polemical turn would be quiescent during the Revolutionary war, and accordingly, besides serving as chaplain of Congress, he fearlessly shared the perils of the army, and made himself so obnoxious to the enemy that a price was put upon his head. His death occurred, after a brief illness, February 2d, 1790, at the age of fifty-seven.

Dr. Duffield's excessive buoyancy in youth was never completely extinguished, and his ardent temperament made him, in riper years, an animated and popular preacher. He was the grandfather of the late Dr. George Duffield, of Carlisle and Detroit. The estimation in which he was held by his contemporaries may be inferred from the fact of his having been chosen the first Stated Clerk of the General Assembly, which post he held at the time of his death. His only published works were, "An Account of a Missionary Tour through Western Pennsylvania, in 1776," by order of Synod, and a "Thanksgiving Sermon on Peace," December 11th, 1783.

Duffield, George, D. D., was born July 4th, 1794, at Strasburg, Lancaster county, Pa., where his father's grandfather had purchased and settled a farm, as far back as 1730. He was of Huguenot and Scotch-Irish descent, and so of pious ancestry—his mother a truly godly woman, his father a merchant and elder in the Presbyterian Church, and his grandfather, of the same name, a graduate in the first class which received diplomas from Princeton College; a minister of the Presbyterian Church; an associate Chaplain with Bishop William White, of the Continental Congress of Philadelphia.

At the precocious age of sixteen the subject of this sketch graduated in the University of Pennsylvania, and then studied theology under Dr. John M. Mason, in New York. He was licensed to preach before he had attained his twenty-first year, and before the expiration of that year (1815) he received and accepted a call from the Presbyterian Church of Carlisle, Pa. In this charge he remained eighteen years and six months, gathering into his church during that time seven hundred persons by profession, and two hundred by certificate. In March, 1835, Dr. Duffield resigned his pastorate at Carlisle, and after brief settlements in New York and Philadelphia, he was installed over the First Presbyterian Church in Detroit, Mich., October 1st, 1838. In 1862, he was chosen Moderator of the General Assembly (New School), in Detroit. He remained in that city, where his labors were greatly blessed, till his sudden death in 1867, at the age of seventy-three. He died in the harness. He was delivering an address of welcome to the Young Men's Christian Association, when he was attacked by paralysis, and in a day or two breathed his last. A memorial window in the church in which his labors were closed bears his name, with his motto: "Deo, Republicæ, et amicis semper fidelis."

Among Dr. Duffield's prominent traits was his prodigious love of learning. There was impressed upon his very countenance an eager readiness either to receive or impart knowledge. As a preacher he was a man of power, a Boanerges rather than a Barnabas. He gave free and fearless utterance to his convictions of truth and duty. His manner in the pulpit was solemn and impressive. His very recreations were of a grave kind, and in sickness he amused himself with works on mathematics. He was deeply in earnest in the great work to which his life was devoted, and at his presence vice was abashed and profanity reduced to silence. He was of a scientific turn, and his writings were voluminous. Besides pamphlets and reviews on a variety of subjects, he published, in octavo form, a volume on "Regeneration," and a book entitled "Travels in Europe and the Holy Land."

Duffield, George, D. D., son of the Rev. Dr.

GEORGE DUFFIELD, D. D.

Duffield, of the preceding notice, was born in Carlisle, Pa., September 12th, 1816. He graduated at Yale College in 1837, and studied theology at Union Theological Seminary, New York. He was ordained December 27th, 1840. He was pastor at Brooklyn, N. Y., 1840-7; at Bloomfield, N. J., 1847-52; at Philadelphia, Pa., 1852-61; at Adrian, Mich., 1861-5; at Galesburg, Ill., 1865-9; at Saginaw City, Mich., 1869-73; evangelist, Ann Arbor, Mich., 1874. He now resides, without charge, at Lansing, Mich. Dr. Duffield has been greatly blessed in his minist-terial labors. He is an accomplished and genial gentleman, an earnest Christian, a faithful, forcible and impressive preacher, and always has discharged his pastoral duties with great fidelity. He is gifted as a poet, and has published several hymns, which have proved to be very popular and useful additions to the hymnology of the Church.

Duffield, John Thomas, D. D., son of William and Anna M. (Fletcher) Duffield, was born at McConnellsburg, Fulton (then Bedford) county, Pa., on the 19th of February, 1823. The family is descended from George Duffield, who came from the north of Ireland, about 1725; settled in Lancaster county, Pa.; was one of the original members, and an elder of the Presbyterian Church at Pequea, and father of the Rev. George Duffield, chaplain of the Continental Congress. John T. Duffield was graduated, with honor, at the College of New Jersey, in 1841, a member of a class of which an unusually large proportion have attained distinction in Church and State. After his graduation he engaged for a time in teaching, and had charge of the Mathematical Department in Union Academy, a select preparatory school in Philadelphia. He entered the Princeton Theological Seminary in 1841, and shortly after was elected Tutor in Greek in the College of New Jersey. He accepted the position, at the same time continuing his theological studies, and in 1846 was elected adjunct Professor of Mathematics. In 1854 he was elected Professor of Mathematics, and in 1862 Professor of Mathematics and Mechanics. He was licensed to preach in 1849; in the following year was elected stated supply of the Second Presbyterian Church of Princeton, and was ordained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, February 5th, 1851. For two years he had charge of the church, in connection with his duties in college. In 1852 he published, for the benefit of the Second Church, "The Princeton Pulpit," a volume containing a sermon by each of the Presbyterian ministers then residing in Princeton. At the meeting of the Synod of New Jersey, in Princeton, in 1865, he was chosen Moderator, and at the opening of the Synod, in 1866, he preached a sermon on the "Second Advent," which was published, by request. He contributed an article to the Princeton Review, in 1866, on "The Philosophy of Mathematics;" an article to the Evangelical Quarterly, in 1867, on "The Discovery of the Law of Gravitation," and an article to the Princeton Review, in 1878, on "Evolution as it Respects Man and the Bible." In 1876 he delivered a discourse on "The History of the Second Presbyterian Church of Princeton," which was published, by request. In 1873 he received the degree of D. D. from the College of New Jersey.

Dukes, Rev. Joseph, whose parents were half-breed Choctaw Indians, was born in 1811, in the Choctaw Nation, now the State of Mississippi. When ten years old he was placed in one of the large mission schools at Mayhew, which had just been established for the education of Choctaw boys and girls. After the treaty was made by which the Choctaw country was sold to the United States, he remained several years in Mississippi with Rev. Cyrus Byington, assisting him very largely in preparing a grammar and lexicon of the Choctaw language. On his removal to the new country, west of Arkansas, he continued his labors as interpreter, as often as they were needed, without charge. He was soon chosen and ordained an elder of one of the churches. Subsequently he was employed by Rev. A. Wright as assistant translator. In this capacity he made the first draft of most of the Epistles and Revelation, and of the Old Testament as far as the Psalms, and helped in the revision and correction of all that has been published.

Mr. Dukes was licensed by the Presbytery, to preach, in 1853. He was never ordained, because he shrank from the great responsibilities of the sacred office. He was an excellent preacher in the Choctaw language, and most highly esteemed by the missionaries. He performed much public service as captain or head man, as translator of the Choctaw laws, as Judge of the Supreme Court for several years, repeatedly as a member of the General Council, and for five years before his death as a trustee of public schools. He was uniformly faithful in every public trust, and possessed, more than almost any other man, the full confidence of the large mass of the people.

JOHN WELSH DULLES, D. D.

Dulles, John Welsh, D. D., was born in Philadelphia, November 4th, 1823. He graduated at Yale College in 1841, and at Union Theological Seminary in 1848. He sailed for Southern India, as a Missionary of the American Board, in 1848, but was compelled, by the loss of his voice and the illness of his family, to leave that field, and returned to Philadelphia in 1852. For three years he served the American Sunday-school Union, having charge of the Missionary work of the Society. In 1857 he became editor of the Publication Committee of the Presbyterian General Assembly (N. S.), and in this position gave great satisfaction. At the reunion of the two branches of the Presbyterian Church, in 1870, he was elected Editorial Secretary of the united Board of Publication, and has edited its tracts, books and periodicals, from that date.

Dr. Dulles is a gentleman of polished and pleasant address, and of admirable Christian character. Modest and retiring in disposition, he is yet firm in his convictions, and an indefatigable and efficient laborer in the vineyard of the Lord. The Sabbath School in the Walnut Street Presbyterian Church, of which he has been the faithful superintendent for many years, is one of the largest in the city, and a model of order, discipline and careful spiritual training. He discharges his duties as Secretary of the Board of Education with great zeal, ability, judiciousness and acceptableness, and is justly held in high regard by his brethren, for his attractive spirit and sterling worth. Dr. Dulles is the author of two interesting and valuable volumes, entitled, "Life in India," and "The Ride Through Palestine."

Dunbar, William, M. D., a distinguished citizen of Adams county, Miss., was for many years an active and useful ruling elder in the Carmel Church, at one time a large and wealthy organization situated in a neighborhood of planters, about ten miles to the southeast of Natchez. He was the descendant of an ancient and noble Scotch family. His grandfather was Sir Archibald Dunbar, of Elgin. His father, Sir William Dunbar, was educated first at Glasgow, and subsequently, at London. His ardor in the pursuit of mathematical and astronomical studies gained for him, in the latter city, the friendship of Sir William Herschell. In 1771 he was induced, for the benefit of his health, to make a voyage to the North American colonies, and landed at Philadelphia in charge of a mercantile adventure. His business led him to Pittsburg, where he remained till 1773. In this year he formed a partnership with Mr. John Ross, a prominent Scotch merchant of Philadelphia, for the purpose of opening a plantation in the British Province of West Florida. Having purchased a force of negro laborers at Jamaica, he settled at a place in the vicinity of Baton Rouge, La., and, after experiencing many fluctuations of fortune, finally, in 1792, removed to the neighborhood of Natchez and opened a plantation, which he called "The Forest." Upon the arrival of Governor Sargent, the first Governor of the Territory of Mississippi, he took the oath of allegiance to the United States. He held several important official trusts under the Government; was the correspondent of President Jefferson, Herschell, Rittenhouse, and other leading characters of the day, and contributed valuable papers to the American Philosophical Society. He is regarded as one of the most distinguished scholars in the annals of the Southwest. He died in 1810, leaving a large estate to his descendants.

William, the subject of this sketch, was born at "The Forest," June 19th, 1793; was graduated at Princeton College in 1813; studied medicine at the University of Pennsylvania, and received his degree of M. D. in 1818. Succeeding to the plantation and homestead of "The Forest," he devoted himself throughout life to the management of his estate. His government of his slaves was literally patriarchal. The domestic servants were daily gathered with his own household for family worship; a chaplain who resided in his family preached to the plantation negroes every Sabbath, and instructed their children in the Catechism and Scriptures. Many of these people were admitted as members to the Carmel Church. Dr. Dunbar was a decided Presbyterian, a zealous Christian, and a liberal promoter of religion in the region of country in which he lived. The elegant hospitality which he delighted to dispense, together with the religious and intellectual atmosphere of his home, made it a resort where his friends loved to congregate, to which strangers sought admittance, and in which ministers in particular were sure to meet a welcome and enjoy a generous entertainment. His prosperity, while it lasted, was used freely for the benefit of others; and when, in his later years, reverses darkened his lot, as they did in various forms, they were borne with the manly fortitude of a true Christian. He died, in the comfort of a "good hope through grace," on the 8th of December, 1847. Few men in their path through life have more beautifully illustrated the figure of "the light shining more and more unto the perfect day."

Dunham, Rev. Samuel, youngest son of Chauncey and Sylvia (Langdon) Dunham, was born in Southington, Conn., February 8th, 1835. He graduated at Yale College in 1860; studied theology two years in Union Theological Seminary, New York, and a third year in the Seminary at Andover, graduating at the latter place in 1863. He was licensed to preach by the Essex South Association, at Salem, Mass., February 3d, 1863. From April following he preached for the Congregational Church of West Brookfield, Mass., as stated supply and as pastor elect until ordained and installed pastor of the same church, October 4th, 1864. He spent six months of 1869-70 in European travel, and October 27th, 1870 was, by advice of Council, released from his pastorate to enter upon an engagement to supply the pulpit of the First Congregational Church, Norwalk, Conn. Accepting a call from the West Presbyterian Church of Binghamton, N. Y., he commenced his labors in that city January 1st, 1873; was installed pastor the following April, and still continues in that office (November 1883). He is a good preacher, and a faithful pastor. His principal publications are "An historical discourse delivered at West Brookfield, Mass., on the occasion of the 150th Anniversary of the First Church in Brookfield, October 16th, 1867," including several historical papers and an appendix; an address at the 150th Anniversary of the First Congregational Society of Southington, Conn., 1874; and "The Nation's Tears," a sermon in memory of President Garfield, preached in the West Presbyterian Church, Binghamton, September 25th, 1881.

Dunlap, Rev. Cyrus H., is the second son of James and Clarissa (Stoughton) Dunlap. He was born in Butler county, Pa., October 15th, 1834. His collegiate education was received at Westminster College, Pennsylvania. He entered the Western Theological Seminary in 1861, and graduated in the Class of 1864. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Beaver (now Shenango), April 12th, 1863. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Allegheny, April 12th, 1864. His first pastoral charge was the North Church, Allegheny City; the next, Carondelet Church, St. Louis, Mo. Afterwards he served the Church of Sodalita, and the Calvary Church, Springfield, Mo. The former of these two he served four years; the latter, eight years. Both these churches were largely increased during his pastorate; and both built new houses of worship. In 1879 he received a call to the First Church, New Castle, Pa. He accepted, and returned to the scene of his early life and labors as a student and teacher.

Mr. Dunlap is a preacher of good parts, and of power. His sermons are clear, Scriptural and spiritual. He speaks with great earnestness and sincerity, and touches the hearts of his hearers. He is a man of devoted piety. He is active in Sabbath School, missionary and temperance work. He is a good pastor, an indefatigable worker, and a faithful under-shepherd. Western Pennsylvania and Western Missouri have both been blessed by his abundant and devoted labors as a servant of Jesus Christ.

Dunlap, James, D.D., was born in Chester county, Pa., and, after graduating at Princeton College, in 1773, acted as Tutor for two years. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Donegal, some time between 1776 and 1781, and ordained by the Presbytery of New Castle, August 21st, 1781. Shortly after his ordination he removed to Western Pennsylvania, and settled first at Little Redstone and Dunlap Creek; afterwards he became pastor of Laurel Hill Church, where he remained until 1803, when he was elected President of Jefferson College. This post he held until 1811. He is represented to have been a very pious man and a remarkable scholar. He was especially distinguished for his accurate attainments in classical literature. He seemed to have had the classics completely in his memory, for he could hear long recitations in Virgil, Homer, etc., without a book in his hand, and then thoroughly drill the reciting class, asking all the words and sentences while walking to and fro with his hands behind his back—his usual position on such occasions. Dr. Dunlap died in 1818.

Dunlap, Rev. Robert White, was born in Lancaster District, S. C., September 11th, 1815. He graduated at the University of North Carolina, in 1835, and was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Georgia, April 6th, 1838. He was stated supply at St. Augustine, Fla., 1838-40; pastor of the church at Columbia, Pa., 1841-4; pastor of Aisquith Street Church, Baltimore, Md., 1844-50, and pastor of the church at Hagerstown, Md., 1853-6. He died at Hagerstown, February 17th, 1856, his decease being deeply lamented by his attached and afflicted congregation. Mr. Dunlap was a gentleman of much suavity of spirit and cultivation of manner, an earnest Christian, an able preacher, a devoted pastor, and enjoyed the confidence and esteem of the communities in which he labored.

Dunlap, William Carnes, D.D., was born in Maury county, Tenn., August 14th, 1817. His early education was obtained in his native county. His theological studies were pursued at Lane Theological Seminary. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of West Tennessee, June 1st, 1844, and ordained as an evangelist by the same body in April, 1846. He began his labors with the Church at Fayetteville, Tenn., and was its stated supply till the latter part of 1852, when he removed to Lewisburg. In the Fall of 1853 he removed to Texas, and served the churches of Centreville and Crockett, as stated supply, for more than two years. In January, 1856, he took charge of the Church at Marshall, where he remained until 1867, when he engaged to preach one year for the Thalia Street Church, New Orleans. At the expiration of this period he accepted a call to the pastorate of the First Church, Shreveport, La., and was installed in January, 1869. Here he still continues, and his labors have been greatly blessed. Under his ministry a feeble congregation has become large and flourishing, and a commodious and elegant church building has been erected. Dr. Dunlap is a gentleman of great benignity and kindness of heart. To the needy he never turns a deaf ear. As a preacher, he is plain, earnest and forcible, and there are times and occasions when his sermons are characterized by sublime flights that thrill his audience. As a pastor, he excels. To the discharge of his duties in this capacity, as the tender ministrant at the bedside of the sick, the gentle consolers of the sorrowing, the sympathetic comforter of the afflicted, and at all times the faithful and affectionate friend, may be very largely attributed his commanding influence in the community in which he lives.

Dunn, Gen. William McKee, son of Hon. Williamson Dunn, was born in Jefferson County, Indiana Territory, December 12th, 1814. Graduated at Indiana College, at Bloomington, in 1832, and took a post-graduate course at Yale College, Conn., where he received the honorary degree of A. M. Was connected with Hanover College, as Principal of the Preparatory Department and Professor of Mathematics, for three years. Studied law and practiced his profession for about twenty years, at Madison, Ind. Was a member of the State Legislature, and also of the Convention which revised the State Constitution in 1850. Represented the Third District of Indiana in Congress, with marked ability and distinction, during the two terms that covered the stormy period, from March, 1859, to March, 1863. He united with the Presbyterian Church in his twenty-first year, and, throughout his residence in Indiana, occupied a prominent and useful part in the advancement of the religious and educational interests of that State.

Gen. Dunn has rendered eminent service to the cause of patriotism and the public good, in various official and private capacities. Though absolutely uncompromising and unflinching in the maintenance of his high standard of principle and right, his gentleness of heart, his uniform courtesy, and his charm of mental acquirement, have everywhere won for him warm personal regard, as well as universal respect, even among his sternest political enemies. His hand has ever been open to the needy, and his ear to the cry of the distressed. General Dunn now resides in Washington City.

Dunn, Hon. Williamson, was of Scotch-Irish descent, and born near Danville, Ky., December 25th, 1781. He removed to Indiana Territory in 1809, and settled in Jefferson county. He was appointed to a Judgeship, in 1811, by Gen. William Henry Harrison, then Governor of the Territory. During the war of 1812 he was captain of a company of rangers, an organization provided by Congress for the protection of the frontier settlement. He united with the Presbyterian Church at Charlestown, Indiana Territory, twenty-five miles distant, but the church nearest to his abode. He was one of the original members and first ruling elders of the church organized, in 1820, at Hanover, a village laid out on his farm. He was a member of the House of Representatives in the first three Legislatures of the State of Indiana, and was Speaker during his last two terms of service. In 1823, on an appointment by President Monroe, as Register of the Land Office, for a recent extensive purchase of lands from the Indians, he removed to the wilderness, and, in connection with Major Whitlock, the Receiver, laid out the town of Crawfordsville. He was one of the first members and first elders of the Presbyterian Church at Crawfordsville.

Returning to Hanover, he resumed his former relations with that church in 1829. He was one of the founders of Hanover College, and served as one of its Trustees for many years. He gave to Wabash College a tract of land, which formed the nucleus for its subsequent endowment, and was one of its first

Board of Trustees. After his return to Jefferson county he was elected to the State Senate, and also served another term on the Bench. He was a frequent delegate to the Presbyteries and Synods of the State, and was a member of the General Assembly in 1834.

Judge Dunn was widely known in the early history of Indiana. He was a man of commanding presence, dignified but cordial manner, and was universally respected for his good judgment, integrity and manly Christian character. Throughout his long life he gave freely of his means, and devoted his best energies to the advancement of religion and education, and every good work.

Dutton, Warren Backus, D.D., was the son of Hubbard and Abigail Dutton, of Lebanon, Conn. He graduated at Yale College, with high rank as a scholar, in 1829. He was then a Tutor in Edgehill School, Princeton, N. J. He completed his theological studies at Union Theological Seminary, Va. As a licentiate, he assisted the Rev. Dr. Stanton, 1838-41, in his pastoral charge at Farmville, Va.

While thus engaged he was called to the pastoral charge of the Church at Charlestown, Va., and commenced preaching there on the first Sabbath of December, 1841. On the 20th of November, 1842, he was ordained by Winchester Presbytery, and installed over that church. This relation continued till April 20th, 1866, when, at his request, on the ground of ill-health, it was severed by Presbytery. For two years he then devoted himself to recruiting his health. This task partially accomplished, he gave himself, as stated supply, in 1868, to the work of repairing the desolated house, both material and spiritual, at Harper's Ferry. There he lived and labored, and was blessed, till the famous flood in the Shenandoah river, in 1870, inflicted disaster upon his church, ruin upon his house, and irreparable injury upon his person. Foreseeing that his active labors were probably ended, he made his residence in Charlestown, the field of his great life's work. There, under the shadows of the monument he had erected, he patiently and hopefully waited all the days of his appointed time till his great change came. Saturday, September 5th, 1874, at the age of seventy years, his soul was called from the earthly house of this tabernacle to mansions in the skies.

Dr. Dutton was remarkable for virtues in every relation of life. His intellect was one of extraordinary power. His Christian character was modest even to excessive retirement and reserve. As a pastor he was eminently successful. His preaching was conceded to be of a very high order.

Du Val, Rev. Frederick Beal, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Wilmington, Del., is the fifth son of Edward Willett Du Val, and Mary (Miller) Du Val, and was born May 31st, 1847, in Prince George's County, Md. After spending some time as a clerk in a mercantile establishment in Washington, D. C., he spent three years at the Hightstown Classical Institute, N. J., then under the care of the Rev. J. E. Alexander. He entered Princeton College in the Fall of 1868. Here he received gold medals, both for oratory and debate (being one of the junior orators of his class), and the first prize for Bible scholarship, and graduated in the Summer of 1872, in the honor-roll. Graduating at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1875, he was ordained and installed over the First Presbyterian Church, Wilmington, June 17th, of that year. Here he has passed nearly eight years in arduous but successful work; by patient labor and earnest prayer a strong church has been built up, one hundred and eighty souls having, during his ministry, been added to the number of God's people. Mr. Du Val is an earnest preacher, and seeks to weave Bible truth into the warp and woof of practical life. He uses no manuscript; his style is pleasing and his manner natural, while his messages are adapted to carry conviction to the hearer, because of the intensity of the conviction of the speaker. He is of a strongly sympathetic nature, and this, combined with a love of what is pure and good, and a hatred of cruelty, deception and fraud, has borne fruit in his efforts to inculcate greater regard for the moral in education, and to foster the work of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children and Animals, and the arrest of fraud and vice by instruction of the masses in their relative duties.

REV. BENJAMIN WOODBRIDGE DWIGHT, PH. D., LL. D.

Dwight, Rev. Benjamin Woodbridge, Ph. D., LL. D., son of Dr. Benjamin Woolsey Dwight, was born at New Haven, Conn., April 5th, 1816; graduated at Hamilton College in 1835; at Yale Theological Seminary in 1838; and was ordained by the Presbytery of Chicago in 1845. Prevented by ill health from pastoral labor in any regular form, he has abounded in useful endeavors in the way of occasional preaching, and in the inspiring aims and pleasures of teaching and of authorship. He resided chiefly in Brooklyn and New York, from 1846 to 1869, but since that time has resided in Clinton, New York.

As an educator, Dr. Dwight has trained for the active duties of life more than 2000 pupils, sending large numbers of them to various leading colleges, and educating a considerable number of young ladies in the higher courses of University study. He was for a period (1872) the Editor-in-Chief of The Interior, of Chicago, resigning, for pecuniary reasons, a post of usefulness which he filled to great advantage to the cause of learning and religion. He is the author of several works of a superior character, among which are, "The Higher Christian Education," "Modern Philology," "The History of the Strong Family," "The History of the Dwight Family," and "Woman's Right to Public Forms of Usefulness in the Church." He has also written many valuable articles for reviews and magazines. He has a fine reputation for the variety, scope and thoroughness of his linguistic attainments. Throughout his life it has been his joy to help others, as largely as possible, to something better and nobler than they had yet reached. He has ever been a man of strongly realized convictions of Divine truth and of personal duty, and has lived as one whose ruling desire is to do all the good that he can in the world, while he is in it.

Dwight, Benjamin Woolsey, M. D., son of President Timothy Dwight, D. D., of Yale College, and great grandson of Jonathan Edwards, was born at Northampton, Mass., February 10th, 1780, and graduated at Yale in 1799. He studied medicine, but was compelled by ill health, to abandon early his much-loved profession. He established himself, in the end, as a wholesale and retail merchant at Catskill, N. Y. (1817-31). Here he was a most efficient elder in the Presbyterian Church. He gave Bible-class instructions to large classes of young men, took a prominent part in conference meetings, and frequently addressed the colored people on the subject of religion. He was always busy with his pen, as opportunity offered, for some good purpose. He published, in The Memoirs of the Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences, in 1811, the first article ever published in this country on "Chronic Debility of the Stomach," which was much commended for its originality and excellence here, and republished in England.

In 1831 Dr. Dwight removed to Clinton, Oneida county, New York, and was elected Treasurer of Hamilton College, in the duties of which office, and the pleasant life of a gentleman farmer, he spent the rest of his days, his death occurring in May, 1850. Dr. Dwight's moral character was of the noblest order, being adorned with spotless integrity, fearless independence in his convictions of duty, conscientious straightforwardness in action, and a keen sense of justice in reference to others' rights. To these traits were united the softer virtues of thorough purity in thought and speech, gentleness, and a quiet spirit before God and man. "He was," says Dr. William B. Sprague, "a man of literary taste, of a philosophical turn of mind, and of most exemplary Christian character."

Dwight, Henry E., M. D., D. D., is the eldest son of the Rev. Dr. William T. Dwight, formerly a resident of Philadelphia, and one of the most distinguished clergymen of his day. After his graduation at Yale College, he was Professor of Latin and Greek in the Brooklyn High School. He graduated at Andover Theological Seminary after a three years' course of study. His ministry was eminently successful in establishing and strengthening three churches, and while pastor, in building one of the finest church edifices in the neighborhood of Boston. His health being impaired by overwork, he tried the mountain air of Switzerland. Having recovered strength he entered the University of Halle, and later became a member of the Universities of Berlin and France, from which he has received the highest testimonials of scholarship and worth.

On returning to America, under the advice of his physicians that he should undertake a more active profession, Dr. Dwight selected that of medicine, and graduated at the University of Pennsylvania. During twenty years he has been a constant resident of Philadelphia, and his life has been filled with usefulness and success. As a scholar he has been crowned with the honors and testimonials of four Universities, on both Continents; those of Yale and Pennsylvania in the United States, and of Berlin and Paris in Europe. He has been very successful as a lecturer, instructor and writer, and has a good reputation as a physician. For ten years he was one of the physicians connected with the largest hospital in Philadelphia. Though laid aside from the active duties of the pastorate by ill-health, Dr. Dwight has rendered, and still renders, useful service to the cause of religion, by aiding to establish and upbuild Evangelical churches in Philadelphia, and by supplying the pulpits of sick and disabled clergymen.

Dwight, Theodore William, LL.D., son of Dr. Benjamin Woolsey Dwight, of Catskill, N. Y., was born in that place, July 18th, 1822; graduated at Hamilton College in 1840, and studied law at the Yale Law School (1841-2). He was Law Professor at Hamilton College (1846-58), in the undergraduate course of study. Since 1858 he has been Professor of Municipal Law in Columbia College, New York city, and Warden of the Law School, which was organized by him.

Prof. Dwight was the legal editor in the corps of associate editors, who prepared "Johnson's Cyclopaedia" for the press (1871), and has been, for several years, an associate editor of "The American Law Register" of Philadelphia. He edited also "Maine's Ancient Law" (1861). He was made non-resident Professor of Constitutional Law, in Cornell University (1869-71), and at Amherst College (1870-2), delivering a course of twelve lectures at each College, at the end of his year's course, in Columbia College.

Prof. Dwight was a member of the New York State Constitutional Convention of 1867, and one of its Judiciary Committee; Vice-President of the New York Board of State Commissioners of Public Charities, in 1873; President of the New York State Prison Association, in 1874, and has been at different times an active member of the well-known "Committee of Seventy" of the city of New York. On December 30th, 1873, he was appointed by Governor Dix a member of the "Commission of Appeals," a special court organized to aid the "Court of Appeals" in clearing its docket of a long overburdened condition, and sharing to the full with it in its duties and honors, as the Supreme Court of Law and Equity in the State (1874-5). An English counsellor-at-law says of him, in MacMillan's Magazine (1872), "He has a reputation throughout the whole Union as the greatest living American teacher of law. He is one of the ablest Professors that any school of law ever possessed." Prof. Dwight is a member of the Madison Square Presbyterian Church, New York city, and was made an elder in it in 1873.

Eakin, Rev. Samuel, a graduate of Princeton, in 1763, was ordained by the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia, in 1770. From 1773 to 1777, he was settled at Penn's Neck Presbyterian Church, in West Jersey; but rendering himself obnoxious to the Tories by his zeal in the cause of American liberty, he was obliged to withdraw. He was the idol of the soldiers. Wherever there was a military training, or an order issued for soldiers to march, he was, in his power, always there to address them, and, by his eloquence, would excite their emotions of patriotism to the highest pitch. It is related of him that he was so warm a Whig, that he never entered the pulpit without imploring the Lord "to teach our people to fight, and give them courage and perseverance to overcome their enemies." Mr. Eakin was an extraordinary man, and next to Mr. Whitefield, esteemed the most eloquent preacher who had ever been in the country. He died in 1784.

Eastburn, Rev. Joseph, was a preacher to seamen in Philadelphia. He died January 30th, 1828, aged seventy-nine. Many thousands attended his funeral. At the grave, Dr. Green delivered an address. When Mr. Eastburn began to preach to seamen, about 1820, "we procured," he said, "a sail loft, and on the Sabbath hung out a flag. As the sailors came by, they hailed us, 'Ship ahoy.' We answered them. They asked us, 'Where we were bound?' We told them 'to the port of New Jerusalem—and they would do well to go in the fleet.' 'Well,' said they, 'we will come in and hear your terms.'" This was the beginning of the Mariners' Church. Mr. Eastburn was eminently pious, devoted to the salvation of seamen, and extensively useful.

Eaton, Horace, D. D., was born in Sutton, N. H., October 7th, 1810, and was fitted for college at Philips Academy, Andover, Mass. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1839, and at the Union Theological Seminary in 1842. He was pastor of the Sixth Presbyterian Church, New York city, six years; of the First Presbyterian church, Palmyra, thirty years, and acted as a supply at Marion four years. Dr. Eaton died October 21st, 1883. He had buried over one thousand one hundred persons, and had married nearly as many couples.

Eaton, Gen. John, LL.D., U. S. Commissioner of Education, son of John and Janet Cole (Andrews) Eaton, was born in Sutton, N. H., December 5th, 1829. He graduated from Dartmouth College with the class of 1854. On graduating he was Principal of the Clinton Street School in Cleveland, O., from September, 1854 to February 1856. His success attracted attention, and in less than two years he was solicited to superintend the schools of the city of Toledo, O. He accepted the invitation and served as superintendent until 1859, when he resigned, to study for the ministry, at Andover, Mass. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Maumee, September 5th, 1861.

After serving as chaplain in the U. S. A. for four years, General Eaton, in 1865, was made Assistant Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau. When he had placed the Bureau in good running order, he resigned, in order to establish the Post, a daily, weekly and tri-weekly newspaper, in Memphis,

REV. JOHN EATON, PH.D., LL.D.

Tenn. In 1867 he was elected Superintendent of Schools in Tennessee, and spent two years in organizing the free schools of that State. While in Ohio he aided in organizing the Northwestern Ohio Teachers' Association. As chairman of a committee of the State Teachers' Association, he prepared the memorial to the Legislature which resulted in the establishment of the Institution for the Reformation of Juvenile Offenders, at Lancaster, O. From his experience as a teacher in New England, while in college, as superintendent in Ohio, and his observations and labors in Tennessee and the Mississippi Valley, he had rare opportunities to know all conditions of education, especially its needs in the South.

General Eaton was appointed Commissioner of the United States Bureau of Education in 1870, which position he still holds. In his first National Report he urged national aid to education, the great measure now attracting so much attention. The Bureau of Education, when he became its head, did not own a hundred volumes, and now it has 16,000, and 35,500 pamphlets; its correspondents number about 20,000, including the most eminent educators of the world, it has a valuable pedagogical museum; France has established an office on its model. In 1873 General Eaton visited Europe, posting himself and establishing connections that continue to furnish the most valuable literature for our educators. He has twice visited the Pacific Coast, and has as minute knowledge of the cause of education in some of the most remote corners of the land, as he has of it among his native hills. His addresses are numerous. He was one of the Government Commissioners at the Centennial, and is a member of various learned associations, both in America and Europe. Dartmouth College conferred the degree of LL.D. upon him in 1876. At an Alumni meeting at that College, a few years ago, the venerable Professor Sanborn presented General Eaton as a son of Dartmouth, who had done more for education than any living man.

Eaton, Rev. Johnston, was born in Rocky Spring Congregation, Franklin county Pa., February 7th, 1776. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1802, studied theology under Dr. John McMillan, and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Ohio, August 22d, 1805. After visiting southern Ohio, he took up his abode, in 1806, in Erie county, Pa. The country at this time was literally a wilderness. There were not more than two or three churches in the county, and at the period of his coming, not a minister of any denomination.

Mr. Eaton was ordained by the Presbytery of Erie, June 30th, 1808, and installed at the same time pastor of the congregations of Fairview and Springfield. Released from the charge of Springfield, November 8th, 1814, he then divided his time between Fairview, Erie and Northeast. In 1818 Northeast was dropped, and his time divided between Erie and Fairview, until 1823. In 1813, during the war with Great Britain, he was employed as a government chaplain, and ministered to the troops stationed at Erie. He also preached for a portion of his time at Harbor Creek, Waterford, Washington and McKean, in Erie county, Pa. He continued to labor in the congregation of Fairview until the close of his earthly toils. He died June 17th, 1847, and his end was peace.

The Record of Presbytery, on occasion of Mr. Eaton's death, is, in part, in these words: "He was uniformly meek, gentle and forbearing, generous and hospitable. As a preacher, he was clear, logical, instructive and evangelical, and eminently sound in the faith. In his death, the Boards of our Church and the cause of benevolent effort for the salvation of a perishing world, have lost a devoted friend."

Eaton, Samuel John Mills, D. D., son of the Rev. Johnston and Eliza (Canon) Eaton, was born in Fairview, Erie county, Pa., April 15th, 1820. He graduated at Jefferson College, in the class of 1845; studied theology in the Western Theological Seminary; was licensed by the Presbytery of Erie, March 16th, 1848, and was ordained by the same Presbytery, February 7th, 1849. He has had but one pastorate, that of the Church in Franklin, Pa. His labors here commenced in April 1848, and ceased in March, 1881, making thirty-three years of steady, solid and successful work.

Dr. Eaton adds to fine inherited natural gifts the learning that has come from a life of close study of books, as well as a keen observation of men and things. His manner, as a preacher, while cultivated, is easy and natural. His sermons are strong, clear, logical and convincing. He is always original, and his illustrations are well chosen, apt and to the point. He possesses, in an eminent degree, that unconscious power that invariably goes with strong convictions and sincere belief. He has been Stated Clerk of the Presbytery of Erie over thirty years; was Stated Clerk of the Synod of Erie during its existence, and has filled the permanent clerkship of the Synod of Allegheny. Dr. Eaton is a writer of ability. He has published "History of Petroleum," "History of the Presbytery of Erie," "Ecclesiastical History in Centennial Memorial," "Lakeside," "Memorial of the Life and Labors of Dr. Dickson," "Centennial History of Venango County, Pa.," "History of Venango County," in Dr. Engle's "History of Pennsylvania," "Jerusalem, the Holy City." He is a Trustee of Washington and Jefferson College, and a Director of the Western Theological Seminary. His life has been crowded with earnest and useful labor.

Eaton, Rev. Sylvester, was born in Chatham, N. Y., August 12th, 1790; graduated at Williams College in 1816; studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Albany in 1818. He was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Norwalk, Conn., in 1820, and was dismissed in 1827; was settled as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Buffalo, in April, 1829, and was dismissed in September, 1834; was settled as pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Paterson, N. J., in 1834, and was dismissed about 1837; was settled shortly after in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., where he remained about four years. He died May 14th, 1844.

Eckard, James Read, D. D., was born in Philadelphia, Pa., November 22d, 1805. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, in 1823; practiced law, 1826-30, was ordained an evangelist by the Third Presbytery of Philadelphia, July 21st, 1833; was missionary in Ceylon, 1833-43; agent of the

A. B. C. F. M., in Georgia, 1844; missionary and Principal of the Chatham Academy, Savannah, Georgia, 1844-46; pastor of New York Avenue Church, Washington, D. C., 1848-58; stated supply at Asbury, N. J., 1860-67, and Professor in Lafayette College, 1858-72. When in Ceylon Dr. Eckard published, in the Tamil language, an Essay on Faith and Justification. Also, in English, a work called the "Hindoo Traveler," designed for natives educated to read English. On his return from India he published a small volume containing a narrative of some of the missionary operations there. He contributed to the Princeton Review, in 1860, an article on the "Logical Relations of Religion and Science."

Edgar James. Judge Edgar was born in York county, Pa., in the congregation of Slate Ridge, November 15th, 1744. He removed to Western Pennsylvania in the Fall of 1779, where he was very highly esteemed and exerted great influence for good. He was an Associate Judge of the Court of Washington, and a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church. Judge Brackenridge, in his "Incidents of the Western Insurrection," alludes to him as "having been a member of committees in the early period of the American Revolution, and of legislative assemblies, executive and censorial councils or deliberative conventions ever since." And Dr. Carnahan, in his "Lecture on the Whisky Insurrection," says: "This truly great and good man, little known beyond the precincts of Washington county, had a good English education, and had improved his mind by reading and reflection, so that, in theological and political knowledge, he was superior to many professional men. He had as clear a head and as pure a heart as ever fell to the lot of mortals, and he possessed an eloquence which, although not polished, was convincing and persuasive; yet he lived in retirement on his farm, except when the voice of his neighbors called him forth to serve the Church or the State."

Edgar, John Todd, D. D., was born in Sussex county, Delaware, April 13th, 1792. His father removed to Kentucky in 1795. He was at the Transylvania University, Lexington, Ky., a short time, but was not a graduate. He graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1816, when he was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery. In 1817 he was installed pastor of the Church at Flemingsburg, Ky., and labored there with earnestness and assiduity. He was subsequently pastor at Maysville, Ky., and in 1827 took charge of the Church at Frankfort, the capital of Kentucky. Here his eloquence soon gathered round him the leading men of the State. In 1833 he accepted a call from Nashville, Tenn., and it was among this people that his great life-work was fully accomplished. He died, November 13th, 1860, his death producing such a profound sensation in the community, that, by proclamation of the Mayor, there was a general suspension of business in the city, and the Chancery Court, then in session, adjourned.

Dr. Edgar was a cultivated and courteous gentleman. His intellectual endowments were more remarkable for their admirable balance than for the special eminence of particular faculties. He was accounted one of the first orators of his day. As a pastor, he was social, winning and catholic. His temperament was kind and genial, generous, loving and most just; pervaded by a settled aversion to all that was mean, cruel and base, sustained by personal and moral firmness of the highest order, and thoroughly unselfish. By birth, training and deep conviction he was a Presbyterian, and clear and constant in his convictions, kind and trustful towards all good men of every denomination, he was a noble specimen of the body to which he belonged.

Edie, Joseph S., M. D., is a venerable and esteemed elder of the Church at Christiansburg, Va. He was born in Brooke county, Va., November 27th, 1798, and graduated at Hampden Sidney College in 1825. About that time he came to Christiansburg as a teacher. Here he entered at once with great energy upon Christian work, and established the first Sabbath School in the place. Subsequently he established another school on Mr. Van Lear's place on the North Fork of Roanoke, and did much in circulating tracts and religious reading among the people. After the organization of the Church at Christiansburg, in which he exerted a strong influence, he went to teach school in Lewisburg, Va., and to pursue the study of medicine. During an absence of several years he taught also at Union, Monroe county, and completed his medical course in Cincinnati, Ohio. He returned to Christiansburg in 1832, and has continued in the practice of his profession there to this day. He has been a member of that church about fifty-six years, and a ruling elder forty-nine years. It is, "says his pastor," perhaps, enough to add that during all this time the church has never had a more valued or valuable member or officer. His name will be linked especially with the names of R. D. Montague and William Wade, and it is no disparagement to those excellent men and women who have stood with them, to say that to these three men, more than to any others, is due, under God, the success of the church in all its early struggles, and in much of its subsequent history. The church has never had in it men more devoted to its interests, or men of greater piety, weight of character and practical wisdom."

Edisto Island Presbyterian Church, South Carolina, is one of the four churches that formed Charleston Presbytery. This island has ever been a stronghold of Presbyterianism, having been settled by emigrants from Scotland and Wales during the earlier part of the 18th century. There is reason to believe, although nothing positive is known, that a church of this Denomination was established here between the years 1710 and 1720, for we are told that a grant of three hundred acres of land was made to Henry Bower in 1705, which land he conveyed in

In 1732 the donation of a number of negro slaves was made, who were to be employed on these lands, and about the same time another valuable gift of land was conveyed to the church by a Mr. Willis. A record of the following year notes the death of a Mr. Moor, a Presbyterian minister of Edisto; the number of years of his service is, however, unknown. He was probably the first resident pastor. Between this period and 1741 the church must have been vacant, for it was not until the latter year that the Rev. John McCloud officiated as next pastor. He served until 1751, and was succeeded, in 1770, by the Rev. Thomas Henderson, who resigned his charge between the years 1775-1776.

The history of the church during the Revolutionary period is unknown, for any records existing at that time were destroyed. The next notice we have of it is in 1784, when it obtained its charter. At this period it was served by the Rev. Thomas Cooley, an Englishman, who continued in its pulpit until 1790. In 1793 he was succeeded by the Rev. Donald McCloud, who served until his death in 1821.

In the same year the Rev. William States Lee entered upon the discharge of his duties as pastor of this church, retaining the position until 1872, when old age and a failing eyesight impelled him to tender his resignation. Throughout the very long period of his pastorate he retained the love and esteem not only of his own charge, but of the community at large. In the silent cemetery near by rest his mortal remains, and a tablet has been erected to his memory within the walls of the church, a fit expression of veneration and affection for one who was the bond of living unity in the successive generations, and who, for more than half a century, pointed the fathers, children and grandchildren to the Lamb of God, united kindred and loving hearts in the sacred bonds of matrimony, sprinkled the water of baptism upon the brows of the children of the covenant, spake words of comfort to the suffering, and shed tears and read the consoling and triumphant truths of God's Word over the narrow coffins of the dead. Since the resignation of Mr. Lee, the Church has been served successfully by the Rev. J. R. Dow and the Rev. J. E. Fogartie, the latter of whom resigned the charge in the Autumn of 1882. On the third Sabbath of May, 1883, the Rev. R. A. Mickle was installed pastor of the Church by a Committee of Charleston Presbytery, consisting of Rev. W. T. Thompson, Rev. Dr. Brackett, and Rev. Thomas P. Hay. Amidst all its outward changes, the Church of Edisto Island—one of the old mother churches—is still sound in the faith, and aims at still greater usefulness.

Edson, Hanford Abram, D. D., the youngest son of Dr. Freeman and Mary Hanford Edson, was born in Scottsville, Monroe county, N. Y., March 14th, 1837. He graduated at Union College, in the class of 1855, received the degree of Master of Arts, in course, and that of Doctor of Divinity from Hanover College, in 1873. He spent the three years after graduation mainly as instructor in Greek and Mathematics, in Genesee Academy, Livingston county, N. Y. In September, 1858, he entered the Union Theological Seminary, N. Y., and remained in the Institution for two years. Having studied German, he went, in May, 1860, to Europe, and was matriculated in the University of Halle, where he gave attention especially to theology and philosophy, under the instruction of Tholuck, Julius Müller, and Erdmann. After extensive tours in Germany, Switzerland, Italy, France and England, he returned home. He was licensed to preach by the Niagara Presbytery, October 29th,

HANFORD ABRAM EDSON, D. D.

1861, and took charge of the Presbyterian Church at Niagara Falls, N. Y., where he remained until called to the pastorate of the Second Presbyterian Church in Indianapolis, Ind., which began January 17th, 1864. He transferred his services to the Memorial Presbyterian Church, in the same city, April 1st, 1873. Both these churches are large and flourishing, and Dr. Edson has been mainly instrumental in erecting handsome edifices for each.

Dr. Edson has been the recipient of many ecclesiastical honors. In 1873 he represented the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the National Congregational Council in New Haven, Conn.; and, in 1878, he was commissioned to the same duty before the General Council of the Reformed Episcopal Church, in Newark, N. J. He has written largely for the press, and is the author of various magazine articles and published sermons and addresses. Among the latter may be mentioned: "Commencement Address at McLean Institute, 1864;" "Commencement Address before the Theological Societies of Marietta College, 1867;" Address at the Dedication of the Library and Chapel of Wabash College, 1872;" "Commencement Address before the Theological Societies of Hanover College, 1873;" "Semi-Centennial Address before the Synods of Indiana, 1876." His Thanksgiving sermon, November 26th, 1868, is said to have given special impulse to the establishment of the Indianapolis Public Library.

Edwards, Rev. James Cooke, son of Wesley and Mary (Cooke) Edwards, was born in Warren county, N. J., March 12th, 1807. He was graduated from the College of New Jersey, at Princeton, in 1830. On leaving college, he passed immediately into Princeton Seminary; and, while in the Seminary, he was also a Tutor in the college, 1832-33. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Newton, April 24th, 1833, and was ordained by the Presbytery of New York, in the city of New York, as an evangelist, October 23d, 1834. For nearly a year, 1834-35, he labored in New York, gathering the Eighth Avenue (now West Twenty-third Street) Church, and then serving it as stated supply. Having accepted a call to Smithtown, Long Island, he was installed as its pastor, May 5th, 1835, and labored there successfully for nearly seventeen years, until released, December 25th, 1851, in order to become pastor of the Second (now South Street) Church of Morristown, N. J. Over the latter church he was installed January 6th, 1852, and labored there over eight years, until released April 18th, 1860. This was his last pastorate. Afterwards he served the Weehawken Church, N. J., as a supply, from May 1st to November 1st, 1877, and since 1860, taught, for longer or shorter periods of time, at South Orange, Rahway, and Jersey City, N. J. He died at Morristown, N. J., June 28th, 1880. He was a man of excellent scholarship, of sound mind, of kindly spirit, and much beloved by all who knew him.

Edwards, Rev. Jesse, the son of George C. and Hannah Edwards, was born in Elmira, N. Y., February 21st, 1819. He was educated in New Jersey College, where he was appointed Tutor. He graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1842, and was licensed by Steuben Presbytery in May of that year. He removed to Indiana, and, in 1845, was ordained by Logansport Presbytery, and labored as stated supply for Delphi and Rock Creek churches. In 1846 he preached at Monticello and vicinity, in the same Presbytery. In 1847 he returned to New York, and became stated supply for the Second Presbyterian Church, Sparta, N. Y., and for a short time at Portageville, N. Y. In 1850 he removed to Wisconsin, and entered upon his labors as a domestic missionary, under circumstances the most arduous and self-denying. He preached at Plover, Portage county, Wis., at Stevens' Point, and for a time at Grand Rapids. Whilst employed in these many labors he was elected one of the Professors in Carroll College, Waukesha, Wis. When that institution was closed he returned to Plover, where he resided till his death, which occurred February 6th, 1866. At all these places his remarkable fidelity and conscientiousness won the highest respect of the people, as his thorough Biblical scholarship, his instructive discourses, and his devotion to duty, claimed that of his brethren in the ministry.

Edwards, Rev. Jonathan, President of New Jersey College, a most acute metaphysician and distinguished divine, was born at Windsor, Conn., October 5th, 1703. He was graduated at Yale College in

REV. JONATHAN EDWARDS.

1720, before he was seventeen years of age. His uncommon genius discovered itself early, and while yet a boy he read Locke on the Human Understanding with a keen relish. Though he took much pleasure in examining the kingdom of nature, yet moral and theological researches yielded him the highest satisfaction. He lived in college nearly two years after taking his first degree, preparing himself for the office of a minister of the gospel. In 1722 he went to New York, at the request of a small congregation of English Presbyterians, and preached a number of months. In 1724 he was appointed a Tutor in Yale College, and he continued in that office till he was invited, in 1726, to preach at Northampton, Mass. Here he was ordained as colleague with his grandfather, Mr. Stoddard, February 15th, 1727. In 1735 his ministry was attended with very uncommon suc-

ness; a general impression was made upon the minds of the people by the truths which he proclaimed, and the church was much enlarged. He continued in this place more than twenty-three years. He had been instrumental in cheering many hearts with the joys of religion, and not a few had regarded him with all that affectionate attachment which is excited by the love of excellence and the sense of obligations which can never be repaid. But a spirit of detraction had gone forth, in consequence of his strict views of Christian discipline and purity, and a few leading men of outrageous zeal pushed forward men of less determined hostility, and he was released from his charge by an ecclesiastical council, June 22d, 1750.

In this scene of trouble and abuse, when the mistakes and the bigotry of the multitude had stopped their ears, and their passions were without control, Mr. Edwards exhibited the truly Christian spirit. His calmness, meekness, humility, and yet firmness and resolution, were the subjects of admiration to his friends. More anxious for his people than for himself, he preached a most solemn and affecting farewell discourse. He afterwards occasionally supplied the pulpit at times, when no preacher had been procured, but this proof of his superiority to resentment or pride, and this readiness to do good to those who had injured him, met with no grateful return from the congregation. Still, he was not left without excellent friends in Northampton, and his correspondents in Scotland, having been informed of his dismissal from his charge, contributed a considerable sum for the maintenance of his family.

In August, 1751, he succeeded Mr. Sergeant as missionary to the Housatonic Indians, at Stockbridge, in Berkshire county. Here he continued six years, preaching to the Indians and the white people, and, as he found much leisure, he prosecuted his theological and metaphysical studies, and produced works which rendered his name famous throughout Europe. Thus was his calamitous removal from Northampton the occasion, under the wise providence of God, of his imparting to the world the most important instructions, the influence of which has been extended to the present time, and will be felt through all the coming ages. In January, 1758, he reluctantly accepted the office of President of the College of New Jersey, as successor of his son-in-law, Mr. Burr, but he had not entered fully upon the duties of this station, before the prevalence of the smallpox induced him to be inoculated, and this disease was the cause of his death, March 23d, 1758, aged fifty-four. A short time before he died, as some of his friends, who surrounded his bed to see him breathe his last, were lamenting the loss which the college would sustain, he said, "Trust in God, and ye need not fear." These were his last words. He afterwards expired, with as much composure as if he had only fallen asleep. He left three sons and seven daughters.

President Edwards was equally distinguished by his Christian virtues, and by the extraordinary vigor and penetration of his mind. Though his constitution was delicate, he commonly spent thirteen hours every day in his study. He usually arose between four and five in the morning, and was abstemious, living completely by rule. All his researches were pursued with his pen in his hand, and the number of his miscellaneous writings which he had left behind him was above fourteen hundred. They were all numbered and paged, and an index was formed for the whole. He was peculiarly happy in his domestic connections. Mrs. Edwards, by taking the entire care of his temporal concerns, gave him an opportunity of consecrating all his powers, without interruption, to the labors and studies of the sacred office.

As a preacher, he was not oratorical in his manner, and his voice was rather feeble, though he spoke with distinctness; but his discourses were rich in thought, logical in structure, and direct in aim, and, being deeply impressed himself with the truths which he uttered, his preaching came home to the hearts of his hearers.

President Edwards was uncommonly zealous and persevering in his search after truth. He spared no pains in procuring the necessary aids, and he read all the books which he could procure that promised to afford him assistance in his inquiries. He confined himself to no particular sect or denomination, but studied the writings of men whose sentiments were the most opposite to his own. But the Bible claimed his peculiar attention. From that book he derived his religious principles, and not from any human system. The doctrines which he supported were Calvinistic, and when these doctrines were in any degree relinquished, or were not embraced in their whole length and breadth, he did not see where a man could set his foot down with consistency and safety, short of deism or atheism itself. Yet, with all his strict adherence to what he believed to be the truths of heaven, his heart was kind and tender. When Mr. Whitefield preached for him on the Sabbath, the acute divine, whose mighty intellect has seldom been equaled, wept as a child during the whole sermon.

President Edwards' Inquiry into the Freedom of the Will is considered as one of the greatest efforts of the human mind, and is generally regarded as having forever settled the controversy with Arminians, by demonstrating the untenableness of their principles. His other works which are most celebrated, are his books on Original Sin; his treatise on The Affections; his dissertation on the Nature of True Virtue, and that on the End for which God Created the World.

Edwards, Tryon, D. D., fourth son of Jonathan W. and Elizabeth (Tryon) Edwards, grandson of the younger, and great-grandson of the elder, President Edwards, was born at Hartford, Conn., August 7th, 1809; was graduated, with honor, at Yale College, in 1825; studied law in the city of New York; entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton in 1830, where he completed his studies in preparation for the ministry; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New York, in 1833; in 1834, was ordained and installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Rochester, N. Y.; in 1845, was installed pastor of the Second Congregational Church of New London, Conn.; in 1867, was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Hagerstown, Md.; and, in 1880, was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Gouverneur, N. Y.

Dr. Edwards has always stood high, both as a scholar and theologian. He is a man of distinguished ability, untiring industry, high literary attainments, and has been eminently acceptable and successful as a writer, a preacher, and a pastor. His ministry has been blessed with several revivals of religion; and from two of the churches under his pastoral care nineteen ministers and missionaries have been raised up and gone forth. He has always been intelligently active in the interests of education, and, while at Hagerstown, was greatly instrumental in building up Wilson College, of which he was unanimously chosen the first President. He is the author or editor of numerous and valuable tracts; review articles, and volumes; and has also prepared the memoirs, and edited the works, of Rev. Joseph Bellamy, D. D., and of the younger President Edwards, and has edited one or more of the previously unpublished works of the elder President Edwards. He is one of the ablest and best preachers of our Denomination; and the learned and unlearned, alike, listen with interest and profit to his faithful and masterly discourses.

Eells, Dan Parmelee, was born in Westmoreland, Oneida County, N. Y., April 16th, 1825, youngest son of Rev. James Eells and Mehitabel Parmelee. His family removed to Ohio, when he was five years old, but in 1841 he returned to the neighborhood of his birthplace, and entered Hamilton College, in the class of 1848. Unable to meet his college expenses, he was compelled to return home at the end of his Sophomore year, and shortly thereafter his business career began, in Cleveland. In 1849 he became bookkeeper in the commercial branch of the State Bank of Ohio, with which bank and its successor, the Commercial National Bank of Cleveland, he has ever since been connected, holding successively the offices of cashier, vice-president and president. With an interruption of only a few months, this connection has extended over a period of thirty-five years, and during Mr. Eells' management the bank has enjoyed uninterrupted prosperity, and has become one of the most influential banks in the State.

Incidental to his connection with the bank, Mr. Eells has been identified with many important enterprises, and has attained an honorable reputation among his associates and in the community at large. As a citizen, incorruptible, public-spirited; in business, enterprising and sagacious; in private life, pure, conscientious, open-handed.

He is also honorably known as the friend of religious and charitable work. The son of a Presbyterian minister, he has always been a Presbyterian, and an active member of the Second Church at Cleveland. Of this church he has been successively a deacon and an elder; and his brother, Rev. James Eells, D. D., now at Lane Seminary, Cincinnati, was for many years its pastor.

The Willson Avenue Mission of the Second Church became Mr. Eells' especial care. From the time of its organization he was superintendent of the Sunday School, and he defrayed almost the entire expense of its support. Eventually he employed a home missionary to labor in this field, and after the organization of a church; under Rev. Carlos T. Chester, he continued to provide liberally for its increased needs. In the Summer of 1883 the corner-stone of the Willson Avenue Presbyterian Church was laid, the building to be completed by April, 1884. It stands on the corner of Willson and Lexington avenues; is constructed of brick and stone; has an auditorium, with seating capacity of seven hundred, and a chapel containing a commodious room for weekly meetings, society rooms and a kitchen. The completed structure, furnished throughout, will cost, with the land, about forty thousand dollars, and is the gift of Mr. Eells to the society. His only stipulations are that the property shall never be subjected to a debt, and that the building shall always be a Presbyterian church.

Mr. Eells is identified with the prominent charities of Cleveland. He is a Trustee of the Women's Christian Association, and of the Cleveland Bethel Union; Treasurer of the Cleveland Protestant Orphan Asylum, and President of the Cleveland Bible Society. With the last named society he has been officially connected since its organization, more than twenty-five years ago.

He has been a Commissioner to three General Assemblies of the Presbyterian Church, and is a delegate to the Presbyterian Ecclesiastical Council, of 1884, at Belfast, Ireland.

Eells, James, D.D., LL.D., is a native of New York. He was born in Westmoreland; August 25th, 1822, and graduated from Hamilton College in 1844. He pursued his theological studies at the Western Reserve and Auburn Seminaries. He received the degree of D. D. from New York University in 1861, and the degree of LL. D. from Marietta University in 1881. He was ordained and installed as pastor at Penn Yan, N. Y., by the Presbytery of Geneva, August, 1851. This relation continued until 1854. He was then pastor of Second Presbyterian Church, Cleveland, Ohio, 1855-9 and 1870-4; at Brooklyn, N. Y., 1860-70; of First Presbyterian Church, Oakland, California, 1874-9; and Professor in San Francisco Theological Seminary, 1877-9. Since 1879 he has been Professor of Homiletics and Pastoral Theology in Lane Theological Seminary. Dr. Eells is a ripe scholar, and an attractive and impressive preacher. He has published a "Memorial of Samuel Eells." In 1877 he was Moderator of the General Assembly at Chicago.

Egbert, Rev. James Chidester, only son of James and Joanna J. Egbert, was born in New York city, October 17th, 1826. He graduated with honor from New York University, in 1852, and afterward from Union Theological Seminary, New York. He was licensed in April, 1855, and in June of the same year, ordained and installed as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, West Hoboken, N. J., by the Third Presbytery of New York. This church has been Mr. Egbert's only charge. Scarce a higher tribute could be paid him than that, in a field requiring peculiar tact and energy, he has maintained himself so long, retaining all the way through the warm affections of his people and the esteem of his brethren in the ministry. Every department of church work has, under his faithful leadership, been successfully carried forward, and the membership has risen from a score to over 300. It would be to the credit of the Presbyterian Church if she could furnish more numerous instances of so long and useful a pastorate.

Elder, Rev. John, was born in the county of Antrim, Ireland, in 1706. He came to this country as a licentiate, and was ordained and installed, by the Presbytery of New Castle, pastor of the churches of Paxton and Derry, near Harrisburg, November 22d, 1738. When associations for defence against the Indians were formed throughout the province Mr. Elder's hearers, being on the frontier, were prompt to embody themselves. Their minister was their captain, and they were trained as rangers. He superintended their discipline, and his mounted men became widely known as the "Paxton Boys." He afterwards held a Colonel's commission from the Proprietaries, and had the command of the block-houses and stockades, from Easton to the Susquehanna. In tendering this appointment to him it was expressly stated that nothing more would be expected of him than the general oversight. His justification lies in the crisis of affairs.

Mr. Elder joined the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia, May 19th, 1768. In the formation of the General Assembly he became a member of the Presbytery of Carlisle. He died, in the year 1792, at the age of eighty-six, having been a minister of the gospel sixty years, and the pastor of the congregations in Paxton and Derry fifty-six. He is represented by those who knew him as having been a fine looking man, above six feet high, well formed and proportioned, dignified in manner, a fine specimen of an educated gentleman, beloved and respected by the people of his charge, and having great influence for good among them.

Eldridge, Lemuel, long an elder in the Presbyterian Church, Atlantic City, N. J., was born January 7th, 1812, at Cape May Court House, New Jersey. At an early age he was apprenticed, for eleven years, to a bookbinder in Philadelphia, and afterwards in New York. Subsequently he became the manager, in New York city, of the largest bookbindery in the country, with which he was connected for many years. He then severed his connection with this business, and, purchasing a large farm in Chester county, Pennsylvania, lived there for a few years, removing finally to Atlantic City in 1857, which was before the Government lighthouse was built. He served twelve years as Councilman, held the Mayoralty, and filled other positions of trust, with satisfaction to his fellow-citizens and honor to himself. His business interests in Atlantic City were identified chiefly with real estate and shipping. Mr. Eldridge in his private life was universally respected, sustaining with honor all the relations of life, and living the consistent life of a Christian gentleman. His death occurred August 23d, 1883.

Ellinwood, Frank Fields, D.D., the efficient Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions from 1871, was born in Clinton, N. Y., June 20th, 1826. He graduated from Hamilton College in 1849, and studied theology at Auburn and Princeton Seminaries. He received the degree of D. D. from the University of New York, in 1865. He was ordained and installed by the Fourth Presbytery of Philadelphia, at Belvidere, N. J., June 21st, 1853, as pastor of the church at that place, and continued so until 1854. He was pastor of the Central Church, Rochester, N. Y., 1854-65; Secretary of the Presbyterian Committee of Church Erection, 1866-70; of the Memorial Fund Committee, 1870-71, rendering good service in both positions, and since that date has been one of the Secretaries of the Board of Foreign Missions, resident in New York. Dr. Ellinwood is a superior preacher, and has had the divine blessing upon his labors. He is eminently consecrated to the work now entrusted to his hands, is indefatigable in his efforts for its furtherance, and pleads its claims with an eloquence that never fails to make a deep and during impression on his audience.

Elliott, David, D.D., LL. D., was born in Sherman's Valley, now Perry county, Pa., February 6th, 1787. He graduated at Dickinson College, September 28th, 1808, and by the unanimous selection of his classmates, to whom the Faculty left the distribution of honors, he delivered the caulidictory. His first preceptor in theology was his pastor, the Rev. John Linn, with whom he spent two years as a student. His last year was spent with the Rev. Joshua Williams, D. D., of Newville, Pa. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Carlisle, September 26th, 1811. He was pastor of the Church at Mercersburg, Pa., 1812-29, where he labored with great energy, efficiency and success. Whilst here, the Franklin County Bible Society, in 1815, originated, in his appeal through the newspapers. From 1829 to 1836 he was pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Washington, Pa. To him, during this period, more than to any other man, was due the resuscitation and prosperity of Washington College, after its complete prostration. He declined the proffered presidency of the Institution: he consented, however, in connection with his pastoral charge, to become "Acting President and Professor of Moral Philosophy," until a permanent president could be secured, and in the Spring of 1832, handed over the institution to Dr. McConaughy, by whom the presidency had been accepted. In 1835, he was called, by the General Assembly, to take a Professorship in the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa. By an arrangement, this was the Chair of Theology. In 1851, he was assigned by the Assembly, with his own cordial approbation, to the department of Polemic and Historical Theology. To this institution he devoted his best years and powers.

Dr. Elliott had many and marked evidences of the confidence and respect of his brethren in the ministry. He was frequently sent as a Commissioner to the General Assembly. He was Moderator of the Assembly of 1837, which held its sessions in Philadelphia. His private character was one of peculiar excellence. This was the real stronghold of his influence. Vigorous and cultured intellect, superior wisdom, unflinching energy, and a life-long service, all came to proportion and power in the moral excellence of the man to whom they belonged. He was genial and sympathetic in his feelings. His manners had the simplicity, candor, politeness and attractiveness of a true Christian gentleman. He was magnanimous and courteous, even in difference and contest. As he scorned unfair advantage in carrying his point, so he was ever able to detect and expose it in others. The law of uprightness ruled him, both in public and private dealing with his fellow men. He held the confidence of his brethren and the world, in full proportion to the intimacy which opened to their view the secret springs of his action. His friends were life-long in their trusts and attachments.

Dr. Elliott died, March 18th, 1874. As an instructor in theology, in church polity, or in the pastoral care, the Church knew him to be wise and true, and all his pupils revered and loved him. As an ecclesiastic he shone in the Church courts, and lifted his voice most effectively in the administration and guidance of her affairs. Chief among his publications was a volume of "Letters on Church Government," which was well received at the time it appeared, and the work in which he rescued from oblivion, in sweet biographical sketches, the labors of Elisha McCurdy and the other noble pioneers of the Presbyterian Church in Western Pennsylvania, and which generations to come will read with interest and profit.

JOHN MILLOT ELLIS.

Ellis, Rev. John Millot, was born in Keene, New Hampshire, July 11th, 1793. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1822, and maintained a high character in a class of more than average abilities. He completed his theological course at Andover Seminary, September 25th, 1825, and was ordained the day following, in the Old South Church in Boston. Furnished with a hundred dollars as outfit, the young minister made his way to Illinois. He first settled at Kaskaskia. During his residence there, he expended a considerable part of his labors west of the Mississippi. In 1828 he removed to Jacksonville. He was deeply interested and very active in building up "an Institution of learning which should bless the West for all time." The designs which resulted in the Female Seminary at Jacksonville, and procured its beautiful grounds, were formed in his house. This Institution continues to be a monument in honor of him and his accomplished wife. His pastorate in Jacksonville ended in 1831.

Subsequently, Mr. Ellis became Secretary of the Indiana Education Society, and while so engaged took an active part in the deliberations which resulted in the foundation of Wabash College, at Crawfordsville. In 1834 and 1835 he served the Education Society, in New England. Afterwards he entered with great warmth into the designs for the aid of Marshall College, Mich. Having organized a church at Grass Lake, he became its pastor in 1836, preaching in a log meeting house, and dwelling in a log cabin. His parish was a scene of constant revivals. In 1840 he was settled as pastor of the Church at East Hanover, N. H., and in 1844 entered the service of the Society for Promoting Collegiate and Theological Education at the West, in which he continued till his death, August 6th, 1855. Mr. Ellis was a Calvinist of the graver type. He was Stated Clerk of his Presbytery, in Illinois. He was the chief agent in organizing the Presbytery of Marshall, and was its first Moderator.

Elmer, Rev. Daniel, was born in Fairfield, Conn., in 1690, and graduated at Yale, in 1713. "For some time he carried on the work of the ministry" in Brookfield, Mass., which he left before 1715. Where he spent the next twelve years is not known. In 1728 he settled at Fairfield, in Cohanzy, West Jersey. In this region, while Whitfield was preaching, November 19th, 1740, the Holy Spirit came down, "like a rushing mighty wind." Some thousands were present, and the whole congregation was moved. Mr. Elmer's congregation divided, in 1741. He died, January 14th, 1755, aged sixty-five years, and his remains lie buried in the old New England town graveyard.

Elmer, Hon. Jonathan, son of Hon. Theophilus Elmer, and grandson of Rev. Daniel Elmer, pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Fairfield, N. J., was the most influential man in Cumberland county and in South Jersey, in the Revolutionary period. He was born November 29th, 1745. His father died when he was sixteen years of age, but he continued his studies under the instruction of the Rev. Mr. Ramsey. He was graduated a doctor of medicine at the University of Pennsylvania, in 1771, and elected the next year a member of the American Philosophical Society. He commenced the practice of medicine, and his practice soon extended beyond the county. He quickly turned his attention to political affairs, raised a military company, was active in the Committee of Vigilance, entered the Provincial Congress in 1776, and was a member of the committee that formed the first Constitution of the State. He was a member of the National Congress during most of the Revolution, and was a Medical Inspector of the Army. After the establishment of Independence he was two years in the National House of Representatives, and then, in 1789, he was elected to be a Senator of the United States. He became an intelligent lawyer, and for many years, until near the close of his life, he was the presiding Judge of the County Court of Common Pleas. He was clerk of the county from 1776 to 1789, and Surrogate from 1781 to 1802. He was a member of the higher branch of the State Legislature in 1780 and in 1784, President of the State Medical Society in 1787; ordained a ruling elder of the Presbyterian Church in 1799. He resigned his Judgeship in 1814. He died September 31, 1817. The foundation of his greatness and worth was in a great measure laid by the instructions which he received from the ministers of God's Word, the faithful pastors of the church in which he was reared.

Elmer, Rev. Jonathan, graduated at Yale, in 1747, and was ordained by New York Presbytery, pastor at New Providence, N. J., in October, 1750. Elmer, N. J. New Prov. Of the first forty years of his ministry we find no notice beyond the fact that he preached, from Jeremiah xlv, 4, at the execution of Morgan, the Tory, who shot Caldwell in cold blood on Elizabethtown Point. He resigned his charge at New Providence, October, 1793. He acted as stated supply at Millstone, and occasionally at other places, and died, June 7th, 1807.

Elmer, L. Q. C., L.L. D., was one of the most distinguished citizens of New Jersey. He was the only son of General Ebenezer Elmer, a Revolutionary patriot. He was a member of Congress from 1813 to 1815, and was believed to be the oldest living ex-member. He was a distinguished jurist. At one time he was United States District Attorney, receiving his appointment from President Monroe. Subsequently he was appointed Attorney-General of New Jersey, and he was for many years a member of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, retiring from the Bench in 1870, on account of advancing years.

Judge Elmer was the author of "Elmer's Digest of the Laws of New Jersey," also "Elmer's Book of Law Forms," "Reminiscences of the Bench and Bar of New Jersey," a very valuable and entertaining work, and a "History of Cumberland County," and various other historical collections. At the time of his decease he was President of the New Jersey Society of the Cincinnati. His father was also President of this Society at the time of his death, in 1813, and was the last survivor of the original members. Judge

Elmer was for forty years a Trustee of Princeton College, and upon his resignation was succeeded by his son-in-law, Judge John T. Nixon, of the United States District Court. He was a devout Christian, and was for many years a member and an elder of the First Presbyterian Church of Bridgeton, N. J., and President of the Cumberland County Bible Society. He died at his home in Bridgeton, March 11th, 1883, aged ninety years.

Ely, Prof. Charles Wright, A. M., son of Elias S. and Hester (Wright) Ely, was born at Madison, Conn., March 14th, 1839. His earlier years were spent on the farm. After having been fitted for college at Guilford Institute, Guilford, Conn., he entered Yale College in 1858, and graduated in 1862. In October, 1863, he accepted a Professorship in the Ohio Institution for the Education of the Deaf and Dumb, at Columbus, and held it for seven years. In September, 1870, he became Principal of the Maryland School for Deaf and Dumb, at Frederick City, which relation has continued to the present time, with every prospect of indefinite duration. During the Fall of 1882 he was elected Superintendent of the Ohio Deaf and Dumb Institution, at Columbus, but declined. He has been a director of the Young Men's Bible Society of Frederick county for over eleven years. He was elected and ordained a ruling elder of the Presbyterian Church in Frederick City, Md., in January, 1872.

Prof. Ely is an agreeable and judicious man. He has an excellent reputation, as an educator of the deaf and dumb. He combines with a thorough education and large experience that decision of character and forbearance which qualify him in an eminent degree for his peculiar work. In his present position he has been eminently successful, and has shown administrative abilities of a high order, combined with broad and comprehensive views of the work of educating the deaf and dumb and of the adaptation of the best methods to that work. He discharges his duties as an elder with great wisdom, efficiency and acceptableness.

Ely, Dr. Ezra Styles, was born in Lebanon, Conn., June 13th, 1786. He graduated at Yale College in 1803; pursued his theological studies under the direction of his father, Rev. Zebulon Ely; was licensed in 1804, and ordained, by West Chester Presbytery, pastor of Colchester (Congregational) Church, Connecticut, in 1806. He was taken from this charge to act as Chaplain to the New York City Hospital. In 1813 he was installed pastor of the Pine Street Church, Philadelphia, as successor of Dr. Alexander, removed to Princeton, but his strong anti-Hopkinsian tenets led to the division of the church. His activity in all schemes of charity and benevolence was boundless. Jefferson Medical College owes its existence, in a great measure, to him, as one of its Trustees, for, in its pecuniary straits, he bought the lot and erected the building where the Institution now stands. From 1825 until 1836 he was Stated Clerk of the General Assembly. In 1828 he was chosen Moderator of the General Assembly.

In 1834 his enthusiasm led him to embark as an active patron of Marion College, in Missouri. It was started as a manual labor college, and the products of the land belonging to the institution were expected to defray all expenses. A large number of students was collected, but, finally, the scheme failed of success. In 1844 Dr. Ely took charge of the Church of the Northern Liberties, Philadelphia. He retained this post till struck down by paralysis, August, 1851. His death occurred June 18th, 1861.

Dr. Ely was of a mercurial temperament, which was never completely overcome, in or out of the pulpit. No one went to sleep under his preaching. It has been estimated that he was the means of the conversion of two thousand, two hundred persons. He was a generous and open-handed man. There is good reason for believing that his benefactions during his lifetime amounted to nearly $50,000.

His published works were, "Visits of Mercy," "The Contrast," "Collateral Bible," Memorial of his father, Rev. Zebulon Ely, and the religious weekly, The Philadelphian. He wrote, also, a "History of the Churches of Philadelphia," which is in manuscript, and unpublished.

Ely, Rev. George, was born at Trenton, N. J., January 3d, 1808. He graduated at the University of Nashville, Tenn., in 1833, and pursued his theological course at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, April 29th, 1840, and was pastor of Nottingham (now Hamilton) Square and Dutch Neck, N. J., 1840-56. He died at Hartsville, Pa., August 14th, 1856. Mr. Ely was a fluent and forcible speaker. He preached earnestly and impressively, and was ardently devoted to his work as a minister of the gospel. His Christian consistency and pastoral fidelity won for him the affectionate regard of the congregations which so long enjoyed his labors.

Emerson, Daniel Hopkins, D.D., was a son of the Rev. Brown Emerson, D. D. He was born in Salem, Mass., January 23d, 1810; graduated at Dartmouth College, and studied theology at Andover and New Haven, after which he spent three years as teacher of a Young Ladies' Seminary, in Richmond, Va. He was first settled as pastor in Northborough, Mass., being ordained, October 19th, 1836. In 1841 he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in East Whiteland, Chester county, Pa., and also preached once in four weeks in Downingtown. May 17th, 1846 he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church, in York, Pa., and resigned the charge in 1855. The same year he was settled as pastor at St. George's, Del., and continued in this relation until 1868. In 1869 he became pastor of the Eastburn Mariners' Church, Philadelphia; in 1873 was elected General Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., of Oswego, N. Y.: in 1878 became Missionary of the Howard Mission of the First Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, and in 1880 became Missionary of that Church. He died July 6th, 1883. Dr. Emerson was a gentleman of culture, an excellent writer, an instructive preacher, and willing to serve the Master wherever a door of usefulness was opened.

Emerson, Rev. Luther, was a native of Massachusetts, and a son of the Rev. Joseph Emerson, eminent as a minister, author and teacher. He graduated at Amherst College, with high standing in his class, and pursued his theological studies at Andover Seminary, where his uncle, the Rev. Ralph Emerson, D. D., was Professor of Ecclesiastical History. After being licensed by an Association of Congregational Ministers in his native State, he went to Virginia in feeble health, and spent some time teaching in Amherst and Albemarle counties. He subsequently removed to Highland county, where he was ordained and installed pastor of Pisgah and Goshen churches, by Lexington Presbytery. Here he remained some eight years, preaching the gospel, and was also the Principal of a Female School of high grade. He was called thence to take charge of Shemariah Church, and settled there in 1852. Here he remained till the time of his death, February 9th, 1867, in the fifty-sixth year of his age, a faithful and diligent pastor; and here the Academy at that place (though he did not teach in it), flourished, under his general superintendence. The Presbytery, in its obituary notice of Mr. Emerson, refers to him as "a brother faithful and beloved."

Engles, Joseph Patterson, the son of Silas and Annie (Patterson) Engles, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., January 3d, 1793, and graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1811. In 1813 he was appointed co-master of the Grammar school of that institution. In 1817 he was associated with Samuel B. Wylie, D. D., in conducting an academy, and, after Dr. Wylie's withdrawal from it, it was under his sole charge for twenty-eight years. In February, 1845, Mr. Engles was elected by the Board of Publication as its Publishing Agent, and in this position realized the expectations of the friends of the Board. He was an elder in the Scots Presbyterian Church until the time of his death, April 14th, 1861. He was a gentleman of varied literary acquirements, and of signal affability and kindness. The spiritual element of his character was pre-eminent: it entered into his daily life and walk, it permeated all he said and did: to visit the widow and the fatherless, and keep himself unspotted from the world, was his earnest desire, and fully was it realized.

Engles, Rev. William M., D. D., was born in Philadelphia, October 12th, 1797. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1815, studied theology with Dr. S. B. Wylie, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, October 18th, 1818. July 6th, 1820, he was ordained pastor of the Seventh or Tabernacle Church, in Ranstead Court, afterwards famous as the scene of the disruption. Here his ministry was faithful and successful, but in 1834 he was obliged to resign, on account of a diseased throat. From the pulpit he stepped into the editorial chair, succeeding Dr. James W. Alexander as editor of the "Presbyterian," in which post he continued for thirty-three years. Under his supervision the paper attained an increased circulation and a high reputation as the leading organ of the Old School party. In May, 1838, he was appointed editor of the Board of Publication, which post he held for twenty-five years. In 1840, he was chosen moderator of the General Assembly, Old School; and then filled the office of stated clerk for six years. His death occurred November 27th, 1867.

Dr. Engles owed his reputation more to his pen than to his pulpit efforts. He was too quiet and didactic to be a popular preacher. But to say nothing of his editorial success, to him the Board of Publication was more indebted than to any other individual, according to its own acknowledgment. He took an active part in its inception and progress. He not only rescued from oblivion various valuable works, in danger of becoming obsolete, but added to the Board's issues a number of treatises from his own prolific pen. As these were published anonymously, they cannot here be specified. Mention, however, may be made of the little volume, entitled, "Sick Room Devotions," which has proved of inestimable service, and "The Soldiers' Pocket Book," of which three hundred thousand copies were circulated during the war.

English, Rev. James Theodore, son of James and Alice (Conover) English, was born at English-town, Monmouth county, N. J., October 31st, 1810. In his youth he attended with his parents the Old Tenment Church, of which he early became a member. He was a graduate of Union College and Princeton Theological Seminary, and in 1837 was ordained by the Presbytery of Elizabeth. After supplying the Church at Liberty Corners, N. J., for a year, he was installed its pastor, where he spent thirty-five years in faithful pastoral service till his death, May 17th, 1873. During the first year of his labors there, over thirty were added to the Church, which continued to prosper, several revivals occurring under his earnest ministrations. He died greatly beloved and revered by his people. Few pastorates have been more successful. Of him it could, with special fitness, be said, "He was faithful unto death."

English, Rev. Thomas Reese, A. M., son of Robert and Elizabeth (Wilson) English, was born in Sumter county, S. C., September 1st, 1806. He received his literary training at South Carolina College, where he took a high stand, but left shortly before graduation. He entered upon the study of law, during which time he was elected a member of the State Legislature. Shortly after experiencing a change of heart he began the study of theology under the direction of the Rev. James McEwen, of South Carolina. He was licensed by Harmony Presbytery, in the Fall of 1832, and in May, 1833, was ordained and installed pastor of Hopewell Church. With the exception of six months, spent as stated supply of the Presbyterian Church in Columbia, Tenn., his whole ministerial life, covering a period of thirty-six years, was spent in the bounds of Harmony Presbytery, where he served, at different times, in a greater or less degree, almost every church in the Presbytery. From 1858 to 1865 he was engaged in the evangelistic work; and from 1865 until his death, which occurred April 11th, 1869, he supplied the churches of Pine Tree, Turkey Creek, Lynchburg and Beulah, preaching to two of them each Sabbath, though widely separated.

Mr. English was a man of ardent temperament and great determination, and those difficulties which cool the ardor of most men were but fuel to the flames of zeal which burned in his breast and eventually consumed him. His chosen field was among the poor and destitute, by whom his name is still revered, and his memory held precious. It was as an evangelist that he achieved his greatest success, giving an impetus and direction to that work which still remain, and leaving quite a number of churches, which date back their origin to his labors, as memorials of his self-sacrificing efforts. As a preacher, he was independent in thought, earnest and often impressive; as a Presbyter, influential and discreet. He was an ardent patriot, and, while eschewing politics, he was the counsellor and leader of his fellow citizens in every time of public danger, and in his death both Church and State suffered loss.

English Version of the Bible. The Scriptures were originally written upon rolls of parchment, similar, probably, to those which are to be seen in the holy place of Jewish synagogues at the present day. These manuscripts were copied with the utmost care. Many versions of them were made from the original Hebrew and Greek into other tongues. The various manuscripts which have come down to the present day all agree essentially in their contents. This is admitted both by believers and unbelievers.

By whom, and at what time, Christianity was first introduced into the British Isles, cannot now be ascertained with any degree of precision. It is certain, however, that many manuscript copies of the Scriptures, or parts of Scripture, in the Saxon tongue, existed at a very early date. One translation of the Psalms is ascribed to King Alfred. For several centuries after this, the general reading of the Bible was prohibited by the Papal See, whose supremacy was then felt and acknowledged.

The first translations of the Bible into English were previous to the invention of printing. They were the result of incalculable labor and expense of time. Transcripts were obtained with great difficulty, and being rare, were purchased at a price which seems to us incredible. The monks, who employed their time, in lone seclusion, in executing these beautiful manuscript copies of the word of God, knew not for what vast and glorious results they were laboring—like the electric chain, unconscious itself of the tremendous power it is transmitting to others.

The whole Bible was translated into English, but not printed, in the fourteenth century, by Wickliffe. Great efforts were made by the dignitaries of Church and State to suppress this translation. A decree was issued prohibiting all from translating or reading any English version of the Bible. Great persecutions arose. Many were punished severely, and some put to death, for reading the Scriptures in English.

But the day had begun to dawn. It was not in the power of man to roll back the "living wheels" which the Prophet saw. A child may put in motion the nicely-poised rocking stone; but the arm of a giant cannot stay it. The art of printing was invented. The Reformation had commenced. Luther and his coadjutors had lifted up their voices, and Europe was beginning to shake with the volcanic fires which were rumbling beneath her.

William Tindal was among the first in England to catch the spirit of the Reformers; and to him are we indebted for the first printed translation of any part of the Bible in the English language. In order to accomplish his holy work, he left his Order in the church and retired from his native land. Nearly all the copies of this work which found their way to England were publicly burned, by authority; and all who were suspected of possessing and concealing any copies were disgraced, fined and punished. And let it be held in remembrance by us, enjoying without fear or molestation, as we do, the fruits of those labors, that the man who first printed any part of the Word of God in our mother tongue was himself strangled to death and his body burned for his temerity; praying, with his dying breath, in the true spirit of his Saviour, "Lord, open the king of England's eyes."

The first printed translation of the whole Bible was by Coverdale, and was probably published at Zurich, in Switzerland, the last page bearing these words:—
"Printed in the year of our Lorde, 1535, and finished the fourth day of October."

Versions of the Scriptures were now multiplied, copies circulated, and the power of God began to be felt. But as yet there was no common standard. To other times was reserved the emission of that version of the Sacred Text which we now possess, and which, we believe, is destined to stand to the end of time, as one of the most splendid monuments of scholarship and success the world has ever seen. This version of the Scriptures generally passes by the name of King James' Bible, during whose reign, and at whose instance, the translation was undertaken, and to whom it is dedicated. It is an intensely interesting question to every Christian, "How much evidence have we that this is a correct translation of the word of God?" As this is the version universally received by Protestants, wherever the English language is spoken, and there exists no probability that any other will ever supersede it, a few remarks, in passing, upon this point, may not be inappropriate.

1. It is worthy of remark, in the first place, that the Word of God, in the original, is so remarkably distinct, intelligible and obvious in its import that no translator, possessing a tolerable knowledge of the original, and aiming to give a correct version of it, can possibly fail of finding there all the substantial doctrines of the gospel—all that is necessary to salvation.

There are some human faces and many scenes in nature so peculiar and striking that the rudest attempt to sketch them cannot fail to convey some idea of the original. Let a thousand artists, of every variety of talent and skill, undertake to paint the face and form of our immortal Washington, and, in all their productions, from the finished and almost breathing pictures of Stewart and Peale, down to the rudest effort of village skill, there will be a convergence of resemblance to one and the same original, that cannot fail to strike the most superficial observer. Or let them attempt to sketch the same bold and lofty mountain, peculiar in its form, striking in its outline—one may present a picture with the last touchings and finishings of skill, but in all you will see a substantial resemblance to an object so prominent and peculiar. So let a thousand men, possessing the least claims to scholarship, of heterogeneous habits and prejudices, undertake to give a translation of the original Scriptures, and on all substantial points there will be such an obvious resemblance that none can mistake, and he that runneth may read—just as the eye catches the outline of the vast and lofty mountain.

Men of every character and nation agree in finding the same obvious and fundamental truths in the Bible. Infidel scholars even have been forced to acknowledge that they were there, while they have denied their divine origin. Errorists of every name have admitted that these same declarations were in the sacred text, and then have resorted to notes and comments to explain them away. The following sentence, from the writings of Chrysostom, one of the early Fathers of the Church, not only expresses the same sentiment, but confirms our preceding assertion that the Scriptures existed in Britain at a very early period: "Though thou visitest the ocean and the British Islands, though thou sailest to the Euxine Sea, and travellest to the Southern regions, thou shalt hear all men, everywhere, reading out of the Scriptures; with another voice, indeed, but not with another faith; in a different language, but with the same understanding." In a word, no man has ever been able to maintain any reputation as a classical scholar who has departed far from that obvious meaning of the Scriptures which is to be found in every version. So bold, and obvious, and deep-chiseled are these truths, that they can, by no process, be sunk below the surface, and another false, fard-fetched and unnatural construction made to take their place. This is a feature in the original structure of that book which came forth from God. We should have been led to expect it, from what we know of the character and intentions of its Author. Revelation is a gift of light; it cannot thicken and multiply our perplexities. The teacher of infinite wisdom cannot expose those whom he would teach to infinite error. He will rather surpass all other instructors in bringing down truth to our apprehensions. In the language of Milton, "The very essence of truth is plainness and brightness; the darkness and crookedness are our own. The Scriptures protest their own plainness and perspicuity, calling to be instructed, not only the wise and learned, but the simple, the poor, babes and sucklings."

2. But the version we possess claims the highest character for accuracy, and that claim is founded on the number and qualifications of those who made it; the manner in which they executed it; and the circumstances of the times in which they lived.

The men appointed for this important labor were fifty-four in number, all of them pre-eminently distinguished for piety and profound learning in the original languages of the sacred text. Seven of them deceased, or declined the task, before the commencement of the work; and the remaining forty-seven were divided into six classes, from ten to seven in each. To each of these classes was assigned a certain portion of the Scriptures. Each and every individual in that department translated this portion by himself. These several translations were subsequently read by the whole division, who together agreed upon the final reading. The portion, thus finished, was sent to each of the other divisions, again to be revised; by which arrangement every part of the Bible passed the scrutiny of all the forty-seven translators successively. Furthermore, these translators were empowered to call to their aid any learned men whose studies enabled them to shed light on points of difficulty. The completion of this holy work occupied about three years. The lives of all the venerable men who commenced it, were spared to witness its successful close.

One circumstance in the aspect of the times in which this version was made deserves our special attention, affording, as it does, another most satisfactory testimony to its impartiality. Protestantism was then one, and homogeneous; or, if not absolutely so, more nearly than at any after period. It was not yet sundered, and divided into sects and parties. The friends of truth were all occupied in opposition to one mighty error—to a common enemy—and had not yet found time or disposition to attack one another, and build up distinct and divided interests. Hence there existed no temptation on the part of the translators to impress upon their work a single sectarian feature. In this respect, certainly, it may be pronounced incapable of amendment. Any one can see that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to make a translation, in the day in which we live, when so many unhappy divisions and sectarian jealousies exist, which would conciliate the favor and secure the confidence of all, and be cheerfully acknowledged as the common standard. But so it happened, in the kind providence of God, that the received version was made just in that auspicious moment of peace and union among Protestants, which has secured its adoption by all as the common standard. None have charged it with partiality, as favoring this or that sect, for the good reason that these sects and partialities did not then exist. Men may now differ in their construction of particular passages, but we know of no Denomination which has generally expressed a desire for a new and different version. Men may differ in the construction which they put upon the Constitution of their country, but to give up the Constitution itself, and undertake to form another out of present discordant and heterogeneous materials, is a point essentially different in its nature, and, perhaps, impracticable in its execution.

Nothing which diligence, circumspection, scholarship, love of truth, and prayer, could avail, was wanting to perfect this version of the Word of God. It is what it professes to be, a translation, not a paraphrase; each word and expression corresponding to the original. What has, by some, been deemed a defect, is in fact a great excellence in our translation; it preserves, as far as possible, the very idiom of the original, the peculiarities of Oriental diction; thus proving that the men who made it understood what was the best style of translation—that which, like a transparent glass, is not seen itself, but shows everything which is beyond it.

Our version of the Scriptures is pure English. Its words are of Saxon origin. Those venerable translators had not acquired the modern taste for language of foreign extraction. They used the language which belonged to their own soil. They have demonstrated its wonderful resources and powers. They have contributed much to fix our language and save it from premature and universal corruption. It is an interesting fact that the men who have done the most to corrupt the English language have been the least familiar with the English Bible.

It is sometimes said that modern advances in knowledge of the original Scriptures have been so great, that many errors have been detected in the present version. And so much has been said to this effect, studiously, habitually and injudiciously, as we must think, by some of good intentions, that much has already been done toward shaking general confidence in its fidelity. Let it be understood, however, that such assertions do not refer to anything important or essential to salvation, but exclusively, to minute points and more delicate shades of criticism.

With regard to this subject, we would remark, that it is not absolutely certain that the present, so-called, "enlightened age," is so far in advance of other times, in profound learning of the original Scriptures, as the claims of some would lead us to believe. It is as true in reference to generations, as to individuals, that to be inordinately self-complacent is nearly the same thing as being pitifully superficial. Reverence for the old is an original element of a good and great mind. To undervalue the wisdom of those who have gone before us, and to overrate our own, is one of the surest signs of ignorance. But, unhappily, our ears are too familiar with language of such import. One would think, from all that is said about modern advances in knowledge, and "discoveries in religion," that our fathers were involved in melancholy ignorance and errors, and that the present age, like a certain divinity in Grecian mythology, "had been hatched from the egg of Night, and, all of a sudden, had spread its radiant wings on the primeval darkness." It is an interesting circumstance, in connection with our subject, that during that long period of more than a thousand years of general darkness, there was in England, in each century, excepting the fifth and sixth, some one or more scholars pre-eminent for knowledge of the Hebrew language. At the period when the first English translations were printed, such examples, instead of being few, like a star here and there in a cloudy sky, were so numerous as to form an illustrious constellation, whose light has reached our own age. Neither was this knowledge confined to one sex. A celebrated historian of that period remarks, in language somewhat quaint and antiquated, that "many of the daughters of nobility and quality were not only as familiarly traded in the Latin and Greek tongues as in their own, but, also, in the Holy Scriptures were so ripe that they were able, aptly, and with much grace, to translate them into the vulgar tongue, for the public inspection, and edifying of the unlearned multitude." And he adds, "It is now no news in England for inmates of noble houses willingly to set all other vain pastimes at nought for learning's sake—to have continually in their hands either psalms, homilies, or Paul's epistles, and as familiarly to read or reason thereof in Greek, Latin or French, as in English." With all due gratitude for present facilities for diffusing knowledge, it would be well for us to bear in mind that many of our fathers were, from their youth up, familiar with the original Scriptures, and that in generations long since passed away some of the venerable ministers of Christ were wont to read, morning and evening, at the family altar, out of the Greek and Hebrew Scriptures. That knowledge is more generally diffused among all classes, and less exclusively confined to the few, in our day, all will allow; but that other times were so far deficient in accurate and familiar knowledge of the original Scriptures as to justify the belief that any essential improvements will ever be made in the present version, demands a serious doubt.

It is admitted on all hands that the received English version of the Bible far exceeds every other translation. It may be relied on as giving a full, clear and accurate exhibition of the mind of God. The illiterate man who reads it with docility and faith may obtain just as correct information of all that is requisite for salvation, as the most profound and critical scholar the world has ever seen. While we would most earnestly encourage every effort on the part of all who have it in their power to prosecute the study of the Scriptures, in their original tongues—while we feel that the Church has a right to expect this of those who are set for the defence of the gospel, we are very sure that the result of all such investigations will be to heighten confidence in the present version, and fill the heart with unfeigned gratitude to God, for that blessed book which we now enjoy, and which, for more than two centuries, has been pouring its light and consolation wherever the English tongue is spoken. Let science toil, and diligence labor in original investigation, for the Hebrew Scriptures are a mine of solid and inexhaustible gold, where giants may dig for ages; let literature hold up her torch, and cast all possible light upon the sacred text; but we must, and ever shall, deprecate any wanton attacks upon our received version, any gratuitous attempts to supersede it by a new and different translation. It is the Bible which our godly fathers have read, and over which they have wept and prayed. It is the GOOD OLD ENGLISH BIBLE, with which are associated all our earliest recollections of religion. As such let it go down unchanged to the latest posterity. We give it in charge to coming generations, and bid them welcome to all the blessings it has conveyed to us. It is our fervent prayer, that the light of the resurrection morning may shine on the very book which we now read; that we may then behold again the familiar face of our own Bible, the very same which we read in our childhood.—William Adams, D. D.

Erskine, Ebenezer, D. D., was born in Delaware county, Pa., January 31st, 1821. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1843; studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, September 11th, 1849. He was pastor of Penn Church, Philadelphia, Pa., 1849-51; of the Church at Columbia, Pa., 1851-7; of the Church at Sterling, Ill., 1858-64, and editor of the Northwestern Presbyterian, Chicago, 1865-9. He is now pastor of the Church at Newville, Pa., which is one of the oldest and largest in the Presbytery of Carlisle, and which prospers under his acceptable ministry. Dr. Erskine is a Director of the Princeton Theological Seminary. He is an able and instructive preacher, of genial spirit, of decided character, and an efficient and useful member of the judicatories of the Church. He was Moderator of the Synod of Harrisburg.

Erskine, Mason, D. D., was the youngest child of the Rev. John M. and Anna (Lefferts) Mason, and was born in the city of New York, April 16th, 1805. Having graduated at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., of which his father was then President, in 1823, he studied theology for some time, under the direction of the Rev. Dr. Duncan, of Baltimore, and in the Summer of 1825 entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton, where he completed his professional education. He was licensed to preach by the Second Presbytery of New York, in 1826, and on the 3d of May, 1827, was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Schenectady. He became pastor of the Bleeker Street Presbyterian Church in New York, September 10th, 1830. In February, 1836, he accepted the Professorship of Ecclesiastical History in the Union Theological Seminary, and held it till 1842. His death occurred, May 14th, 1851. When the last moment came he declared: "It is all bright and clear."

Dr. Mason had the advantage of impressive manliness and dignity of form. His bearing was courteous and kind. He was of that happy organization which excites admiration without jealousy, and was so considerate and just towards others that all were pleased to acknowledge what was due to himself. He was a strong, substantial, honest man, with no pretension, and without attempt to appear more and greater than he was. His style of preaching was rigorously intellectual, and yet his sermons were characterized by religious pathos. A masculine imagination gave a glow and warmth to all his appeals. His demonstrations were tremulous with emotion, and his proofs were with power, because they were so earnest and sincere. He was generally regarded as a remarkable preacher. During his life he published a number of discourses, and after his decease a selection from his manuscript sermons appeared, under the title of "A Pastor's Legacy."

Eva, William T., D. D., is at present the pastor of the Bethesda Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pa. He was born March 20th, 1827, in the village of Helstone, county of Cornwall, England, and came to the United States with his mother when he was six years of age. By her death, when he was a boy of eleven, he was thrown upon the world to take care of himself, and from that time has done so, without material help from any one. His school days were then ended, and all his subsequent education was obtained by private study, having never had the opportunity to spend a day—except as a teacher—in academy, college, or seminary.

After pursuing a course of study, privately, for the ministry, Mr. Eva obtained license to preach from the Protestant Methodist Church, when he was fifteen years of age. In April, 1843, at sixteen, he was received into membership in the Maryland Annual Conference, as an active preacher, after which he labored at various points in that State. On arriving at full age, he was ordained with Presbyterian ordination, in the City of Cumberland, Md. Subsequently, while in Washington city, engaged in the double work of preaching and teaching, he was received into the Presbytery of the District of Columbia. About the same time he had the compliment of the honorary degree of A.M. from the College of Delaware.

Mr. Eva's first pastoral charge was the Church of Rockville and Bethesda, Md., where he continued for six years with good success; his second charge, the Sixth Church, Newark, N. J., and his third charge, the First Church of Kensington, Philadelphia, over which he was installed, November, 1860, and in which he was blessed with precious ingatherings, until the membership reached eleven hundred.

WILLIAM T. EVA, D.D.

Then, under the sanction of the Fourth Presbytery of Philadelphia, he led out a colony of one hundred and eighty members, and organized the congregation of Bethesda, which now has a membership of seven hundred, with a spacious and beautiful house of worship, at Frankford Avenue and Vienna Street.

In 1878, Mr. Eva received from the College of New Jersey the degree of D. D. He is an admirable preacher, instructive, earnest, impressive, and a most active and devoted pastor. He has been a member of five General Assemblies, and is one of the Trustees of that body. He is an active Presbyterian, a member of The Board of Publication, and has been Trustee, from the beginning, of the Presbyterian Hospital, in Philadelphia. Besides religious newspaper articles, a few contributions to biographical works, and a few sermons, he has never published anything.

Evans, Rev. David, was of Welsh extraction. In 1713 he graduated at Yale College, after which he received a call from the people of Welsh Tract, and was ordained, November 3d, 1714. He was the recording clerk of New Castle Presbytery for six or seven years. For his services each member gave him a half-crown. He was released from his charge in 1720, and was called to Great Valley, but he declined to accept the call for several years. He was one of the first supplies sent to Sadsbury, west branch of Brandywine, and Comestoga. When he removed to Treddyfryn, he was directed to spend one-fourth of his time at Sadsbury. He died before May, 1751. Mr. Evans is said to have been eccentric and high-spirited. His preaching gave such offence, on one occasion, to a person at Pilesgrove, that, rather than listen a moment longer, he jumped out of the church window.

Evans, Llewellyn J., D. D., is a native of North Wales. He was born in Treuddyn, June 27th, 1833. He graduated at Racine College in 1856; studied theology at Lane Seminary, and was ordained by Cincinnati Presbytery in May, 1862. He was pastor of Lane Seminary Church, 1860-3; Professor of Church History in Lane Seminary, 1863-7, and from that date has been Professor of Biblical Literature and Exegesis in that Institution. He received the degree of D. D. from Wabash College in 1872. Dr. Evans is an eminent scholar, and admirably qualified for the important position he now occupies.

Evans, Rev. Thomas, was received by the Presbytery of New Castle, as a student, from the Presbytery of Caermarthen, in Wales, and licensed May 28th, 1720. A call from the congregation of Welsh Tract was placed in his hands, March 12th, 1723, and he was ordained at Pencader, May 8th. Proclamation was made thrice at the door of the meeting house, by David Evans, Esq., that, if any had allegations to make against his life or doctrine, they should do so before the ordination. Mr. Evans was an excellent scholar and a valuable instructor. He was a bachelor, a book-worm, possessed a fine library, and was continually adding to his store. He was esteemed a truly pious man.

Ewalt, Rev. John Adams, is the oldest child of Z. T. and Belinda (Adams) Ewalt, and was born in Howland, Ohio, January 25th, 1846. He remained at home, assisting his father on the farm, until of age, when he decided to secure a liberal education. His preparatory and collegiate studies were pursued in Oberlin, during which he supported himself by teaching in the Winter. It was at this time that he was converted, and before graduation, in 1871, his life work was chosen. Entering Princeton Seminary the same Fall, he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, in April, 1876. Believing that the West offered the widest field for usefulness, the last year of his theological training was pursued in the Presbyterian Seminary of Chicago. Before graduation, in April, 1877, he was called to the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church in Streator, Ill. May 10th, he was installed pastor of that church. He remained in Streator until February, 1882, when he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church of London, Ohio. He has an impressive manliness and dignity of form; his bearing is courteous and kind. He makes no attempt to appear more than what he is. He is a man who is clear in his convictions, resolute in action, humble in the following of the Master, and a very earnest apostle of Temperance.

Ewing, Charles, LL.D., was the son of James Ewing, a distinguished citizen of New Jersey. He took the first honor in his class at Princeton (1798), and, after graduation, studied law in Trenton, N. J., and was admitted to practice in 1802. In October, 1821, he was appointed Chief Justice of the State of New Jersey, and reappointed in 1831. Judge Ewing may be justly reckoned among the greatest ornaments of the New Jersey Bar. His acquaintance with his own department of knowledge was both extensive and profound, closely resembling that of the English black-letter lawyers. In a very remarkable degree he kept himself abreast of the general literature of the day, and was even lavish in regard to the purchase of books.

He was an elder in the Presbyterian Church in Trenton, and was an active and earnest Christian. He was eminently conservative in Church and State, punctual in adherence to rule and precedent, incapable of being led into any vagaries, sound in judgment, tenacious of opinion, indefatigable in labor, and incorruptibly honest and honorable, so as to be proverbially cited all over the State. Judge Ewing died at Trenton, August 5th, 1832.

Ewing, Rev. Fielding Nathanael, son of Adlai Osborn and Sophia (Gillespie) Ewing, was born September 29th, 1811, in Fredell county, N. C.; graduated at the University of Nashville, Tenn., in 1838; spent a year in teaching at Lebanon in that State; graduated at Princeton Seminary in 1843; was licensed by the Second Presbytery of New York, October 17th, 1842, and was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Muhlenberg, April 3d, 1846. From October, 1844, to October, 1849, he was stated supply to the churches of Morganfield and Careyville, Ky.; then, from February 14th, 1850, to April 18th, 1857, stated supply of Bloomington First Church, Ill.; at the latter date he was installed pastor, and continued so until September 22d, 1858, when he was compelled to discontinue preaching, by an attack of laryngitis, which continued to disable him to the end of his life.

Mr. Ewing was a fast and most helpful friend to the Seminary of the Northwest. In 1862-3, as agent for the Institution, he secured $15,000 in money and a donation of eighty acres of land, for the main building of the seminary, the erection of which he afterwards supervised. While able to preach, he made full proof of his ministry as a preacher and pastor.

His urbanity, his dignity, and weight of character, his geniality and sociability, his quiet humor, his warm heart, won all whom he approached. On November 25th, 1880, without a fear, he calmly met death, and conquered.

Ewing, Francis Armstrong, M. D., was named in memory of his maternal grandfather, the Rev. James Francis Armstrong, of Trenton, N. J., who was Moderator of the General Assembly of 1804, and died in 1816, having ministered to the Trenton Church thirty years. He was born in Trenton, September 1st, 1806, graduated at Princeton College in 1824, and as Doctor of Medicine in the University of Pennsylvania in 1828. In 1840 he was ordained to the Ruling Eldership in Trenton, and was a devoted member of the Session until his death, which took place December 10th, 1857. Dr. James W. Alexander wrote of him that, "though a professional man by title, he was in fact and of choice much more a man of letters, and a recluse student of science. In the classical languages, in French, in the natural sciences, and in all that concerns elegant literature and the fine arts, he was singularly full and accurate. In matters of taste he was cultivated, correct, and almost fastidious. Music was his delight, and he was equally versed in the science and the art." The only publication that bears Dr. Ewing's name as author, is a volume of four hundred pages, published by the American Sunday-school Union in 1835, entitled, "Bible Natural History, or a description of the Animals, Plants and Minerals mentioned in the Sacred Scriptures, with copious references and explanation of Texts."

Ewing, John, D.D., was a native of Cecil county, Maryland. He was born, June 23d, 1732. He was a pupil of Dr. Francis Alison, at New London, Pa., and for three years a tutor. In 1751 he graduated at the College of New Jersey, then at Newark, N. J., Aaron Burr being President. Here also he served as tutor. He was then engaged as an instructor in the College, afterward University, of Philadelphia. In 1774 and 1775 he visited Great Britain, to solicit aid for Newark Academy, Delaware, in which effort he was quite successful, and made many friends. The University of Edinburgh conferred on him the degree of D. D., and Principal Robertson declared he had never bestowed the degree with greater pleasure, in his life. But, very naturally, the American was not so great a favorite with the high Tories of the period. Dr. Samuel Johnson, in his presence, gruffly abused the colonies as ignorant as well as rebellious. "What do you know, in America?" said he, "you never read." "Pardon me," replied Dr. Ewing, "we have read the 'Rambler.'" "A soft answer turneth away wrath," and the misa major was at once mollified, and paid special attention to the guest for the remainder of the evening.

Dr. Ewing was made Provost of the University of Pennsylvania, in 1779. He was a thorough Hebraist, and an accomplished scholar, capable of supplying any Professor's place at a moment's warning. He excelled in mathematics, assisting Rittenhouse in running the boundary lines between several of the States. He was a solid and instructive preacher, and much esteemed by the intellectual and cultivated portion of his congregation. Gillett places a high estimate upon him, when he called him "the leading member of Philadelphia Presbytery."

Dr. Ewing died, September 8th, 1802, in the seventy-first year of his age. His lectures on "Natural Philosophy," in two volumes, and a volume of sermons, were published after his death.

Ewing, Hon. John Kennedy, is the only child of Hon. Nathanael and Jane (Kennedy) Ewing, and was born in Uniontown, Fayette county, Pennsylvania, where he still resides, December 15th, 1823. He graduated at Washington College, Washington, Pa., in 1842, and, after studying law under his father, was admitted to the Bar of Fayette county, in March, 1846. By his diligence and ability he soon acquired a large practice and attained eminence in the profession. In the Fall of 1864 he was appointed President Judge of the Fourteenth Judicial District of Pennsylvania, embracing then the counties of Fayette, Washington and Greene. This appointment enabled him to retire at once from the practice of the law, a step he had been endeavoring to take, and imperatively demanded by his impaired health. His discharge of the duties of President Judge added to the public estimation of his character and abilities. Since leaving the Bench he has been largely interested in the coal and iron industries of Western Pennsylvania. Nearly all his life he has had to contend against ill health, but, by virtue of great energy and perseverance, and a strong will, he has succeeded in accomplishing much more than seemed possible.

He united with the Presbyterian Church of his native town, May 4th, 1846, and was therein ordained and installed elder, March 4th, 1860. He was Commissioner to the General Assembly which met in Pittsburg, in 1864, and has frequently been a Delegate to Synod and Presbytery; while in the session of his own church his services have been invaluable.

Judge Ewing is quiet and modest in manner and bearing, pleasing in address, and courteous and benevolent. He possesses great mental vigor and accurate and extensive information, entertains broad and enlightened views, and is strong in his convictions and earnest in his efforts. A Presbyterian from conviction, he loves his Church and takes the greatest interest in all that concerns her welfare and prosperity; but there is nothing whatever of the bigot in his disposition. His sympathies include all Denominations, and to all his assistance is freely given. A man of earnest piety and charitable disposition, his practice conforms to his professions, and his example and counsel exert a commanding influence.

HON. JOHN KENNEDY EWING

F

Fahnestock, Benjamin A., was born at Berlin, Adams county, Pa., July 8th, 1799. After graduating honorably at Dickinson College, Pa., he began the study of medicine, but soon abandoned the practice of the profession, as it proved uncongential to his taste. For some years he conducted a large enterprise in Chambersburg, and about 1829 removed to Pittsburg, where he established the well-known drug house of B. A. Fahnestock & Co. In this business he accumulated a greater part of the large fortune which he so liberally disbursed in acts of friendship and benevolence. Mr. Fahnestock was a courteous, affable gentleman, and an earnest and active Christian. In Pittsburg he was a ruling elder of the Third Presbyterian Church, and upon his removal to Philadelphia, he connected himself with the Arch Street Presbyterian Church, of which the Rev. Charles Wadsworth was then pastor, where he continued to serve the church faithfully, in the duties of the eldership, until his decease, which occurred July 11th, 1862.

Fairchild, Ashbel Green, D. D., was born at Hanover, N. J., May 1st, 1795. He graduated at Princeton College, in September, 1813; studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Jersey, April, 1816. Subsequently he made two missionary tours, one in North Carolina, the other on the waters of the Monongahela, and on the upper branches of the Allegheny. He was taken under the care of the Presbytery of Redstone, April 21st, 1818, and was appointed stated supply to the congregation of George's Creek for half of his time, and on July 1st following, he was ordained as an evangelist by this Presbytery. On July 2d, 1822, he was installed pastor of the churches of George's Creek, Morgantown and Greensboro'. In April, 1827, he resigned the charge of the congregations of Morgantown and Greensboro', and became pastor of the Tent Church, to which he devoted the half of his time. From this date he labored faithfully and successfully in the united pastorate of the churches of George's Creek and Tent, till April, 1854, when he resigned the former charge, that he might devote the whole of his time to the Tent congregation, of which he remained pastor until his death, in June, 1864, a period of thirty-seven years.

Dr. Fairchild was greatly beloved by his people, and esteemed by his brethren. As a friend he was ardent and constant. As to scholarship and general intelligence, he was, perhaps, unsurpassed by any of his contemporaries. In him the dignity and simplicity of the gospel ministry were most beautifully combined and exemplified. His Presbytery looked up to him as a wise counsellor and father. Besides frequent contributions to the weekly religious press, the publications from Dr. Fairchild's pen are: "The Great Supper," "Scripture Baptism," "Unpopular Doctrines," and "What Presbyterians Believe," all of which are issued by the Presbyterian Board of Publication. "The Great Supper" has been translated into German, and, with one or two exceptions, no book published by the Board has a larger circulation.

Fairfield, N. J.—the Old Stone Church.—

The people who came to this region from the towns and churches of Connecticut, Long Island, and East Jersey, organized this church, about 1690. Their first minister was the Rev. Thomas Bridge, a graduate of Harvard College, a man of wealth, piety, learning, ability and manifold experience. He probably continued here not more than ten or fifteen years. His ministry was in the log-cabin period. The meeting-house was built of logs. Most of the dwellings were doubtless of the same kind. The next minister was the Rev. Joseph Smith, who came from New England, was installed, May 10th, 1709, and continued pastor not more than two or three years. He was followed by a comparatively worthless minister, who never became a pastor of this Church. In 1713 Howell ap Howell, a Welshman, came and preached here acceptably, and was installed pastor, October 14th, 1715, but died, less than two years thereafter. It is believed that during his pastorate the log meeting-house gave place to a frame one, built in the New England style, shingled on the sides and ends as well as the roof. It stood near the site of the old one, in the southeast corner of the old burying ground. The worshippers, having no pews, sat on benches. Mr. Howell's successor was the Rev. Henry Hook, an Irishman, who was admitted to the membership of the Synod, in 1718, but seems to have never been installed here. Before this time Presbyterian meetings began to be held in Greenwich. Several families of Scotch and Scotch-Irish settled there, and trustees, in 1717, received a deed for land on which to build a church edifice. A church was organized as early as 1728. Mr. Hook preached for a time in both Fairfield and Greenwich. In 1724 the Rev. Noyes Parris, of Massachusetts, came here, preached for five years, and then returned to New England.

The first minister who lived here long enough to make any great and permanent mark upon the place was the Rev. Daniel Elmer. His honorable ancestry is well known. He was born in Hartford, Conn., in 1690, graduated at Yale in 1713, taught a classical school, married and preached several years in Massachusetts; came here, probably, in 1727, with his wife and five children, purchased a farm near the church, and became its pastor in 1729. Mr. Elmer's death occurred January 14th, 1755. His grave is in the old burying-ground, and the inscription on his tombstone is ecclesiastically significant. It does not speak of him as the late pastor of the Presbyterian Church, but of the Church of Christ in Fairfield. Mr. Elmer's successor was the Rev. William Ramsey, who was born in Lancaster county, Pa., in 1732, and graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1751. In the call made out for him, and dated March 22d, 1756, thirty-eight men, whose names were attached to it, agreed to pay the salary, "eighty pounds proclamation," according to an assessment upon all the property of each, made by a committee of their own

The Rev. William Hollingshead succeeded Mr. Ramsey, being installed pastor of the church by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, July 27th, 1773. Soon after it was found necessary to provide for the building of a new house of worship, to make sure of the future comfort and growth of the congregation and the township. The frame building, used more than half a century, was taken down in 1775. The pulpit and benches were set in the shade of an oak near the site of the church, and this was the place of the choice. The sum amounted to about eight dollars and a half from each man, in silver, on the average, a yearly payment, by every one, of the price, perhaps, of a good cow or two acres of good land, at that time. Mr. Ramsey was ordained and installed December 1st, 1756. On his marriage (1758), the congregation bought him a farm of one hundred and fifty acres, on the east side of Sayre's Neck, a little below the school-house, about two miles south of the church. His home was on this farm till he died. On his tombstone, in the old cemetery, is the following inscription:—

Beneath this Stone he interred public worship in fair weather. There seems to have been no difficulty in selecting the new site for the new building. The hallowed and grateful associations of the old place, even though sanctified by the graves of their parents, were made subordinate to the prosperity, convenience and welfare of the people, and of posterity. The good of the township required that the church should stand on the main road running through its centre from one end to the other. Accordingly, they bought land here, and determined that a suitable edifice should be erected. The work of building the new house advanced so rapidly that the pastor was able to preach his first sermon in it September 7th, 1780; but the labors of a year were required to finish it within, and to form rules for its use by the families of the congregation. As soon as they could worship in it, the people gave themselves to the promotion of their spiritual interests, and, in the Spring of 1784, a large number of persons were admitted to the full communion of the Church. The church was incorporated by a special Act of the State Legislature, August 4th, 1783.

In the year just mentioned the church lost the pastoral care of the Rev. Mr. Hollingshead, who accepted a call to the pastoral charge of the Circular or Independent Church of Charleston, S. C., the principal congregation in the chief Southern capital. December 3d, 1789 the Rev. Ethan Osborn was installed pastor of the Fairfield Church. As this eminently useful man has a separate sketch in the appropriate place in this volume, we only here insert the inscription upon the marble shaft to his memory, in the later burial ground at the Old Stone Church:—

Front—Erected August 21st, 1858, to the memory of REV. ETHAN OSBORN, born in Litchfield, Conn., August 21, 1758; died full of faith, and in the hope of a joyful resurrection, May 1, 1858, aged 99 years, 8 months and 10 days.

Right—Graduated at Dartmouth, 1784; licensed 1786; called to Fairfield 1788; ordained 1789, and resigned his charge 1844, having been pastor of this Church 55 years.

Rear—A soldier of the Revolution, a good man, a faithful minister of the Gospel.

Left—He obeyed the command—"Go preach my Gospel." His children in the flesh and in the spirit lie around him.

In August, 1836, the Rev. David McKee, from Kentucky, became co-pastor of the church with Mr. Osborn. During his short co-pastorate, which was dissolved October 1838, there was an extensive revival in the congregation. As stated in the epitaph, Mr. Osborn resigned his charge in 1844. The Rev. Beriah B. Hotchkin was installed November 19th, 1845, pastor of the church, in connection with the Second Presbyterian Church of Fairfield, now called the Second Presbyterian Church of Cedarville. His residence was part of the time at Cedarville, and part in Fairton. Under his ministry numbers were added to the church from time to time. March 16th, 1848, it was determined to build a new church at Fairton, and March 29th, 1850, on a lot contributed by Mr. John Trenchard for the purpose, the house was completed. After the fifth Sabbath of March, 1850, the regular public worship of the congregation was transferred from the Stone Church to the new church in Fairton. The last sermon prior to removal was preached by the old pastor, as was very fitting. It was, as Judge Elmer well said, "a solemn farewell to that place, hallowed by so many endearing associations, and to the people so long under his care." The pastoral relation of Mr. Hotchkin, at his request, and with the reluctant acquiescence of the congregation, was dissolved June 11th, 1850.

The Rev. D. C. Meeker, having preached as supply, was installed pastor, February 12th, 1851, and reaped the harvest of the seed sown by his excellent and devoted predecessor. There was an earnest revived state, as the condition of the church during his stay with them. Since the old parsonage and plantation at Sayre's Neck were sold, in 1807, the church was without a home for the pastor. Mr. Osborn occupying his own home, the need was not felt till after his resignation. A parsonage was completed in 1853. After serving the church as supply for nearly nine months, the Rev. James Boggs was installed pastor, May 19th, 1857. During his pastorate the church was again visited with an outpouring of the Spirit, of great power. Large additions were made to the church. It enjoyed peace and gradual growth, and the congregation had so increased that an enlargement of the building became necessary, and was completed in 1862. Mr. Boggs continued to labor on till the Autumn of 1866. The Rev. H. E. Johnson, on the withdrawal of Mr. Boggs, was obtained as stated supply, which arrangement continued more than two years and a half. A chapel at the rear end of the church was completed in 1867. Mr. Johnson's labors closed May 9th, 1869. The Rev. Samuel Beach Jones, D. D., of Bridgeton, was then invited to supply the pulpit, and did so, with much success attending his ministry, until he was laid aside by a stroke of apoplexy, October 4th, 1874. The Rev. Samuel Rutherford Anderson, after preaching to the congregation for a year, was installed pastor, November 12th, 1875. In the Winter of 1878-9 the church enjoyed an unusual refreshing.

During the century about one thousand souls have been added to the church on the profession of their faith. There have been seven pastors (including the short co-pastorate of the Rev. Mr. McKee), and two stated supplies. Thirty-seven persons have been associated in the Session and co-operated with the pastor in the spiritual oversight. At present there are five elders and one hundred and forty-seven members. It may truthfully be affirmed that there are few congregations in the land in which have been reared more men of distinction and usefulness than those whose names appear on the records of Fairfield. Some of them are noticed elsewhere in this volume.

The burial ground of this church is invested with peculiar interest. When the house was opened for service, a century ago, and became the birthplace of souls, this ground became the receptacle of the dead. Mr. John Bateman was put in charge of the graveyard. His son John succeeded him, who was again followed by his son Thomas. It continued in the care of this family seventy-seven years. The first burial was the child of John Hanseman, in 1780, marked only by a rude sandstone, without name or date. The second was John Barton. The third, and first marked by a tombstone, is Stephen Clark, Esq., May 13th, 1781. Then follow two Ruths, the wives of two elders, Jedediah Ogden and John Bower. In 1879 the forest trees were cleared away from this ground; it was laid out in regular tiers of lots, with roadway and paths, and an iron fence was built in front. There are now not far from two thousand six hundred bodies reposing in this sacred yard. Only a little more than one-third have stones with inscriptions, commemorating their names and virtues.

The following verses, on "The Old Stone Church," from the pen of Francis De Haes Janvier, will be read with interest, especially by those who are familiar with the history of the venerable building, and whose early and tender associations cluster around it, as the house in which their fathers and themselves have worshiped:—

THE OLD STONE CHURCH, time-worn and gray,
Survives, though since its natal day
A hundred years have passed away

Still stands, while those who planned and reared
Its walls have long since disappeared,
A sacred shrine, beloved, revered.

With hallowed memories running o'er,
With visions of the times of yore,
Dear to each heart forevermore.

And with them comes the kindly face
Of one whose life we fondly trace—
A Pastor, full of heavenly grace.

A youth when, in those distant days,
He led the flock in Wisdom's ways,
With words of love, and prayer, and praise;

And still, through half a century
Of sweet devotion, lived to be A Father in God's ministry;

Till, with the weight of years oppressed,
His mission closed—accepted, blest,
He tranquilly laid down to rest.

And reunited now with those Who, gathered here, these graves enclose,
The Pastor and his flock repose.

But the Archangel's trump shall sound,
And God Himself rend every mound
Within this silent burial ground.

Then shall the dead awake, and be Redeemed from death's deep mystery
To life and immortality

The fathers sleep; but what they wrought,
The faith and love their lives have taught,
Survive the changes time has brought

And, cherished with their memory,
Prized as a precious legacy,
The OLD STONE CHURCH shall ever be.

Faith. This, in its widest sense, is a dependence on the veracity of another, or belief on testimony. In Scripture the testimony which is the ground of faith means, generally, the divine testimony, announced either by God himself, or by his accredited messengers. Thus Noah credited the warning which the depraved antediluvians disregarded, and used the means which God pointed out to him for deliverance from the approaching deluge (Heb. xi, 7). Faith is distinguished from credulity in that it does not accept anything as true which is not based on sufficient evidence; it is contrasted with unbelief, in that it accepts whatever is proposed to it when the testimony thereof is adequate. We are informed that faith may be dead, if it be merely in the understanding, admitting facts as true, but not realizing their bearing upon ourselves. Such a faith is that historical faith which credits the narrative of our Lord's passion and death, but seeks not, through that, remission of personal guilt. The faith of devils goes further than this, for they 'believe and tremble' (James ii, 19); but they find no means of release from their apprehended doom. True faith is the substance (or realizing) of things hoped for, the evidence (or sure persuasion) of things not seen' (Heb. xi, 1). With such a faith 'Abraham believed God; and it was counted unto him for righteousness' (Gen. xv, 6; Rom. iv, 3; Gal. iii, 6). So those who believe in Christ, accepting his offered mercy, relying on his never-forfeited word, are, for his sake, regarded as God's children. Hence men are said to be 'justified by faith' (Rom. iii, 23-26; v, 1). Faith, if genuine, will work by love (Gal. v, 6), yielding the fruits of a holy life and conversation (Matt. vii, 20; James ii, 26).

The objection which some have made, that the Bible makes so much account of faith, is utterly unreasonable. Though faith is requisite in religion, it is as much requisite elsewhere. Human society, in its whole framework, is so held together, and the kindreds and amusements and business of the world are presenting, to the most earthly-minded, continual images and imitations of that faith which, when demanded of him by the Church and by the Word of God, he may sometimes affect to regard as strange and unexampled. The generous confidence of soldiers in a tried and heroic leader, that enables them, in his company, to dare, at immense odds, all peril, and to pluck victory out of the teeth of death; the implicit confidence of his correspondents in a merchant of known means, and of proved integrity and sagacity, bidding them set a fortune afloat on the credit of his mere signature; the trust of the voyager in the intelligence and vigilance of the navigator to whose keel he commits his estate, and family and life; the reliance of the husbandman upon the regularity of nature's laws, and upon the ordinance of her God, which leads him to plow and sow, in the certain expectation that he shall reap; the unshaken assurance of a friend in the worth and affection of one whom he has long known and intimately loved, and the quiet, serene and rooted trust of a wife or a child in the husband or the parent to whom for years they have looked, and never looked in vain; what are all these but examples, in daily recurrence, that faith is a universal principle, at work in all the relations and under all the responsibilities of our common, earthly life.

And though metaphysicians and divines have involved this matter of faith in mystery, we may be assured that there is nothing more needed for our salvation than that God would inspire us with a belief in the declarations of His Word as real, heartfelt and practical, as that which we put in the laws of providence, in the due return of day and night,

Summer and Winter, seedtime and harvest. It is not a new principle that we need, but the principle that is already in us turned to its right exercise. As a man who is approaching a precipice does not need to get feet, but to get the feet he has turned round, so that every step becomes one from danger to safety, so it is not so much faith we need, as that the faith we have be set on new and right objects, and turned in a new and right direction.

Faitoute, Rev. George, acted as Tutor in the College of New Jersey for a short time after graduating, in 1776. He received his license to preach from the Presbytery of New Brunswick, about 1778, and was ordained and settled at Greenwich, N. J., in 1782. In 1789 he removed to Long Island, and became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Jamaica, where he died suddenly, on Sabbath, August 21st, 1815, having preached with his usual vigor in the morning. Mr. Faitoute was an amiable, pious man.

Faris, Rev. John McDonald, son of William and Elizabeth (McDonald) Faris, was born May 23d, 1818, in Ohio county, now West Virginia. He graduated at Washington College, Pa., in the class of 1837, receiving a share of its first honor; and at the Western Theological Seminary in the class of 1840. Mr. Faris was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Washington, in April, 1840. Most of the following Winter was spent in supplying the Church of Lebanon, near Pittsburg; but in the following Spring he accepted a like invitation to become stated supply of the Church of Barlow, Ohio, and at the end of his term was chosen as its pastor. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Lancaster in April, 1842.

After three years of labor at Barlow, Mr. Faris received a call as pastor to the church of Fredericktown, Knox county, Ohio, where he labored successfully until 1855, when he resigned his position in order to accept that of Financial Agent of the Board of Trust of the Synod of Wheeling, then having in charge the endowment of Washington College, his own Alma Mater. Two years later he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Rockford, Ill., where he labored for nearly five years. But again his fine business accuracy and energy came into demand. During two periods, viz. 1863-66 and 1873-81, he was Financial Agent as well as a Director of the Theological Seminary of the Northwest at Chicago, and a part of this time a member and Secretary of the Executive Committee. In the years 1869-73 he was Financial Agent of Westminster College. His official connection with the Chicago Seminary having commenced with its origin, in 1859, was only brought to a close in 1883. Mr. Faris now lives in the retirement of his Illinois farm, near Anna, of the Presbyterian Church of which place his son is pastor. His record is that of an efficient minister, a successful agent of Church Institutions, a faithful friend, and a servant of the Lord, who, approaching life's border, is looking for his Master's coming.

Farquhar, Rev. John, the son of Joseph and Christiana (Fraser) Farquhar, was born in Aberdeen, Scotland. His parents emigrated to the United States and settled in Easton, Pa. He was educated in Lafayette College, studied theology at Princeton, was licensed by Newton Presbytery and ordained by Donegal Presbytery, and installed as pastor over the Church of Lower Chanceford, York county, Pa., in 1846. This was his first and only charge. He died, September 18th, 1866. Mr. Farquhar was a man of clear, vigorous mind, great independence of character, of strong convictions of truth and duty, honest and outspoken in his utterances. As a preacher he was earnest, doctrinal, and practical. As a Presbyter he was intelligent, consistent and rigid in his compliance with the requirements of the Constitution and the forms of order. As a pastor he was endeared to all the people of his charge, ever welcome at their homes, with his genial smiles and kind sympathies.

Farris, Robert Perry, D.D., the son of Robert P. (a lawyer) and Catharine A. Farris, was born in St. Louis, September 6th, 1826. He spent two and a half years in St. Louis University, and three and a half in St. Xavier College, Cincinnati (both Jesuit institutions), receiving the degree of A. B. at the latter, in 1844. He then entered the Sophomore Class in Yale College, and was again graduated with the degree of A. B. in 1847. He then read law in St. Louis, but in the Fall of 1848 entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J., where he remained two years. He studied theology a third year under the Rev. N. L. Rice, D.D., in Cincinnati. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of St.

Louis, June, 1851, and was ordained by the same body, November, 1852. He was called to Peoria, Illinois, in 1853, where he organized and became pastor of the Second Church. His health broke down after six years' faithful service, and for a short time he was employed by the Theological Seminary of the Northwest, at Chicago. He was called to St. Charles, Missouri, in 1860, where he continued as pastor-elect until 1868.

In 1866 he became the editor of the Missouri (now St. Louis) Presbyterian, a position which he has held continuously since. In addition to his editorial work, he has had, in a sense, "the care of all the churches" of the Southern Missouri Synod, and has done a great deal of preaching. Westminster College conferred upon him the degree of D. D. in 1867. He was unanimously elected Moderator of the General Assembly, South, at Staunton, Va., in 1881.

Dr. Ferris is a gentleman of courtly bearing, of intelligent countenance, and of commanding person. As a husband, father and friend, he is the embodiment of kindness. As a preacher, he is simple, clear, full of unction and of force. As a writer, there are few who wield a more facile or more potent pen. His style is distinguished more for its strong Saxon than for its classic elegance. No one can mistake what he means, or fail to feel its force. Though educated chiefly by the Jesuits, his paper has always bristled with opposition to them. A man of transparent honesty and of decided convictions, he has no patience with dissimulation or trickery, and sometimes wounds by his candid and caustic utterances. He is one of the strongest men of the Missouri Synod of the Southern Presbyterian Church, and wields an influence in that body which is modestly exercised, but is practically potent. His friends love and admire him; his enemies fear and respect him.

Ferguson, Rev. Angus Norman, son of Norman and Catharine (Campbell) Ferguson, was born in Moore county, N. C., January 4th, 1837. He entered Davidson College, September, 1855, and remained over a year, when failing health compelled him to leave the Institution. He pursued his theological studies in the Seminary, at Columbia, S. C., and was licensed by Fayetteville Presbytery, October 4th, 1862. In January, 1863, he took charge of Ben Salem, Euphronia and Macedonia churches, in the same Presbytery. He supplied Macedonia two years, Ben Salem seven, and Euphronia nine. He was ordained in April, 1865, and in June, 1871, he took charge of Laurel Hill Church, in Richmond county, and Lambertton Church, in Robeson county. Having served the Church in Lambertton, he withdrew from it, to take charge of Smyrna Church, in the same Presbytery. He still continues to serve these churches, Laurel Hill, as pastor, and Smyrna, as stated supply.

The cordial and unassuming manner of Mr. Ferguson ensures him ready access to the confidence and esteem of all who meet him. His style of preaching is earnest and practical, rather than profound or metaphysical. Without any effort at display he stands behind the Cross, and holds up Jesus as the only Saviour of sinners. Hence his labors have been greatly blessed in building up his Master's kingdom. As a Presbyter he is punctual and faithful, and as a pastor, zealous and laborious.

Ferrier, Rev. Edsall, D. D., was born at Warwick, Orange county, N. Y., on the 30th of October, 1831. He graduated at Lafayette College, Easton, Pa., in 1854, and studied theology at the Seminary at Princeton. He was pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Florida, N. Y., from 1859 to 1865, when he was elected Professor of the English Language and Literature in Washington and Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa. In 1866 he accepted the Grad Professorship of English Language and Literature in Pennsylvania College, Gettysburg, and occupied that chair until 1873, when he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Mauch Chunk, Pa., and continues as such to the present time. The degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him by the trustees of Lafayette College, in 1881.

Dr. Ferrier is a highly accomplished scholar and writer, and is thoroughly conversant with the various departments of English literature. His attainments in philology are varied and extensive, and his scholarship is at once general and accurate. As a writer his style is terse and vigorous, and he expresses his thoughts in strong and striking forms of language. He possesses the didactic faculty in a very high degree, and has had marked success as an instructor in college. He is an earnest, edifying and impressive preacher, and his ministry has been attended with great usefulness and signal indications of divine favor.

Ferry, Hon. Thomas White, was born at Mackinaw, Michigan, June 1st, 1827, and is the second son of the late Rev. William M. Ferry, of Granby, Mass., a Presbyterian clergyman, who, under the auspices of the American Board of Missions, established an Indian mission on the Island of Mackinaw, in 1822. The family subsequently removed to Grand Haven, Ottawa county, Michigan, then a wilderness. Here his sons grew up amid the privations and struggles of a pioneer life.

The Hon. T. W. Ferry was thus early trained in a Christian household, and throughout the whole of his busy and eventful life, the religious convictions of childhood have been ever with him, drawing him ever to the side of the Church of Christ, and making him prominent in all educational and philanthropic works. Wherever duty called him, there he has not failed to identify himself openly with the cause of Religion and everything promotive of intelligence and morality. His business life has been various and widely extended, sufficient to engross the whole time of the strongest and most industrious of men.

But he is more distinguished among his countrymen in his political and public career, it having fallen to him to have a peculiar prominence on some of the most thrilling occasions in the history of our Republic, particularly when he presided at the National Centennial Celebration at Philadelphia, July 4th, 1876, and subsequently at the joint convention of the two Houses of Congress, for the electoral count, in 1876.

Mr. Ferry is a man of fine mould and figure; dark chestnut or auburn hair, and beard flowing to the breast; not florid or imaginative in speech, but of plain, sound, practical, hard sense, and has borne a remarkable part in the political and legislative debates and measures of a whole past generation, although he is even now only in his prime. He has held many important offices and positions of public trust, and been subjected to ordeals which only the coolest courage and stoutest nerve could support; and in every situation he has been always equal to the demand, and has left a public name behind him which is without a stain. For some years he was a member of the Legislature of his native State, and subsequently became a member of the House of Representatives, in Congress, from Michigan, where he rendered distinguished service. In 1871 he took his seat in the American Senate, and soon rose to the highest rank in the most dignified and powerful legislative body in the world. Several times he was chosen to the Presidency of the Senate, over very powerful and older men. To him it fell to guide the Senate in some of the most difficult and complicated emergencies, which he did with eminent success. His last Senatorial term expired March 3d, 1883, and soon after he sailed for Europe, where, after a long and honorable career in public life, he finds a grateful repose, and may enjoy, even amid the attractions of the Old World, the welcome retrospection of a most valuable and noble service to his State, his Nation, and to mankind.

Ferry, Rev. William Montague, the son of Noah and Hannah (Montague) Ferry, was born in Granby, Mass., September 8th, 1795. He graduated at Union College in 1820; attended the Theological Seminary at New Brunswick, N. J., for two years, and finished his studies under Gardiner Spring, D.D., of New York. He was licensed and ordained by New York Presbytery in 1832, and, under a commission from the United Foreign Missionary Society, he was appointed as missionary to the Indians of the northwest, which led to the establishment of the Mackinaw Mission on the island of Michilimackinac, Michigan. The history of his labors there is that of incessant toil. He established schools among the Indians, and hundreds of their children were brought under the influence of religion.

On November 2d, 1831, Mr. Ferry removed with his family to the point where the city of Grand Haven now stands; his was the first white family in the county. Here they encountered the toils and trials of pioneer life in its various forms; but soon he added to his wealth, and scattered blessings in his path. He maintained the preaching of the Word, and for eighteen years he built that people up in the faith, without fee or reward. Where he instituted the Church, in a log hut on the shore of Lake Michigan, six churches now gather to worship God. He died December 30th, 1867, in Grand Haven, and his decease was deemed a public calamity. The Councils, in referring to him as "the founder and father of this city," recorded "their high estimate of his qualities of mind and heart, as a most affectionate friend, a man of untiring business enterprise, large benevolence, inflexible integrity of purpose, and firmly fixed moral and religious character."

Mr. Ferry directed in his will that, on his tombstone, after his name, age, etc., should be this inscription:—

"First, toil; then rest.

First, grace; then glory."

For religious, charitable and educational purposes, he bequeathed $137,000. He was the father of the Hon. T. W. Ferry, who has been a member of the United States Senate from Michigan.

Field, Rev. Jacob Ten Eyck, was the son of Jeremiah and Jane (Ten Eyck) Field, and was born in Lammington, N. J., October 31st, 1787. Early in life he united with the Presbyterian Church, and was prepared for college by his pastor, Rev. William Boyd. Graduated from Princeton College, 1806. He studied theology under Dr. Woodhull, of Monmouth, and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick. 1807 he was appointed by the Home Missionary Society to labor in Stroudsburg, Pa. In the Spring of 1810 he received a call from the Presbyterian Church, Flemington, N. J., but preferred to serve as a supply for six months before deciding to accept. He was ordained and installed, November 28th, 1810. Remained in Flemington until April 27th, 1813. The congregation parted from him with reluctance. He then accepted a call to D. R. Church, Pompton, N. J. From 1833 to October 5th, 1841, was stated supply, and then pastor, of the Presbyterian churches of Stroudsburg and Middle Smithfield, Pa. In 1839, when fifty-two years old, he was disabled by a stroke of paralysis, from which he never sufficiently recovered to resume his work, although he lived twenty-seven years, dying at the advanced age of eighty, at Belvidere, N. J., May 15th, 1866. He established a scholarship in Lafayette College, which bears his name. When in health he was a man of fine personal appearance, and of good talents.

Field, Samuel, son of Charles Field, of Philadelphia, was born in Delaware county, Pa., August 12th, 1823. Throughout his life he has been engaged in mercantile pursuits, and has won an enviable reputation for his integrity, ability and success. He is a gentleman of great affableness, courtousness of manner and benignity of spirit. He is, and has for years been, a ruling elder in the Walnut Street Church,

Philadelphia, in which he is held in high esteem for his excellent Christian character, and is very active in aiding every good work. Mr. Field is very liberal in contributing to charitable and religious purposes. No proper appeal to him, in this direction, fails of a response. He has been a prominent member of several business corporations of the city, in which his judiciousness and uprightness have been highly appreciated. For many years he has belonged to the Presbyterian Board of Education, and shown a deep interest in the cause. From the very establishment of the Presbyterian Hospital, in Philadelphia, he has been a member of its Board of Trustees, and devoted himself earnestly to the promotion of its prosperity. He has also taken a leading and very influential part in founding and fostering the Presbyterian Home for Widows and Single Women, and the Presbyterian Orphanage. Mr. Field has been chosen several times to represent his Presbytery in the General Assembly, and in that judicatory, as in all others, has been marked by steadfast and cheerful fidelity to duty.

Findley, Samuel, D. D., son of the late Samuel Findley, D. D., so well known and so long revered in the Associate Reformed Church, was born in West Middletown, Pa., October 26th, 1818. He graduated at Franklin College, Ohio, in 1839. His theological studies he pursued in the Associate Reformed Seminary, at Allegheny, Pa., and in the summer of 1841 was licensed to preach by the Second Presbytery (Associate Reformed) of Ohio. On October 12th, 1842, he was ordained by the same Presbytery, sine titula, in order to serve as stated supply at La Fayette, Indiana.

As a pastor and educator, Dr. Findley has rendered long and faithful service to the Church of Christ. In 1843 he was installed pastor of the united charge of the churches of Troy, Chesterville and Sulphur Springs, Ohio. In 1846 he was chosen Principal of the Edinburg Academy, near Wooster, Ohio. In 1848 he accepted the Associate Principalship of the Chillicothe Academy, of which his brother, Dr. W. T. Findley, was at the time Principal. He was chosen Principal of the Chillicothe Female College in 1850. In February, of 1853, he removed to Antrim, Ohio, to become President of Madison College, a new institution under care of the Associate Reformed Church. In July, 1856, Dr. Findley was elected to the Principalship of the Urbana Female Seminary, but, on account of objection made to his want of orthodoxy on Psalmody and Communion, he declined this election, resigned the Presidency of Madison College and, on July 27th, 1856, connected himself with the O. S. Presbytery of Zanesville, Ohio. On March 20, 1857, he was installed pastor of the Sixth Church (O. S.), of Pittsburg, Pa., where he served until in the summer of 1861, when he became Professor of Logic and Rhetoric in the Western University of Pennsylvania. In 1865 he took charge of the pastorate of the Fourth Presbyterian Church of Dayton, Ohio, and also of the Chaplaincy and a Professorship in the Western Military Academy, in the same city. Dr. Findley's next charge was that of the New Jersey Church, at Carlisle, Ohio, where he labored for eight years, from 1870 to 1878. Since 1879 he has been pastor of the united congregations of Somerville and Collinsville, Ohio. He was honored, in 1873, by being made correspondent member of the American Entomological Society. While pastor of the Sixth Church, Pittsburg, he, for over two years, edited the Pennsylvania Teacher, and in 1878 published a volume entitled "Rambles Among the Insects," at the special request of the Presbyterian Board of Publication.

Findley, Rev. Thomas M., is the second son of William and Eleanor (Caruthers) Findley, and was born at Glade Run, Venango county, Pa., September 29th, 1847. After graduating at Monmouth College, Ill., in 1871, with the first honor of his class, he was for two years engaged in teaching. He graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary, April 28th, 1879, and was licensed the next day, by the Presbytery of New Brunswick. He preached at Keyport, N. J., until May, 1880. June 23d, 1880, he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Indianapolis, Iowa. Here his labors were very successful. At the solicitation of the Committee of the Presbytery of Southern Dakota, he agreed to take charge of the Presbyterian University of Southern Dakota, located at Pierre, and on October 10th, 1883, was elected and formally made President of the new Institution. President Findley is a broad and vigorous thinker, an earnest and persevering worker, and a fine scholar. As a writer he is clear and forcible, as a speaker, earnest and persuasive.

Findley, Hon. William, the fourth Governor of Pennsylvania under the Constitution of 1790, from December 16th, 1817, to December 19th, 1820, was born at Mercersburg, Franklin county, June 20th, 1763. He commenced life as a farmer, on a portion of his father's estate, which at the death of his father, in 1799, he inherited. The first office which he ever held was that of Brigade Inspector of militia. In 1797 he was elected a member of the House of Representatives of the State Legislature. He was again elected to the House in 1803. He proved himself a leading member, and one of the most useful in the House, being placed in the most responsible positions. January 13th, 1807, he was elected State Treasurer, and was annually re-elected to that office for eleven years, when he resigned to assume the duties of Chief Magistrate.

At the session of the Legislature, 1821-2, Governor Findley was elected to the Senate of the United States for the full term of six years. At the expiration of his Senatorial term he was appointed Treasurer of the United States Mint at Philadelphia, and resigned the office on account of the infirmities of age. He died at Harrisburg, at the residence of his son-in-law, Governor Shunk, November 12th, 1846. Governor Findley was a very popular man. In his domestic relations he was most exemplary. He was charitable in the largest sense. He was a Christian in faith and practice. Baptized and brought up in the Presbyterian Church, he accepted its Standards, and respected and hospitably entertained its ministers. In his inaugural address as Governor, in enumerating the duties which should be required of public servants, he included that of cherishing "by their example, the purity and beauty of the religion of the Redeemer."

Findley, William Thornton, D. D., is the oldest son of Rev. Samuel and Margaret (Ross) Findley, and was born near West Middletown, Washington Co., Pa., June 2d, 1814. He removed, with his parents, to Ohio in 1824. Graduated at Franklin College, in 1839. During the year of his senior studies he performed the duties of College Tutor. He was licensed by the Second (Associated Reformed) Presbytery of Ohio, to preach, June 12th, 1839, after one Winter's study in the Theological Seminary in Allegheny, Pa., Rev. John T. Pressley, D. D., Professor. At this time his health had become so seriously impaired that all his future theological studies were pursued under the supervision of a Committee of Presbytery. He spent the Winter of 1840-41 in the South, and derived lasting benefit by a voyage of about eleven days on sea, on his return home. He engaged in mission work in Dayton, Ohio, from the Fall of 1841 till in the Fall of 1843. He was pastor of the Associate Reformed Church in Chillicothe, Ohio, 1843-1855. During his pastorate here he was four years Principal of the Chillicothe

Academy, with his brother Samuel as Associate Principal three years. He was pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Springfield, Ohio, 1855-59, and pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Xenia, Ohio, 1859-1869. In the last week of January, 1869, he entered upon his pastorate of the Central Presbyterian Church, Newark, N. J., in which relation he still continues. In 1867-68 he edited the Family Treasure, a literary and religious magazine, which originated with Dr. David McKinney, in Pittsburg, but was published at above date in Cincinnati, Ohio. Dr. Findley is an instructive preacher and a forcible writer. He has published about twenty separate sermons and addresses. He is ready for every good work, diligent in his Master's service, blessed in his ministry, and beloved by the communities in which he has labored.

Fine, Hon. John, was born in the city of New York, August 26th, 1794. He graduated from Columbia College in 1809, next to the head of the class. He studied law, and in 1815 opened an office in St. Lawrence county. In 1824 he was appointed first Judge of the county, and reappointed at the expiration of successive terms of office until he retired on his election to Congress, in 1838, where he served, during the latter of his two years, on the Committee of Foreign Affairs. In 1841 he was again placed on the Bench, and sat there until the reorganization of the courts in 1847, under the new Constitution of the State. In 1848 he was chosen a State Senator, and most happily impressed himself on the legislation during his period of service. From 1821 to 1833 he acted as County Treasurer, and, on his resignation, the Board of Supervisors bore unqualified testimony to the ability, accuracy and integrity with which he had discharged his trust. In 1852 he published a valuable volume of lectures on "Law." Judge Fine's name is as familiar to the Synod of Central New York as that of any minister who has lived within its bounds. Indeed, his life-work was not less religious and ecclesiastical than secular. No man surpassed him in the fervor of his piety and the activity of his benevolence. On removing to St. Lawrence county he was substantially a superintendent of the missionary field about him, and looked after the waste places and feeble churches, and was constantly consulted about them. He was a frequent and nearly a constant member of the Presbytery and Synod, and afterward prominently a Commissioner to the General Assembly, and active in planning and executing its schemes. He took a prominent part in initiating and consummating the "Remmon." Judge Fine died in 1867. For fifty-six years he served as ruling elder in the church at Ogdensburg, and was one of the first two chosen for the office there.

Finley, General Clement A., was the son of Samuel Finley, who was a nephew of the Rev. Dr. Samuel Finley, President of Princeton College, a Major in the Virginia line during the Revolutionary War, and a commander of a regiment of Mounted Riflemen in the war of 1812. He was born in Newville, Cumberland county, Pa., in 1797; graduated at Washington College, Pa.; studied medicine in Chillicothe, Ohio, and received his diploma in the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania. Dr. Finley entered the army August 10th, 1818, as Surgeon's Mate of the First Regiment of Infantry, then stationed at Baton Rouge, La. He subsequently filled the positions of Assistant Surgeon, and Surgeon, and was Medical Director in the field, with Generals Jessup, Scott, and Taylor, in the Black Hawk, Seminole, and Mexican Wars. He spent nearly eight years on the frontier of Arkansas, Louisiana and Florida, accompanied the commands that established Forts Leavenworth, Jefferson Barracks, and Gibson, and went with General Dodge on one of the earliest expeditions to the Rocky Mountains in 1831.

In 1861 he was appointed Surgeon General of the United States Army, and having served his country honorably and acceptably forty-four years, he retired from active service upon his own application. The commission of Brevet Brigadier General was given him by the President on his retirement, for long and faithful service. General Finley was a fine specimen of a Christian gentleman. His appearance was commanding and impressive. Even in advanced years, he retained the graceful bearing of the soldier. Modest and retiring, he was yet the centre of many strong friendships and attachments. He was by religious profession, and from strong convictions, a Presbyterian, and his long and useful life was ever adorned by Christian fidelity.

Finley, Rev. James, was born in County Armagh, Ireland, in February, 1725; was educated at Fagg's Manor, under Samuel Blair; was licensed by New Castle Presbytery, and installed pastor of East Nottingham, on the Rock, in Cecil county, Md., in 1752. Mr. Finley crossed the Alleghenies in 1765, and again in 1767, and by the direction of the Synod, supplied Ligonier, and the vacancies beyond the mountains for two months, in 1771-2. His pastoral relation at Nottingham, against the remonstrance of an attached people, was dissolved, May 17th, 1782. He was not dismissed to Redstone Presbytery till April 26th, 1785, and he was received by that body June 21st. He was called to Rehoboth and Round Hill, both in the Forks of Youghiogheny, in the Fall of 1781, and remained there till his death, January 6th, 1795. On removing to the West, the Supreme Executive Council of Pennsylvania intrusted important business to Mr. Finley, and commissioned him as a Justice of the Peace and a Judge of the Common Pleas.

Finley, Rev. John Evans, a nephew of President Finley, was licensed to preach by New Castle Presbytery, about 1780, and was settled at Fagg's Manor, Pa. About the year 1795 he removed to Kentucky, and became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Bracken, Mason county, where he exercised his ministry during the great revival in the West.

Finley, Robert, D. D., was born at Princeton, N. J., in 1772; graduated at Princeton College in 1787, and by the advice of Dr. Witherspoon, was appointed teacher of the Grammar School connected with the college. After remaining in this situation some time, he took charge of an academy at Allentown, N. J. In 1791 he removed to Charleston, S. C., and became Principal of an academy in that city, where he gained a high reputation as a gentleman, a Christian, and a teacher.

Having determined to devote himself to the ministry, Mr. Finley returned to Princeton, and again conducted the Grammar School, but was soon appointed Tutor in the college, and served in that capacity from 1793 to 1795. On September 16th, 1791, he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, and on June 16th, was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Baskingridge, N. J., where he also conducted one of the largest and most popular schools of the day.

About this time Mr. Finley conceived the idea of African Colonization, and he may be considered as the founder of the American Colonization Society. In 1817 he was elected to the Presidency of the University of Georgia, but he had hardly entered upon the duties of his new position, when disease seized him, and he died, October 3d, 1817. Dr. Finley was a man of decision and energy. His perceptions were uncommonly vivid, and his feelings proportionately strong. He sustained a high rank as a preacher, and published several sermons.

Finley, Samuel, D. D., was born in the year 1715, in the county of Armagh, Ireland. After having obtained the rudiments of an English education, his parents sent him to a school at some distance from home, in which he distinguished himself by his successful application.

In his nineteenth year he left his native country, with a view to find a home on this side of the Atlantic, and arrived in Philadelphia, September 28th, 1731. After his arrival, he resumed his studies, with reference to the ministry, put himself under the care of New Brunswick Presbytery, and having gone through the prescribed trials, was licensed to preach, August 5th, 1740. As this was a period in which the public mind was greatly awakened to religious things he traveled extensively, for some time after his licensure, and co-operated vigorously with the friends of the revival. He labored for a considerable time, and with great success, in West Jersey, in Deerfield, Greenwich, and Cape May. He was ordained, probably as an evangelist, by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, October 13th, 1742.

In August, 1743, Mr. Finley received a call from Milford, Conn., and the Presbytery sent him to Milford "with allowance that he also preach for other places thereabouts, when Providence may open a door for him." In June, 1744, he accepted a call from the congregation in Nottingham, Md. Here he instituted an academy, with a view chiefly of preparing young men for the ministry, which acquired great reputation, and was resorted to by many from distant parts of the country, some of whom attained eminence. He was chosen to the presidency of the College of New Jersey, upon the death of President Davies, in 1761, and, having accepted this appointment, his administration, which continued for five years, fully met the highest expectations that had been indulged in regard to it. By unremitting application to the duties of his office, his health was impaired, and he died, July 17th, 1766. In his last illness he was more than conqueror. His joyful experience was a most remarkable attestation of the power of the grace of God to give victory over the last enemy. In the afternoon of the day preceding his death, to a friend who said to him, "pray sir, how do you feel?" he replied, "full of triumph. I triumph through Christ. Nothing clips my wings but the thought of my dissolution being prolonged. O, that it were to-night! My very soul thirsts for eternal rest!"

Ebenezer Hazard, Esq., of Philadelphia, formerly Postmaster General of the United States, who had been a pupil of Dr. Finley, says of him:—

"He was remarkable for sweetness of temper and politeness of behavior. He was given to hospitality, charitable without ostentation, exemplary in the discharge of all relative duties, and in all things showing himself a pattern of good works. As a divine he was a Calvinist in sentiment. His sermons were not hasty productions, but filled with good sense and well digested sentiment, expressed in language pleasing to men of science, yet perfectly intelligible to the illiterate. They were calculated to inform the ignorant, to alarm the careless and secure, and to edify and comfort the faithful."

Dr. Finley's publications consisted mainly of sermons, the last of which was preached on the death of President Davies, 1761.

First Presbyterian Church of Chicago.

This Church was organized June 26th, 1833, by the Rev. Jeremiah Porter, and consisted of twenty-five members, of whom sixteen belonged to the garrison of Fort Dearborn. In the Spring of 1833 two companies of United States troops were transferred from the Falls of the St. Mary to Fort Dearborn. They had enjoyed, during the year 1832, the ministerial labors of the Rev. Mr. Porter, and many of the officers and soldiers had been hopefully converted to God. These troops, under command of Major John Fowle, and accompanied by their minister, landed at that Fort May 13th, 1833. About six weeks afterwards the First Church was organized, by adopting the Covenant and Articles of Faith of the Presbytery of Detroit. Mr. Porter continued as stated supply of the Church until his removal to Peoria, Ill., in November, 1835. During his ministry its members increased from twenty-five to about one hundred.

For two years after Mr. Porter's removal, the pulpit was supplied, partially, by the Rev. Isaac Taylor Hinton, then pastor of the Baptist church there, and by the Rev. William McLain, since of Washington City, and the Rev. J. J. Miter, subsequently of Beaver Dam, Wis. July 1st, 1837, Rev. John Blatchford, now deceased, was installed the first pastor, and in August, 1839, he was dismissed, at his own request. The Rev. Flavel Bascom commenced his labors in December, 1839; was installed November 10th, 1840, and remained pastor until December, 1849. Following Mr. Bascom, the Rev. Harvey Curtis began his ministry, August 25th, 1850, and was installed pastor on the 13th of October following. After a successful pastorate of about eight years, he was dismissed, June 8th, 1858, for the purpose of assuming the office of President of Knox College, at Galesburg, Ill., which office he held, with honor, until his death, Sept. 18th, 1862.

Dr. Curtis was succeeded by the Rev. Z. M. Humphrey, who commenced his ministry May 15th, 1859. He was installed June 7th, of the same year, and for nearly nine years he ministered to the church, ending, February 3d, 1868, a pastorate crowned with usefulness. Dr. Humphrey then removed to Philadelphia, and thence, in 1875, to Cincinnati, as Professor of Church Polity and Ecclesiastical History in Lane Seminary. He died November 13th, 1881, universally beloved. In July, 1868, a call was given to the Rev. Arthur Mitchell, who commenced his labors October 25th, and was installed November 10th following. He was dismissed August 9th, 1880, to the First Presbyterian Church of Cleveland, O., closing a nearly twelve years' pastorate, which was dissolved with much regret. Dr. Mitchell was succeeded by the Rev. John H. Barrows, D. D., of East Boston, Mass., who commenced his ministry November 6th, 1881, was installed on the 8th of December following, and still holds the important position, with very encouraging evidence of the divine blessing accompanying his faithful labors.

The first church edifice erected for the use of this church and congregation was a frame building, twenty-six feet by forty, and stood on the southwest corner of Clarke and Lake streets. It was opened for worship January 1st, 1831. In 1837 this building was removed to the southwest corner of Clark and Washington streets, and enlarged by increasing its length twofold. In 1840 it was again enlarged, by doubling its width. In the Fall of 1847 the foundation of a brick edifice was laid, sixty-five feet by one hundred. The basement rooms were opened for worship January 1st, 1849, and the whole house finished and dedicated in September following, at a cost of about $21,000. In the growth of the city, it was found that, on account of the encroachments of business, the location was not good. Besides, an increase of church sittings was needed, to supply the wants of the rapidly increasing population. Accordingly, the lot and building then occupied by the congregation was sold, in November, 1855, and a lot immediately purchased, on Wabash avenue between Van Buren and Congress streets, at a cost of $16,000, and a new church edifice, costing about $115,000, was erected thereon, for the use of the First Presbyterian Church and congregation.

The church here built was occupied from the Fall of 1856 until destroyed by the great fire of October 9th, 1871. In April, 1865, a lot was leased on Congress street, running back to and uniting with the church, on which a large and commodious brick chapel was built, at a cost of $22,000, and in which the Sunday School was held, as also the devotional and social meetings of the church. This building was also destroyed by the fire of October, 71. After the destruction of both church and chapel, and before any action had been taken toward securing a new location, the growth of the city and change of residences again called for a removal further south. Overtures were made by the City of Presbyterian Church, which had commenced the building now occupied by the First Church congregation, to unite the two churches and complete the present edifice. Owing to the large amount of building in the city for the next two years the expense was much above the estimated price, so that when completed the total cost, including the ground, was $160,000.

In addition to its important Railroad Mission, the First Church founded, and for nearly ten years carried on, Foster Mission, on the west side, with 500 scholars, which is now under the care of the Third Presbyterian Church; it also established the Sands Mission, on the north side, afterwards relinquished to the North Presbyterian Church, in 1857, and the Indiana Street School, relinquished to the Second Presbyterian Church. This church also organized, in 1858, the Archer Avenue Mission, and sustained it until 1860, when it was transferred to the care of the First Baptist Church; and from 1869 until 1878 it, in great part, sustained the Forty-first Street Presbyterian Church, now under the care of the Rev. Arthur Swazey, D. D., with a growing congregation and every prospect of a bright future. In its present prosperous condition it has a fulfillment of the Divine promise: "The liberal soul shall be made fat; and he that watereth shall be watered also himself."

First Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia.

The exact time of the organization of this church is not known, the early records having been lost. The records extant date back to 1698, the congregation worshipping in a store belonging to the Barbadoes Company, at the northwest corner of Second and Chestnut streets. The first pastor of this church was the Rev. Jedediah Andrews, who came from New England in the Autumn of 1698. Mr. Andrews was known as an independent minister, but was also denominated Presbyterian. The congregation afterwards procured a lot on Market street, at the corner of what is now Bank street, between Second and Third streets, upon which they erected a small house of worship. This structure was enlarged in 1729, when the Presbyterian form of government was adopted. The funds necessary for this improvement were partially raised in Boston, Mass. This edifice continued to be the place of worship until 1793, when it was superseded by a more spacious and elegant building, erected partly on the old site. The congregation worshipped here until their removal to their present location, at the corner of Washington Square and Seventh street, in 1821.

The pastors of this church have been as follows:—Rev. Jedediah Andrews, 1698 to 1717; the Rev. Samuel Hemphill was elected as an assistant or colleague of Mr. Andrews in 1735, but served in this capacity only a short time. In 1739 the congregation called the Rev. Robert Cross as colleague pastor with Mr. Andrews. Upon the death of Mr. Andrews, in 1747, Mr. Cross continued the pastoral office until June 23d, 1758, when he resigned. During his pastorate the Rev. Francis Alison, D. D., was employed, in 1752, as assistant to Mr. Cross, and subsequently as colleague with Dr. Ewing, until his death. Rev. John Ewing, D. D., was pastor from 1759 to September 8th, 1802. In 1801 the congregation called the Rev. John Blair Linn, D. D., as colleague, and on the death of Mr. Ewing, in 1802, he became sole pastor of the church until his death, August 30th, 1841. Rev. James Patriot Wilson, D. D., was pastor from May, 1806, to the Spring of 1830. The Rev. Albert Barnes was installed pastor, June 25th, 1830, and filled the pulpit until 1867, when he resigned and was appointed Pastor Emeritus, which position he retained until his death, in 1870. Rev. Herrick Johnson, D. D., LL. D., was pastor from 1868 to 1874, when the present incumbent, the Rev. Lawrence M. Colfelt, was installed as pastor of the congregation. Sketches of most of these gentlemen will be found in their appropriate place in this volume.

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States met in this edifice in 1863, and the first meeting of the General Assembly after the "Reunion" was held here, in May, 1870.

The location of this church is "down town," the pastors, and of the faithful German (Webber), since 1782.

The First Church gave first sign of life in applying to the Presbytery of Redstone for supplies, on the 14th of April, 1784. The Rev. Joseph Smith was appointed to preach, in August. No other notice of organization is made in the Presbyterial records. In October, 1785, the Rev. Samuel Barr, licentiate of Londonderry Presbytery, Ireland, appeared in the Presbytery of Redstone, having had his attention directed to Pittsburg as a field, by merchants who met him at the house of his father-in-law, at New Castle. There was not complete satisfaction on the part of Presbytery at first, but Mr. Barr's work began and went forward without formal installation. The Church of population for many years having steadily moved to other sections of the city, but notwithstanding the drain upon it, it is still, numerically, one of the strongest of the Denomination in Philadelphia.

Arthur Lee, a Virginian, visited Pittsburg, in 1783, and wrote thus: "It is inhabited almost entirely by Scots and Irish, who live in paltry log houses, and are as dirty as in the North of Ireland, or even Scotland. . . . There are in town four attorneys, two doctors, and not a priest of any persuasion, nor church, nor chapel, so that they are likely to perish without benefit of clergy." But Arthur Lee had no ear for the echoes of Beatty and Duffield's preaching, in 1758 and 1766, of McLure's in 1772, of McMillan's in 1775, besides that of the garrison Pitts-township (now Beulah Church) united with the First Church in the call to Mr. Barr.

Where the Church at first worshiped no scrap, even of tradition, remains to inform us. There had been a bent fixed toward a certain property, by the burial there of certain soldiers and officers, but it was not until December 4th, 1786, that a bill was introduced into the Assembly at Philadelphia, asking that, in a new laying out of things, lots should be set apart for "a church and burying ground." "For what church?" was asked. "There is but one church there," answered Hugh Braekkenridge, the representative, "all go to that." After some discussion, whether the words "religious Christian society," or "religious society," or "Presbyterian congregation," should be inserted in the bill, the last phrase, through the influence of Mr. Findley, prevailed, and the bill, having passed over to September 21st, 1787, was passed in that shape, on the 29th September of that year.

Before the Assembly had acted, and mainly through the influence of Mr. Barr, who had gone east to obtain money for building and a grant of land, the Penn heirs had deeded two and a half lots of the ground already designated, for the nominal "consideration of five shillings, as well as of the laudable inclination they have for encouraging and promoting morality, piety and religion in general, and more especially in the town of Pittsburg." This deed was executed to eleven trustees, of whom six had been officers in the Revolutionary army. On this ground the Church proceeded to erect (some think had already begun to erect) their first house of worship—a structure of "moderate dimensions and squared timber." Another lot was purchased, with foresight and private means, by Mr. Barr, and came into the hands of the trustees in 1802.

A history of the times asserts that the church was "not remarkable, early, for exemplary piety." Many of them were a gay, fashionable, worldly people, conforming to the customs and manners of the times." ("Old Redstone," page 377.) Mr. Barr's ministry closed in 1789. From June, 1789, to November, 1792, there were only supplies, Mr. Robert Findley being the principal one. From November, 1792, to October, 1793, Mr. Samuel Mahon, licentiate of Carlisle Presbytery, preached, and was called, but the Presbytery did not see its way clear to put the call in his hands. From October, 1793, to October, 1800, is almost a blank. There are no sessional records, as there are none, indeed, until 1817, and the church does not appear in Presbytery in any form, except in April, 1795, to ask supplies, and then again in June, 1799. At this time, though there were great revivals in the surrounding country, the city was as the heath of the desert. The First Church was asleep in the midst of a harvest. A song of gleam of promise, long to be deferred, fulfillment, is found in Dr. Herron's preaching in the old log church in 1799, much to the annoyance of the neighbors, which seemed to claim the neglected

The Rev. Robert Steele, from Ireland, became supply of the First Church in October, 1800. When fairly settled, in 1802, a few persons, dissatisfied with the spiritual food afforded them, petitioned for the formation of the Second Church, and the church organization, after some opposition, was granted, in 1804. In this year the First Church began and built (with some finishing work in 1805) a large house of worship, built of brick, over and around the log structure, which was itself used until the new one was almost completed, and then the venerable timbers were thrust out at the windows. There was growth by immigration at this period, but little otherwise. The tone of piety, if tradition is correct, was but little improved, while the pecuniary embarrassment of the debt caused by the new house was so severely felt that in 1807 a lottery of first and second schemes, to raise $2000, was authorized, and pressed to actual drawing. It was, however, unsuccessful, and the debt had to be subsequently otherwise provided for.

Testimony to the personal character, ability and earnestness of Mr. Steele is abundant, but the tide was too strong. At his death, March 22d, 1810, the church life seemed weak. The preaching of the Rev. Joseph Stockton, which followed, ad interim, for about one year, was refreshing and strengthening. He is said to have refused the salary voted for his services, and in other services was greatly useful in the two cities.

The Rev. Francis Herron, pastor at Rocky Spring, Franklin county, Pa., since 1800 (see his Sketch), came to visit his relative, Dr. Brown, of Washington, Pa., and preached in the First Church, by request. Great interest was excited, and such a call followed him home as brought him back again in the Fall of 1811. Existing difficulties only stirred the noble and evangelical pastor to exertions. The truth as it is in Jesus, faithfully and affectionately preached, and earnest pastoral work, wrought speedy change, with God's blessing, among the backslidden, strengthened the hands of the constant, and attracted the attention of the worldly. In three years the pecuniary difficulties were ended, and then came church enlargement, re-seating of pews, and building the session-room, in 1811. The impetus of the Sabbath-school movement had already begun to be felt. Dr. Herron and the pious Joseph Patterson formed the Sabbath-school Association of Pittsburg, in 1817. A special building for the promotion of this great interest, the first of its kind in all the region, was erected in 1826. The blessing of God continued on the church, which cared for its own and other children. The Third Presbyterian Church was formed in 1833, with full consent and approval of the First, and some of the choicest material of the First entered the enterprise. The First Church, with alternations, of course, continued to grow and prosper, until, in December, 1850, Dr. Herron felt the need of transferring the increasing burden to younger shoulders.

Dr. William M. Paxton came, early in 1851, from a two years' pastorate at Greencastle, Pa., to take charge of the First Church. (See his Sketch.) The older were edified with his ministry, the younger were attracted, the congregations rapidly increased, and the third edifice for the church was decided upon immediately after a gracious and productive revival. The building was the handsomest of its time, and has stimulated many others of like grade. During Dr. Paxton's pastorate the life of the church was deepened, its numbers largely increased, and its beneficence greatly developed. Its termination in June, 1865, was a matter of great regret, and only permitted, by acquiescence of the congregation, in action based upon considerations, mainly of health, which the pastor regarded as imperative. The interim was supplied, to the great satisfaction of the congregation, by the Rev. Dr. A. A. Hodge.

The Rev. Sylvester F. Scovel became Dr. Paxton's successor, in December, 1865, and continued in charge of the church until July, 1883, when he resigned, to accept the presidency of Wooster University. Under Dr. Scovel's ministry the church was greatly blessed. Popular as a preacher, diligent as a worker, and faithful as a pastor, his efforts were crowned with success. Precious revivals in 1867 and 1876 resulted in a large increase of the membership. The organization of the church was perfected, by the institution of its first Board of Deacons; a parsonage was purchased in 1876-79, at the cost of $18,000, and in 1880-81 a Sabbath-school room, with latest facilities for Christian work of every description, was erected, at a cost of $24,000. Dr. Scovel enjoyed, in a high degree, the confidence and affection of the large and influential congregation he so faithfully served, and, amidst their deep regrets for his separation from them, to occupy a new sphere of duty to which he feels himself called, carries with him the abiding regards of his flock, and their best wishes for his future usefulness and happiness. (See his Sketch.)

The First Church has, naturally and by reason of zeal, also been a place of beginnings, and wide influences have started thence, the extent of which is measureless. It was the place of the first meeting of the Synod of Pittsburg, in 1802. The "Moral Association," about 1812, was formed there, for the city. The Sabbath School Association began there, in 1817. The first Temperance meetings were held there. The Western University was there inaugurated, in 1819. The Western Missionary Society was formed there, in 1802, by the Synod, and the Western Foreign Missionary Society had its beginnings there, in 1831, in the councils of the little Session-room, between Swift and Herron, and like-minded ones; the first to do faithful work for our own land for twenty-seven years and be merged into the Assembly's Board of Missions, with the full consent of its originators, and the second to present and represent the great principles of Church action in the conversion of the world, until it became triumphant in 1837, and became, "as it was always intended it should become" (said Dr. Swift), "the Board of Foreign Missions of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church." Here the first missionaries were commissioned, and Pinney has lived to speak from the same pulpit from which, fifty years ago, he was sent to Africa. The Western Theological Seminary had its beginnings here, likewise (1825-7), and its first classes recited here. The General Assembly met in the First Church at its first venture west of the mountains, in 1835; again met there in 1836, then in 1849, then in 1865; then gave it, with the Third Church, the hallowed associations of re-union, with its communion, in 1869, and met there again—the first meeting in the new series of Assemblies which pay their own expenses, and thus may continue popular rather than select. And it was made the place of the first effective gathering of the precious memories of Western Presbyterianism by the Memorial Convention of 1875, with its admirable result and volume.

Nor must it be forgotten that there have been held in the First Church a series of four distinctively revival conventions, embracing the membership of several western Synods, all of them productive of much edification, and two of them, to wit, 1812 and 1857, followed by great outpourings of the Spirit. Such are the known connections of the latter, that some have traced directly to its influence the presumed perpetual convention of prayer for the "outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon all flesh," called "The Week of Prayer," the Sabbath of the intercessory year.

It may only be added that the First Church has been characterized by its attachment to and interest in, the city with which it has grown up. Starting the very year the city plan was adopted, it has ever been an integral part of its life. Its part in city charities and helpful institutions is written every where in their history. The ground at the Western Pennsylvania Hospital, and thirty-five years' Presidency of the Board of Managers of the principal orphan asylum, attest the interest of one faithful woman; and they are not the only witnesses she has left; nor is she the only benefactor of the city. Many of the noblest citizens have been identified with its interests, temporal or spiritual, or both. Judge Addison, John Wilkins, James Ross, the Brackenridges, the Craigs, James O'Hara, Harmar Deiny, John Thaw, William Robinson, the Laughlins, Michael Allen, William Plummer, and others. There was a day when it was said "There are but two things in Pittsburg, the devil and Dr. Herron, and the Doctor seems to be getting the advantage." When he died, business houses were closed, and even the Courts adjourned in his honor. And though he died, the church he taught lives still in the city, and for the city, and will continue a blessing to it, beyond doubt, to the latest syllable of recorded time.

Fish, Rev. Peter, was descended from an old family of Long Island. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, in 1779, supplied the Presbyterian Church at Newtown, Long Island, from October 20th, 1785, until November, 1788, when he was installed pastor at Connecticut Farms, N. J., where he remained for ten years, and then removed to Holland Patent, N. Y., and labored there for a time. Being in poor health he purchased a place in Newtown, and removed there in the Spring of 1807. He died, November 12th, 1810.

Fisher, Daniel Webster, D. D., was born at Arch Spring, Huntingdon county, Pa., January 17th, 1838. His academical studies were pursued at Milwood and Airy View, Pa. His college course was taken at Jefferson College, Pennsylvania, where he graduated in 1857. He immediately entered the Theological Seminary at Allegheny, Pa., completing his professional studies in 1860. In April, 1859, he was licensed by the Presbytery of Huntingdon, and in April, 1860, he was ordained by the same body. He began his ministry with the Thalia Street Presbyterian Church, New Orleans, La., in 1860. In 1861 he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Wheeling, W. Va., continuing with them until 1870, when he took charge of the Second Presbyterian Church of Madison, Ind. In 1879 he was called to the Presidency of Hanover College, which position he still holds.

Dr. Fisher was popular, both as pastor and preacher. His preaching is always solid and instructive. His administration of the College has by every successful. Under his judicious management the Institution has recovered from the financial embarrassments in which he found it at the commencement of his presidency, and has attained an efficiency that it has never known before. His administration is kind, yet just and firm. His teaching is clear, thorough and practical. His most marked trait is his intense mildness, hating shame and pretense of every kind. He is a plain, solid, honest man, without pretension, and without affectation of any kind.

Fisher, Hon. John, was born in Londonderry, N. H., March 13th, 1806. He came to the Rev.

N. Y., and subsequently resided in Lagrange, Warsaw, Hamilton, Canada, and Batavia, N. Y. Whilst he was in Hamilton he was elected first to the Council and afterwards to the Mayoralty of that thriving city. In 1855 he removed from Hamilton to Batavia, where he was among the foremost in suggesting and helping to establish and nourish church, educational and other enterprises calculated to promote the best interests of the village. His influence did much to secure the location of the New York State Institution for Blind there. In 1868 he was elected by his district a member of Congress, and by his unbending honesty and truthfulness and his integrity to his convictions, he speedily gained the respect and esteem of his fellow members. He was an honest, faithful, conscientious representative. Mr. Fisher was a Trustee of Auburn Theological Seminary, 1863-70. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church, a sympathetic, benevolent, consistent Christian man, loved and honored by most of the community in which he lived, and respected by all. He died at Batavia, March 28th, 1882.

Fisher, Prof. M. M., D. D., LL. D., was born in Parke county, Indiana, October, 1831. He graduated at Waveland Presbyterian Academy in 1853, and the same year entered Hanover College, where he received the degree of A. B. in 1855. Soon after completing his literary course Dr. Fisher accepted a Professorship in Westminster College, at Fulton, Mo. In 1856 he was made Professor of the Ancient Languages. In 1857 he was assigned to the Chair of Latin Language and Literature, a chair which he occupied till the Fall of 1870. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Missouri, in 1858, having completed his theological course under the Rev. Dr. S. S. Laws. He was ordained by the same Presbytery in 1860. In connection with his duties as College Professor, he was, for the most of his time, in charge, in whole or in part, of the Presbyterian Church at Fulton, one of the largest in the Synod.

In 1870 Dr. Fisher resigned his position in the Synodical College, after a period of service extending through fifteen years, and became pastor of the Presbyterian Church, in Independence, Mo. While there he was President of Independence Female College, a position to which he was called soon after accepting the pastorate of the Church. When the Rev. N. L. Rice, D. D., resigned the Presidency of Westminster College, in 1871, Prof. Fisher was recalled to the Chair of Latin, and also to the Chairmanship of the Faculty, a position which he had held for years previous to his resignation in 1870. While there was a Theological Department in connection with the College, Dr. Fisher was in charge of the Semitic languages.

In the Fall of 1877, after having served nineteen years in Westminster College, Dr. Fisher was called to the Chair of Latin in the State University, at Columbia, a position which he accepted and still holds. By his scholarship and literary labors he has acquired an international reputation. His published works are regarded as authority in both England and America. He is now engaged in a series of books which, it is hoped, will soon be published. The New England Journal of Education, Boston, speaks of Dr. Fisher as "one of the ablest of living teachers." In the estimation of scholars, his work, entitled "The Three Pronunciations of Latin," contains the ablest defence of the English system that has ever appeared.

Fisher, Samuel Ware, D. D., LL. D., was born in Morristown, N. J., April 5th, 1811. He graduated at Yale College in 1835; then spent a year in Middletown, Conn.; and after that studied divinity at Princeton for two years, and at Union Seminary, New York, for one year. He held a high rank, both as a collegian and a seminarist. In 1839 he was called to West Bloomfield, N. J., now Montclair, as the first pastor there, and remained three and a half years, manifesting, as the Session testify, "the fervent zeal and the unremitting labor which have ever made his life so full of usefulness and honor." In 1843 Dr. Fisher removed to Albany, and was installed over the Fourth Church, October 13th, in which his labors were largely blessed. In 1846 he accepted a call to the Second Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati, and during his eleven years' pastorate in that city, 178 were added to the church on examination, and 218 by letter, while its benevolent activity was greatly quickened.

In 1858 Dr. Fisher accepted the presidency of Hamilton College. His presidency was notable, and in certain directions very successful. His gifts did not qualify him for permanency in a college, and his tastes did not affect it, and finishing the work given him to do there, he gladly returned to the pastorate, and November 15th, 1867, resumed it, in the Westminster Church, Utica. This church greatly prospered under his ministry, which continued until 1871, impaired health compelling him at that time to resign the charge. He died at College Hill, O., January 18th, 1874. Dr. Fisher's traits were pronounced. He was honorably ambitious and aspiring, and enjoyed authority as well as eminence. His convictions were positive, unyielding and openly expressed. Principle preponderated with him over hurry and force. Conscience was his master faculty, and, incapable of trickery, he could not perpetrate wrong. His heart was aglow with zeal for the welfare of his race. His style of composition was admirably adapted to popular discourse—free, affluent and intense. His matter was not weighted with learning, and yet considering its purpose, sufficiently supplied with it. He spoke in words that burned, and the themes in which he most delighted were those that most partook of the gospel. Many of Dr. Fisher's sermons and addresses were put to the press. In 1852 he published a volume entitled "The Three Great Temptations," and in 1860, a volume of "Occasional Sermons and Addresses." A course of sermons at Utica, on the "Life of Christ," appeared in print after his decease.

Fisk, Ezra, D. D., was born in Shelburne, Mass., January 10th, 1785. He graduated at Williams College, in 1809, studied theology under the direction of Dr. Packard, and was licensed to preach by the Franklin Association, April 19th, 1810. After preaching some months, as a licentiate, he was ordained as an evangelist, and proceeded to Georgia, where he labored for two years in districts comparatively destitute of the preaching of the gospel. In the Autumn of 1812 he removed to Philadelphia, where he acted for some months as a city missionary. In August, 1813, he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Goshen, N. Y., where he labored faithfully about twenty years. In 1832 he passed the Winter in Georgia, for the benefit of his health. In his absence he received the appointment of Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Domestic Missions, but from a conviction that to fulfill its duties properly would require more labor than he was able to endure, he declined the appointment.

In May, 1833, Dr. Fisk was elected to the Professorship of Ecclesiastical History and Church Government in the Western Theological Seminary, and accepted the Chair. On his way to enter upon his duties he was taken sick in Philadelphia, and died, on December 5th. His remains were removed, by request of his former charge, and deposited amid the ashes of his beloved people at Goshen. In 1830 Dr. Fisk presided as Moderator of the General Assembly. His published works consist of an Oration, delivered at Williams College in 1825; a lecture on the Inability of Sinners; his Farewell Sermon on leaving Goshen; a series of articles on Mental Science, in the Christian Advocate, and several valuable articles in the Biblical Repository.

Fitzgerald, James H., was born in Cumberland county, Va. Liberally educated, and inheriting a competent estate, he was enabled to fill up the measure of duty as a private citizen, and to devote himself to labors for the welfare of his fellow-men. Early in life he was called out from his retirement to represent the county in the Legislature of the State. The sphere of politics, however, was not the one in which he most delighted to serve his generation, and do good to the human race. Becoming connected by marriage with a family whose residence was at the Falls of the Kappahannock, in the neighborhood of Fredericksburg, he was led to make his home in that healthy and beautiful situation. As an elder in the Church, Trustee of Hampden-Sidney College, Director of Union Theological Seminary, President of the Central Board of Foreign Missions and a helper in every good word and work, he expended his strength and the resources of an ample income.

The kindness of Mr. Fitzgerald's disposition was equaled by the firmness of his moral principles. Instead of seeking prominence in any cause or act in which he was associated with others, he seemed to make every one a leader, rather than himself. Naturally gentle, he was truly brave; retiring and unassuming, he was strictly honorable. In the judicatories of the Church, which he very generally attended as representative, he was always a welcome member, a model of propriety in action, coolness of judgment, and correctness in decision. Through him the influence of the Church in Fredericksburg was commanding, and in him the Church in Warrenton had a firm friend and generous helper. During a visit to Europe, he died, in Paris, May 6th, 1852, and his remains were deposited in the private burial ground at the Falls, June 2d. The Rev. G. W. McPhail, in a sermon preached on the occasion, and subsequently published, characterized the departed elder as a model of the Christian gentleman.

Fithian, Rev. Philip Vicars, was born in Cumberland county, N. J. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, in 1775. For some time he labored as a missionary under the direction of the Presbytery, and then entered the army as a Chaplain. At the Battle of White Plains he fought in the ranks. He died in 1776, from disease contracted in camp.

Fitzhugh, Edward H., was born in the county of Caroline, in the State of Virginia, in 1816. He united with the Presbyterian Church of Wheeling, under the ministry of Rev. Henry R. Weid, D.D., in 1818. He was ordained an elder in that church in 1850, and continued his connection with that church, and remained a member of its Session until 1861, when he removed to Richmond, Virginia. In 1862 he united with the First Presbyterian Church of Richmond, under the ministry of Rev. Thomas V. Moore, D.D. In 1867 he was elected and installed an elder in that church, of which he still remains a member. In 1867 he was elected, by the General Assembly of the Southern Presbyterian Church, a member of the "Assembly's Executive Committees of Publication and Education." By continued re-elections he remained a member of both committees while they were met, and he still is a member of the Committee of Publication.

John Fitzhugh is a Lawyer, and practiced his profession many years in Wheeling, W. Va., and for some years in Richmond, Va. In 1850 he was elected by the Legislature of that State, Judge of the Circuit Court of the county of Richmond. He held that position until 1854, when he retired on office expired, and he returned to the Bar. He was a member of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, which met at New Orleans in 1857, representing in part, the Presbytery of Washington, and in 1858 he was a member of the General Assembly, which met at Baltimore, representing the Presbytery of Fort Henry.

Flagler, Thomas (Thomas), son of Abraham and Sarah Thom Flagler, was born at Pleasant Valley, Steuben county, N. Y., October 12th, 1811. At the early age of eighteen he was the successful editor and proprietor, as well as publisher, of the Chattanooga Republican, at Oxford, N. Y. He removed, in 1836, to Lockport, Niagara county, N. Y., which has since been his residence. In 1840 he was ordained a ruling elder of the First Presbyterian Church of Lockport, which position he has faithfully maintained ever since. From 1838 to 1843 he was the editor and publisher of the Niagara Courier, at Lockport. He then engaged in the hardware business for twenty-seven years. He is now President of the Holly Manufacturing Company, and of the Niagara County National Bank. He represented his district in the State Legislature in 1842, 1843, and 1860, was a member of the Thirty-third and Thirty-fourth Congress, and was also a member of the Constitutional Convention of the State of New York in 1868. Mr. Flagler's practical judgment, promptness of action, rectitude and honesty have given him great influence. He has honored all the positions of Church and State to which he has been called. He is universally respected and beloved by the community in which he lives.

Flinn, Andrew, D. D., was born in the State of Maryland, in 1773. When he was little more than a year old his parents migrated, with their family, to Mecklenburg county, N. C. After his preliminary education, he entered the University of North Carolina, where he acquitted himself well, both as a scholar and a Christian, and received, with considerable marks of distinction, the degree of Bachelor of Arts, in 1799. Having studied theology, he was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Orange, in the year 1800. In June, 1803, he was ordained and installed pastor of the Church at Fayetteville, N. C. Here he was indefatigable in the discharge of his duties as a pastor, and was obliged, besides, to teach a school, in order to make out a competent support. But in the latter part of the year 1805 his united labors as pastor and teacher became so oppressive, that he felt himself obliged to resign his charge. He now removed to Camden, S. C., where he was instrumental in organizing and building up a very respectable Presbyterian congregation. After laboring there for a short time, he went to Williamsburg District, and preached for a while to the churches of Beaufort and Indiantown.

On the 15th of April, 1811, Dr. Flinn was installed pastor of the Scotch Presbyterian Church of Charleston. This was the theatre of his most important labors, and here, especially, he gained his wide and brilliant reputation. His soon came to be known extensively in the Church, and in the North as well as the South, as one of the most impressive and attractive preachers of his day. His labors in Charleston were attended with a manifest blessing, and both his church and congregation had a rapid and healthful growth. He continued in this connection till the close of his life, which occurred February 21th, 1820. In 1812 Dr. Flinn was Moderator of the General Assembly. As a preacher, he was distinguished by earnestness, solemnity and pathos. The all-absorbing object of his ministry was to awaken the consciences of men and lead them to the Saviour. He was faithful and exemplary in his attendance upon the judicatories of the Church. Whether he was found in the General Assembly or in the meetings of Synods and Presbyteries, his personal influence, judicious counsels and glowing zeal were always highly appreciated.

Folsom, George Palmer, D. D., is a native of New York. He was born in Buffalo, December 16th, 1826, and graduated from Williams College in 1847. He was a teacher at South Bend, 1847-8, and in business, 1848-9. He was ordained by Genesee Presbytery, 1853; pastor at Attica, N. Y., 1852-9, and at Genesee, 1859-68; District Secretary of the Board of Church Erection, at Chicago, Ill., 1869-71; settled at Baraboo, Wis., 1872-8; Chicago, Ill., 1879-80, and from 1880 has been pastor at Iowa City, Ia. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by Williams College, in 1881. Dr. Folsom is a faithful and successful preacher. He has published sermons and historical addresses.

Fontaine, Thomas Littleton. The history of the Presbyterian Church in this country is closely linked with the days of persecution and the tyranny of governments in other lands. Liberty of conscience and the right to worship God in the exercise of it, when oppressed elsewhere, found an asylum here. Driven by the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, the founder of a distinguished French family took refuge on American soil. From this family of Huguenots was descended Thomas Littleton Fontaine, who was born in Maryland, 1806. Along the line of his family, both in this country and France, are found many persons distinguished for piety and talents, and many ministers of the gospel. He bore the family marks. He gloried in the Cross of Christ with a fervor and fearless zeal that seemed to worldly minds an infatuation. The spirit he was of was that which was shown in the martyrs.

In early manhood he publicly acknowledged the Saviour, and united with the First Presbyterian Church of St. Louis, of which Dr. W. S. Potts was then pastor. He and his wife were among the original members of the Second Church, formed under the pastorate of Dr. Potts. He was resident within the bounds of these churches for about fourteen years. He afterwards removed to New Madrid, where he spent most of his remaining life.

Mr. Fontaine valued opportunities for doing good as few men value them, and with ceaseless ardor did he follow the injunction, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." To him was due the organization of the first Sabbath School in New Madrid, and the establishment of the Presbyterian Church there. During a short residence in Batesville, Arkansas, he secured the organization of a Presbyterian Church in that place, and the erection of a house of worship, in which he was a ruling elder. New Madrid was the principal scene of his labors. When the church was organized there, in 1856, he was made an elder in it, and he was for a number of years its only ruling elder. There, surrounded by the artfulness and corruption of Romanism and the vices of a mammon-serving world, his consecration to the service of Christ marked him as a peculiar man. He was by nothing daunted. He yearned for souls, with what seemed an irresistible passion, hoping and believing to the end.

Foote, Charles Henry, D. D., son of Alvan and Ann (Palmer) Foote, was born at Lenox, Mass., June 17th, 1825; graduated at Williams College, in 1849; taught one year at the Academy, in Mendon, N. Y.; studied law one year; graduated at Princeton Seminary, in 1854, and was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery, February 8th, 1854. He was pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, in New Brunswick, N. J., from May 23d, 1854, until October 15th, 1857; of Jerseyville Church, Ill., from April 15th, 1860, until April 16th, 1868; of the Church at Cairo, Ill., from May 10th, 1868, until September 20th, 1871; of the North Church of St. Louis, Mo., from November 25th, 1871, until October 20th, 1875, and of the Walnut Street Church at Evansville, Ind., from April 23d, 1876, until September 27th, 1878. His last charge was at Ionia, Mich., where he was installed October 19th, 1879. He died June 28th, 1880. In all his settlements Dr. Foote's labors were eminently successful in winning souls, and the additions to all his churches, during his pastorates, were unusually large. He was a scholar of much more than usual culture. As a preacher he took a high rank. His social qualities and gifts were eminent.

Foote, William Henry, D. D., was born in Colchester, Connecticut, December 20th, 1794. He entered Yale College, in September, 1811; in the Spring of 1816 went to Virginia as Tutor in a private family, at Falmouth; returned to college in September, and received his degree of A. B., September 11th, 1816. Afterwards he resumed his duties as Tutor, in connection with the duties of which position he began to hold religious meetings in destitute neighborhoods, thus early developing a spirit which never ceased but with his life. In October, 1817, he placed himself under the care of the Presbytery of Winchester as a candidate for the gospel ministry. In July, 1818, he left Falmouth and became an assistant in the school of the Rev. Dr. Hill, in Winchester. In October, 1818, he went to the Theological Seminary at Princeton, but having injured his health by the excessive study incident to an effort to keep up with two classes he left the Institution in the Fall of 1819. He was licensed to preach the gospel, October 30th, of that year. After his licensure he performed missiatory labor for some time, at the Ridge, and the Northern Neck. He began preaching, October 29th, in a circuit embracing Shenandoah county, and parts of Frederick and Hampshire. After preaching as a missionary at other places, in June, 1822, he organized and afterwards became pastor of the Church of Woodstock, and also the previously existing Church of Stoverstown (now Strasburg). While residing in Woodstock he established and conducted an academy.

In September, 1824, Dr. Foote was installed pastor of the congregations of Mount Bethel, Springfield and Romney, residing at Romney, where he established, and conducted with great success, a Male and Female Academy. His first pastoral connection with Romney extended to 1838, during which period his abundant labors there and throughout the country were greatly blessed. About the beginning of 1838 he was Agent of the "Central Board of Foreign Missions," and labored with great earnestness and success in the bounds of the Synods of Virginia and North Carolina. While engaged in this work he became deeply interested in the early history of the Presbyterian Church and ministry, and the fruits of his investigations are seen in his admirable "Sketches." In May, 1845, he returned to his old charge, in Romney and the Academy, and there continued until 1861, after which he was Agent for Hampden-Sidney College, then returned once more to Romney and Springfield, to labor till the close of his life, which occurred November 22d, 1869.

Dr. Foote was in many respects a marked man, of clear and strong convictions, and indomitable energy in carrying them into action. As a missionary and pastor, he was abundant in labors, never deterred by difficulties or dangers from the discharge of duty. As a member of different ecclesiastical bodies, he was faithful and judicious. In debate he was vigorous and logical. As a scholar, he was accurate and well informed; and as a writer, easy, copious and attractive. In his home and moments of relaxation he was affectionate and sympathetic, preserving greenness of heart even down to old age.

Ford, John Richardson, was born in Danville, Ky., May 8th, 1801. At about the age of sixteen he moved to Natchez, Miss., where he resided for a number of years. He joined the Church at Danville, Ky., in 1831, and was made an elder of the same in 1839, and after moving to Missouri he was chosen to the same office in the Presbyterian Church of Lexington, Mo. In 1838 he moved with his family to Pettis county, Mo., and afterwards, in 1862, to Laclede county, near Lexington, Mo., where he spent the rest of his days.

"Oldmell" Ford, as he was commonly called, was a man of fine appearance, kind, hospitable and generous, of strong convictions, sincere in the belief and frank in the expression of them. His piety was unostentatious, but genuine. He loved the Word and people of God, and he was not "without chastisement," especially in his later life, but tribulation wrought in him patience, experience, hope and love. He lived to a good old age—more than fourscore—revered by his children, loved by his friends and respected by all.

Ford, Rev. Joshua Edwards, the son of George W. and Mary (Edwards) Ford, was born in Ogdensburg, N. Y., August 3d, 1825. He graduated at Williams College, Mass., in 1844; studied Divinity in the Union Theological Seminary, New York City, and was licensed and ordained by the New York Fourth Presbytery. In 1847, under the direction of the A. B. C. F. M., he sailed as a missionary to Syria, accompanied by his wife, having married Miss Mary Perry, of Williamstown, Mass. His first station was Aleppo, Northern Syria, a field of peculiar trials, owing to the prejudices of the people against the truth and the multitude of his labors. Besides being missionary for that city, he was forwarding agent, postmaster, and banker for several other stations further in the interior, and his duties were very onerous. In answer to an urgent call he left his family in Aleppo, and spent six months in Mosul, preaching the gospel. When the Central Turkey Mission was formed, including Aleppo within the field, Mr. Ford was transferred to Beirut, where he labored most zealously for four years. From thence he removed to Sidon, where he had to meet the responsibilities of a wide field, while much of the time his associates were laid aside by sickness. By the invitation of the Turkish Missions Aid Society he visited England in 1861, and spent several months in presenting most ably the claims of Syria upon the sympathies of the Church of Christ.

In the Summer of 1865 Mr. Ford returned on a visit to the United States, by the advice of physicians, for the health of his family. He expected speedily to return to his field of labor, but, after pleading the cause of missions in his native country with earnestness and zeal, on April 3d, 1866, he slept the sleep of death. Mr. Ford was eminently unselfish, wholly devoted to his work, and was willing to be counted anything or nothing that Christ might be exalted. He was emphatically a man of prayer, and one who prayed in faith, expecting an answer. He had a power over other Christians associated with him, stimulating them to greater prayerfulness and labor, though seemingly himself unconscious of it. He was one in whom the grace of God abounded and was active; he loved God and walked with Him.

Foreign Missions, Board of. The first or General Presbytery established in the United States was organized as an Evangelistic Society. Its first foreign missionary work began among the heathen aborigines of this country, in 1741, and in 1751 a standing rule was adopted by the General Synod, in view of the "exigencies of the great affair of propagating the gospel among the heathen," an annual collection be taken in each church. Other movements, in different portions of the Church, were instituted at various times, and distinct societies formed for labor among the Indians. This feeling for direct missionary effort increased, and in 1817 the General Assembly recommended measures which resulted in the establishment of the United Foreign Missionary Society, which did a good work, for years, among the Indians. In 1826 it was amalgamated with the American Board.

Whilst many in our Church sympathized with the American Board, and co-operated with it, others stood aloof, holding to the doctrine that the Church, in her corporate capacity, was entrusted with the duty of evangelizing the world. This led to the formation, in Pittsburg, of the Western Foreign Missionary Society, in October, 1831, which soon drew around it those who held to the principle named, and who, under the guiding hand of Rev. E. P. Swift, the first Secretary, commenced operations in different countries. The first report of this Society was made in May, 1833, and showed receipts to the amount of $6,431.90; with missionaries appointed to Western Africa, India, and North American Indians. In 1837 the Board of Foreign Missions was organized by the General Assembly, and to it all the missions and funds of the Western Foreign Missionary Society were transferred. In that year the receipts were $22,832.54, and its missions were as already enumerated.

As soon as the Board was created it drew to it friends who had not co-operated with the Western Society, so that the gain in receipts the first year (1838) was 100 per cent. over those of 1837. The working force in the field, reported for this same period, was 15 missionaries, 6 laymen, and 16 females. No native laborer is mentioned. Two missionaries were sent out in December, 1837, to the Chinese in the Eastern Archipelago. This mission was established at Singapore, and continued until the opening of China to missionary effort, in 1843, when it was transferred, first to Macao, and then, when reinforcements arrived, to Canton, Amoy and Ningpo. This was the fourth important mission of the Board. The following were established, in succession, until the reunion in 1870: Siam, 1840, and reoccupied in 1846; Corisco, 1849; Chinese in California, 1851; Bogota, 1856; Brazil, 1859; Japan, 1859; Laos, 1867.

The total receipts to the Western Foreign Missionary Society, till May, 1837, were $92,361. The growth for the next ten years was steady, and the receipts from the living membership of the Church and from legacies were $627,438. In the next decade, from 1848 to 1857, $1,193,291; from 1858 to 1867, $1,858,061. The growth in this decade is remarkable, as in this period the whole Southern Presbyterian Church, with a large portion of the border churches in Kentucky and Missouri, ceased to contribute through the Board. The contributions of the churches for the next three years, or until the reunion of the Old and

New School branches, were, including $41,692 raised for the debt by a few friends, in 1870, $877,682, so that the new Board commenced its work without a balance against it; adding these sums together, and the total raised by one branch of the Church, through its own Board, was $1,511,873. The number of missionaries sent to its different missions in this same period were about 206 ministers, 110 unmarried ladies and 62 laymen. These laymen were largely employed among the Indians. As most of the missionaries are married, the number of women in connection with the Board is larger than that of the men. From 1871 to 1883 the total receipts from the sources named have been $6,558,783, or a little over half a million per annum ($504,521). The average number of communicants for this period has been 537,335. So that the members of our Church have not reached, including legacies, the sum of one dollar per annum to this cause.

At the reunion, the following missions and missionaries were received: Kohlapur, 1870, one missionary and his wife, 20 communicants and 127 scholars, one station. From the American Board, Syria Mission (1870), 8 missionaries, 1 unmarried lady, 4 stations, 2 native preachers, 291 communicants and 1674 scholars. Gaboon Mission (1870), 2 missionaries, 1 station and 10 communicants, no report of the school. Seneca Mission (1870), 3 missionaries, 3 stations and 216 communicants. Persia Mission (1871), 4 missionaries, 1 physician, 1 unmarried lady, 1 station, 700 communicants and 900 scholars. Dakota Mission (1871), 2 missionaries, 1 teacher, 1 ordained native minister, 2 stations, 164 communicants and 151 scholars. In addition to these, two missionaries of Peking were transferred to the Board in 1870, making a total, including Kohlapur, of 6 missions, 22 ordained missionaries, 1 physician, 2 unmarried ladies, 1404 communicants and 2909 scholars, as far as reported. The number of native laborers is incomplete. The following missions have been established since 1870 among the Indians: Nez Percés, Chippewas, Winnelagoes, Iowas, Saes and Choctaws; Mexico, 1872; Chili (1873), transferred from Foreign Christian Union; Guatemala, 1882.

The following comparison will show the rapid development of the work, from the reunion to the present time, November 1st, 1883:—

	Missionaries.	Physicians.	Unmarried Ladies.	Ordained Native Laymen.	Educators (Natives).	Communicants.	Scholars.
1871.....	111	5	28	18	23	3,512	19,954
1883.....	106	16	130	92	143	18,656	21,253

The receipts in 1872, when the two branches were thoroughly consolidated, were $151,276; and in 1883, $655,588.

* A key-note of the year's work is given in the Report of the Board of Missions, New York, 1883. These receipts represent the amount received during the regular receipts of the Board.

About the time of the reunion there was an awakening among the women of the Church, in foreign missions, and as a result of this several Women's Societies have been organized, that have been in thorough sympathy with and heartily loyal to the Board in all their aims and endeavors. The table of receipts by the Board, on the preceding page, will show what they have done since 1870. The first four years have been merged in one column, for want of space:—

There has been a steady increase in the gifts of the living membership of the Church, from the formation of the Board to the present time, but whether the increase of the receipts has kept pace with the augmented wealth of the Church is a question. The following facts are of interest. Beginning with 1840, when the minutes of the O. S. branch were pruned and represented its own constituency, we have annually, from the living membership of the Church, excluding legacies, the following average for each decade:—

1840 to 50.....	40	cents per member.
1860 to 70.....	68½	" " "

Beginning with the year 1872, when the contributions of the N. S. branch were given in bulk, for the first time, to the Board, and taking the annual average per member during the next decade, or to 1881, and the sum is eighty cents, while for the last two years, the average per annum is eighty-three cents for each communicant. Most of the legacies left to the Board were the outcome of previous training and of interest in the cause, so that they properly represent, with the specific donations from the living membership, the amount of sympathy with the work.

The system of agencies was maintained by the Board till 1853, when it was virtually abandoned. From 1840 to 1853 inclusive, the average from each communicant was forty-two and one-fourth cents per annum, while for the next sixteen years, or down to reunion, the average for each year was sixty-one and one-half cents per member.

From the organization of the Board to 1870 it consisted of one hundred and twenty members—sixty ministers and sixty laymen. These met annually, at least, for the consideration and superintendence of matters relating to the work at home and abroad. As these members were scattered through all portions of the Church, it was not easy to get a strong representation at the annual meeting. An Executive Committee was elected every year by the Board, to whom was entrusted the care and control of missionary operations. In 1870 it was decided by the reunited Church to do away with a large Board, and constitute a small Board of fifteen members, directly amenable to the Assembly, thus superseding the old Executive Committee. The Board is simply a committee of the General Assembly.

The Board was eminently favored in its first Secretary. In 1836 Hon. Walter Lowrie resigned his office as Secretary of the United States Senate, and accepted the Secretaryship of the Western Foreign Missionary Society. When it was transferred to the newly organized Board, the following year, he was re-elected to fill the same office, and continued to discharge its onerous and trying duties till a few months prior to his death, in 1868. His varied attainments and great executive force were all consecrated to the cause. He had, during his connection with the Board, many wise and able counsellors, both in the ministry and laity; and the Church and the cause owe much to this class of workers, who not only give their means, but their valuable time and counsel, to help forward the work.

The present Executive Officers are, Rev. John C. Lowrie, D.D., 1838; Rev. D. Irving, D.D., 1865; Rev. Frank F. Ellinwood, D.D., 1871; Wm. Rankin, Esq., Treasurer, 1850.

Foreman, Rev. John Preston, son of William and Susan (Parker) Foreman, was born in Ralls county, Mo., December 18th, 1840. He graduated from Westminster College, Mo., in 1861; entered Princeton Seminary in 1861, and having completed the full course, was regularly graduated in 1864; was licensed by the Presbytery of Palmyra, Mo., May 13th, 1863; and was ordained as an evangelist by the same Presbytery, August 27th, 1864. All his ministerial life was spent in Missouri. He was stated supply at Lick Creek, 1864-65; at Big Creek, 1865-68; at Ashley, 1868-69; at Glasgow, 1869-72; at Liberty, 1872-74. During the year 1875 he was compelled to suspend his ministerial work, on account of illness, during which he was a great sufferer from acute physical pain. After severe surgical treatment he regained his health, and resumed the active duties of the ministry at Plattsburgh, in 1876, where he labored with great efficiency and acceptance until disease compelled him to cease, in March, 1882. He died in Ralls County, Mo., at the residence of his sister, Mrs. McElroy, June 10th, 1882, in his forty-second year. He was an earnest Christian, an able, acceptable preacher, a good man, universally respected and beloved.

Foreman, Rev. Stephen, son of Anthony and Natce (Elizabeth), a full-blooded Cherokee woman, was born at Oo-you-gilogie (near Rome), Ga., October 22d, 1807, and was taught first at a mission school among his own people, and afterwards one year and a half by Prof. H. P. Goodrich, at Union Seminary, Prince Edward, Va.; first united, on profession, with the Presbyterian Church at Candy's Creek, Ga., in his eighteenth year; was never connected with any college; entered Princeton Seminary in the Fall of 1831, and spent there one year; then two years, 1832-34, in the theological department of Marysville College, Tenn.; was licensed by Union Presbytery, Tenn., September 25th, 1833, and ordained an evangelist by the same Presbytery, at Madisonville, Tenn., September 23d, 1835. He labored as stated supply at Candy's Creek Church, Cherokee Nation, Ga., 1834-38, until his nation was compelled to remove to Arkansas; then as an evangelist among them, 1834-61, preaching at Dwight Mission Station, Honey Creek, Fairfield Mission Station, and many other points, and was in part supported by the A. B. C. F. M. During the civil war, 1861-65, he resided and preached as a missionary in Texas; then returned to his former home at Park Hill, Cherokee Nation, where he resided for the remainder of his life, preaching and laboring among his people, until compelled by bodily infirmities to desist, a short time before his death. In addition to his constant and zealous missionary labors, Mr. Foreman rendered valuable services to the Cherokee people in other ways, and, except that of principal chief, filled, at one time or another, almost every office in their power to give. In the last years of his ministry he built a church at Park Hill, out of his own funds, and preached in it. He died at Park Hill, Cherokee Nation, Indian Territory, of paralysis, December 8th, 1881, in the seventy-fifth year of his age, strong in the faith of the Gospel.

Fort Wayne (Indiana) First Presbyterian Church. The distinction of having first preached to the actual settlers of Fort Wayne, according to the distinctive faith and usages of the Presbyterian Church, and under ecclesiastical appointment, is due to the Rev. John Ross, a native of Ireland, familiarly and reverently known throughout the two Synods of Indiana, as "Father Ross." This venerable servant of God afterwards died in Tipton county, Indiana, at the age of ninety-three.

In December, 1822, Mr. Ross, then pastor of a church in the New Jersey settlement, on the west side of the Big Miami, opposite the town of Franklin, visited this post, under appointment of the General Assembly, to labor for three months as a missionary among the destitutions of this frontier region. The settlement here comprised about one hundred and fifty or two hundred souls, including French and half-breed families, mainly engaged in the Indian trade. The nearest white settlement was at Shame's Prairie, forty miles southeast, and except as the trace was dotted with an occasional settler, a day's journey, apart all northwest of Piqua, Ohio, was a wilderness. The missionary took passage in a light two-horse wagon, with Matthew Griggs, afterwards with his family, members of the Fort Wayne Church, then of Lebanon, Ohio, and visiting Fort Wayne on a trading expedition, with furs and dried fruit.

Father Ross, in a letter dated November 26th, 1859, describes the peril and exposure of the first missionary journey, how the first night's encampment in the woods, a few miles north of Dayton, was made memorable by the howling of wolves on every side, how the snow storm afterwards met them in the wilderness, with intense cold, which froze fast in the mud the wheels of their wagon, how failing to strike fire from the flint, the woodsman's last hope, they were compelled to leave their conveyance under guard of a faithful dog; how, by walking and leading their horses, the cold being too severe to ride, they reached Fort Wayne at a late hour on a wintry night; and with what kindness he was received by Samuel Hanna, who afterwards became a ruling elder in this church—a kindness, the remembrance of which, after the lapse of forty years, was still fresh in the old missionary's grateful heart.

Father Ross continues: "The next day being the Sabbath, I preached in the Fort morning and afternoon, because there was no other convenient place to preach in. . . . I visited the place five times from 1822 to 1826. I was once sent out to Fort Wayne by the Synod of Ohio."

Allen Hamilton, postmaster at Fort Wayne, December 10th, 1828, wrote to the Home Missionary Society, saying there had been no minister there since the town was laid off, and urging their claims by saying that the canal was laid off through the place; that there were, in the town and immediate vicinity, five hundred inhabitants; that there was no preaching within eighty miles, etc. In response to this appeal, the Rev. Charles E. Furman was appointed a missionary for Fort Wayne, who, after preaching some six or eight months, passed on to other fields.

In June, 1831, Rev. James Chute, of the Presbytery of Columbus, visited Fort Wayne, and, on the 1st of July following, at the request of the few Presbyterians then residing there, organized the First Presbyterian Church of the place, consisting of eleven members. On the 4th of October, 1831, the church was received under care of Miami Presbytery, whose place of meeting was some one hundred and twenty miles distant.

Of the first members of this church, two were half-Indians, who had before, in 1820, joined the Baptist Church under the labors of Rev. Mr. McCoy, missionary to the Indians at this post. They were nieces of "Little Turtle," the celebrated war-chief of the Miamis, the force of whose fierce courage, as leader of the savage hosts, our countrymen had felt on this spot, in the bloody conflict with Harnar's Army, in 1790, and again in the defeat of St. Clair, on the Upper Wabash, in 1791. They were daughters of Captain Wells, who, at the age of twelve years, had been taken prisoner, or rather stolen in Kentucky, and adopted by the Miami tribe.

The want of a place of worship, affording reasonable comfort, at Fort Wayne, was a chief hindrance of church progress for the first six years. Six or eight different rooms were occupied in succession within this period. The religious services connected with the organization were held in the open air, under a rude shelter of boards, near the junction of Columbus and Harrison streets, on ground now occupied by the canal basin. For a time, the little brick school room, about twenty by twenty-five feet, then standing some two hundred feet southwest of the present county jail, in a cluster of sumach shrubbery, was the place of worship. Then the Masonic Hall, on the site of Hill and Orbison's warehouse, a room, perhaps, thirty by forty feet, was occupied until surrendered, in June, 1833, to the first printing press ever set up in northeastern Indiana (Fort Wayne Sentinel, established by Thomas Tigar and S. V. B. Noel). Next a carpenter's shop, on the north side of Columbia street, near Harrison, was for some length of time the Sanctuary. At the close of each week's work the shop was hastily transformed from its material to its adaptation to sacred use, by removing the shavings and adjusting the benches minus their backs, with the work-bench for a pulpit-desk. A small room on the opposite side of Columbia street was for a short time used, as was likewise a room in the old brick tavern, in the same street, on the site of Morgan and Beach's store-room. During the Summer of 1833, and afterwards in 1835 and 1836, the old brick Court House, long since gone to decay, was occupied as a place of worship. Such were the wanderings and adjournings of the little congregation, until, in 1837, they found a home and resting place in their own church building, the small frame, forty feet square, near the east end of Berry street.

In that little frame church, on what is now the site of the residence erected by Charles McCulloch, Esq., in 1881, were organized both the Synod of Northern Indiana and the Presbytery of Fort Wayne, the former in October, 1843, and the latter on January 1st, 1845.

In that period of progress and growth, the frame church having in a short time become too small, the enterprise of erecting the commodious edifice now occupied was considered, as early as 1844. The corner-stone was laid by the pastor, Rev. H. S. Dickson, with appropriate religious ceremonies, in October, 1845. The basement of the new building was first occupied for public worship in 1847, and the upper room completed and solemnly dedicated to the worship of Almighty God in November, 1852. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Thomas E. Thomas, D. D., then President of Hanover College.

A brief notice of those who have preached the gospel is appropriate to this historic sketch. The labors of Rev. James Chute were continued, in humble, self-denying faithfulness, from the organization of the church till called to his rest on the 28th of December, 1835. His memory is blessed. Following the death of Mr. Chute, the pulpit was supplied, first, in 1836, by Rev. Daniel Jones, and after him by Rev. Jesse Hoover, a Lutheran minister, until October, 1837; Rev. Alexander T. Rankin was next invited to this field. He entered on his ministry in October, 1837, and continued to labor here until September, 1843. Rev. William C. Anderson was called to the church in the Spring of 1844. Though declining to accept the call, he took charge of the church, and preached for some six months, guiding it, under the providence of God, most happily through the period of its greatest trials and danger. In September, Mr. Anderson's health having failed, a call was forwarded to Rev. H. S. Dickson. Mr. Dickson was installed pastor in November, 1845. Until this time the fixed relationship of pastor and people had not been enjoyed by this congregation—the several ministers having labored as stated supplies. In the Fall of 1847, Mr. Dickson having resigned the pastorate, Rev. Lowman P. Hawes supplied the pulpit for about six months. In August, 1848, Rev. J. G. Riheldaffer, then of the graduating class of Princeton Seminary, accepted a call and was installed as pastor, continuing in that relation until he resigned, in 1851. In November, 1851, Rev. Jonathan Edwards D. D., was installed as pastor. He resigned in July, 1855, to accept the presidency of Hanover College, and was succeeded by Rev. John M. Lowrie, D. D., who was installed in November, 1856. During the vacancy before the settlement of Dr. Lowrie, Rev. J. H. Burns supplied the pulpit for a few months. The pastorate of Rev. Dr. Lowrie continued to the time of his death, September 26th, 1867. In March, 1868, Rev. Thomas H. Skinner, D. D., accepted the call of this congregation. Dr. Skinner resigned September 18th, 1871, to accept a call to the Second Presbyterian Church of Cincinnati. February 5th, 1872, Rev. D. W. Mollatt, then a pastor at Georgetown, D. C., accepted a call to this church, and continues in charge of it, blessed in his labors and beloved by his people. Most of these brethren are elsewhere noticed in this volume.

Foster, Rev. James Bonner, was born in Southeastern Indiana, July 6th, 1837, and was brought up in Israel Township, Preble county, Ohio. He graduated at Miami University, Oxford, Ohio, June, 1858; studied theology in the United Presbyterian Seminary at Monmouth, Illinois; and was licensed to preach by the First United Presbyterian Presbytery of Ohio, April, 1859. In 1860 he was appointed, by the United Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, to preach in Dayton, Ohio, where he was ordained in January, 1861. After three years of faithful work in Dayton, he accepted a call to Kirkwood, Ill., where he labored successfully for three years. Called to the Orchard Street Presbyterian Church of Cincinnati, August, 1867, he became a member of what was then the Old School Presbytery of Cincinnati. After a pastorate of three years, during which he won the warm affection of his people, he was compelled to resign, on account of ill health. Early in 1871 he accepted an invitation to supply the Cumminsville Church, and, in October, received their unanimous call. Greatly beloved by his people, he labored here as long as he had strength. In the hope of regaining his health, he visited friends in South Carolina. The hope was vain. Rapidly declining, he died, of consumption, at Due West, S. C., February 25th, 1873. His remains were laid to rest among his kindred, in the old Hopewell burying ground, in Preble county, Ohio. He was a good man, a faithful pastor and a true friend.

Foster, Rev. William, a native of Lancaster county, Pa., was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Castle, April 23d, 1757, and ordained and installed pastor of Upper Octorara and Doe Run Presbyterian churches, Pa., October 19th, 1768. In the Revolution Mr. Foster engaged heartily in the cause of civil liberty, and encouraged all who heard him to do their utmost in defence of their rights, and on this account he became very obnoxious to the enemy, and more than once attempts were made to seize him. On one occasion Mr. Foster was called to Lancaster, to preach the gospel to the troops collected there, previous to their joining the main army. The discourse was so acceptable, that it was printed and circulated, and did much to arouse the spirit of patriotism among the people. Mr. Foster was a graduate of Princeton College (1761); was a man of very superior mind, and was much esteemed and respected by all who knew him, for his solid sense and unaffected piety. He held a high place among his brethren, as his name constantly occurs in connection with positions of trust and responsibility. He occasionally received theological students under his care. He died September 30th, 1780. His death-bed was a scene of triumph.

Fowler, Philemon Halsted, D.D., son of William and Margaret (Stevenson) Fowler, was born in Albany, N. Y., February 9th, 1811. He graduated from Hobart College, at Geneva, N. Y., in 1832, and for one year after his graduation was Tutor in that Institution. He graduated at Princeton Seminary, in 1836; was licensed by the Presbytery of Albany, October 15th, 1835, and was ordained, sine titulo, by the same Presbytery, August 24th, 1836. From October, 1836, to November, 1839, he served, as pastor elect, the Second Presbyterian Church of Washington, D. C., which was afterwards merged with the T. Street Church, into the New York Avenue Church. At the latter date he removed to Elmira, N. Y., where he was installed as pastor, December 1th, 1839, and continued to labor with great usefulness and popularity until he was released, December 16th, 1850. He next became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Utica, N. Y., over which he was installed, February 10th, 1851, and where he labored with large success and growing reputation until released on account of failing health, February 9th, 1874. He was brought into wider notice, by being made a member of the Joint Committee on Revision, in 1866, on the part of the New School General Assembly, in all the deliberations of which Committee he took an active and influential part. In 1869 he was elected Moderator of his General Assembly, then sitting in the Church of the Covenant, in New York city, at the same time that his friend and fellow student, the Rev. M. W. Jacobs, D. D., was made Moderator of the Old School Assembly. Hence it fell to the lot of these two jointly to preside at the opening of the first General Assembly of the reunited Church, in Philadelphia, in May, 1870, and to Dr. Fowler to preach the opening sermon.

After he resigned his church at Utica Dr. Fowler continued to reside in that city, but usually spent his winters on his orange plantation, at San Matteo, on the St. John's River, in Florida. While here he ministered a considerable length of time to the church at Jacksonville, greatly encouraging and helping that then struggling enterprise. He died peacefully, at Utica, N. Y., December 19th, 1879.

Dr. Fowler was the author of a number of published sermons and small volumes, his largest work being his "History of Presbyterianism in Central New York." He was long a corporate member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, a Trustee of Hamilton College, and a Director of Auburn Theological Seminary. He was widely known and honored for his personal qualities and his high reputation as a preacher and pastor. He preached Christ with great directness and fidelity, and his ministry was an eminently fruitful one.

Fox, Rev. Louis Rodman, was born at Doylestown, Pa., January 10th, 1831. For a time he practiced law. He studied theology at the Seminary in Princeton. He was missionary at Bustleton, N. J., 1863-4, and pastor elect at Tuckerton, 1864-5. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Burlington, April 28th, 1864; was pastor of North Church, Washington, D. C., 1865-71; assistant pastor to the Rev. Dr. Boardman, in the Tenth Church, Philadelphia, Pa., 1872-4, and stated supply at Providence and Jacksonville, N. J., 1876-80, when he accepted the pastorate of the Union Church, Detroit, Mich., in which he still continues. Mr. Fox is a gentleman of polished address, winning manners and earnest piety. His discourses are carefully prepared, replete with instruction, and delivered with much solemnity. He is characterized by great faithfulness in the Master's service.

Franklin, Rev. William Sheldon, was born in Aurora, N. Y., October 23d, 1811. He studied at Cayuga and Cortland Academies, and Cazenovia Seminary, and received the degree of A. M. from Madison University in 1855. He was a student of Auburn Theological Seminary. His fields of labor were, Five Corners, N. Y., 1842-64; Camden, 1864-7; Marcellus, 1867-70; Ludlowville, two years; Jamesville, two years; Ridgville and Oneida Lake, two years; General Secretaryship of Y. M. C. A., Syracuse, two years. He died at Danforth, N. Y., March 6th, 1882. Mr. Franklin's ministry was marked with signal fidelity and earnestness, with untiring zeal and industry, and with higher than average ability. Both in thought and diction his sermons were more than ordinary productions. He aimed pre-eminently at scripturalness, and was very faithful and fearless in his presentation of the truth. He possessed unusual gifts in prayer. He was very successful in gathering many into the Master's fold. His last days were days of overflowing spiritual joy and abounding peace.

Frazer, David R., D. D., was born in Baltimore, Md., July 10th, 1837. He graduated at the Central High School in 1852, and was engaged for four years in the wholesale dry goods business in that city. He entered Delaware College, at Newark, in January, 1858, and the College of New Jersey in 1859, graduating in 1861. He graduated at the Union Theological Seminary, New York city, in 1861, and was licensed by the Presbytery of the District of Columbia in 1861, and ordained in 1865. He was pastor of the First Church, Clifton, Staten Island, from April, 1865, to November, 1867; of the First Church, Hudson, N. Y., from November, 1867, to June, 1872; of the First Church, Buffalo, N. Y., from June, 1872, to February, 1880; of Classon Avenue Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., from February, 1880, to February, 1883, from which date he has had charge of the First Church, Newark, N. J. Dr. Frazer is a gentleman of very winning address and benevolent spirit, a fine scholar, a superior preacher, a faithful friend, and in all the important pastoral relations he has sustained, the Divine blessing has accompanied his attractive and earnest ministry.

Frederick City, Md., Presbyterian Church.

Presbyterianism has existed for one hundred and fifty years, and the present Presbyterian Church has been planted for over a century among the people of Frederick City. The beautiful valley in which the city is situated was settled about the year 1730, by hardy Germans, who soon after established a church in "Frederick Town," known as the "German Presbyterian Church." No records of this Church have been preserved earlier than 1717, but it has been recorded that, at that date, there was an "organization which had existed for several years without a pastor," and the congregation was occupying its "second church, the first having already grown too small or gone to decay." This church was Calvinistic in doctrine and Presbyterian in polity. But all its religious services were conducted in the German language. This, to the thrifty Scotch-Irish people and others of the Presbyterian faith, who had settled in Frederick Valley almost as soon as the Germans, and who could not understand the German language, was a great hindrance to their uniting in church fellowship with the German Presbyterian Church. And this naturally led to a desire on the part of these English-speaking Presbyterians for the organization of a church in which the services would be conducted in their own language. Hence, prior to the year 1780, there was a small congregation of these English Presbyterians in "Frederick Town," and the surrounding country, imperfectly organized, meeting together for public worship, in private houses, seeking and receiving ministerial supplies from the nearest Presbyteries, and earnestly desiring, though unable to support, a pastor. In order that the congregation might be distinguished from the German Presbyterians, it (according to its earliest records), "adopted the distinctive appellation of English Presbyterians." The year 1780 is considered as the date of the more formal commencement of the church now known as THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN FREDERICK CITY, MARYLAND.

Rev. Stephen Bloomer Balch, D. D., began preaching to the English-speaking Presbyterians of "Fredericktown" as early as 1780, immediately after he was permanently settled at "Georgetown, on the Potomac." As a result of his labors this church was regularly organized in 1782. It was originally connected with the Presbytery of Donegal, but it was transferred to the Presbytery of Baltimore at its organization in 1786, and it is one of four churches that have continued in this connection ever since. About the year 1782 the congregation erected a church on what is now known as the "Presbyterian Graveyard." It was "a plain brick structure, with brick floor, high-backed pews and lofty pulpit." Dr. Balch continued his work in this church, preaching one or two Sabbaths each month, until 1790, when his church in Georgetown, having very much increased, demanded all his time, and he resigned.

Rev. David Baird, who had preached to the congregation for some time in 1786, succeeded Dr. Balch in 1791, and remained for about two years. Rev. Cunningham S. Semple began to supply the pulpit about the year 1791. Subsequently the Pipe Creek Church was added to his charge. His ministry continued for about three years. It is believed that the celebrated "Blind Preacher," Rev. James Waddell, D. D., supplied the pulpit for some time, during the year 1797. Rev. Samuel Knox, D. D., D. D., became pastor of the church in 1797. In connection with his pastorate he was President of Frederick Academy (now Frederick College). He resigned the pastorate in 1803. Rev. John Brackenridge became stated supply in 1809, after the church had been vacant for six years, and remained about a year. Rev. Patrick Davidson was elected pastor in 1810, entered upon his duties the same year, but was not installed till 1815. He established a number of preaching stations in the surrounding country. During the first part of his ministry the church was reorganized, according to the provisions of the "Form of Government."

In 1819 the congregation purchased two lots on West Second street, opposite the grounds of Frederick College, for the erection of a place of worship, and after various hindrances, the original portion of the present church edifice was completed, in 1825, and afterwards dedicated to the worship of Almighty God. Then came a period of stated supplies—Rev. E. J. Morrison in 1825; Rev. Donald McIntosh from 1825 to 1828; Rev. J. W. McCullough, D. D., from 1828 to 1830, and Rev. J. S. Galloway in 1830.

Rev. J. G. Hammer, D. D., was elected pastor in September, 1830, entered upon his duties the same year, but was not installed till July, 1831. The spiritual interests of the church greatly improved under Dr. Hammer's ministry. He resigned in 1833. The church continued vacant for a year; it was then supplied by the Rev. Joseph Smith, D. D., who became pastor in 1838, till August, 1831, and subsequently by Rev. T. P. Shelman, for three months. The Rev. Philo Fuller Phelps was elected pastor in November, 1831, and installed the following June. He resigned in 1836. Rev. William Blood was elected pastor in April, 1837. He supplied the church for one year, but was not installed. Rev. Joseph Smith, D. D., was elected pastor in July, 1838, and was installed in January, 1839. The church was prosperous during his pastorate. He resigned in September, 1842, but continued as stated supply till April, 1843. Rev. John Miller was installed pastor October 31st, 1843, and his labors were much blessed. He resigned in December, 1848. Rev. Joseph M. Atkinson, D. D., was installed pastor in July, 1849. His pastorate was marked by the unity that pervaded the congregation, and the great zeal of the members in spiritual work. He resigned in July, 1855. Rev. Jacob W. E. Ker was elected pastor in December, 1855, but being unwilling to accept, he was appointed stated supply for a year. Rev. John B. Ross, M. D., was chosen pastor in October, 1857, installed soon after, and resigned in November, 1862. In 1858 the church edifice was enlarged, remodeled and repaired, at considerable expense. After Dr. Ross' resignation the church was without a pastor or stated supply till May, 1861, when Rev. Robert H. Williams took charge of it, and labored with success. Mr. Williams resigned the pastoral relation, January 23d, 1880. The Rev. Irwin P. McCurdy was installed over the congregation, July 8th, 1881. His pastorate has been more particularly marked by the development of the activities of the congregation in thorough organization and liberal contributions. During the first year of this pastorate a larger number was added to the membership of the church than in any previous year of its history, with a single exception, during Dr. Hammer's pastorate.

Freeman, Rev. Jonathan, was born at Woodbridge, N. J., April 4th, 1765. He was licensed to preach March 3d, 1793, by the Presbytery of New York, and was elected and installed pastor of the Church in Hopewell, May 25th, 1794. After remaining here about two years he resigned his charge, and in 1797 removed to Bridgton, where he labored till October, 1805. He was again pastor of the Church at Bridgton, N. J., until he died, November 17th, 1822. Mr. Freeman preached several sermons. He also contributed largely to several religious periodicals. He possessed a liberal mind, was a highly respectable scholar, fair preacher, and acceptable preacher.

French, Edward W., D. D., was born at Barre, Vt., in 1829. He was graduated, with high honor, at Williams College, Mass., in 1852. He studied theology at Union Seminary, N. Y., and at Newport, R. I. He was licensed by the Third Presbytery of New York City, in 1856. During the same year he aided in the organization of a Presbyterian Church in Bergen, Hudson county, N. J. (now Jersey City), to whose pulpit he was at once unanimously called. He has had no other charge, and is now just completing the twenty-seventh year of his pastorate in the "First Presbyterian Church of Jersey City Heights," in which he is greatly beloved.

Dr. French is, in bearing, courteous and cordial to all; in pulpit manner, deliberate and quiet, yet intense and effective; in style, terse, original, incisive, packed with thought and luminous with apt illustration; in matter, combining the profound and solid with the practical; in treatment, scholarly, exhaustive and tender. Every sermon, with or without manuscript, is "beaten oil." In theology, he is eminently evangelical. He preaches and lives the whole glorious gospel, to which the victory is pledged. His power is proven by his permanence, and his permanence enhances his power. His church is a tower of strength for spiritual religion and all genuine reforms. He is an active and potential force in his Presbytery, of which, for several years, he was the Stated Clerk. Many of his sermons and tracts have been published and widely distributed.

French, Hon. George H., was born in Junius, Seneca County, N. Y., January 18th, 1820. When eighteen years of age, he commenced teaching, and continued in this employment several winters, working on his father's farm during the intervening summers. In 1842 he removed to Tekonsha, Calhoun County, Mich., and settled upon ninety acres of new land near that village; but the following Spring returned to his native place, where he resided about two years. In September, 1844, he again journeyed west, settled at Tekonsha, taught the village school during the Winter, and commenced again upon his land in the Spring of 1845. Here he remained, improving his farm, till the Fall of 1848. He then removed to Homer, his present residence, and engaged soon after in the mercantile business, in which he still continues. For over twenty-five years he has steadily pursued an honorable and successful business career. He has always contributed generously of his means to promote the cause of education and religion, and to advance the general interests of the town. In Tekonsha and in Homer he has been frequently called by his townsmen to positions of public trust, and in the Fall of 1860 he was elected to the State Senate, and was re-elected two years later. To him the village of Homer and its surrounding country are largely indebted for the competing lines of railroad built through the town within the last ten years.

Mr. French was elected deacon of the church in Homer, in 1851, and elder in 1853, and by re-election, once in three years, continues a member of the Session until the present time. In April, 1882, he was elected Moderator of the Presbytery of Lansing, and served as such. As a member of the Session, as superintendent of the Sabbath School, as solicitor for contributions for any form of Church work, he has few equals. He contributes liberally of his means, and is always present and active in the prayer meeting, and wherever else he can do work for the Master. In ability and tact he has no equal in the Presbytery, and in Christian spirit no superior.

French, Justice Clement, D.D., is a native of Vermont. He was born at Barre, May 3d, 1831. He graduated at Williams College in 1853, and at the Union Theological Seminary, New York, in 1856. On March 5th, 1857, he became pastor of the Central Congregational Church, in Ormond Place, Brooklyn, and continued so, with success in his ministry until 1870, when impaired health necessitated his resignation of the charge. In November, 1871, his health having improved by travel, he consented to supply the pulpit of the Westminster Presbyterian Church of Brooklyn, and March 6th, 1872, was installed its pastor. Here his labors were greatly blessed. He is at present the esteemed pastor of the Park Presbyterian Church, Newark, N. J. Dr. French possesses fine social qualities. In his manners he is exceedingly polite and cordial. His writings are fearless, graceful, and eloquent. As a preacher he is calm, thorough, and effective. He is an earnest, practical worker, makes no compromises with and asks no favors of the adversary, and has little patience with those who do.

Fuller, Charles, one of the original members, and active in the organization of the Presbyterian Church of Scranton, Pa., was descended from the Pilgrims of the Mayflower. For thirty-three years he was a member of the Session of that Church, and for thirty of these acted as Clerk and Treasurer. For over sixty years he was a worker in the vineyard of the Master, and for half a century was identified with every good enterprise in his own and other churches, and in the communities in which he lived. All his life he was a warm friend of missions, and his name is borne by a native of China educated through his instrumentality. He died November 29th, 1881.

Fullerton, Hon. David, was born in Cumberland Valley, Pa., in 1772. He was for many years in the Senate of the State, as Representative from Franklin county, also a member of the Congress of the United States, and was one of the most honest, active, and self-denying Representatives who ever served the people. His whole career as a Representative was marked by the highest integrity, combined with the most active measures for the good of the people. He was President of the bank at Greencastle, and conducted the leading mercantile business of the town. He died February 1st, 1843. Mr. Fullerton was an elder in the Presbyterian Church of Greencastle, always in the lead in the support of the Church, and the first superintendent of the earliest (1817) Sabbath-school organization known of in the history of the place of his residence. He was the father of the Rev. Matthew Fullerton, who for a time was the esteemed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Hagerstown, but died in his early ministry.

Fullerton, Rev. Hugh Stewart, was born near Greencastle, Pa., February 6th, 1805. In 1812 his father removed to Baltimore and engaged in mercantile business. His complete failure, after two years, necessitated a removal, and the family sought what was then the far West. In 1815 they went to Fayette county, Ohio, building a one-roomed cabin in the wilderness, for the home of the father, mother and eleven children. Humble as the residence was, it was so aristocratic as to be known for miles around as "the house with the glass window." From the time when he was fourteen years of age almost the entire charge of the farm, and of providing for the support of the family, fell on the young lad. In 1826, one of the "fever years" in that region, he was called, in the space of a few months, to follow to their graves his loved mother and six brothers and sisters. Great as was the grief of these changes to him, they left him at liberty to fulfill the life-long wish of his mother, that he should enter the ministry. By the assistance of friends he became a student at Ohio University, and after studying theology with Dr. Crothers, was licensed by Chillicothe Presbytery, April 8th, 1830. A member of Presbytery, in criticising his "trial sermon," said, "He is just like a good screw-auger, takes hold right away, cuts all the time, and stops when he gets through." The Summer after his licensure he spent in home missionary work, among the vacant churches of the Presbytery. In 1831 he became pastor of Union Church, four miles from Chillicothe, and was much beloved, and blessed in his labors. In 1832 he was installed pastor of the Church in Chillicothe, where he was also very successful. The greater part of 1837 he was an efficient agent for the A. B. C. F. M. In 1838 he took charge of the Church at Salem, Ross county, Ohio, where he spent twenty-six years of most laborious life before God called him home. Mr. Fullerton was a man of humility, simplicity of nature, and self-denial. He was an exemplary Christian, and an earnest, fearless and successful preacher.

Fullerton, Rev. Robert, S., the son of Thomas and Elizabeth (Stewart) Fullerton, was born in Bloomingburg, Ohio, November 23d, 1821. He was educated at Miami University, Ohio; studied divinity at the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa.; was licensed by Chillicothe Presbytery, and ordained by the same Presbytery in 1850. He entered upon the service of his Master as a foreign missionary under the care of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. He was stationed at Mynpoother, Agra, Futtegurgh, Dehra, etc. in Northern India. He died October 4th, 1865, of cancer, at Landour, on the Himalayah mountains, and was buried in the mission cemetery, at Dehra, the station to which he belonged. Mr. Fullerton was a most devoted missionary, and his brethren held him in high esteem. As a preacher he was simple, forcible and Scriptural. He was of a thoroughly affectionate nature. The sole object of his life appeared to be usefulness. One of his most striking characteristics was the geniality and wholesomeness of his nature. His death was one of triumph. Just before his departure he said to his family and friends, "I am so inexpressibly happy that I must talk to you a little while. I wish to say that I would not exchange this bed of pain for crowns and kingdoms. I did not think that I should be permitted to enter the land of Babel while here on earth, but I have entered it. Do not think that this is excitement; I am as calm as ever I was, but my peace and joy are beyond expression. Oh, can it be that God would thus reveal himself to one so unworthy! Heaven is indeed begun below."

Fulton, Rev. John L., was born April 11th, 1836, near Paris, Washington county, Pa. He graduated at Monmouth College, Monmouth, Ill., June, 1862, taking a course in theology in the United Presbyterian Theological Seminary of the same place. He was licensed to preach by Monmouth Presbytery (I. P.), April 26, 1863. He was sent to Iowa as a missionary; settled at Cedar Rapids, July 1st, 1863, and was ordained April, 1864. Resigning his charge at Cedar Rapids, July 1st, 1867, he became pastor of the Mill Creek Presbyterian Church, January, 1868, connecting himself with the Presbytery at Washington. This pastorate he resigned to take charge of the Broadway Church, Baltimore, February, 1873. He assumed his present charge, Second Presbyterian Church, Allegheny, Pa., September, 1876. The ruling characteristics of Mr. Fulton's preaching are practicalness and earnestness. His discourses teem with Scriptural texts, combined with startling and quaint illustrations gathered in out-of-the-way lines of reading. He is a faithful pastor, and a warm and devoted friend.

Fulton, Rev. R. H., is the son of Henry and Elizabeth (Plumer) Fulton, and was born near Monongahela City, Washington county, Pa. He graduated with honors in the first class of the United College of Washington and Jefferson, in 1866. Having spent four years in teaching and in the private study of theology, he entered the middle class in the Western Theological Seminary in 1870, and graduated in April, 1872. He was licensed to preach the gospel in 1871, and, having been called to the pastorate of the Second Presbyterian Church of Baltimore, he was ordained and installed by the Presbytery of Baltimore in —, 1872. In May, 1883, he accepted a call to the Northminster Church of Philadelphia, and was installed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia Central, in June, 1883.

In his first pastorate, Mr. Fulton had for predecessors such men as Dr. Jonathan Edwards, Dr. George P. Hays, Dr. J. T. Smith, Drs. Robert and John Breckinridge; and, at the end of eleven years, it seems universally conceded that he has proved himself the peer of any of these illustrious men. As a preacher of the gospel, he is scholarly, interesting, instructive, persuasive, edifying, and frequently very eloquent. As a pastor, he is generous, dignified, prudent, compassionate. As a Presbyter, he is able, courteous, faithful. He has always taken an active part in all the business of his Presbytery and Synod; and, having made himself very familiar, both with the underlying principles and the specifications of our Book of Government and Discipline, he ranks high as an executive officer and debater in our Church courts. A number of his sermons have been published, and several of his reports as Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Missions in the Synod of Baltimore.

Fulton, Rev. William, is of Scotch-Irish parentage, his ancestors being relatives of Robert Fulton, of steamboat notoriety. His early training was received in the Old Country. He was installed pastor of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, Manayunk, Pa., in 1855. Having withdrawn from this field, for a time, he accepted a second call to this congregation, and remained its pastor until 1868, when he was unanimously called to the Bridge Street Presbyterian Church of Catasauqua, Pa. In this charge he labored with much success and acceptance, until 1875, when he received a unanimous call to the Presbyterian Church of Conshohocken, Pa. Soon after commencing his work at the latter place a precious and extensive revival occurred, through which 166 persons were added to the church. The church is still prosperous under his ministry, and has recently built a commodious and handsome parsonage for the pastor. Mr. Fulton is the author of several tracts. One, called "The Middling Man," has been published by our Board of Publication, and his tract, "Saved for Nothing," published by the Dublin Tract and other Societies, has been very largely blessed, and has had a wide circulation. He is emphatically a gospel preacher, in the strict sense of the term. His utterances are always pointed, vigorous and full of meaning. His style is logical and argumentative, always presenting clearly and forcibly the great fundamental doctrines of grace, and with earnestness appealing to the mind and conscience of his hearers. As a Bible exponent, he is rarely excelled, exhibiting often a peculiar vein of originality, both in thought and diction.

Futhey, Hon. John Smith, is a native of Pennsylvania. He was born September 3d, 1820, in West Fallowfield (now Highland) Township, Chester county. He was educated at the Unionville Academy, in that county, and after studying law, was admitted to the Bar, February 7th, 1843. In 1848-9 he was appointed Deputy Attorney-General for Chester county, and in 1853, he was elected District Attorney of Chester county, by the popular vote. This position he held from November of the latter year until November, 1856, discharging the duties with great ability. As a leading member of the West Chester Bar he long enjoyed a large and lucrative practice. He has a decided and a well-improved taste for archaeological investigation, and has contributed much valuable antiquarian information to the press. His work, entitled "The History of the Upper Octorara Church," is one of decided merit. For several years he has been President Judge of the Court of Chester county, and has met the demands of his office with great ability, fidelity and acceptableness. He is an active member of the First Presbyterian Church of West Chester, and, in 1872, was elected one of its ruling elders.

G

Gage, Rev. Henry Bartlett, was born near Chillicothe, Ohio, June 15th, 1815. He graduated at Marietta College, in 1869, standing third in his class, and the same year entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton. Removing to Colorado, on account of his health, he was, by the direction of the Presbytery of Colorado, placed in charge of the recently-organized church at Colorado City, at the base of Pike's Peak. He was licensed by the Presbytery at Golden, April, 1871, being the first Presbyterian licentiate in the Rocky Mountains. He was ordained September 8th, 1872, and is at this date the oldest minister in continuous connection with the work in the Synod of Colorado. From 1870 to 1873 he was in charge of the churches of Colorado City and Colorado Springs; from 1873 to 1876, at Central City, Colorado; from 1876 to 1879, at Colorado Springs, the second term. He was installed, November 15th, 1879, pastor of the Church at Pueblo, Col. At Central, Colorado Springs and Pueblo, he developed the churches, from aid-receiving to self-supporting, created and fostered missionary enterprises, and remembered all the departments of Church work.

Mr. Gage's vacations have been largely given to missionary exploration among the newer mining camps in the out-of-the-way mountain districts. During his present pastorate at Pueblo, he has edited with ability and published the Presbyterian Herald, a monthly Church paper. He is a preacher of more than ordinary originality and popular acceptance, a most successful pastor, possesses an earnest missionary spirit, and is a warm, sympathizing friend, and an active Presbyter.

Gale, George W., D. D., was born at North-east, Dutchess county, N. Y., December 3d, 1789; graduated at Union College; studied theology at Princeton, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Hudson in September, 1816. On October 29th, 1819, he took charge of the Church at Adams, N. Y., where he enjoyed a great revival of religion, among the converts of which he reckoned Rev. Charles G. Finney and many other eminent men. He resigned this charge in 1826. He was the founder of the Oneida Manual Labor Institute, at Whitesboro, N. Y. But his great life-work was the founding of Knox College, at Galesburg, Ill., in 1835. He died, September 13th, 1862. Dr. Gale's intellect was strong, clear, logical, acute, penetrating, active, well furnished, and well disciplined. In pulpit power he was respectable, but not eminent. His prejudices, founded in convictions, were strong, and his antipathies liable to be shaded with severity. His piety was a governing principle, organized into his whole being, and controlling his plans, labors, comforts and purse. Stern in rebuking those who deserved it, before his Maker he lay in the dust.

Gallaher, Rev. James, was of Scotch-Irish descent, and was born in Washington county, Tenn., in 1792. He graduated at Washington College, then under the Presidency of Dr. Doak; studied theology under the direction of the Rev. Edward Crawford and Dr. Stephen Bovelie, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Abingdon, in December, 1815. Almost immediately he was invited by the Church of New Providence and by the people of Rogersville, to become their pastor. The church accommodations at New Providence were merely a small brick school-house, that would seat about one hundred and fifty persons. In a short time, under his labors, the congregation increased until it numbered four hundred church members, and sometimes a thousand hearers.

Mr. Gallaher was a very efficient and popular preacher. His scholarly attainments were, indeed, quite meagre, but his imagination was fervid, his oratory well-nigh perfect, and his piety ardent and sincere. Taking, in his sermons, the broadest, plainest, most common-sense views of the Bible, he carried the convictions of his hearers with him, and, whether pathetic, violent, vociferous, earnest, or pointed, he uniformly secured their sympathy. Wherever he went he was sure to attract crowds around him, and on them he left no doubtful or transient impression. In 1830 he was settled over the Third Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati. In 1835 he became a Professor in the Theological Department of Marion College. In 1839 he removed to St. Charles, Mo., where he had his home till the close of his life, laboring faithfully as stated supply of the church there, and making occasional visits through the surrounding country. In 1852-3 he was Chaplain of the House of Representatives in Congress. At the close of the Session, he resumed his labors as an evangelist, and was thus employed when death overtook him, October 19th, 1853.

Galloway, Rev. John Smith, the son of John and Margaret Galloway, was born in Gettysburg, Pa., August 5th, 1806; graduated at Jefferson College in 1826; graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1829, and was licensed by Carlisle Presbytery in 1828. After leaving the seminary, he preached for some time in the churches of Meckersburg, Pa., and Frederick, Md., and then took charge of the united congregations of Somerset and Newton, in Muskingum county, Ohio. Instead of settling in these churches, as he was desired to do, he accepted an appointment as agent of the Board of Education, in which he continued until invited to the Church of Springfield, Ohio, where he began his labors in April, 1832. This was his only pastoral charge, and in it his ministry of eighteen years was one of the most useful in the history of the Presbyterian Church. After resigning this charge, he was eleven years an agent for the American Bible Society, and the last year of his life he was Principal of the Cooper Female Seminary, Dayton, Ohio. He died in peace, August 25th, 1862. Mr. Galloway was distinguished by simplicity of character, purity, frankness, and earnestness of purpose. Among ministers he was "the beloved disciple." Though highly impulsive and emotional, he was never known to be under the influence of evil passion. The Cross, the life of Christ, was the constant theme of his effective ministrations. He never took part in controversy in the spirit of a partisan, yet was ever ready to take a decided stand on all important questions.

Gamble, Hamilton Rowan, was born in Winchester, Va., November 29th, 1798. His parents were Irish Presbyterians, his father a ruling elder. His education was principally obtained in Hampden-Sidney College, Va. When about eighteen he was admitted to the Bar in Virginia, and afterwards in Tennessee and Missouri, before he was twenty-one. He went to Missouri Territory in 1818, and resided for some years in Franklin, Howard county. In 1821 he was appointed Secretary of State of Missouri, but resigned the office in the following year, and took up his residence in St. Louis, where he was his home till his death.

His temperament was phlegmatic, and his natural disposition was even, but capable of high and dangerous excitement. His mind was well balanced, acute, discriminative, logical and analytical, moving calmly, examining thoroughly, considering coolly, weighing honestly and concluding confidently. His power was in finding, stating and applying facts and principles.

He had neither imagination, wit, humor nor eloquence. His career at the bar was a successful and eminent one. For many years he was at the head of the legal profession in Missouri. He held for four years, in 1851-55, a seat on the bench, and was Presiding Judge of the Supreme Court of that State. The character of his mind was admirably suited to that high position, but he did not appear as great there as at the bar. He never sought political office, but was once elected to the House of Representatives of the State. In 1861 he was elected from St. Louis county to the State Convention of Missouri, by which body, July 31st, 1861, he was appointed Provisional Governor of Missouri, a post which he held until his death, on the 31st of January, 1861.

His Christian life began in 1832, when he united with the First Presbyterian Church of St. Louis, under the pastorate of the godly William S. Potts, of which church he became a ruling elder. In 1838 he headed a colony from it, which was organized as the Second Presbyterian Church of St. Louis, of which he was immediately chosen a ruling elder; and he continued in that office while he lived, and was a tower of strength to the church. The transforming power of divine grace was signalized in him. From being given over to worldliness, in some of its worst forms, he became a man of marked and steady purity of life. Naturally of hot and hasty temper, he was enabled by the Holy Spirit's help, so to keep it in subjection, that none would suppose he had ever been subject to its dominion. By nature, of powerful and inflexible will, and prone to be overbearing, he became considerate and patient toward others, and as gently submissive as a child to God's will, even in its most afflictive forms. As he grew in years and grace, he would say to intimate Christian friends that he had but two great objects in life—religion and the law. He had a profound faith in prayer, and practiced it faithfully. Secret prayer was habitual with him, and on fit occasions he inculcated its observance on other professors of religion. Though not of emotional nature, his heart was ever tender to the touch of Gospel truth. He made the Bible his companion and guide. He was well-grounded in the great doctrines of grace, as formulated in the Standards of his Church.

Not spasmodically, but regularly, he was faithful in the discharge of his duties as a member and officer of the Church. In the Session, while kind and charitable toward delinquents, he had no sentimental weakness over their transgressions or shortcomings, nor any fear of offending their friends, or disturbing the peace of the church by subjecting them to discipline. To his pastor he was an ever ready support, counsellor and friend. What is my duty? was with him, in all things, the ever-present and controlling question. For the answer he habitually looked to God, and when he felt that it had been given, he followed its teachings with unquestioning steadfastness.

He gave largely and freely of his means for the cause of Christ and for benevolent objects, but expressed sorrow that he gave only from a sense of duty, and had not such feeling in it as he thought a child of God ought to have in giving. Such was the man, the lawyer, and the Christian. This is not the place to attempt any reference to his character and acts as a public man, in the last three years of his life.

Gamble, Hon. James, was a member of the Presbyterian Church, and for years he served acceptably and usefully as a ruling elder. He was a native of Lycoming county, Pa., having been born on a farm near Jersey Shore, January 28th, 1809. He studied law with A. V. Parsons, Esq., and was admitted to the Bar in 1832. In 1841 he was elected a member of the State Legislature, and was re-elected in 1842. While in the Legislature he served as Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, when the appropriation for the Portage Railroad over the Allegheny Mountains was made. He was elected to Congress from the Eleventh District in 1850, and re-elected in 1852. After leaving Congress he was not called to public life again until 1859, when Governor Packer appointed him President Judge of the district composed of Clinton, Centre and Clearfield counties, to fill the vacancy caused by the sudden death of Judge Burnside. He served about a year, when he retired to private life again. In 1868 he was elected President Judge of the Lycoming District, and served his full term of ten years. On retiring from the Bench, in 1879, he was tendered and accepted a banquet from the members of the Bar, as an expression of their esteem. He was a Director of the Bald Eagle Valley Railroad Company, and of the Williamsport National Bank. Judge Gamble died at his residence in Williamsport, Pa., February 23d, 1883. He was a gentleman of marked excellence of character, a consistent Christian, a jurist of superior ability, and held in the highest regard by the community in which he lived.

Garnet, Henry Highland, D. D., was born a slave, in Kent county, Md., December 23d, 1815. After receiving his primary education at schools in New York City, he graduated at Oneida Institute, Whitesboro, N. Y., with honor, in 1839. He immediately began teaching at Troy, N. Y., meanwhile studying theology under Dr. Beaman, and assisting in the services of the Liberty Street Presbyterian Church of that city. In 1842 he was licensed to preach, and ordained and installed the first pastor of this church, where he labored with great acceptance for nearly ten years. For a short time he also published a paper called "The Clarion."

In 1850, he was invited over to England to lecture in the interest of the Free Labor Movement, where he was regarded as one of the ablest and most eloquent speakers. In 1851, he was sent from England as a delegate to the Peace Congress at Frankfort-on-the-Main, after which he spent some time traveling and lecturing in Prussia and France. About this time, also, he connected himself with the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, whence he was sent as a missionary to Sterling, Grange Hill, Jamaica, West Indies. Here his labors were effectual, but owing to ill health, he was obliged to return to the United States. He was pastor of the Shiloh Presbyterian Church in New York City until 1865, when he was called to the Fifteenth Street Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C. Here he labored successfully. In 1869 he was called to the presidency of Avery College, and after a brief service in that position, he was recalled to the pastorate of the Shiloh Presbyterian Church, New York. Appointed by President Garfield as Resident Minister to Liberia, in the Fall of 1881 he fell a victim to the African fever, February 13th, 1882, and passed to his reward in heaven.

Dr. Garnet was a great and good man; great in the native power of his mind, great at heart, and great in the power of endurance. Few men could express themselves more clearly, forcibly and eloquently than he. The poor of his people honored him as their leader, and his ability was admitted and admired by all. At his funeral, the President and his Cabinet and all the leading men of the little Republic were present to do him reverence.

Gauss, Rev. O. W., M.D., grandson of C. F. Gauss, Prof. of Astronomy and Mathematics in Hanover University, Germany, is the second son of the late C. W. Gauss and Louisa (Faldenstein) Gauss, of St. Louis, and was born in Glasgow, Mo., March 20th, 1842. He graduated at Washington University, St. Louis, in 1863, and received the Physician's Degree from the St. Louis Medical College, in 1865. He was, after three years' practice of medicine, licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Missouri, in connection with the (then Independent) Synod of Missouri, and was ordained, sine titulo, by the Presbytery of Potosi, of the same Synod, in the same year, to take charge of some churches in Cape Girardeau county. He was pastor of the Church of the City of Cape Girardeau, 1873-5, at which time he took charge of the Boonsville Presbyterian Church, in which he continues to labor with fidelity and success.

Gayley, Samuel A., D. D., son of Daniel and Nancy Gayley, was born December, 1822, in the county of Tyrone, Ireland. His father removed his family to this county in 1842, and settled in Chester county, Pa. He graduated at Lafayette College in 1847, taking the first honor of his class, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1850. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle in 1849. After leaving the Seminary he took a commission from the Board of Home Missions, to labor in Luzerne and Carbon counties, Pa., with Whitehaven as his central point. On June 3d, 1851, he was installed pastor of the Great Island congregation, Lock Haven, Pa. On June 9th, 1856, he was installed pastor of the Church of West Nottingham, Md., where he still labors.

In all of Dr. Gayley's fields of pastoral labor he has been eminently successful. In Whitehaven he found but one Presbyterian, but when he left the town there was an organized church of twenty-five members and a vigorous Sabbath-school. Weatherly, another of his preaching stations, was ready for organization. At Lock Haven the membership doubled during his pastorate of less than five years. The labors rendered necessary by the growth of the church here broke down his health, and led him to accept the call to West Nottingham. The latter church has grown steadily under his ministry, and is stronger, both in numbers and in working power, now, than it has ever been in its history. It is considered the best equipped rural church in the Synod of Baltimore. Dr. Gayley was Principal of the West Nottingham Academy, an incorporated Institution under the control of the Church. Under his management it reached a degree of prosperity greater than it ever had attained before. He resigned in 1874, because the duties of school and church were too onerous.

Gayley, Rev. Samuel Maxwell, son of Andrew and Margaret (Crawford) Gayley, was born in the town of Creevy, parish of Ardstraw, county of Tyrone, Ireland, June 14th, 1802. He was put to the study of the Latin language at ten years of age, and continued the study of the ancient classics until he reached his seventeenth year. He studied for the ministry two years, under the direction of the Rev. Andrew Maxwell. He arrived in this country May 31st, 1823, resumed his studies under Dr. Wylie, and was licensed to preach April 4th, 1828, by the Reformed Presbytery of Philadelphia. He labored for a season, with success, at Chambersburg, Pottsville and Mauch Chunk, Pa. He withdrew from the Reformed Presbyterian body; joined the Presbytery of New Castle, in 1833; then preached at Rockland Church, near Wilmington, sixteen years, in the meantime resuscitating the First Presbyterian Church of Wilmington. He also gathered and organized the Green Hill Presbyterian Church, near Wilmington, and ministered to it for a time. Other waste places around very often enjoyed his ministrations. He died December 19th 1862. Much of Mr. Gayley's time was devoted to teaching, for which he had peculiar qualifications. He took a great interest in the cause of education generally. He was a man of great industry, and his piety, like his character, was of a manly type. As a preacher, he was more argumentative than ornate, and confined himself to the presentation of gospel truth.

Gayley, Rev. Samuel Rankin, the son of Andrew and Eleanor Rankin Gayley, was born in October, 1828, in the town of Creevy, parish of Ardstraw, County of Tyrone, Ireland. In 1847 he arrived in America, and immediately became Assistant Teacher in the Wilmington Classical Institute, of which his uncle, the Rev. Samuel M. Gayley, was Principal. He graduated at Lafayette College, in 1853, delivering the Latin Salutatory on that occasion. After studying theology at Princeton, he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Castle, in April, 1855, and was ordained by it, as an evangelist, July 1st, 1856. On the 11th of October he sailed as a missionary for Shanghai, China, arriving at that place on February 7th, 1857. Death closed his earnest labors in that field July 29th, 1862.

Mr. Gayley possessed fine talents, and was capable of the highest class of intellectual efforts. He was a thorough gentleman, in the noblest and best sense of the term. Modesty was a notable feature in his character. Conviction of duty was the mainspring of his every act. He had the elements of character which would have made him eminently useful in any position in which he might be placed. He labored not long in the Master's vineyard; long enough, however, to see some precious souls saved through his instrumentality. He left to the Chinese Christians, as they have some of them remarked, a living representation, rarely and beautifully complete, of the pure and peaceable religion of Jesus.

Geary, John White, ex-governor of Pennsylvania, was born at Mt. Pleasant, Westmoreland county, JOHN WHITE GEARY.

Pa., December 30th, 1819. He taught school, became a merchant's clerk in Pittsburg; afterwards studied at Jefferson College; finally became a civil engineer, and for several years was connected with the Allegheny Portage Railroad. He was lieutenant-colonel of the Second Pennsylvania Regiment in the Mexican war, wounded at Chapultepec, and for meritorious conduct was made first commander of the city of Mexico, after its capture, and colonel of his regiment. In 1849 he was made postmaster of San Francisco; soon after, alcalde of that city, and its first mayor. In 1852 he returned to Pennsylvania and settled on his farm in Westmoreland county. From July, 1856, to March, 1857, he was Governor of Kansas.

On the 15th of January, 1867, General Geary was inaugurated Governor of Pennsylvania, a position in which, by election to a second term, he served six years. During that period the debt of the Commonwealth was reduced over ten millions of dollars. It was a time of unusual activity in business and the proper development of the industrial resources of the State. At the session of the Legislature of 1870 an effort was made to take from the sinking fund of the State bonds, to the value of nine and a half millions of dollars, the proceeds of the sales of the public improvements formerly owned by it, in aid of certain railroads. The Governor, interposing his veto, prevented this contemplated outrage. In July, 1871, a serious disturbance of the public peace and order of the city of Williamsport took place, rendering the civil authorities powerless. Under this necessity a reliable military force was sent forward by the Governor, to protect and aid the authorities in enforcing the civil processes. By the presence of the troops the law-abiding citizens were encouraged and the lawless disheartened. A Bureau of Labor Statistics and of Agriculture was established, by an act of the Legislature of April 12th, 1872. Governor Geary connected himself, by profession of faith, with the First Presbyterian Church, at Harrisburg, soon after he entered on his office. He died suddenly, in that city, February 8th, 1873.

Gelston, Rev. Samuel, was born in the north of Ireland, in 1692, and came as a probationer to New England, in 1715. Received in the Fall under the care of Philadelphia Presbytery. He labored for a short time to the people of Kent, in Delaware; then went to Southampton, Long Island, where he became colleague of the pastor, being installed April 17th, 1717, and remaining about ten years. In August, 1728, he took into consideration a call to New Castle. The next month he was called to New London, Pa. He left his charge in 1733, and fell under censure, which, however, was soon removed. In April, 1736, he joined the Presbytery of Donegal, and was sent to Opequhon, to Conestoga and Conodoguinet. In the Fall he was directed to supply Pequea, and in the Spring, being about to remove from the bounds of Presbytery, was dismissed. He is said to have died October 23d, 1782.

General Washington and the Presbyterians. It is not for any low, sectarian purposes that we bring into the same picture the Father of his country and the Church of our hopes and love. On the contrary, it is with a view of endearing the greatest of men to those whom this article may reach, and of increasing their patriotic affection. Washington, it is well known, was an Episcopalian, by birth and by attachment. Before the Declaration of Independence he was a vestryman, both in the church at Alexandria and in the Polish Church, the latter being his own parish church. He partook regularly of the Communion, until he entered upon the office of General in the American army, after which time there is said to be but a single well-authenticated instance of his celebrating the Lord's Supper. This will be noticed in the course of our article, among the incidents which brought General Washington into interesting relations to the Presbyterian Church.

I. A PRESBYTERIAN PROPHECY.

Samuel Davies, one of the greatest of our ministers and orators, was settled in Virginia at the eventful period which preceded the American Revolution. With the true Presbyterian spirit, he was forward in every movement relating to the liberties and safety of his country. In 1755 he preached a sermon before one of the volunteer corps of Virginia, which had been raised to repel Indian and French invasion, immediately after the defeat of General Braddock. In the course of this sermon he alludes to the great men whom God raised up from time to time, and inspired with an enterprising public spirit, to accomplish some useful service in their day and generation.

"As a remarkable instance of this, I might point to the public that heroic youth, Colonel Washington, whom I cannot but hope Providence has hitherto preserved in so signal a manner, for some important service for his country."

This interesting prophecy, uttered by one of the greatest of ministers in reference to one of the greatest of men, had a fulfillment far beyond the most sanguine hopes.

II. WASHINGTON'S VICTORY AT PRINCETON.

On the 1st of January, 1777, the sun set gloomily upon the waters of the Assampink, a narrow and feeble barrier between the British and American armies. Cornwallis, who had the superior force, and was advised to use his advantages without delay, resolved to wait for the morning. "If Washington is the man I think he is, he will not be found in the morning," was the remark of a sagacious officer. Before midnight Washington was on his march to New Brunswick. At Princeton he encountered three regiments of the enemy, and in a gallant engagement put them to flight, with the loss, however, of the lamented General Mercer, a noble Scotchman, who had in his youth been present at the battle of Culloden. In this engagement, Washington is said to have fearlessly and immovably exposed his person, but Providence had a gracious design in his preservation, according to the fervent expectations of Davies, in 1755. The British troops having retreated to the college, which they had previously used for their barracks, Washington ordered an assault upon them, and triumphantly delivered Nassau Hall from the enemies who had profaned its name of liberty and its courts of religion and learning.

It was certainly, to us, an interesting providence, that one of Washington's memorable achievements should be at what might be then called the headquarters of the Presbyterian Church. Here Samuel Davies, the prophetic herald of Washington's fame, had lived and died, as President of the very college which Washington now purged of the foe, and the war-horse of the illustrious General passed near the distinguished minister's grave. Here, too, lived the honorable Richard Stockton and the Rev. Dr. Witherspoon, both of whom had signed the Declaration of Independence only six months previously, and the latter of whom was, at the time, President of the college. The deeds of Washington brought into historical notice the humble village of Princeton, a distinction not unworthy the services of Davies, of Witherspoon, of Stockton and of Presbyterians generally in the cause of the American Revolution.

III. WASHINGTON AT THE COMMUNION TABLE IN THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

It is the Sabbath. The congregation are assembled in the house of worship, and among their number is the Commander-in-Chief of the American Army. With a willing and devout spirit he unites with the people of God in the ordinances of religion. After a solemn sermon from a venerable minister, a hymn is sung, and the invitation given to members of sister churches to unite in the celebration of the Lord's Supper. A well-known military form rises in response to the invitation. With solemn dignity and Christian meekness he takes his seat with Christ's people, and partakes of the bread and wine. It is Washington at the communion table in a Presbyterian Church.

The circumstance that renders this incident in Washington's life remarkable is, that it was the only time, after his entrance upon his public career, that he is certainly known to have celebrated the sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

*It would seem that the religious services of the Church at this time were held, not in the meeting-house, but in an orchard, not far from the parsonage. The Rev. O. L. Kirland, for a time pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church at Morristown, and whose wife was a granddaughter of the Rev. Dr. Timothy Johnes, in a letter to the Rev. Nicholas Chevalier, of Christiansburg, Va., says: "Mrs. Kirland recollects very distinctly that she was accustomed to hear father speak of the fact that the religious services of the congregation were conducted in the orchard in the rear of the house, whilst Washington was here, during the Revolutionary war."

†Mrs. S. died, with one of our lay sisters, and a grand daughter of a Mrs. F. of, whose name has been deemed unwelcome, fragment with pen, and meane that her grand daughter tells her about attending the meetings in the orchard. On one occasion when the old lady was present. Washington was sitting in his high chair, in the orchard, and I sat by his side, and he was very much engaged in conversation with me. He was very much engaged in conversation with me. He was very much engaged in conversation with me.

Mr. Kirland also recounts that he attended the meeting in the orchard, as there was a meeting there, and he was very much engaged in conversation with me. He was very much engaged in conversation with me. He was very much engaged in conversation with me.

‡Dr. Sparks in his Life of Washington, thus alludes to this

The Rev. Dr. Cox, of Brooklyn, New York, first gave to the public the circumstances attending this interesting event, which he received from Dr. Hillyer, who had it from the lips of Rev. Dr. Timothy Johnes himself, the latter being pastor of the Church at Morristown at the time.

"While the American army, under the command of Washington, lay encamped in the environs of Morristown, New Jersey, it occurred that the service of the Communion, then observed semi-annually only, was to be administered in the Presbyterian church of that village. In a morning of the previous week, the General, after his accustomed inspection of the camp, visited the house of the Rev. Dr. Johnes, then pastor of that church, and, after the usual preliminaries, thus accosted him: 'Doctor, I understand that the Lord's Supper is to be celebrated with you next Sunday. I would learn if it accords with the canons of your Church to admit communicants of another denomination?' The Doctor rejoined, 'most certainly; ours is not the Presbyterian table, General, but the Lord's Table, and we hence give the Lord's invitation to all his followers, of whatever name.' The General replied, 'I am glad of it; that is as it ought to be; but, as I was not quite sure of the fact, I thought I would ascertain it from yourself, as I propose to join with you on that occasion. Though a member of the Church of England, I have no exclusive partialities.'

"The Doctor reassured him of a cordial welcome, and the General was found seated with the communicants the next sabbath."

This incident in the life of Washington shows, in the first place, his own impressions that he was a religious man, entitled to the privileges of the household of faith; and, in the second place, it shows that he understood the spirit and principles of the Thirty-nine Articles, which recognize other evangelical churches as belonging to the true catholic Church. The anecdote, in either aspect, commends itself to thoughtful consideration.

IV. WASHINGTON AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE COLLEGE OF NEW JERSEY, IN 1783.

In 1783 Congress held its sessions in Princeton, having adjourned to that place from Philadelphia, in consequence of some mutinous proceedings of a portion of the Philadelphia line. Washington was invited by Congress to visit Princeton, with a view of consultation in reference to the arrangements for fact. "The circumstance of his withdrawing himself from the communion service, at a certain period of his life, has been remarked as singular. This may be admitted and regretted, both on account of his example and the value of his opinion as to the importance and practical tendency of this rite. . . . Whatever his motives may have been, it does not appear that they were ever explained. Nor is it known, or to be presumed, that any occasion offered. It is probable that after he took command of the army, finding his thoughts and attention necessarily engrossed by the business which devolved upon him, in which frequently little distinction could be observed between Sunday and other days, he may have been led improperly publicly to partake of an ordinance which, according to the rite he entertained of it, imposed severe restraints on outward conduct and required pledges to perform duties impracticable difficult in his situation. Such an impression would be natural to a serious mind, and although it might be founded upon erroneous views of the nature of the ordinance, it would not leave the less weight to a man of a delicate conscience and habitual reverence for his Lord. There is proof, however, that on one occasion, just before the war, he partook of the Communion, but this was at a season when the army was in camp, and the activity of business and cares might be suspended." Dr. Sparks relates Dr. Cox's anecdote.

peace and other public concerns. Their sessions were in the library room of Nassau Hall. On the last Wednesday of September the Commencement exercises of the College occurred, and Congress adjourned to attend them. The valedictory orator on that occasion, then in his twenty-first year, was the celebrated Dr. Ashebel Green. At the close of his oration, he, with great tact, turned to General Washington, who, with the members of Congress, had a seat on the platform, and made a most eloquent and effective personal address, congratulating him on the happy issue of the long and perilous contest in which he had been engaged, and thanking him, on behalf of his fellow-students and the authorities of the College, for the important and distinguished services rendered to the country during the war, brought, at length, so much through his own instrumentality, to a glorious termination. This incident excited a thrilling interest in the whole assembly. The presence of Congress and of the Commander-in-Chief of the American army rendered this Commencement, perhaps, the most memorable that has occurred since the origin of the Institution. The following is the account given by Dr. Green, in his autobiography:—

"The church in Princeton had been repaired during the Summer (1783) which preceded the Commencement at which I received my Bachelor's Degree. An extended stage, running the length of the pulpit side of the church, had been erected, and as the President of Congress was a trustee of the college, and the President of the College had recently been a distinguished member of Congress, and that body itself had been accommodated in the college edifice, an adjournment to attend Commencement seemed to be demanded by courtesy, and was readily agreed on. We accordingly had on the stage, with the trustees and the graduating class, the whole of the Congress, the Ministers of France and Holland, and the Commander-in-Chief of the American army. The valedictory oration had been assigned to me, and it concluded with an address to General Washington. I need not tell you that, both in preparing and delivering it, I put forth all my powers. The General colored as I addressed him, for his modesty was among the qualities which so highly distinguished him. The next day, as he was going to attend on a committee of Congress, he met me in one of the long entries of the college edifice, stopped and took me by the hand, and complimented me on my address, in language which I should lack his modesty if I repeated it, even to you. After walking and conversing with me for a few minutes, he requested me to present his best wishes for their success in life to my classmates, and then went to the committee-room of Congress. I never took a copy of my valedictory oration, but carelessly gave the original, at his request, to Shepard Kollock, who then printed a newspaper at Chatham, in Morris county. It was published by him, in October, 1783. I have made several efforts to find the paper which contained it, but hitherto without success."

It was at this same Commencement that the Trustees of the College requested General Washington to sit for his portrait. This picture, taken by Peale, in 1781, is a full length portrait of Washington in the vigor of manhood. In the background is represented the battle of Princeton and the death of Mercer. Washington stands in a posture of dignity, and even majesty, the right hand with the sword referring to that battle, which Washington always regarded as one of the deciding victories of the Revolution. The flag of his country is, by a happy artistic artifice, made, as if by accident, to wave about his head. This celebrated picture, hanging in the very frame which formerly contained the picture of George II (the latter having been decapitated by a cannon-ball), now adorns the gallery of Nassau Hall.

One other circumstance rendered this Commencement memorable—the gift of two hundred and fifty dollars, presented by General Washington to the College. It is recorded on the minutes of the trustees "that Dr. Witherspoon reported that His Excellency, General Washington, had delivered to him fifty guineas, which he begged the trustees to accept as a testimony of his respect for the College."

The oration delivered before Washington and Congress, the painting and the gift, concur in making the Commencement of 1783 a rallying point of pleasant recollections to Presbyterians, in reference to the Father of our country.

V. WASHINGTON AND THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

The first meeting of the "General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America" was held on May 21st, 1789. Dr. Witherspoon preached the sermon, and after the election of Moderator, the following, being its first official act, was passed by the Assembly:—

"Resolved, unanimously, That an address be presented from the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church to the President of the United States, and that Drs. Witherspoon, Alison and S. S. Smith be a committee to draft said address."

On the 26th of May the General Assembly took into consideration the draft of an address to the President of the United States, which, being amended, was adopted, and is as follows, viz.:—

"To the President of the United States:—

"SIR—The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America embrace the earliest opportunity in their power to testify the lively and unfeigned pleasure which they, with the rest of their fellow citizens, feel, on your appointment to the first office in the nation.

"We adore Almighty God, the Author of every perfect gift, who hath endowed you with such a rare and happy assemblage of talents, as hath rendered you equally necessary to your country in war and in peace. Your military achievements insured safety and glory to America, in the late arduous conflict for freedom, while your disinterested conduct and uniformly just discernment of the public interest gained you the entire confidence of the people; and, in the present interesting period of public affairs, the influence of your personal character moderates the divisions of political parties, and promises a permanent establishment of the civil government.

"From a retirement more glorious than thrones and sceptres, you have been called to your present elevated station, by the voice of a great and free people, and with an unanimity of suffrage, that has few if any examples in history. A man more ambitious of fame or less devoted to his country would have refused an office in which his honors could not be augmented, and where they might possibly be subject to a reverse. We are happy that God has inclined your heart to give yourself once more to the public. And we derive a favorable presage of the event from the zeal of all classes of the people, and their confidence in your virtues, as well as from the knowledge and dignity with which the Federal Councils are filled. But we derive a presage even more flattering, from the piety of your character. Public virtue is the most certain means of public felicity, and religion is the surest basis of virtue. We, therefore, esteem it a peculiar happiness to behold in our Chief Magistrate a steady, uniform, avowed friend of the Christian religion, who has commenced his administration in rational and exalted sentiments of piety, and who, in his private conduct, adorns the doctrines of the gospel of Christ, and on the most public and solemn occasions, devoutly acknowledges the government of Divine Providence.

"The example of distinguished characters will ever possess a powerful and extensive influence on the public mind, and when we see, in such a conspicuous station, the amiable example of piety to God, of benevolence to men, and of a pure and virtuous patriotism, we naturally hope that it will diffuse its influence, and that, eventually, the most happy consequences will result from it. To the force of imitation we will endeavor to add the wholesome instructions of religion. We shall consider ourselves as doing an acceptable service to God, in our profession, when we contribute to render men sober, honest and industrious citizens, and the obedient subjects of a lawful government. In these pious labors we hope to imitate the most worthy of our brethren of other Christian denominations, and to be imitated by them, assured that if we can, by mutual and generous emulation, promote truth and virtue, we shall render a great and important service to the republic, shall receive encouragement from every wise and good citizen, and above all, meet the approbation of our Divine Master.

"We pray Almighty God to have you always in His holy keeping. May He prolong your valuable life, an ornament and a blessing to your country, and at last bestow on you the glorious reward of a faithful servant.

"Signed by order of the Assembly,

"JOHN RUTHERFORD, Moderator.

"Philadelphia, May 26th, 1789."

WASHINGTON'S REPLY.

From A. C. the Assn. of the Clergy, p. 10.

"To the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, in the United States of America:—

"GENTLEMEN.—I receive with great sensibility the testimonial given by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, of the lively and unalloyed pleasure experienced by them on my appointment to the first office in the nation.

"Although it will be my endeavor to avoid being elated by the too favorable opinion which your kindness for me may have induced you to express of the importance of my former conduct, and the effect of my future services, yet, conscious of the disinterestedness of my motives, it is not necessary for me to conceal the satisfaction I have felt upon finding that my compliance with the call of my country, and my dependence on the assistance of Heaven to support me in my arduous undertakings, have, so far as I can learn, met the universal approbation of my countrymen. While I reiterate the professions of my dependence upon Heaven as the source of all public and private blessings, I will observe, that the general prevalence of piety, philanthropy, honesty, industry and economy seems, in the ordinary course of human affairs, particularly necessary for advancing and confirming the happiness of our country. While all men within our territories are protected in worshipping the Deity according to the dictates of their consciences, it is rationally to be expected from them, in return, that they will all be emulous of evincing the sincerity of their professions by the innocence of their lives and the benevolence of their actions. For no man who is profligate in his morals, or a bad member of the civil community, can possibly be a true Christian, or a credit to his own religious Society.

"I desire you to accept my acknowledgments for your laudable endeavors to render men sober, honest and good citizens, and the obedient subjects of a lawful government, as well as for your prayers to Almighty God for His blessing on our common country, and the humble instrument which he has been pleased to make use of in the administration of its government. GEORGE WASHINGTON."

VI. WASHINGTON, AND WASHINGTON COLLEGE, VIRGINIA.

In the year 1774 the Presbytery of Lexington, Va., resumed the consideration of a school for the liberal education of youth, judged to be of great and immediate importance. We do, therefore, agree to establish and patronize a public school. At present it shall be managed by Mr. William Graham, a gentleman properly recommended to this Presbytery, and under the inspection of the Rev. Mr. John Brown; and the Presbytery reserve to themselves the liberty, at a future session, more particularly to appoint the person by whom it shall be conducted, and the place where it shall be fixed." Thus commenced, under Presbyterian auspices, the education of youth in the Valley of Virginia. The Institution took the name of LIBERTY HALL. It was the means of training many useful ministers, and among the number the venerable ARCHIBALD ALEXANDER, &c. &c. It was a bulwark of liberty, as well as of learning and religion. It was incorporated in 1783, but the Presbytery retained a connection with it for some time; and although not now under ecclesiastical supervision, it is still managed by Presbyterians.

In 1785 the Legislature of Virginia expressed their sense of the value of General Washington's services, by a donation of one hundred shares in the James River Company and other property. Washington felt a delicacy either in accepting a donation for his private use, or in declining the gift of the State. When the shares began to be productive, in 1795, he addressed a communication to the Legislature, stating that he would appropriate them to a seminary at any place they might deem proper to recommend. The Legislature, in reply, requested General Washington to appropriate the shares to a seminary in the "upper country." In 1796 Washington wrote to the Governor of Virginia his final conclusion, stating, "After careful inquiries to ascertain a place, I have, upon the fullest consideration of all circumstances, destined those shares to the use of LIBERTY HALL Academy, in Rockbridge county."

The following correspondence passed between the trustees of the academy and General Washington, on this occasion:—

Str:—It was not earlier than September, 1797, that we were officially informed of your liberal donation to Liberty Hall Academy.

Permit us, as its immediate guardians, to perform the pleasing duty of expressing those sentiments of gratitude which so generous an act naturally inspires. We have been long sensible of the disadvantages to which literary institutions are necessarily subjected, whilst dependent on precarious funds for their support. Reflecting particularly on the many difficulties through which this seminary has been conducted since the first moments of its existence, we cannot but be greatly affected by an event which secures to it an independent and permanent establishment. Convinced as we are that public prosperity and security are intimately connected with the diffusion of knowledge, we look around with the highest satisfaction on its rapid advances in these United States, unfeigningly rejoicing that the citizen who has long been distinguished as the assertor of the liberties of his country adds to this illustrious character the no less illustrious one of patron of the arts and of literature. And we trust that no effort may be wanting on our part to encourage whatever branches of knowledge may be of general utility.

That you may long enjoy, besides the uninterrupted blessings of health and repose, the happiness which none but those who deserve it can enjoy, and which arises from the reflection of having virtuously and eminently promoted the best interests of mankind is the fervent prayer of the Trustees of Washington Academy, late Liberty Hall.

By order of the Board,

SAMUEL HOUSTON, Clerk.

His Excellency, GEORGE WASHINGTON,

Late President of the U. S. A.

WASHINGTON'S REPLY.

MOUNT VERNON, 17th June, 1798.

GENTLEMEN:—Unaccountable as it may seem, it is nevertheless true, that the Address with which you were pleased to honor me, dated the 12th of April, never came to my hand until the 11th inst.

To promote literature in this rising empire, and to encourage the arts, have ever been amongst the warmest wishes of my heart. And if the donations which the generosity of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Virginia has enabled me to bestow upon Liberty Hall, now, by your politeness, called Washington Academy, is likely to prove a means to accomplish these ends, it will contribute to the gratification of my desires.

Sentiments like those which have flowed from your pen excite my gratitude, whilst I offer my best vows for the prosperity of the Academy, and for the honor and happiness of those under whose auspices it is conducted.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Trustees of Washington Academy.

In 1813 Washington Academy was incorporated as a College. The donation of General Washington forms a considerable part of its present endowment, and is believed to yield an annual income of about three thousand dollars. Thus did the Father of his country assist in perpetuating an institution which has trained many worthy sons for the ministry of the Presbyterian Church, as well as for other professions in life. As a PATRON OF EDUCATION his name is endeared to us, and he who led our armies to liberty, and our national councils to prosperity and honor, has also been instrumental, under the same divine guidance, in conducting many of our youth to learning, religion and usefulness.

Gennet, Charles, was born in the city of New York, June 9th, 1807. His parents removed to Poughkeepsie, Dutchess county, in the year 1812, where he received a plain English education, chiefly in the Lancasterian schools of those days. He removed to Richmond, Va., in 1829, where he engaged in mercantile pursuits, in which he continues at this present time (1883). In the year 1831 he was received in the First Presbyterian Church, under the charge of Rev. William J. Armstrong, and was elected deacon in the Grace Street Presbyterian Church, Rev. C. H. Read, D. D., pastor, in 1860.

Mr. Gennet acted as Treasurer of this church for some twenty-five years, and was elected Treasurer of Publication by the General Assembly of 1867, which office he retained until 1878. He has been a successful man in mercantile life, and an active worker in all the schemes of the Church, and, though now nearly fourscore years of age, retains his bright, genial manners, and his methodical attention to business.

George, William, D. D., was born in the north of Ireland, near the noted city of Derry, in the year 1829. While yet a mere boy he came with relatives to Kentucky, which became his permanent home. After varied experiences, some of which were sufficiently severe, including services with Kentucky troops in the Mexican War, he pursued a liberal course of study at Danville, preparatory, collegiate and theological. He graduated from Centre College in 1855, a worthy member of one of the most distinguished classes ever connected with that Institution. Having consumed three years in teaching, he entered the Danville Theological Seminary. Licensed by the Presbytery of Transylvania in the Spring of 1861, he was, after completion of the theological course, ordained by the Presbytery of Ebenezer, in the Fall of 1861, and installed pastor of the Springfield Church, which, with that of Mount Sterling, he had been serving. In 1863 he became pastor of the Midway Church. In 1870 he returned to the Springfield pastorate. In 1873 he was translated to the Bethel Church. All this service was in Kentucky. In 1880 he was settled in Fort Worth, Texas, where he still is pastor of a prosperous church.

Dr. George possesses some of the best traits of the good stock whence he sprang; a warm heart, a genial humor, a strong intellect, a fine moral sense; pluck that delights in overcoming obstacles; sympathy that glows with tenderness for all the afflicted; loyalty to Christ that counts no costs and fears no peril in its devotion to the Church and cause of his Lord. Of course, therefore, his has been a successful ministry. Called always to feeble churches, as an able, scholarly and consecrated pastor, he has always built them up in numbers, in sound doctrine and in spiritual power.

Gerrish, John, D. D., the oldest son of Joseph and Sarah (Church) Gerrish, was born April 26th, 1814, at Canterbury, N. H. He entered Dartmouth College, but failed to complete the course of study, on account of the state of his health. For a few years he devoted his attention to agriculture. Regaining his health, he entered Bangor Theological Seminary in 1843, and graduated in 1846. For some years he labored as an itinerant missionary in Vermillion county, Indiana. He was pastor at New Washington, Indiana, from October, 1853, to July, 1862. He subsequently supplied the Church in Lapeer, Michigan, from June, 1865, to December, 1877, he was pastor of the Church of Homer, Mich., where his labors were eminently successful and satisfactory. After leaving Homer he preached two years at Washington, Ind., and two years at Kansas, Edgar county, Ill. From the latter place he removed to Hays City, Kansas, where he is at present engaged as stated supply of the Presbyterian Church. As a preacher, Dr. Gerrish is clear, logical and profound, always elucidating his subject fully. Well acquainted with Church government and ecclesiastical law, his opinions have great weight with those who know him best. As a pastor he has watched and led his flock, endeavoring himself to his people, cheerfully sacrificing his own preferences and feelings when the cause of Christ and the interests of the Church required such sacrifice. His ministerial career has been that of a faithful servant of the Lord.

Gibson, Rev. Joseph T., was born February 13th, 1814, in Jefferson county, Pa. He graduated at Washington and Jefferson College, in the class of 1839. During the next two years he was Superintendent of Public Schools of Indiana county, Pa., and at the same time he prosecuted the course of study prescribed by the Western Theological Seminary. Having graduated from that Institution in the Spring of 1841, he accepted a call to Covey Chapel Presbytery of Baltimore, where he did remarkably good service for eight years. From Baltimore Presbytery he was dismissed to the Presbytery of Allegheny, that he might accept a call to the Church of Sharpshong, Pa., his present charge.

Mr. Gibson is a gentleman of frank manners, modest carriage and magnanimous disposition. He preaches well, with or without notes. He is not content with surface truth, but works down to the bottom facts, and puts them before his audience in a masterly style, progressing, without a break or lateral deviation, to the end of his discourse. As a pastor, he looks well to his flock, and displays, in the management of affairs, executive ability of a high order.

There are few abler Presbyters than Mr. Gibson. To his knowledge of the form of government, the decisions of the General Assembly, and of ecclesiastical polity, he adds a ready wit, courage of opinion, and persuasive speech, which give him great influence in deliberative assemblies.

Gibson, William J., D. D., was born August 22d, 1810, in Ryegate, Vt. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pennsylvania, in 1826. After teaching for a time, and having studied theology privately for two years previously, under the care of the Reformed (Covenanter) Presbytery, he changed his church relations in 1830, and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Old Presbytery of Philadelphia, October 30th, 1831. Soon after he received a call to the Ninth Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, which had just been vacated by the Independent Presbyterian Church, Rev. John Chambers, pastor, and was installed its pastor February 7th, 1832. In this church he continued his ministry until the Spring of 1838. He became pastor of the Church in Hollidaysburg, Pa., in April, 1839. In 1841 he was called to the Union Church, Philadelphia. The following year he was called to Williamsburg, and while pastor there he supplied Martinsburg, until called for half his time to Sinking Valley. After a prosperous pastorate of some years in this field, he was called, in 1852, to Lick Run, at Jacksonville, Centre county, then a large, strong church. Here he continued until October, 1861. He subsequently supplied the churches of Pine Grove and Duncansville, and finally became pastor of the churches of Martinsburg and Duncansville, which he continued to serve until increasing blindness and growing infirmity compelled his retirement from the active ministry. He died in 1883.

Dr. Gibson was highly appreciated as a minister of the gospel and profound theologian. He was a faithful and fearless advocate of sound doctrine. He was also a good Presbyter, well versed in Presbyterian law and modes of procedure. His interest in all religious questions and work was unabated to the last. As an author he wrote much and powerfully for the press, and has left behind a printed debate on Baptism, showing great skill and deep research, and a history of Huntingdon Presbytery, with several biographical sketches of its deceased members, both clerical and lay.

Giddings, Rev. Salmon, A. M., was the father of Presbyterianism in a portion of Illinois lying East of the Father of Waters. In December, 1815, he was commissioned by the Connecticut Missionary Society to labor in the western country, particularly St. Louis. He came to that city on horse back, that same Winter, preaching often while passing through the destitute settlements. The people were hospitable, fed his horse and made him welcome. He slept in their log cabins, partook of their plain fare, prayed in their families and talked to their children. He reached St. Louis, April 6th, 1816, and at once entered upon his labors on both sides of the river. He proceeded to organize Presbyterian churches, and as soon as possible united with three others in forming a Presbytery. Mr. Giddings labored in St. Louis for more than six years without a house of worship, constantly calling upon the people to rise up and build. At length this object was accomplished, and in June, 1825, the first Presbyterian Church building in St. Louis was dedicated. On Sabbath, November 9th, 1826, Mr. Giddings was installed pastor of the congregation. He died in St. Louis, February 1st, 1828, and the remains were deposited in a vault beneath the pulpit.

In due time a marble tablet was placed in the wall, with this inscription:—

IN MEMORY OF
REV. SALMON GIDDINGS, A. M.,

First Pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in St. Louis.

He was born in Connecticut, March 3, 1782; became a member of the Church of Christ 1807; was a graduate of Williamstown College,

Mass., and a student at Andover Theological Seminary; was ordained to the Gospel Ministry 1814; arrived in Missouri as the First Protestant Missionary, 1815; organized the First Presbyterian Church in St.

St. Louis, Nov. 15, 1817; died in the assurance of a joyful resurrection, Feb. 1, 1828, aged 45 years, 10 months, 28 days

As a man, he was kind, prudent and decisive; as a Christian, he was pious, cheerful and prayerful; as a minister, meek, laborious and persevering. His body mounds in its vault under this house of worship, which his labors contributed to erect. His spirit has gone to receive its reward.

"Well done, good and faithful servant."

When, in 1853, the edifice was pulled down, that vault was opened. A few bones, clean and bare, were all that remained, save a small residuum of dark, damp dust. The relics were disinterred and placed in a copper urn in a cemetery vault, and, when the new edifice was dedicated, deposited again beneath the pulpit.

Giger, George Musgrave, D.D., was born in Philadelphia, Pa., June 6th, 1822; graduated at Princeton College, with high honors, in 1841; studied theology at Princeton Seminary; was licensed by Baltimore Presbytery, in 1844; and in 1860 was ordained by New Brunswick Presbytery. Soon after finishing his theological course he was chosen Tutor in Princeton College; in 1846 he was elected Adjunct Professor of Greek, and in 1854, Professor of the Latin Language and Literature, which chair he held till 1865, when declining health compelled him to resign. He died, October 14th, 1865. Dr. Giger was ardently attached to the interests of the College with which he was so long connected. He bequeathed to it his library, and made it a residuary legatee to the amount of thirty thousand dollars. He was a faithful man—never preferred policy to duty—never made a compromise with conscience. As an instructor he was eminently successful. He was public-spirited as a citizen. His efforts in the cause of education, his self-denying labors in behalf of the colored people, for whom he preached in Witherspoon Church, in Princeton, and his uprightness and fidelity in all relations, won him warm regard.

Gilbert, Eliphalet Wheeler, D. D., was born in Lebanon, N. Y., December 19th, 1793. He graduated at Union College, in 1813, and was ordained by the Presbytery of New Castle, May 29th, 1818. Soon after his licensure he became pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Wilmington, Del. There he remained until 1831, during which year he accepted the presidency of Delaware College. He returned, however, to Wilmington in the following year, in obedience to the call of the Hanover Street Church. In 1841 he became once more President of Delaware College, and retained this office until 1847, when he accepted a call from the Western Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. Here he remained until his death, in 1853.

Dr. Gilbert was a man of clear mind and of decided views; skilled as a controversialist, yet with such courtesy to his opponents, that when the joust was over they were among the first to sit down in his tent. He was "mighty in the Scriptures," and studied them with constant care. His effort as a preacher was to set forth the truth in strong, sharp outlines, yet these outlines were often illuminated and tinted by vivid lights and touches. He was an omnivorous reader, and drew knowledge and illustration from every available source. In the discussion of theological questions he charmed his hearers by crystalline statements, acute distinctions, and the playful radiance which he threw over all. His life ran into that of the Church at large, like a clear, bright stream, whose qualities were only diffused, not lost, after the stream had ceased to flow.

Gilbreath, Rev. John Naylor, son of James and Jane Naylor Gilbreath, was born in Rhea county, Tenn., September 1st, 1811. He was graduated from Greeneville College, Greene county, East Tennessee, 1835, and immediately afterwards entered Princeton Seminary, where he was regularly graduated in September, 1840. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, August 5th, 1840, and was ordained by the Presbytery of St. Louis, at Potosi, Mo., April 4th, 1841. From 1841-42 he served the Church at Des Peres, Mo., as stated supply, then accepted a call to the two churches of Des Peres and Bonhomme, and was installed over Bonhomme Church, October 2d, 1842, and over Des Peres Church, November 27th, 1842. He was released from Bonhomme Church, January 3d, 1846, and from Des Peres Church, April 21st, 1849. In October, 1846, he established and became principal of the Des Peres Institute, a position he successfully occupied until 1861, at the same time, during all these years and until 1868, supplying, most of the time, the Des Peres Church. He then labored about four years, 1869-73, as a missionary in the southwestern part of Missouri; subsequently supplied Newport Church two years, 1874-76; then the Church at Washington, Mo., one year, 1876-7, and the Joachim Church one year, 1877-8. He then again became stated supply to Des Peres Church, and continued there to the end of his life. He died, March 7th, 1881. Mr. Gilbreath was a good man, a genial companion, a warm friend, a zealous laborer in the work of the ministry, a staunch upholder of sound doctrine, unsparring of his means and efforts for advancing the cause of Christ.

Gilchrist, Rev. Adam, was born in Charleston, S. C., April 10th, 1806. He graduated at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., in 1825; studied theology at Princeton, N. J., and was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery in 1830. The following year he was ordained and installed by Charleston Presbytery as pastor of the Church in Walferboro, S. C. Here he labored earnestly and faithfully, when he accepted a call to the Church in Fayetteville, N. C., and was installed its pastor in March, 1841. Here it was that his life-work was accomplished. He was a faithful pastor and a kind counsellor. His humility, purity and exalted piety won for him the affection and esteem of all with whom he associated. He died, March 27th, 1861.

Gildersleeve, Rev. Benjamin, D. D., was born near Norwalk, Conn., January 5th, 1791. Whilst in charge of a school at Green's Farm, Conn., he was hopefully converted, and united with the Church. He graduated at Middlebury College, Vt., in 1811, and, after teaching in Georgia, entered Princeton Seminary in 1817, remaining there a little over a year. For a time he was editor of "The Missionary," In 1826 he became editor of "The Christian Observer," which post he held until 1845, when he removed to Richmond, Va., where he was sole editor of "The Watchman and Observer," until 1856, and after that, until 1860, was associated with the Rev. Moses D. Hoze, D. D., and the Rev. Thomas V. Moore, D. D., as editor of "The Central Presbyterian." During his residence in that city he preached wherever he found an open door, especially in the Virginia Penitentiary, where his labors were greatly blessed. In advanced life he lost his sight, but continued his ministry long after his vision was entirely gone. He died at the residence of his son, Dr. J. R. Gildersleeve, Tazewell county, Va., June 29th, 1875, in his eighty-fifth year, leaving, especially in the region where he spent his later years, a fragrant memory.

Gill, Rev. William Hugh, is a native of Ireland. He was born in County Down, February 27th, 1811. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1861, and pursued his theological studies at the seminaries of Allegheny and Princeton. Ordained by the Presbytery of Blairsville, June 26th, 1867, he was pastor at Greensburg, Pa., 1867-70; pastor-elect of the Sixth Street Church, St. Joseph, Mo., 1870-72; pastor of the Central Church, Allegheny, Pa., 1872-78; and in 1878 was installed over the Church at Westfield, N. J. He resides at present at Greensburg. He is a preacher of ability, and earnest in the Master's work.

Gill, Rev. William John, the son of James and Mary (Edgar) Gill, was born, March 26th, 1830, in county Down, Ireland. After the usual preparation, he entered the college at Belfast, when not quite sixteen years of age, and having completed the required six years' course of study, including theology, was licensed by the Down Presbytery, about 1852. Having preached as a licentiate, under Presbyterian direction, with much success, he was ordained and installed over the Church of Lismore, by the Presbytery of Cork. Providential circumstances having led him to Scotland, he attended medical lectures in Glasgow for several months, and accepted, for a year, the position of Secretary of the West Coast Mission, which, by his efforts, was established on a secure basis. His second pastoral charge was a congregation of the Free Church of Scotland, on the Isle of Bute, whence he was called to the Presbyterian Church of Salford, Manchester, England, over which he was installed, March, 1863. Coming to America, for a vacation trip, in 1871, he was called to the First Presbyterian Church, Des Moines, Iowa. This call was accepted, and the pastorate continued until 1879, when he was called to the Westminster Presbyterian Church, Baltimore, Md., his present charge (1883). Mr. Gill's pastoral labors have been greatly blessed. He has ever been generously unselfish in aiding weak churches. As a preacher he has a vivid conception of his subject, great command of language, and an earnest, sympathizing manner. In his sermons the great doctrines of the Word of God, and the privileges and duties resulting from them, are enforced by arguments and illustrations drawn from that Divine source, and from vast stores of human learning.

Gillam, Rev. Jeremiah C., was born November 30th, 1826, at Peter's Creek, Allegheny county, Pa. He graduated at Jefferson College, in 1856. After graduating he spent three years in the Theological Seminary at Allegheny, and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Coshocton, in April, 1859, at Millersburg, Ohio. He seems to have been an exception to the proverb, "A prophet is not without honor, save in his own country," for he has been preaching in the neighborhood of his early home all his life. His first pastoral charge was Mount Eaton, where he remained from 1859 to 1868. During this pastorate he also conducted a select English and Classical school, at Berlin, Ohio, called Berlin Institute. After leaving this charge he preached to the churches of Shreve and Homessville, as stated supply, for three years, adding greatly to their prosperity. He was then called to the churches of Canal, Fulton and Marshallville, where he remained over seven years, doing a good work. He is at present pastor elect and stated supply at Mt. Eaton, where his work has been greatly blessed. He is an acceptable preacher, and an excellent and useful man in the ministry.

Gilland, Rev. James Wesley, is the fourth of six sons of Thomas and Susan (Conrad) Gilland, and was born in Antrim township, Franklin county, Pa., November 24th, 1853. Having graduated at Lafayette College, Easton, Pa., in June, 1877, he entered Union Theological Seminary, New York, in September of the same year, where he completed the course of study in May, 1880. He was licensed to preach by the Classis of East Pennsylvania, Reformed (German) Church, which met at Easton, Pa., May 25th, of the same year. Was received under the care of Carlisle Presbytery as a licentiate from the Reformed Church in the United States the following October. Received and accepted a call from the Presbyterian Church at Duncannon, Pa., January 9th, 1881, when he was ordained and installed the following June. His brief pastorate has been greatly blessed.

Gillespie, Rev. George, was born in 1683, in the town of Glasgow, and educated in the University there. He was licensed by Glasgow Presbytery, early in 1712, and came to New England in the Spring. He first settled at Woodbridge. He was ordained May 28th, 1713, having received a call from the people of White Clay Creek. Red Clay, Lower Brandywine and Elk River, besides White Clay, seem to have formed his charge for several years. He is said to have organized the congregation of the Head of Christiana, and he served it till his death, which occurred January 2d, 1760. Mr. Gillespie was zealous for the interests of the Church, and was remarkably punctual in attendance on Presbytery and Synod. Mr. Alison, who knew him, called him "that pious saint of God."

Gilliam, Marshall M. was born in Buckingham county, Virginia, on the 10th day of December, 1843, of Presbyterian parents. He came, on his father's side, of an old Huguenot family, whose ancestor was an early settler in the State. His mother was a daughter of Benjamin Marshall, of Virginia. He entered the Junior Class at Hampden-Sidney College, in his fourteenth year, and graduated with distinction, in the entire curriculum of that Institution, at fifteen and a half years of age. While a student at college he made a profession of his faith in Christ and became a member of the Presbyterian Church. He entered the University of Virginia as a student in the academic and law departments. He was one of the first graduates in the Law Class of 1867. While at the University he united with Professor Minor in some religious work among the colored people in that vicinity. He came to Richmond, Va., in 1868, and entered the legal profession, and has been closely engaged in the practice of law since that time. He has been an active worker in Sabbath schools the greater part of his life, and has been superintendent of the Sabbath School of the Second Presbyterian Church of Richmond, for the last fourteen years. He is a ruling elder of that Church, to which office he was elected in 1875. He has been a member of the Committee of Publication since 1879.

Gilliland, Rev. James, a son of Alexander and Frances Gilliland, was born in Lincoln county, N. C., October 28th, 1769. He graduated at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., in 1792, and presented his theological studies, partly, at least, under the direction of the Rev. William C. Davies, of South Carolina. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of South Carolina, September 26th, 1794, and was ordained and installed pastor of the Broadway congregation in 1796. He retained his connection with this congregation a little less than eight years, and both his character and ministrations were highly appreciated. He resigned this charge, April 4th, 1804, and in 1805 settled in Red Oak, Brown county, O., where he remained till the close of his life, February 1st, 1845. Mr. Gilliland was of a social, cheerful disposition. He was a very humble and modest man. Self nothing, Christ all in all, seemed to be his motto. On the plain head-stone that marks his grave, the only memorial, by his own request, is, "James Gilliland, Born —, Died —." His sermons were clear, practical, experimental, instructive, and often strikingly original. But that which imparted the richest lustre to all his powers was his sincere, heartfelt godliness. He was an eminently devout and experimental Christian.

Gilman, Winthrop S., was for many years an elder of the Presbyterian Church of Alton, Ill. He now resides, in advanced years, at Hey Ho, New York. His pastor at Alton, Rev. A. T. Norton, D. D., bears this testimony of him: "His name is associated with every public or private enterprise, in the early history of the church. Possessing a delicacy of feeling, a refinement of manner almost feminine, he was yet ever true to his convictions and firm in manly purpose. Broad and liberal in his views, yet ever guided by principles so fixed that all knew where to find him. Generous, even to the Scripture rule, in his benevolences, yet so silent and unobtrusive that few knew their extent or variety. No good cause ever failed of his sympathy or of material aid to the extent of his ability. Occupied through a long life by the demands of a large business, yet so systematic that he found time, not only for church and public duties, but for so thorough and general reading that few are more familiar, not only with the best current literature, but with that of past times, or possess a truer love for it. In short, few are so well entitled to the name of a Christian gentleman. He is one of the best and most influential elders the Presbyterian Church in the United States has ever had." Mr. Gilman was chairman of the Assembly's Committee which carried to a successful completion the magnificent project of a memorial re-union fund of five million dollars.

Glen, Rev. William Renwick, was born in Glasgow, Scotland, January 12th, 1812, and came to the United States at an early age. He was prepared for college at the Hudson River Seminary, Stockport, N. Y., and Barr Seminary, Vt., but never graduated at any college. He graduated at Princeton Seminary in 1848, was licensed by the Presbytery of North River, April 21st, 1847, and, supported in full by the late Francis N. Buck, Esq., of Philadelphia, labored as a missionary to the coal miners of Schuylkill and adjacent counties, Pa., 1847-52. He was pastor of the Church at Tamaqua, Pa., from June 9th, 1852, until August 12th, 1856; of German Valley Church, N. J., from October 17th, 1856 until January 13th, 1868, and pastor elect at Bloomington, Ill., from January 20th, 1868, until installed, July 11th, 1869, which relation was dissolved after the Rennon, April 5th, 1871. He then served the Church at Heyworth, Ill., from April 5th, 1871, until July 1st, 1872. From July 1st, 1872, to January 1st, 1873, he labored as a missionary to the feeble and vacant churches of Bloomington. He was installed pastor of the church at Monticello, Ill., June 10th, 1873, and, on account of impaired health, resigned the charge, May 1st, 1875. He died March 31st, 1880. Mr. Glen was a man of a tender, true and affectionate nature, of deep and fervent piety, prayerful, conscientious, industrious, an unflinching worker, wearing himself out for Christ, always keeping in view, as his great aim, the salvation of souls.

Glendy, Dr. John, was born in Londonderry, in the north of Ireland, June 24th, 1755. Exiled by the British Government for supposed complicity with the Irish Rebellion, he found an asylum in America. After preaching in Virginia for two years very acceptably, he was called, in 1803, to the Second Church in Baltimore, expressly formed for him by his admirers. He served as Chaplain to Congress in 1806, 1815 and 1816. His growing infirmities led to the settlement of Dr. John Buckenidge as associate pastor in 1826, and finally compelled him to resign entirely. He died in Philadelphia October 4th, 1832, aged seventy-seven.

Dr. Glendy's style resembled that of his fellow-countrymen, Currier and Phillips. It was a torrent of eloquent declamation. He fascinated his audience and commanded their rapt attention by his graceful, ornate and fluent diction. He was neat in his dress, and wore his hair curled and powdered. His manners were courtly, and he was profuse in the language of compliment. Though not deficient in orthodoxy, his preaching was not calculated to awaken sinners or to promote revivals. The only production of his pen was an "Oration on the Death of General Washington."

Glover, Rev. William, was born of sturdy Scotch ancestry, in Edinboro', April 9th, 1815. His early religious training laid the foundation for a sterling and symmetrical Christian character. In 1832 he emigrated with his parents to Canada, where he learned the miller's trade. At the age of twenty-seven, he was brought to make a public confession of Christ, and he soon began a life of Christian activity and usefulness. At the age of forty-four he was ordained an elder in the Presbyterian Church of Peterboro', Canada, and for eighteen years past he has filled that office in Lockport, N. Y., as a co-pastor of the flock. He is one of the founders and original elders of Calvary Church. For thirteen years past Mr. Glover has been a missionary of the Presbyterian Board of Publication, not only disseminating the printed gospel, but "preaching publicly and from house to house." He is frequently called to supply pulpits, and has sometimes filled vacancies steadily for a year. Although very acceptable as a preacher, he has thought best to decline ordination and the pastorate. His preaching is eminently Biblical, and though not scholastic, it is so surcharged with the unction of the Spirit, and enforced by character, that it proves a great blessing. His unworldliness and spirituality render his visits like those of a heavenly stranger, and yet a universal friend. God's grace has wrought mightily in and through him, assisting pastors in revivals and conducting them alone. He magnifies his eldership, both in teaching and ruling, and in it all he is encouraged and aided by a devoted and beloved wife. His well known wisdom in difficult and delicate church affairs renders him a frequently solicited counsellor. His eminent piety and consistency have made him greatly respected and beloved, so that "his praise is in all the churches."

Godfrey, Captain Benjamin, was born at Chatham, Mass., December 4th, 1794. He spent nine years in Ireland, where he was probably occupied in short coasting voyages. The war of 1812-15 brought him home, and he was connected with the naval service during some part of the war. He afterwards made several voyages, as commander of a merchant ship, to various parts of the world, including Italy and Spain. He also, in command of his own ship, made many voyages from Baltimore to New Orleans and the West Indies. In 1826 he located at Matamoros, Mexico, where he opened up a very successful mercantile business. Subsequently he lived, prosperous in business, in New Orleans, where he remained until 1832, when he came North and settled in Alton, Ill. He united with the Alton Presbyterian Church, on profession, November 3d, 1833. The same year he erected, with his own means, a commodious stone church, with a basement and spire, on the northeast corner of Third and Market streets, where the Episcopal Church now stands. He retained the title to the property in his own hands, and gave the use of it to the Presbyterian and Baptist churches, who occupied it jointly until 1831, when the Baptists removed elsewhere, and the Presbyterians occupied it solely until April 27th, 1845.

July 5th, 1840, Captain Godfrey was elected an elder in the Alton Presbyterian Church, and remained such until September 18th, 1844, when his church relation was transferred to Monticello Church, in which he acted as elder until his death. With him originated the idea of the Monticello Female Seminary, and upon the building he expended $53,000. His name was associated with every good public and private enterprise in the place of his residence. Few are so well entitled to the name of a Christian gentleman. He died at Godfrey, Ill., August 13th, 1862.

Goodale, Montgomery Smith, D. D., son of Timothy and Lydia Goodale, was born in Conway, Mass., March 23d, 1806. After graduating at Amherst College, in 1831, and completing his theological course, at Hartford Seminary in Connecticut, he was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Amsterdam village, New York, by the Presbytery of Albany, in 1837. In this relation Dr. Goodale continued until the year 1871, when he became Pastor Emeritus, retiring from the active work of the ministry, but retaining the confidence and love of the people who have grown up under his careful training.

Without making any pretension, Dr. Goodale was an earnest and faithful preacher of the doctrines of grace, never shunning to declare the whole counsel of God. The result of this great fidelity is seen in the successive revival seasons which contributed so largely to make the church what it is to-day, one of the best and most active in the Presbytery of Albany.

Dr. Goodale has fully justified the reputation which has long been accorded to him, of being not only a true and good man, but a wise counsellor. By his honesty and wisdom and good common sense he became the trusted adviser of other churches besides his own. He was eminently and in the best sense a man of peace. And for thirty-seven years, amid all the agitations of Church and State, the Presbyterian Church in Amsterdam enjoyed uninterrupted harmony. Others have entered into Dr. Goodale's labors, but his influence for good is still felt, and some of his last works rank among his best works, the efforts put forth in his riper years. Dr. Goodale, at an early day, was a corporate member of the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions. During his ministry he published a number of occasional sermons. But his memorial is the church to which he gave his life.

Goodhue, Rev. George Franklin, the son of Samuel and Mary Goodhue, was born in Deerfield, New Hampshire, June 16th, 1821. He was educated at Dartmouth College, and studied divinity in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J., where he was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery, and entered upon his labors as a missionary in New Jersey, at May's landing, Weymouth, and several stations. He was appointed to this field June 1st, 1849. The following year he removed to the West, settling at Marengo, Ill., where he was ordained and installed, and where he labored for a number of years, thence to Belydere, Ill., and on the breaking down of his health, he removed to Southeast, N. Y., where he labored until his death, November 8th, 1865. Mr. Goodhue was among the first and most successful founders of the Presbyterian Church in Northern Illinois. He was identified with every good cause: the ministry foremost, and with it education, religious literature, temperance. He was a missionary, pastor, church builder, school founder, superintendent of colportage, and president of collegiate institute. "In all his private relations," says one who knew him well, "he was what, if it were all told, would be regarded as the language of intemperate eulogy. But he was indeed so faithful, so utterly unselfish, so constant, so true, so gentle and easy to be entreated, so full of mercy and good fruits, so patient under disappointment and even under misrepresentation, so genial, generous and sympathizing, so ready to bear others' burdens, and yet so humble and so unconscious of his own generosity, so ignorant or unmindful of his own self-sacrifice, and making himself so happy in the happiness he provided for others, that it would be as difficult to exaggerate his virtues as to discover his defects."

Goodrich, Harvey, was born in Cayuga county, N. Y., in 1793, and removed to Albion in 1823. He was for some time officially connected with the Erie Canal. He was ordained elder of the Albion Church, January 11th, 1825, and served in this office until his death, August 4th, 1863. He was a man of profound convictions and positive characteristics, and yet eminently a man of peace. He abounded in good works, kindly ministering to the poor, the sick, and the afflicted. He died in the full and blessed hope of the gospel. To this man of consecrated life, more than any other, perhaps, is to be traced the origin of the Presbyterian Church of Albion, N. Y., in 1821.

Goodrich, Hiram P., the son of Benjamin D. and Elizabeth (Plummer) Goodrich, was born in 1800, at Richmond, Mass. He graduated at Union College, N. Y.; studied theology at Princeton, N. J., and was licensed by Albany Presbytery in 1825. On leaving Princeton, in 1826, he was elected Professor in the Union Theological Seminary, Va.; he also labored as an evangelist through the destitute portions of the Presbytery of West Hanover, working earnestly for the good of souls. On resigning his professorship he went to Missouri, and entered fully upon his Master's cause, first at Marion, where he was also President of the College; then Jefferson City, St. Louis, and Charondelet; winning souls to Christ, building churches, and working with apostolic zeal. Whilst thus employed he died, May 17th, 1858.

Goodrich, William Henry, D. D., was born in New Haven, Conn., January 19th, 1823. He was a son of Rev. Chauncey A. Goodrich, D. D., long a distinguished Professor in Yale College, and in the theological department of that University. His grandfather was for years a distinguished member of the United States Senate, and his mother was the daughter of Noah Webster, the distinguished American lexicographer. Few men could look back upon a nobler ancestry, and yet this fact never led Dr. Goodrich to forget that his own character and usefulness must depend upon his own life and labors. He graduated at Yale College, in 1843, served as Tutor in that Institution for two years, studied theology in the Divinity School of New Haven, and then spent a year in foreign travel. He then became pastor in Bristol, Conn., and at the end of four years was called to the pastoral charge of the Presbyterian Church in the beautiful city of Burlington, N. Y. In 1859 he became associate pastor, with Dr. Aiken, of the "Old Stone Church" of Cleveland; as Dr. Aiken soon afterwards became Pastor Emeritus, Dr. Goodrich became sole pastor in active service, in which position he continued, with two long interruptions, occasioned by illness, for fourteen years, honored and loved, not only by his own congregation, but by all to whom he was known. As a preacher he was distinguished for culture, earnestness and spirituality. He was not much given to philosophical speculations and theorizing, but was eminently practical and impressive. His elocution was of a high order, and in preaching he commanded the close attention of all. In social life he was a gentleman, in the best sense of that term, and all loved his companionship. Very few men have ever lived who were so dearly loved as Dr. Goodrich. His heart was large, and he took into it all the people whom God had committed to his care. When any of his people were afflicted in any way, he sympathized most tenderly with them. He was the friend, not only in name, but in reality, of all who needed friendship.

After a ministry of twelve years in Cleveland, his health became seriously impaired. He left, in 1872, for a long vacation in Europe. Before leaving he had seen Dr. Hiram C. Hadyu installed to fill his place during his absence, and, as was expected, to be his associate pastor on his return. There followed him over the ocean the prayers and the love of thousands. His expectations of restored health were not realized. Bravely and cheerfully he bore up against the progress of disease, until, on Saturday evening, July 11th, 1874, in the city of Lausanne, Switzerland, his great, loving heart ceased to beat, and he passed into the presence of Him whom he so deeply loved and had so faithfully served, to be forever with the Lord.

Gordon, Hon. Isaac Grantham, was born December 22d, 1819, in Lewisburg, Pa. He is emphatically a self-made man, having risen, without any external advantages, to deserved eminence. Having received the rudiments of an ordinary English education in the common schools of his native place, by studying at night and during intervals of work, he reached an intellectual culture of a high order. He studied law in Lewisburg; was admitted to the Bar in April, 1843; opened an office in Curwensville, Clearfield county, and in 1846 settled in Brookville, Jefferson county. He was a member of the State Legislature in 1860 and 1861, being, in the latter year, Chairman of the General Judiciary Committee. In 1866, he was appointed President Judge of the Twenty-eighth Judicial District, to fill up an unexpired term. In 1873 he was elected to the Supreme Bench of the State, which position he continues to adorn by his ability, integrity and fidelity. Judge Gordon is an honored and useful elder in the Presbyterian Church.

Gordon, Thomas Patterson, D. D., was born in Monongahela City, Pa., July 23d, 1834, graduated at Jefferson College in 1854, and at the Western Theological Seminary in 1857, was licensed by Ohio Presbytery, and the following year was installed by Lancaster Presbytery as pastor of the Church in Cumberland, Ohio. He labored here with great acceptance till 1862, when he removed to Fayette, Pa., as pastor of Mintours Church, and remained there a few years. In January, 1866, he was appointed as agent for the Board of Domestic Missions. He resigned this position the first of July following, and accepted a call from Manchester Church, Allegheny, Pa. This pastorate lasted till 1850, when he removed to Wells-ville, Ohio. In 1856 he became pastor of the Sixth Church, Pittsburg, Pa. He remained in this charge but a single year. In 1857 he removed to Terre Haute, Ind., where he labored with faithfulness and zeal, and with the blessing of the Master, until his death, August 15th, 1865. As a friend and companion, Dr. Gorin was kind and genial, as a Presbyter he possessed great excellence; as a preacher he was eminently scriptural and faithful, and as a Christian he was devout and humble, and lived near to the Throne of Grace. His character commanded confidence and esteem wherever he was known.

Gorin, Rev. M. G., son of B. W. and Mary C. Gorin, was born in Louisiana, Pike county, Missouri, April 28th, 1836. He graduated at the University of Missouri, July 2d, 1852; studied law under Hon. J. B. Henderson, of St. Louis, and practiced law for some years, in co-partnership with Hon. T. S. Richardson, of Memphis, Mo. In December, 1863, Mr. Gorin removed to Lebanon, Ky., and the next Spring to Springfield, in the same State, where, for several years, he practiced his profession. At Springfield he made a public profession of religion; united with the Presbyterian Church, and was soon afterwards called to serve the Church, as a ruling elder. His profession of religion and connection with the Church mark the beginning of an entirely new manner of life, to which succeeding years but add development.

Notwithstanding many discouragements he soon commenced, under the direction of Rev. T. A. Braeken, D.D., of Lebanon, Ky., a course of study, preparatory to the gospel ministry, and was licensed by Transylvania Presbytery (Ky.), in September, 1870; ordained by the Presbytery of Palmyra (Mo.) in 1871, and shortly afterwards installed by the same Presbytery pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Memphis, Mo., his present field of labor.

Mr. Gorin is a superior classical scholar, and a critical expounder of the Word of God. He possesses a good physique, and his manner in the pulpit is dignified, earnest and impressive. Readily comprehending doctrinal truths in their systematic relations, his sermons, distinctly Calvinistic, are more instructive than emotional, though not lacking in earnest application and tender appeal. They abound in Scripture proofs, and the Cross of Christ is their central truth. The whole so preached as to warn every man, and teach every man in all wisdom.

Mr. Gorin is a man of decided religious convictions, hence of decided and uniform Christian character, and displays untiring activity in Church work. Having, over great obstacles, entered the ministry, his life is devoted to the work unto which he is called; and, without conferring with flesh and blood, or turning aside to please men, he goes forward as God opens the way. He is a successful pastor, a growing Presbyter, and is yet in the vigor of strong manhood.

Gosman, Abraham, D. D., was born at Danby, Tompkins county, N. Y., July 25th, 1819. He graduated at Williams College, in 1843. The next year he entered Princeton Seminary, and went through the prescribed three years' course, remaining another year upon a Fellowship, after completing the regular course. In the session of 1850-51 he assisted Dr. J. Addison Alexander in the Hebrew department, and in May, 1851, he was ordained to the ministry, and installed pastor of the Church at Lawrenceville, N. J., where he still remains, beloved by his people and blessed in his labors. Dr. Gosman was chosen to complete "The History of the Israelitish Nation," from Samuel to the Babylonish Captivity, left incomplete by Dr. Archibald Alexander. He also translated and edited a portion of Lange's Commentary on Genesis and Deuteronomy. In 1850 he contributed to the Princeton Review an article—"Neuman's Hebrew Commonwealth," and in 1851 another—"Pearson on Infidelity."

Gould, Capt. Gilbert, was born in Franklin County, Mass., February 24th, 1779, and descended from a long line of pious ancestors, being able to trace them back for thirteen or fourteen generations, Puritans, of England. He migrated to French Creek, Western Virginia, as one of many pioneers to the same place, in 1811. A Presbyterian Church was soon afterwards organized, and he became a prominent member and a ruling elder, which office he held fifty-four years, till his death, at the age of ninety-eight years. His influence in moulding the opinions of the people, and building up that prominent church, was great; for, though not well educated, in the common sense of the word, he was a reader and a thinker, and retained his mental faculties remarkably till the last. He was grandfather of the Rev. J. L. Gould, now missionary to the Hydahs of Alaska. All his numerous children became members of the same church.

Gould, Rev. William Ripley, was born in Sharon, Conn., May 27th, 1789; graduated at Yale College, in 1811, and at Andover Seminary in 1814. He was licensed and ordained as an evangelist in 1814, by the Hartford North Consociation, and was commissioned by the Connecticut Missionary Society to labor in Ohio for one year. But before the year closed he was invited to settle permanently at Gallipolis, Ohio. The town had been settled by French Catholics, who brought their priest with them from France, but failed to supply themselves with another after his death. Mr. Gould became the father of Presbyterianism, and, indeed, of the Protestant religion, within a wide field of thirty miles in distance, surrounding the town where he settled. After a laborious and eminently successful ministry of more than twelve years, he returned to Connecticut in 1825, and became a pastor in Torrington and Barkhamstead, Conn. In 1839 he was recalled and re-installed over the same church which he had organized and first ministered to at Gallipolis. In 1846, he finally left Ohio, and resided in Pottstown, Pa., without a regular charge, until his death, July 24, 1867. Alike in labor for Christ, and in suffering with them, Mr. Goulding was an example to his brethren in the ministry.

Goulding, Thomas, D. D., was born in Midway, Liberty county, Ga., March 14th, 1786. At the time of his death he was the oldest of fifteen ministers from one church, occupying, usefully and honorably, various important and responsible stations in the South. He received the principal part of his academic education at Wolcott, Conn., and studied law in New Haven. He was licensed to preach the gospel by Harmony Presbytery, in 1813. A few months after his licensure he commenced preaching, as a stated supply, at White Bluff, and was ordained and installed pastor of that church, January 1st, 1816. Here he labored faithfully, acceptably, and successfully, for about six years, during which time the warmest reciprocal attachments were formed between himself and his flock. In 1822 he resigned his charge, and removed to Lexington, Oglethorpe county. Here he remained for eight years, during which he exerted a strong and salutary influence over some of the first minds of the State.

On the establishment of the Theological Seminary of the Synod of South Carolina and Georgia, he was elected by the Synod its first, and for a time, its only Professor. For one year he instructed a Theological class at Lexington, in connection with his pastoral labors, and was then transferred, by direction of the Synod, to Columbia, S. C., the present site of the seminary. After serving the church laboriously, in the department of Ecclesiastical History and Church Government, for several years, in connection with others associated with him, he resigned his chair as Professor, and was called to be pastor at Columbus, in January, 1835. For thirteen years and a half he was the laborious and faithful pastor of that church. He found it comparatively weak, and, by his persevering fidelity, raised it to influence and strength. He was, for many years in succession, elected President of the Board of Trustees of Oglethorpe University, and held this office at the time of his death, which occurred June 26th, 1848. Dr. Goulding's character was formed of a rare combination of intellectual and moral qualities, that fitted him to be at once eminently popular and eminently useful. His intellect was much above the ordinary standard, and it had been cultivated by diligent and long-continued study. As a preacher, he was always sensible and instructive, and sometimes his pulpit efforts rose to a very high order of excellence.

Graham, Rev. Chauncey, was ordained by a council, January 29th, 1750; pastor of Rumbout and Poughkeepsie, in Dutchess county, N. Y. He gave up Poughkeepsie, September 29th, 1752. He was annexed to Dutchess Presbytery on its being received by the Synod in 1763. The records for many years are in his clear, beautiful hand. Being dismissed from Rumbout, he supplied Fishkill, and opened an Academy there. He took his dismission from the Presbytery in 1773, and died in 1781.

Graham, Mrs. Julia A., was the only daughter of Charles Graham, whose ancestor, James Graham, was a near relative of the Duke of Montrose, and came to this country with Sir Edmond Andros, Governor of the Province of New York, in 1678. In 1685 he was appointed Attorney General, and settled at Morrisania, then in Westchester county, at a homestead which was in the family during Mrs. Graham's girlhood. On her mother's side she was of Scotch-Irish descent, and her grandfather was a vestryman of Trinity Church. Her father was a distinguished member of the New York Bar, till his death, in 1838. Mrs. Graham had all the advantages which wealth, social connections and the best educational facilities could bestow upon her girlhood and young womanhood. Naturally her mind was acute and active. In 1833 she married the late General James Lorimer Graham, who otherwise was not related to the family, and shortly after made a tour of Europe, in after years extending her travels to the Holy Land. She joined the Presbyterian Church, of which her husband was a member. She gave her life to the work of Christ. Her beautiful home on Washington Square was the centre of many Christian activities. In 1862 she became a member of the Woman's Bible Society, and soon had the main responsibility of the work of superintending the Bible Women, which she did until the close of her life. She was also one of the Board of Managers of the Presbyterian Home for Aged Women, from its organization, in 1866.

In 1867 Mrs. Graham, with other ladies, formed a society, called the New Mexico, Arizona and Colorado Missionary Association, of which she was made President. For nearly three years this society labored to send out the means of grace to the distant and destitute parts of our country. At the time when the reunion of the two branches of the Presbyterian Church took place, this Society decided to enlarge their organization, and they became, in the Spring of 1870, the Ladies' Board of Missions, Auxiliary to the Home and Foreign Boards of Missions of the Presbyterian Church, of which Mrs. Graham was President up to the time of her death, February 19th, 1883.

In the death of Mrs. Graham the cause of missions lost one of its most devoted and indefatigable friends. Her influence had made itself to be felt, not only in our own country, but in many a far distant land. Not only was she mourned by those who had been associated with her in New York, but by others in the various mission fields, who had been cheered by her faithful correspondence and her unflinching sympathy and love. Many a young missionary teacher, in the isolation of her distant work, had found in her heart a refuge for her confidences and her sorrows, and had learned to love her as a mother. As the President of the Ladies' Board of Missions, she was wholly devoted to its interests. Although others who were associated with her were ever ready to lend their counsel and their help, yet none could keep pace with her indefatigable zeal, or devote, as she did, their whole time and strength to the work. Even when, amid the distracting influences which prevail in a great city, she encountered apathy in others, and suffered manifold discouragements where she had expected help, it was only to return to her work with the rebound of new purpose and increasing toil.

Of the last illness of Mrs. Graham it may be said, emphatically, that her end was peace. Though called to great suffering, she realized, in a rare degree, the sustaining grace of God, and seemed only to think of the last messages of love which she desired to send to one and another who had been associated with her in her great work. Out of the crucible of her patient suffering rose, for days and weeks, a spirit of prayer for missions, from which all the dross of self had been purged away. Verily she was abundant in labors, and died working for missions. Of her, as of another faithful one, it may well be affirmed, "she hath done what she could."

Graham, Rev. Loyal Young, was born near the town of Butler, Pa., in 1838. His father, James H. Graham, and his mother, Frances Graham (Thompson), were worthy members of the Presbyterian Church of Butler. Mrs. Graham died when her son Loyal was but an infant. Two days before her decease she dedicated this son to the Lord, in baptism, and then said to her pastor, for whom she named him, "I dedicate my boy to the gospel ministry. I wish you to watch over him, and take charge of his spiritual instruction." Mr. Graham graduated at Jefferson College in 1858, and pursued his theological studies at the Western Theological Seminary. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Allegheny, April 12th, 1860. He was pastor at Connellsville, Rehoboth and Peoria, with grand results of his ministry in these several places. In the position he occupies at present, as pastor of Olivet Church, Philadelphia, God has remarkably smiled upon his labors. The church has had a steady and solid growth. He is a faithful, earnest preacher, wholly devoted to his work, and is greatly beloved by his congregation, as well as esteemed by his brethren.

Graham, Samuel Lyle, D.D., was of Scotch-Irish extraction, and born in the town of Liberty, Bedford county, Va., February 9th, 1791. In May, 1812, he entered Washington College, Lexington, as a student, and graduated in April, 1814, receiving at the same time a premium awarded by the Faculty to the best scholar in the class. In 1815 he joined the Theological Seminary at Princeton, continuing until the close of the prescribed course, and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of

New Brunswick, April 29th, 1818. After his licensure, he was occupied for some months on the frontier in Indiana, then returned to Virginia, and for nearly two years following was engaged in missionary labors in Greenbriar and Monroe counties. In 1821 he removed to Granville county, N. C., was ordained by the Presbytery of Orange, September 7th of that year, divided his labors between the congregations of Oxford and Grassy Creek, and established a female school at Oxford. In 1828 he resigned his charge of the Oxford Church, and assumed the pastoral care of Nutbush Church, in connection with Grassy Creek. In 1830 and 1831 extensive revivals occurred in his churches. In 1832 he was elected to the Chair of Ecclesiastical History in the Union Theological Seminary, Va., but felt it to be his duty to remain with his pastoral charge. In 1833 he resigned the pastoral care of the Nutbush Church, and gave the portion of time he had devoted to that to the Church in Clarksville, Va. In 1834, he relinquished the care of Grassy Creek Church, and his labors were now divided between the churches of Clarksville and Shiloh, over which he was installed in July, 1835. In 1838 he was again elected to the Professorship in the Union Theological Seminary, accepted the position, and while faithfully discharging its duties, spent most of his Sabbaths in supplying vacant churches, within a moderate distance of the seminary. He died October 29th, 1851. Dr. Graham was a man of decidedly vigorous intellect, and much given to profound reflection. As a preacher, he was deservedly held in very high esteem. In the judicatories of the Church he was judicious and conciliating, but firmly and immovably attached to the doctrines and polity of the Presbyterian Church. He was particularly popular with young men, in whose enterprises and pursuits he took a kindly interest. He was always a great favorite of Dr. Archibald Alexander, which, of itself, is no mean praise.

Graham, Rev. William, was born, December 19th, 1745, in the township of Paxton, near Harrisburg, Lancaster county (now Dauphin), Pa. During his course at the College of New Jersey he stood pre-eminent as a scholar, and graduated in 1773. He studied theology under the tuition of the Rev. Mr. Roan, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Hanover, October 26th, 1775. Mr. Graham commenced his labors as a teacher in a classical school at Mount Pleasant, Va., which was the germ whence sprung Washington College. The school was subsequently removed to Timber Ridge meeting-house. The income from the Academy being small, and Mr. Graham's salary for preaching to the two congregations of Timber Ridge and Hall's meeting-house (now Monmouth) being paid in depreciated currency, it was impossible for him to support his family, and he resolved to engage in farming, purchasing a small farm on the North River, within a mile or two of the present site of Washington College. After relinquishing the establishment at Timber Ridge, Mr. Graham opened a school in his own house, which was continued until, in 1782, it was incorporated, under the name of Liberty Hall, which name it retained until it was endowed by General Washington, when his name was substituted for that which it had before borne.

Mr. Graham possessed a mind formed for accurate and profound investigation. As a preacher he was always instructive and evangelical. He was an ardent patriot and a thorough republican. From the time of his ordination he became a teacher of theology, and most of those who entered the holy ministry in the Valley of Virginia pursued their preparatory studies under his direction. Some of his pupils rose to eminence in the Church, and as Professors or Presidents of literary institutions. He died in Richmond, Va., June 8th, 1799, and his remains were deposited near the Episcopal Church, on the hill, over which a plain marble slab, with a short inscription, is placed. "The extent of the influence exerted by this one man over the literature and religion of Virginia," says Dr. A. Alexander (who was one of his students), "cannot be calculated."

Grant, Asahel, M. D., the Nestorian missionary, was born in Marshal, Oneida county, N. Y., August 17th, 1807. After studying medicine, he opened an office at Braintrim, Wyoming county, Pa., and, losing his wife four years after, he removed to Utica, N. Y., where he acquired a large and lucrative practice, and was an exemplary, active and useful Christian, and a valuable ruling elder in the First Presbyterian Church. On May 11th, 1835, Dr. Grant, accompanied by his second wife, Judith Lathrop Campbell, sailed from Boston, under commission from the A. B. C. F. M., and on October 27th arrived at Oroomiah, his destined station. The district is the Persian frontier in the direction of the Turkish Empire. The people for whom his labors were designed formed the scattered "remnant of a Church that once disputed with Rome the spiritual dominion of half the world." At this time, they had shrunk from the people of "twenty-five metropolitan provinces to a small sect," allowed to exist by Mohammedan tolerance, but pecked by exaction and pursued by persecution. Dr. Justin Perkins preceded Dr. Grant, and Mr. Merrick followed him. A school was immediately opened and operations rapidly extended and in every direction.

In 1839 Dr. Grant visited the almost inaccessible region in which the Nestorian Patriarch, Mar Shimon, resided. Here, on the rugged hills of Koordistan, and within its deep ravines, "the Waldenses of the East, the Protestants of Asia," dwell, Christians who had preserved, with few corruptions, an apostolic faith. The difficulties and dangers of the trip made it foolhardy to ordinary eyes, but did not daunt the zealous missionary, and he set out on it with the promise from the Patriarch of a guard through the Koord villages. His time, as a physician had gone before him, and often saved his life and secured him favors and help. For five weeks he journeyed there, taking the hardest fare and suffering the greatest fatigue, as well as encountering peril, and obtaining the information he desired, and encouraged by it to expect success in an enterprise there, he came back to his station.

Soon after—1841—the death of Mrs. Grant and the breaking down of his own health rendered a return to the United States an unavoidable necessity. His report to the Board determined it to establish a mission in the mountains, and in April, 1841, he went back to inaugurate it. In 1842 he made a tour, accompanied by the Patriarch, Mar Shimon, to the villages and sections of the region, and, selecting Asbita as the headquarters and centre, Mr. and Mrs. Laurie, April, 1843, opened a school there and started a mission. Soon after, Dr. Grant learned that the Pasha of Mosul was forming an alliance with the Koords, for the subjugation of the Mountain Nestorians, who had always been independent. Dr. Grant strove, in vain, to induce the infatuated people and their Patriarch either to make terms with the Turks, and so vanquish the Koords, or secure protection against them, or to make an alliance with the Persians, and so conquer both Koords and Turks. A shocking massacre ensued. The dead bodies of the murdered Nestorians filled the valleys and choked the mountain streams. For a time the mission buildings were left untouched, but in the end they too were destroyed, and the missionaries fled for their lives. Escaping to Mosul, Dr. Grant gave himself up to the relief of the poor fugitives who crowded the city, and there his health rapidly failed, and on the 25th of April he died.

Devotedness to missions was only one of the forms which Dr. Grant's passion for usefulness put on. Doing good was the aspiration of his soul and the aim of his life. Mrs. Grant, a remarkable woman, shared all her husband's enthusiasm for the Nestorians, and was scarcely less useful to them, and as much beloved by them. When she died, the bishops begged leave to bear her to her burial.

Grant, Rev. Thomas, was ordained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick in 1791, and was settled as pastor of the churches of Amwell and Flemington, N. J. Mr. Grant died in 1811, being succeeded in his churches by Rev. Jacob Kirkpatrick, D. D.

Graves, Rev. Allen Truman, son of Calvin and Lydia (Isbell) Graves, was born in Saratoga county, N. Y., June 25th, 1809. He graduated at Miami University in 1837; was stated supply at Huntington, Tenn., 1841-43; ordained evangelist by the Presbytery of the Western District, April 7th, 1843; was stated supply at Trenton, Tenn., 1843-51; stated supply at Bethel, Miss., 1852-55; assistant editor of Presbyterian Herald, Louisville, Ky., 1855-58; agent of the United States Christian Commission, 1864, and teacher in Plainfield, N. J., 1858-70. He died December 5th, 1878. As a preacher, Mr. Graves was serious and earnest. His services were especially sought for at sacramental seasons and protracted meetings, and his labors were greatly blessed in bringing sinners to Christ. He was an accurate scholar; from conviction a thorough Presbyterian, and ever ready to maintain and defend the doctrines of our standards. His end was peace.

Graydon, William, Esq., was born September 2d, 1759, near Bristol, Pennsylvania, and spent his early life in Philadelphia, where he pursued his classical education, and studied law in the office of EDWARD BIDDLE, Esq. He removed to Harrisburg, and entered upon the practice of his profession, while quite a young man. He was well educated, and a man of fine literary tastes. He was elected, at some date prior to 1812, an elder of the Church at Harrisburg. He was highly esteemed as a gentleman of the old school, in his manners refined, courteous, of unblemished integrity in the many trusts committed to him, of high and honorable principles, and in the Church and walks of Christian life a man of true piety and deep devotion to the Church, of which he was a ruling elder for twenty-eight or thirty years. He was honored by his fellow-citizens with the office of Magistrate, was a Justice of the Peace for several years, and published a "Book of Forms," well known as a standard to professional men, also a Digest of the Laws of the United States. He died October 13th, 1810, in the eighty-second year of his age, ripe in years and full of honors.

Gready, Rev. William Postell, son of Andrew Plyme and Prudence Eliza (Switzer) Gready, was born in Charleston, S. C., June 5th, 1817; was graduated from Yale College, A. D. 1842; went immediately to Princeton Seminary, where he spent three years, 1842-45, and was regularly graduated; was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery, April 23d, 1845, and was ordained by Hopewell Presbytery, an evangelist, at Thyatira, Jackson county, Ga., August 15th, 1847. Immediately after his licensure he served for some months a mission church in Charleston; in 1846-47 he supplied the Church at Turkey Creek, Ga.; supplied the united churches of New Hope and Danielsville, Ga., 1847-50; supplied the Church at Perry, Houston county, Ga., 1850-56; then removed to the county of Pickens (now Oconee), S. C., where he supplied, 1857-73, the churches of Retreat, Tugalo and Richland, as a domestic missionary. Tugalo Church had a house of worship on each side of the river, one in South Carolina, the other in Georgia. In 1873 the members residing in the latter State organized a separate Church at Toccoa City, Ga., which, in connection with Hopewell Church (and for one year, 1871-72, the Church at Gainesville, Ga., also, he supplied until within a year of his death. Early in the year 1881 he was prostrated by a sickness from which he never fully recovered. He died, calmly and peacefully, on his farm, four miles from Carnesville, Ga., and fifteen miles from Toccoa, January 28th, 1882. He was a fair scholar; a well-read theologian; a sound, instructive, spiritual and faithful preacher; a pious and devoted man of God.

Green, Ashbel, D.D., LL.D., was born at Hanover, Morris county, N. J., a son of the pastor, Rev. Jacob Green. In 1778, at the age of sixteen, he was teacher of a school, but dismissed it and entered the army. He was promoted, young as he was, to be orderly sergeant in the militia. Becoming infected with skepticism, he was cured of it by the study of the New Testament. He entered the Junior class, half advanced, and graduated at Nassau Hall, in 1783, with the highest honors. After acting for a while as Tutor, then as Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy, he entered the ministry. Declining invitations from Charleston and New York, he was ordained colleague to Dr. Sproat, in the Second Church, Philadelphia, May, 1787. He was very popular, and large accessions were made to the church.

From 1792 till 1800 he served as Chaplain to Congress, along with Bishop White. In 1812 he was made President of the College of New Jersey. While he elevated the standard of learning in the college, he did not neglect discipline and religious instruction.

In 1815 there was a revival of religion, and thirty students were its subjects, among them such men of mark as John Breckinridge, Dr. Charles Hodge, Bishop Melville and Bishop Johns. In 1822 he resigned and returned to Philadelphia, where he applied himself to editing the Christian Advocate for twelve years.

In 1821 Dr. Green was elected Moderator of the General Assembly. He was a member of the Assembly in the years, successively, 1837, 1838 and 1839, and took a decided stand in favor of the Old School party. "The trumpet gave no uncertain sound." In 1846 the Old School Assembly met in Philadelphia, and the venerable man was led in. The whole Assembly rose to do him honor, and the Moderator, Dr. Hodge, welcomed him, to which Dr. Green responded. He was conducted to a chair, placed for him under the pulpit, but was able to remain only a short time. May 19th, 1848, he paid the debt of nature, in the eighty-sixth year of his age. He was found dead, in the posture of prayer.

Dr. Green's long experience and active habits gave him great weight in the councils of the Church. Dr. Van Rensselaer styled him "the connecting link between old times and new." Scarce an important action was taken in which he had not a share. He was identified with the history of the Church from the beginning. He could appropriately apply to himself the words, "quorum pars magna fui." Some objected that he was dictatorial, or at least, magisterial. Dr. Carnahan thought him "fitted to adorn any station." Dr. Janeway regarded him as "the first preacher in the Presbyterian Church."

His discourses were written, but not read. He was also in the habit of writing his prayers, to which they owed their richness and variety. To weighty matter he added an impressive manner, a transparent style, beautiful diction and a good delivery.

"The scholars pay to see, though goodly yet not dull, Strong withal of reason, without overflow, full."

His printed works, comprising, an Autobiography, and "Lectures on the Shorter Catechism," fill several volumes.

Green, Rev. D. D., was born in Washington county, Pa., August 12th, 1828. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1856, and at the Western Theological Seminary in 1859. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Richland, at Frederickstown, O., and ordained a Foreign Missionary by the same Presbytery, at Shelbyville, Ohio. His field of labor was Ningpo, China, to which he was sent out in 1859, and which he occupied until the Fall of 1866. He then removed to Hang Chow, where he remained till May, 1869, when he returned home to his native land, in feeble health. In 1870 he settled as a home missionary at Doniphan, Kansas, where he labored till the time of his death, September 25th, 1872. He was an earnest student and a devout servant of the Master, and died in the triumphs of the faith he sacrificed so much to preach. Said one who was with him at his death, "The valley had no shadow for him, and when his articulation failed in English his tongue found utterance in the Chinese, 'Yong Wha' glory. He not only taught us how to live, but how to triumph over death."

Green, Rev. Enoch, of the class at Princeton which graduated in 1769, was ordained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, in 1762, and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Deerfield, N. J., June 9th, 1769. While pastor of this church he was abundant in missionary labor, on the coast of New Jersey. During the Revolution he acted as chaplain, and died, November 20th, 1776, from camp fever, contracted while in the discharge of his duty.

Green, George Smith, of Trenton, N. J., was the oldest of three brothers, who, in their lives, were prominently identified with the Presbyterian Church, the other two being John C. Green, of New York city, and Henry W. Green, late Chancellor of New Jersey. His death, which occurred at Trenton, November 17th, 1883, closed a long, active, and in every respect, an honorable and exemplary Christian life. Of a retiring, modest disposition, not given to the conventional forms of demonstration, Mr. Green was as strong in his intentions as in his will and his integrity, a man of sound judgment and uniform character in his connections alike with the world and with the Church. He was for forty-two years a communicant, for twenty-nine years a ruling elder, and nearly as long a trustee of the First Presbyterian Church of Trenton.

Green, Henry Woodhull, LL. D. This eminent lawyer was a brother of Mr. John C. Green whose sketch is below, and was born September 20th, 1801, at Maidenhead (now Lawrenceville), in the county of Hunterdon (now Mercer), N. J. He graduated at Princeton College, with honor, at the early age of sixteen. He was licensed as an attorney-at-law, in 1825, and continued to practice, in Trenton, for twenty-one years. After receiving many honorable and responsible appointments of various kinds, he was, in 1846, appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, and at the expiration of his term of office, in 1853, was reappointed. On the 14th of March, 1860, he was appointed Chancellor, and entered immediately upon the duties of his new office. In the Spring of 1866 he resigned his Chancellorship, on account of his health, which had become enfeebled by his intense and unremitting labors, and imperatively demanded repose. A voyage to Europe, from which he returned after five months of absence, proved of essential benefit. His last years were largely spent in devotional studies and exercises, as he had, to a great extent, withdrawn from professional and public cares. His death occurred at his residence in Trenton, N. J., December 19th, 1876, in the seventy-third year of his age.

Chancellor Green was, for many years, a ruling elder in the First Presbyterian Church of Trenton. He was also a warm and liberal supporter of the various Boards of the Presbyterian Church. Whenever he appeared in its judicatories, he was always an influential member. He was a Commissioner to the General Assembly at Albany, in 1868, and was sent by it as one of its delegates to the other Assembly, then sitting at Harrisburg, Pa. He was always a devoted friend to the Institutions at Princeton. From 1833 he was, until his death, a Trustee of the Theological Seminary, and the President of its Board of Trustees, from 1860. In 1850 he received the degree of LL. D. from Princeton College, and, at the same time, was elected a member of its Board of Trustees. He was universally esteemed one of the most accomplished jurists, and one of the ablest and most upright judges our country has produced.

Green, Rev. Jacob, a native of Malden, Mass., graduated at Haverd College, in 1741, and was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, in September, 1745. He was soon called to Hanover, and was ordained in November, 1746. The support of a large family led him to engage in the practice of medicine, and he continued it for thirty years. He was very diligent in catechizing, and endeavoring to promote piety in the young. During the Revolution he was foremost in his country's cause, and, against his will, was elected to the Provincial Congress, and was Chairman of the Committee which drafted the State Constitution. Mr. Green died, May 24th, 1799, whilst a revival of religion was in progress in his congregation. He was an instructive, plain, searching, practical preacher, a watchful, laborious pastor, and was eminently successful in doing good.

Green, John Cleve, for twenty-one years a Trustee of Princeton Theological Seminary, and a most munificent benefactor of both the Seminary and the College at Princeton, was born in Lawrenceville, N. J., April 14th, 1800. He was of true Presbyterian lineage, his father being an elder in the Presbyterian Church, a grandson of Rev. Caleb Smith, of Newark Mountain, and great-grandson of Rev. Jonathan Dickinson, the first President of the College of New Jersey. In his early youth he entered the counting-room of Messrs. N. L. & G. Griswold, in New York city. In 1823 he embarked as supercargo on the ship Potosi, for Callao, and, with the intermission of a year spent in Spain, he continued voyaging in this capacity to South America and China until 1833, always acquitting himself satisfactorily to his employers. Being in Canton in the Fall of 1833, as agent of the Messrs. Griswold, Mr. Green was invited to join the house of Russell & Co., one of whose partners had been obliged to leave on account of ill health, and for six years his was the leading mind in the administration of the affairs of that house.

Returning home in the year 1839, with an ample fortune, and establishing his residence in the city of New York, Mr. Green continued, for a time, his connection with the China trade, but subsequently other enterprises engaged his attention. He became a Director in the Bank of Commerce, a Trustee and President of the Bleeker Street Savings Bank, and Director in various important railroad companies. He was long connected with the New York Hospital, as one of its governors; also with the Deaf and Dumb Asylum and other kindred institutions. He established or aided in establishing the Home for the Ruptured and Cripples, of which he assumed the presidency, being one of its most generous benefactors. He connected himself with the church of the Rev. Dr. Potts, while worshiping in Duane street, and both there and after its removal to University Place, he was one of its most active and liberal supporters. His contributions to all causes of benevolence and Christian enterprise were large, but unostentatious. His enlightened zeal on behalf of liberal education was shown, not only by large gifts to other institutions, but by his princely munificence to the College of New Jersey.

Mr. Green was one of the most efficient and punctual of the Trustees of Princeton Seminary during the entire period of his connection with the Board. He was for many years its Financial Agent, entrusted with the care and investment of its funds, and in that capacity rendered it essential service. That Seminary is also largely indebted to his generous liberality. It owes to him the endowment of the Helena Professorship of Church History, one of the houses occupied by a Professor, the renovation of the chapel at an expense equal to the original cost, the remodeling of the main Seminary building, handsome contributions to its various funds, and finally a legacy of fifty thousand dollars. He died, April 29th, 1875, peacefully, and in the calm confidence of a Christian hope.

Green, Col. Lewis, a ruling elder, first in the Lexington Church, and subsequently in the Prairie Church, Lafayette county, Mo., was born in Tennessee in 1791; went to Missouri in 1836, and died the death of the righteous in 1875. Of strong and active mind, close observation, sound judgment, and fixed purpose, he took an active part in all that he conceived to be promotive of either Church or State. Trained to the life of a soldier he exhibited the vigor and courage of a soldier in the Christian warfare. His influence was strong, and he exerted it honestly in the interests of truth. God gave him many years of life and usefulness. Upon his death, the following resolution was adopted by "The Old Men's Club of Lafayette county":—

Resolved, That we honor the memory of our departed friend as a patriotic soldier of 1812, as a citizen eminently faithful to all his obligations, as a neighbor universally beloved and respected, and as a Christian whose consistent life ever reminded us that he had been with Jesus."

LEWIS WARNER GREEN, D. D.

Green, Lewis Warner, D. D., was born in Boyle county, Ky., January 2nd, 1806; graduated at Centre College; then at Princeton Seminary, in 1832; was licensed by Transylvania Presbytery, and, having received an appointment as Professor in Centre College, he entered upon the duties of this position, which he held for two years, discovering much ability as an instructor. He spent a little more than two years abroad, under the auspices and advantages of European Professors and Libraries, and on his return to his native land he resumed his Professorship, and very soon received an appointment to the Vice-Presidency of Centre College, with the department of Belles Lettres under his control, being, at the same time, joint supply, with Dr. John C. Young, of the Presbyterian Church of Danville. For a time he was Professor in the New Albany Theological Seminary, Indiana, and then was elected by the General Assembly to the Chair of "Hebrew and Oriental Literature" in the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny, Pa., which position he occupied for seven years, with great credit to himself and to the general satisfaction of the Church. Next he became pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Baltimore, Md., where he soon commanded the attention not only of his own church, but of the whole city. In 1818 he was chosen to the presidential chair of Hampden-Sidney College, Va., and occupied it for eight years with much acceptance and success. In 1856 he was summoned to the presidency of the Kentucky State Normal School, by a voice so unanimous and urgent that he felt it to be his duty to accept the responsible position. After some time he was chosen to the presidency of Centre College, on the death of Dr. John C. Young, and labored for the prosperity of the Institution, with great zeal and efficiency. His death occurred, May 26th, 1863.

Dr. Green was eminent as a scholar, and equally so as a teacher. His intellect was vigorous and brilliant. To the business of communicating knowledge to students, he brought a wonderful knowledge of the human mind, and a somewhat unusual power of stimulating the youthful mind to enlarged desires after truth. He was a most agreeable companion, the united charms of his manner and conversation being unsurpassed. By the habits of his professional life, and the enlarged sympathy of a profound and liberal mind, he exerted a strong influence over the young. As a preacher, he stood in the foremost rank, possessing, in almost unlimited profusion, the inherent qualities that lie at the basis of successful public speaking. He was greatly beloved by those who knew him, and his death produced a deep and universal sorrow.

Green, Rev. Oliver McLean, was one of the faithful band of workers who have done so much to carry the gospel to the "Sunrise Empire" of Japan. He passed from this world of shadows into the clear light of the better land, November 17th, 1882, in his thirty-eighth year. He graduated at Princeton College in 1867, and at Princeton Seminary in 1870. After this he studied one year in the Seminary at Columbia, S. C. Though in delicate health during his whole course of study, he maintained a high standing in all his classes. After leaving the Seminary Mr. Green preached in the coal regions of Pennsylvania, his native State, and in 1873 he served, for several months, the Presbyterian Church in Alexandria, Va., where he was greatly admired and beloved. But his heart was set on a foreign field, and, having been ordained by his Presbytery, in Carlisle, Pa., in the Fall of 1873, he started for Japan on the 15th of October of the same year. As soon as he reached his field he set himself, with all the ardor of his nature, to the work before him. In a surprisingly short time he began to preach to the natives in their own tongue. During most of the time of his residence there he was Clerk of the Presbytery, and kept the records in both English and Japanese. He was greatly beloved by his associates and trusted by the natives. Mr. Green's constitution having given way under exposure and labor, he came home, in October, 1880, to die, and enter into the perfect rest beyond. His mortal remains await the resurrection morn, in the little churchyard in Dickinson, Cumberland county, Pa., where his infant feet first sought the house of God.

Green, William Henry, D. D., LL. D., was born at Groveville, near Bordentown, N. J., January 27th, 1825. He graduated at Lafayette College in 1840, where he remained a short time as Tutor. He pursued his theological studies in Princeton, and upon the completion of his course, in 1846, was made assistant teacher of Hebrew. After remaining three years in this capacity, during a portion of which he supplied successively the pulpits of the First and Second churches in Princeton, he became the pastor of the Central Church in Philadelphia, where he labored for a time with great acceptableness and success.

In 1851 Dr. Green was elected Professor of Oriental and Biblical Literature in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, as successor to Dr. J. Addison Alexander, who was transferred to the Chair of Ecclesiastical History. In 1859 the title of his Professorship was changed to that of Oriental and Old Testament Literature. In 1861 he published a Grammar of the Hebrew Language; in 1863, a Hebrew Chrestomathy; in 1866, an Elementary Hebrew Grammar; in 1863, "The Pentateuch Vindicated from the Aspersions of Bishop Colenso," and in 1870 he translated Zockler's Commentary on the Song of Solomon, for the American edition of Lange's Commentary. He has also contributed numerous valuable articles to the Princeton Review. Dr. Green is a gentleman of lovely spirit, an attractive preacher, and an able writer. He was a member of the Second General Council of the Presbyterian Alliance, which convened at Philadelphia, September, 1880.

Green, Rev. Zachariah, was, for many years, the patriarch among the pastors of Long Island, N. Y. He was born at Stafford, Conn., in 1760. In the Revolutionary War he joined the army, and was present on Dorchester Heights when the British landed at Throgg's Neck. He was also engaged at the battle of White Plains, and at the battle of Whitmarsh, Pa., he was wounded by a ball, in the shoulder. On his recovery he entered Dartmouth College, 1782.

His health failed, and he did not remain to graduate. His theological course was completed under Dr. Jacob Green, of Hanover, N. J., and in 1785, he was licensed by the Morris County Associated Presbytery, and by them, in 1787, ordained pastor of the Church of Cutchogue. Ten years later he was settled at Setaukhet, where he remained for fifty-one years. His death occurred, June 20th, 1858, in his ninety-ninth year.

Greene, Rev. William Brenton, Jr., the oldest child of William Brenton and Eliza Harriet (Arnold) Greene, was born in Providence, R. I., August 16th, 1854. Having graduated from Princeton College, in 1876, he taught, for a year, in the Preparatory School at Princeton, N. J. He entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton in the Fall of 1877. In the college he was the valedictorian of his class; in the seminary, also, he took high standing in scholarship.

In the Spring of 1880, in the second term of his Senior year, he received a unanimous call to the First Presbyterian Church in Boston, Mass. He accepted this call, and was licensed, in May, by the Presbytery of Boston. In June he was installed and ordained. Having done not a little to forward the cause of Presbyterianism in that city, he remained there till April, 1883. About six weeks before, a committee from the Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia had heard him preach, and shortly after their visit to Boston a unanimous call to become their pastor was sent to him by the congregation of this church. He accepted this call, and was installed as pastor of the Tenth Church, in May, 1883. He has spent his Summer vacation traveling in Europe.

Mr. Greene is characterized by methodical industry; each day's work is carefully planned, and, rising early, he pushes it before him; thoroughness; in college he devoted himself, not simply to the studies which he liked, but to the whole curriculum; and the same trait is now seen in the varied work of preacher, pastor and presbyter; an excellent judgment and a strength of character which lead others to ask his advice and to rely upon him; a piety which is felt rather than heard, and which makes diligent use of the means of grace; a humility which always esteems others better than himself.

His preaching is upon both the doctrines and the duties. It is never superficial, and although argumentative and profound, and delivered with great deliberation, yet the analysis is so careful, the thought is so clean cut, the utterance is so earnest, that he merits the high praise that the common people hear him gladly.

Greenman, Rev. Nehemiah, was born at Stratford, Conn.; graduated at Yale, in 1718, and was licensed by Suffolk Presbytery very soon after. The first year of his ministry he spent at Moriches and Quogue, now Westhampton. He was called, April 14th, 1750, to the New Society in South Ham-over, N. J., and was probably ordained by New York Presbytery while laboring there. He joined Abingdon Presbytery, in May, 1753, and commenced preaching at Pilesgrove (now Pittsgrove), and was installed December 5th, continuing to be pastor until April 9th, 1779. He died before the next November. Mr. Greenman spent part of his time at "Aloes Creek." He also gave one-fourth of his time to Penn's Neck (probably Quilhawken).

Gregory, Caspar Robue, D. D., son of Caspar Ramsay and Mary (Holmes) Gregory, was born in Philadelphia, September 17th, 1824; graduated from the University of Pennsylvania, in 1843; taught nearly two years, 1843-4, in private families; graduated at Princeton Seminary, in 1847; was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 5th, 1848; then taught another year, and was ordained an evangelist by the same Presbytery, May 20th, 1849. His field of labor was as a missionary, under appointment of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, among the Choctaw Indians, at Spencer Academy, in the Indian Territory. At the end of one year his health gave way, under excessive labor, and he left the mission in July, 1850. He labored with much success, as pastor of the Church at Oneida, N. Y., from February 9th, 1852, until March 1st, 1862. After a successful pastorate of the First Church at Bridgeton, N. J., from May 12th, 1864, until October 7th, 1873, he became Professor of Sacred Rhetoric in Lincoln University, Pa., where he labored zealously and most successfully until his death, which occurred February 26th, 1882. His end was full of faith and hope. Dr. Gregory was an earnest man, throwing his whole heart into whatever he undertook. His mind was quick, vivacious and well cultivated. His preaching was of a high quality, and as a Professor he was most devoted and faithful.

Gregory, Daniel Seely, D. D., is a native of the town of Carmel, N. Y., and was born August 21st, 1832. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1857. After graduation, and while a student at the seminary, he acted as Tutor in Rhetoric in the session 1859-60, when he completed his course at the seminary. After licensure he settled as pastor at Galena, Ill., and continued in this relation until 1863. He then accepted the charge of the Second Church of Troy, N. Y., where his labors were very greatly blessed, and several hundred added to the membership of the church. In 1867 he accepted a call to the Third Congregational Church of New Haven, Conn., and in 1869 became pastor at South Salem, N. Y. He was Professor of Metaphysics and Logic in Wooster University, Ohio, 1871-5; Professor of Mental Science and English Literature in the same institution, 1875-78, and in 1879 was elected President of Lake Forest University, Illinois, which position he still holds. Dr. Gregory is an eminent scholar, and a writer of unusual force. He has contributed several valuable articles to the Princeton Review; 1866, "The Preaching for the Times;" 1868, "The Pastorate for the Times;" "Studies in the Gospels;" "Matthew the Gospel for the Jew."

Gresham, Hon. John J., was born in Burke county, Georgia, on the 21st of January, 1812. His father, a Virginian by birth, was reared in Kentucky, and in his early manhood removed to Georgia. His mother was the immediate descendant of one of a colony of Associate Reformed Presbyterians who came from the north of Ireland and settled in Jefferson county, Georgia, in the latter part of the last century.

He received a liberal education and graduated with the highest honors of his class at the University of Georgia in 1833. He was soon afterwards admitted to the Bar, and entered the practice of law in his native county, but in the year 1836 he removed to Macon, Georgia, where for many years he devoted himself to his profession with marked success, becoming prominent in all the enterprises of his adopted city. While he did not seek political preferment, he was twice chosen Mayor of Macon, and in 1866 was elected, almost without opposition, to the State Senate.

He united himself with the Presbyterian Church in Athens, Ga., while in college, and during his long and useful life has always been a leading and active worker in all the enterprises of the Church, and to his wise counsels and sound judgment, his brethren, both at home and abroad, have been wont to defer with the greatest respect and consideration. He was chosen an elder in the Macon Church in the year 1848, and since that time has been a frequent member of the General Assembly and other Church courts, and was a delegate from the Southern Church to the Presbyterian Council at Philadelphia in 1880.

More than ten years ago he retired from the practice of the law, and has given his entire time to the various benevolent and educational institutions with which he has been so long and prominently identified. For many years he has been a valued member of the Board of Directors of the Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C., and of the Trustees of the University of Georgia, of which Board he is now the President: thus holding a position which has always been filled by the very first men of the State. He is also an active member of the Board of Public Education in the county of his residence, and of several other educational and charitable institutions in the City of Macon.

Mr. Gresham is still a resident of Macon, the home of his early manhood, honored and respected by the church and the community. His Christian character has always been remarkable for its purity, both in life and doctrine.

Gretter, Rev. John A., the son of Michael and Joanna Gretter, was born in Richmond, Va., September 28th, 1810. He graduated in the University of Virginia in July, 1829; prosecuted his theological studies under the direction of his pastor, the Rev.

Stephen Taylor was licensed to preach in 1833, and was ordained in September, 1834. Soon after his ordination he was sent as a missionary to Gemito, Powhatan county, Va., where he labored with great acceptance. In the Spring of 1836, he became mathematical instructor in the Caldwell Institute at Greensboro', N. C., and, as a thorough mathematician, did much to elevate the character of the Institution. During this time he accepted a call from the congregations of Bethel and Gum Grove, nine and twelve miles distant, to preach to them on alternate Sabbaths. This he did, to their entire satisfaction, for several years. He then accepted a call to the Church in Greensboro', dissolved his connection with the Caldwell Institute, and in April, 1844, was installed pastor of the church. He entered upon his labors with great zeal and efficiency, and as he began, so he finished, ever on the alert to improve opportunities for benefiting his flock, and helping forward the great cause of truth and righteousness. The church greatly prospered under his ministry. He died January 21st, 1853. Mr. Gretter was a man of much literary cultivation, and a forcible and polished writer and speaker. But it was as a preacher that he was most generally known and admired. He strove successfully to combine those two great elements of good preaching, clear statement of doctrine, and pungent, faithful appeal. His pastoral labors and success were abundant. He exerted a strong influence in the several judicatories of the Church. "He loved Jesus," says the Rev. James H. McNeill, "His service, His ministers, and His saints. His religion was without ostentation, without moroseness, cheerful and manly."

Gridley, Samuel Hart, D. D., was born in Kirkland, N. Y., December 28th, 1802, and studied at Hamilton College, from which Institution he received the title of Doctor of Divinity, in 1855. He studied theology at Auburn, N. Y., and was ordained by the Oneida Association, in September, 1829. His fields of labor have been, Springville, N. Y., 1829-30; Perry, 1830-6; and Waterloo, from 1836, where he has been Emeritus Pastor since 1873. Dr. Gridley has published sermons and articles, and has been a trustee of Auburn Seminary, from 1849, and Vice-President of the trustees, from 1870. He has been faithful during his long life, and the divine blessing has crowned his labors with success.

Grier, Isaac, D. D., was born at Jersey Shore, Pa., January 7th, 1806. He graduated at Dickinson College, Pa., in 1828. After his graduation, he was engaged for a time in teaching. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Northumberland, November 12th 1831. He was stated supply of Shamokin and Washington, Pa., 1833-4; pastor of Washington, and stated supply of Buffalo and Bethel churches, 1834-53. Since 1854 he has been pastor of Buffalo Church. He resides at Millinsburg, Pa. He is a brother of the Hon. Robert C. Grier, who was for years a Justice of the U. S. Supreme Court. Dr. Grier is a solid and instructive preacher, and a diligent and faithful pastor. As a member of Presbytery he is highly esteemed for his soundness of judgment and dignified Christian character. His labors as a minister have been blessed.

Grier, Rev. Isaac, Sr., was one of the eleven members that constituted the Presbytery of Huntingdon, Pa., April, 1795, and one of the five who constituted the Presbytery of Northumberland, at its organization, in October, 1811. His parents' names were Thomas and Martha, Scotch-Irish emigrants. He graduated at Dickinson College, Carlisle, in 1788; was received under the care of the Presbytery of Carlisle, April 15th, 1790, and studied theology under Dr. Charles Nisbet. He was licensed, December 21st, 1791, and appointed a missionary to supply, during the Winter and Spring, the churches of Harrisburg, Paxton, Upper and Middle Tuscarora, Bedford, Great Cove, etc., and was as far west as Pittsburg, preaching several times in that place.

In the Spring of 1792 Mr. Grier was appointed to missionate on the West and Northeast branches of the Susquehanna, and on through the State of New York. He was ordained, April 9th, 1794, at Carlisle, and at the same time he was installed pastor of the congregations of Lycoming, Pine Creek and Great Island, commissioners from the congregations being present. In the Spring of 1794, he removed to Lycoming county, near to Jersey Shore, and in 1802, owing to his small salary, took charge also of a classical school. He received a call to the united churches of Sunbury and Northumberland, and removed to Northumberland, in the Spring of 1806, and in addition to his pastoral charge, and supplying Shamokin Church once a month, he took charge of the academy in Northumberland. He died, August 23d, 1814. Mr. Grier was the father of the Hon. Robert C. Grier, one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. As a teacher of the Latin and Greek languages he is said to have had no superior in Pennsylvania.

Grier, Rev. James, a native of Bucks county, Pa., graduated at Princeton College, in 1772, with the highest honors of his class, and acted as Tutor for about one year. He was licensed by the First Presbytery of Philadelphia, in 1775, and ordained and installed pastor of Deep Run Presbyterian Church, Penna., in 1776, where he remained until his death, November 19th, 1791. Mr. Grier was amiable and conciliatory in his disposition and manners. Ordinarily using but little gesture, and that of the mildest kind, in the pulpit, his manner was always earnest, and, at times, it became deeply impassioned. He had power over an audience to which few attain. To illustrate this—on a Communion Sabbath he followed up the sacramental service with a sermon on the text, "And the door was shut." After reading the passage he closed the Bible, with an action somewhat energetic, and lifting up his hands, apparently in the deepest agony, exclaimed: "My God! and is the door shut?" The impression on the whole congregation was perfectly overwhelming.

Grier, Rev. John Walker, was born in Bucks county, Pa., in 1789. He graduated at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., in 1809, and studied theology at the Theological School of the Rev. Dr. J. M. Mason, of New York, and also at the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J. His health being very precarious, he was much delayed in his preparations for the ministry, but was finally licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle, October 1st, 1818. Mr. Grier, for a few years, taught a classical school, but, having received a commission as Chaplain in the United States Navy, he was ordained by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, May 25th, 1826. As a Chaplain, he officiated, at different periods, at almost all the naval stations in this country, and made five voyages, some lasting more than three years, in the vessels of war—Delaware, North Carolina, Potomac, Ohio, and St. Lawrence. His last public service was performed as Chaplain of the Navy Yard at Pensacola, Fla.; and in 1859 he resigned his commission, passed the remainder of his days in the families of his children, and died, March 25th, 1861. Mr. Grier was the father of the Rev. Dr. M. B. Grier, one of the editors of the Presbyterian. He was an humble, earnest Christian, an accomplished and affable gentleman, of great purity and dignity of character, and highly esteemed by all who enjoyed his acquaintance.

MATTHEW B. GRIER, D.D.

Grier, Matthew B., D. D., son of the Rev. John W. Grier, Chaplain of the United States Navy, was born at Brandywine Manor, Chester county, Pa., July 25th, 1820. He graduated at Washington College, Pa., in 1838. After studying law for a time in Philadelphia, he prosecuted his theological studies at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Baltimore, December 3d, 1847, and was pastor at Elliott's Mills, Md., 1847-52, and at Wilmington, N. C., 1854-61, in which charges his labors were crowned with success. In 1861 he became editor of The Presbyterian, Philadelphia, and in connection with the duties of this position, was stated supply of the Church at Gloucester City, N. J., 1867-9, and since 1875 has had charge of the Church at Ridley Park, Pa. Dr. Grier is a gentleman of genial spirit, dignified bearing and cultivated manner. He is a graceful and vigorous writer. His sermons are prepared with care, preached with solemnity and pervaded with the tone and teachings of the gospel. His course as an editor, has been marked by much ability, correct taste, sound judgment and firm adherence to the truth as embodied in the Standards of our Church. He has the esteem and confidence of all who know him.

Grier, Rev. Nathan, was born in Bucks county, Pa., September, 1760. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1783; studied theology under the direction of his elder brother, the Rev. James Grier, of Deep Run; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Philadelphia in 1786, and in the same year received and accepted a call from the Forks of Brandywine, Chester county, Pa., and was installed as their pastor in 1787, in which relation he continued until the end of his life.

Mr. Grier was an able and faithful minister. His judgment was sound and discriminating, and his talents as a preacher eminently popular. The arrangement of his discourses was natural and lucid, and the matter of them at once eminently evangelical and practical. With a voice clear, pleasant and commanding, he exhibited a solemnity of manner and a deep and tender earnestness, which never failed to secure attention, and often made a powerful impression. He spoke as one who believed and felt the force of divine truth, and the weight of ministerial responsibility. In all his relations as a pastor, a citizen, an ecclesiastic and a man, he was earnest in his endeavors to know what was right, and inflexibly firm in his adherence to it. As a husband, a father, and guardian of his family, his whole demeanor was characterized by Christian dignity, condescension, affection and faithfulness. As the Presbyterian Church in America had not then provided theological seminaries, and students in theology availed themselves of the libraries and instructions of the pastors of churches, as they had opportunity, the estimation in which Mr. Grier was held as a pious, able and successful minister of the gospel, induced many to avail themselves of his direction and aid. Twenty-seven years he served the congregation of the Forks of Brandywine with fidelity and success, until, having finished the work which was assigned him, he was summoned from his labors on earth to a glorious reward in heaven. His death occurred March 31st, 1844.

Grier, Hon. Robert Cooper, was the eldest son of Rev. Isaac Grier, and grandson of Rev. Robert Cooper, D. D. He was born in Cumberland county, Pa., March 5th, 1791, and graduated at Dickinson College in 1812. He assisted his father in conducting the Academy at Northumberland, Pa., and on his father's death became Principal, devoting his leisure hours to the study of law. He was admitted to practice in 1817, and opened his office in Bloomsburg, Columbia county; in 1818 he removed to Danville, in the same county. In 1833, being appointed Judge of the District Court of Allegheny county, he removed to Pittsburg. On August 1th, 1846, he was nominated by President Polk, one of the Judges of the United States Supreme Court, and unanimously confirmed the next day. In 1848 he removed to Philadelphia, and continued to reside there until his death, which occurred September 25th, 1870.

Judge Grier was eminently distinguished for integrity of purpose, fidelity to his client, and benevolence to those of limited means, preferring justice to gain. He stood very high as a lawyer and as a judge. The esteem of his legal brethren was exhibited in the great deference given to his decisions, and their warm personal friendship. At the death of his father, he took charge of his brothers and sisters, ten in number, cared for and educated all, as a faithful guardian, until they were settled in life. At the time of his residence in Pittsburg, Judge Grier was an active and influential elder of the First Presbyterian Church, Allegheny, then under the pastoral care of the Rev. Dr. E. P. Switt.

Grier, Rev. Robert Smith, the son of Rev. Nathan and Susanna Smith Grier, was born at Brandywine Manor, Chester county, Pa., May 11th, 1790. He graduated at Dickinson College in 1809; studied theology under the instruction of his father; was licensed by New Castle Presbytery, September, 1812, and soon after was called to the churches of Tom's Creek and Piney Creek, near Emmetsburg, Md., where he was ordained and installed by Carlisle Presbytery, in April, 1814. This was his only charge. He died December 28th, 1865. As a preacher, Mr. Grier's ministrations were characterized by punctuality, fidelity and ability. He was clear, energetic and instructive. As a friend and citizen he was sincere and honest. With a great flow of animal spirits, and a ready fund of humor, he combined remarkable decision and independence of character. His piety was never doubted by any one. It was an intelligent piety, based upon fixed principles. For nearly fifty-two years he went in and out before his people, who fully appreciated his services, and their attachment to and affection for their pastor suffered no abatement during this long period.

Griffin, Edward Dorr, D. D., was born at East Haddam, Conn., January 6th, 1770, and graduated at Yale College, with one of the highest honors of his class, in 1790. He pursued his theological studies under the direction of the Rev. Dr. Jonathan Edwards, of New Haven, and was licensed to preach, in October, 1792, by the West Association of New Haven county. From the very start, his preaching was attended with a signal blessing. He was pastor of the Congregational Church at New Hartford from June 4th, 1795, until October 20th, 1801, at which time he was installed as colleague pastor with the Rev. Dr. McWhorter, over the Church at Newark, N. J. His ministry was signalized, in 1807, by a most remarkable revival, of which he said, in his journal, "Ninety-seven joined the Church in one day, and about two hundred in all." During his eight years' pastorate, four hundred and thirty-four persons were added to the church.

In 1808 Dr. Griffin accepted an appointment to the Bartlett Professorship of Pulpit Eloquence in the Theological Seminary at Andover, and on July 31st, 1811, was installed pastor of the Park Street congregation, Boston. In the Winter of 1812-13, he delivered his Park Street Lectures, on successive Sabbath evenings, to a crowded audience, collected from all classes of society. June 20th, 1815, he was installed pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church in Newark, N. J. During this second period of his residence in Newark, besides attending with exemplary fidelity to all the appropriate duties of a pastor, he devoted himself, with characteristic energy, to the establishment and support of several of the leading benevolent institutions of the day. He was one of the original founders of the American Bible Society, and had also an important agency in establishing the United Foreign Mission Society, and in promoting the interests of the school established by the Synod of New York and New Jersey, for the education of Africans. His celebrated "Plea for Africa" was distinguished alike for learning and eloquence. About 1821 he was elected President of Williams College, and his connection with the Institution proved most auspicious to its interests. On account of enfeebled health, he resigned this position, in 1836, removed to Newark, and died November 8th, 1837. His exercises in the immediate prospect of his departure were characterized, not only by the "peace which passeth understanding," but by "the joy unspeakable and full of glory."

Dr. Griffin's publications consisted largely of sermons, orations and addresses, all of which bore the impress of his vigorous intellect. He was eminently a man of mark, both in the literary and religious spheres. His power of clear, penetrating, and, at the same time, of lofty and comprehensive, thought; his skill and force in argument, his rhetorical genius and culture, his eloquence, his majestic person and manner, all pervaded and controlled by his enlightened, religious devotion, performed efficient service for the Church, and placed him among the greater lights of his age.

Griffin, Nathaniel Herrick, D. D., was born in Southampton, Long Island, December 28th, 1811. He graduated at Williams College, Mass., in 1831, with high reputation as a scholar, after which he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, and pursued his studies there for two years. He was a Tutor for one year afterwards in Williams College. In 1837 and 1838 he was stated supply, first of the Church at Westhampton, L. I., and subsequently at Franklin, N. Y. He was installed pastor of the Church at Delhi, N. Y., June 27th, 1839, but by reason of failing health, this connection was dissolved in 1841. He passed a year in Williams College, supplying the place of Prof. Tatlock, who had gone to Europe. After teaching in Brooklyn, N. Y., from 1843 until 1846, he was called to fill the Professorship of the Latin and Greek Languages in Williams College. In 1853, this Professorship being divided, he was made Professor of the Greek Language and Literature. After eleven years' service as a Professor, he resigned in 1857 and opened a private school in Williamstown. In 1868 he relinquished this to take charge of the College Library, and retained the position of Librarian until his death. He was Secretary of the Williams College Alumni Association for twenty-four years; published the Triennial Catalogues for eleven years; prepared the first Alumni Necrological Sketches; published valuable articles in various reviews and magazines, and was widely known. His death occurred, October 16th, 1876.

Dr. Griffin was a man of clear and decided piety. While in Princeton Seminary he determined to go on a foreign mission, but afterwards abandoned his purpose, for the sake of his widowed mother. His heart was always in the ministerial work, and it was the great trial of his life that his poor health compelled him to relinquish it. Perfect trust in the Saviour was the marked feature of his life and of his last days. He was able to commit himself and all his interests to Jesus. He was an active, earnest and useful Christian man, doing much to promote the temporal and spiritual good of all around him.

Griffith, Rev. Timothy, taught a classical school in Philadelphia, in 1737, and graduated at Yale, in 1742. The Presbytery of New Castle ordained him, in 1743, as successor to Rev. Thomas Evans, in Pender. He supplied the Church of Tredeffryn, once a month, for several years. When the province was threatened with invasion, he was elected Captain of the company raised in New Castle county, in September, 1748. He was a missionary in Western Virginia, in 1751. He removed to a farm in Appoquiniminy, and resided on it till his death, in 1754. During that time, he probably supplied New Castle and Drawyers.

Grigg, Rev. George Cooper, son of William and Isabella (McDowell) Grigg, was born in the District, S. C., February 19th, 1814. He graduated at at the South Carolina College, in 1838 and at the Theological Seminary, in Columbia, in 1841. He was licensed in the Spring, by Harmony Presbytery, and November 6th, 1841, was ordained and installed pastor of the Salem Church. He died, May 28th, 1861. Throughout his long pastorate he had the entire confidence and cordial esteem of his charge.

Mr. Gregg was a man of solid excellence and intrinsic worth; he was in the highest sense, an honest, true and devoted Christian man. His mind was of a high order and well cultivated. His preaching was solid and instructive, sound in doctrine, clear in statement, strong in argument and close and unambiguous in application. As a Presbyter among Presbyters, his knowledge of the principles of our Church polity, his acquaintance with the forms of business, and his instinctive perception of what each case required, gave him a deserved pre-eminence.

Grimes, Joseph Smiley, D. D., was born near New Athens, Ohio, July 23d, 1827. His parents, Joseph Grimes and Martha Edgar McCollough, were of Scotch-Irish descent. He graduated from Franklin College, New Athens, Ohio, in 1847. In his Senior year he represented the Philo-Literary Society of the College, as orator in the annual contest, and received the honor for the Society. In 1849 he entered the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa., and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of St. Clairsville, Ohio. In June, 1853, he was ordained by the Presbytery of New Lisbon, Ohio, and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Salem, Ohio, where he served until June, 1857. For six months subsequent he held a call to and supplied the First Church in Miami City, Ohio, and then declining that call, he accepted one to Columbia, Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, in June, 1858. In April, 1861, he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in New Castle, Pennsylvania, and there remained until September, 1865. In the Spring of 1866 he took charge of the First Church in Rockford, Illinois, where he preached until September, 1869, when he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church in Alliance, Ohio, and is still serving that body as pastor.

Dr. Grimes is a man of very marked traits of character. A strong and original thinker, he possesses quick and keen perceptions, vigorous powers of analysis and a method of sermonizing peculiarly his own. He is an able and influential preacher. He combines in a happy manner the topical and logical methods in his discourse, and his delivery is rapid, earnest and emphatic. His dignified and unbending bearing, combined with a highly developed social nature, command for him the respect and esteem of all classes. Dr. Grimes' ministry has been greatly blessed. Since his settlement in Alliance, six hundred and fourteen communicants have been added to his church. No less than thirty pastors, now occupying the pulpits of the Presbyterian Church throughout the country, have attributed their conversion and entrance upon the ministry to his instrumentality. As a Presbyter he is zealously devoted to the strict law of the Church, and thoroughly acquainted with the deliverances of the Assembly. He is Chairman of the Presbyterial Committee on Theology and the Sacraments, in the examination of candidates.

Grimke, Francis James, was born at Charleston, S. C., November 1th, 1850. He was the second of four sons of Nancy Weston and Henry Grimke. Hearing of the opportunities at the North for education, he entered Lincoln University, Chester county, Pa., in the Fall of 1866, and was graduated therefrom as an A. B. in 1870. For one year after graduation he taught mathematics in the Preparatory Department of the University, and also acted as its Financial Agent. He studied law for three years at Lincoln and Howard Universities, but finally decided to relinquish the law for the ministry, and entered the Princeton Theological Seminary in 1875, and was graduated therefrom in 1878. The Rev. Dr. McCosh speaks of him "as a young man of very high order of talent, and of excellent character. I have heard him preach, and I feel as if I could listen to such preaching, with profit, from Sabbath to Sabbath." Dr. Craven, who was one of his examiners at graduation, said, "In my judgment he was the peer of any man in his class." His first charge was the pastorate of the Fifteenth Street Presbyterian Church at Washington, D. C., which he still holds. He was ordained and installed by the Washington Presbytery, June, 1878, and has since devoted himself to the work in Washington City. He is a Trustee of Howard University, and an active worker in all that pertains to the advancement of the colored race.

Grover, Rev. Stephen, was born at Tolland, Conn., July 16th, 1758. His father, Ebenezer, had a family of six children. The oldest son, Joseph, was ordained over the Presbyterian Church in Parsippany, N. J., in 1775. But feeling that his ecclesiastical freedom was infringed by being a member of Synod, he withdrew from Presbytery in 1779. (See Gillett's Presbyterian Church, vol. 1, p. 210.) He was settled over the Church in Bristol, N. Y., where he died, aged eighty-four. Stephen Grover was the youngest son. Early converted, from his youth he was devoted to the ministry. His education was delayed by his efforts to support himself. At the breaking out of the Revolution he was a student in Dartmouth College. He at once volunteered as a soldier in the Continental army, and served until the close of the war, obtaining rank in his regiment. He then returned to college and graduated with honor in 1786. He at once came to New Jersey, where his brother Joseph was located, and in two years was licensed to preach.

He was the first pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Caldwell, N. J., and was mainly instrumental in the erection of the first edifice, the corner-stone of which he laid in 1794. He continued in that charge until his death, in June, 1836, when he was seventy-seven years old. From the beginning of his ministry until its close, his church was the scene of frequent and powerful revivals, over a hundred uniting at one time, on several occasions. It is believed he was the instrument, under God, in the conversion of over one thousand six hundred souls. He was active in all the work of the Church, in educational enterprises, in missionary, Sabbath-school and benevolent efforts. He was ardent and pathetic, and to the end of his life found his highest happiness in preaching the gospel, and in ministering to the wants of his fellow-men. He was the associate of a group of eminent ministers—Drs. Richards and Griffin, of Newark; Hillyer, of Orange; Fisher, of Paterson; Judd, of Bloomfield.

Grundy, Robert C., D. D., the son of Samuel and Elizabeth (Caldwell) Grundy, was born in Washington county, Ky., in 1809. He graduated at Centre College; studied theology at Princeton; was licensed by Transylvania Presbytery, and installed by Ebenezer Presbytery, as pastor of the Church in Maysville, Ky., in 1836. This relation existed for twenty-two years. In 1858 he was installed pastor of the Church in Memphis, Tenn. In 1863 he became pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati, Ohio. He died June 27th, 1865. Dr. Grundy was a generous, earnest, fearless man, a vigorous preacher, an active Presbyter. In the relations of private and social life he was remarkably courteous and ever chivalric. None doubted his sincerity. He was ever ready to defend the truth and oppose error. He was identified with various institutions of the Church, and never spared himself when good could be accomplished. He seemed truly a man of God.

Gulick, Rev. Peter Johnson, was born at Freehold, N. J., March 12th, 1797; graduated at the College of New Jersey (where he roomed with James Brainerd Taylor), in 1825, and immediately entered Princeton Seminary, remaining there two years. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, August 7th, 1827, and was ordained by the same Presbytery, as an evangelist, October 3d, 1827. Immediately after his ordination, November 3d, 1827, he embarked at Boston for the Hawaiian Mission, under commission from the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and labored at Waimea, on the Island of Kauai, from 1828 until 1835; at Koloa until 1843; on the Island of Malokai until 1847; then at Waiaha, on Oahu, until 1857; after this he resided at Honolulu, until his removal to Japan, in June, 1871. Thus he labored more than forty-six years on the Sandwich Islands, and his labors were greatly blessed of God. He saw a nation transformed from barbarism into enlightened and devout Christians, and his name will always be held in honor as that of one of the foremost and most useful pioneers, who, under God, brought about that wonderful transformation. In his old age he went to Kobe, Japan, and spent his last days in the home of one of his sons, where, on December 8th, 1877, after a short and painless illness, he gently breathed his last, in the eighty-first year of his age. He was a man of faith and prayer, and earnest labor for God. He never returned to his native land after entering on his great work in the Sandwich Islands. Five of Mr. Gulick's children are missionaries of the A. B. C. F. M., in Spain, China and Japan, and a sixth, who was a missionary, is agent of the American Bible Society, in Japan.

Gurley, Phineas Dinsmore, D. D., the youngest child of Phineas and Elizabeth (Fox) Gurley, was born at Hamilton, Madison county, New York, November 12th, 1816. But during the infancy of this son the family removed to Parishville, St. Lawrence county. His father was born and educated a Quaker, though his ancestry were Scotch Covenanters, and his mother was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in all her intercourse was a model of Christian charity. He graduated at Union College, in 1837, with the first honor. Shortly after his graduation he entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton, where he took a very high stand as a scholar, a gentleman, and a Christian. During the vacation of 1838 he performed missionary labor in Sussex county, Del. In April, 1840, he was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of North River. December 15th, 1840, he was ordained to the work of the ministry by the Presbytery of Indianapolis, and installed pastor of the First Church of Indianapolis, Ind. Here he very soon acquired a powerful influence, not only by his correct, able, scriptural preaching, but by his faithfulness as a pastor, and his considerate, exemplary deportment in all the relations of life.

PHINEAS DINSMORE GURLEY, D. D.

Influenced largely by a regard to his health, Mr. Gurley accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church, Dayton, Ohio, and was installed its pastor by the Presbytery of Miami, in April, 1850. Here he remained four years, during which he was indefatigable in his labors, and the church enjoyed unwonted prosperity. In March, 1854, Dr. Gurley was installed pastor of the F Street Presbyterian Church, Washington City. Here he continued, discharging his various duties with great fidelity and success, until he finished his course with joy. In 1858 he served as Chaplain in the Senate of the United States. In 1859, a union of the Second Presbyterian with the F Street Church having been consummated, the united body was known from that time as the New York Avenue Church, Dr. Gurley continuing its pastor. To the building of the noble edifice now occupied by this church he contributed largely, by collecting funds, both at home and abroad. He was a member of the General Assembly in 1866, and Chairman of the Judicial Committee. The same General Assembly appointed him a member of the Committee of Fifteen, to confer with a similar Committee of the New School General Assembly, in regard to the reunion of the Presbyterian Church. In 1867 he was chosen Moderator of the General Assembly which met at Cincinnati. He died, September 30th, 1868, and his departure was eminently peaceful, and even glorious.

Dr. Gurley had a well formed and robust frame, that seemed fittingly to represent his intellectual and moral character. He had great power of endurance, and could perform more labor than almost any of his contemporaries. He was earnest and firm, yet descending and conciliatory. His preaching was not highly impassioned, but it was eminently clear, evangelical and spirited, and fitted to find its way to both the understanding and the heart. As a pastor, he united great discretion with great fidelity, and no one knew better than he how to mingle in scenes of sorrow. As a Presbyter, the various ecclesiastical bodies with which he was connected testified their respect for him and their confidence in him, by placing him in their highest positions of influence and responsibility. As a Christian he was humble, zealous, consistent, and his grand inquiry always was, what his Lord and Master would have him to do.

II

Hadden, Rev. Isaac, was among the earliest of the ministers who settled in Alabama. A licentiate of the Presbytery of South Carolina, he commenced the work of a missionary in 1823. He was ordained an evangelist at Montgomery, March 24th, 1825. His grave is in the burying ground of Bethel Church, of which he had been the pastor for a number of years. He had passed into the autumn of life, had spent twenty-five years of his ministry within the region of country comprised within the bounds of the Synod of Alabama, was widely known through its churches, and was a man of great prudence, of mature Christian character, and as a minister of Christ, efficient and successful.

Hageman, John Frelinghuysen, Counsellor-at-Law, was born in the village of Hartlingen, in Somerset county, a few miles north of Princeton, N. J. He graduated at Rutgers College in 1836, and was admitted to the Bar in 1839, and practiced his profession in Princeton for a number of years. In 1850 he was a member of the Legislature of the State, having been elected from the county of Mercer, on general ticket, to the House of Assembly. From 1851 he was a ruling elder in the First Presbyterian Church of Princeton, and a trustee of the Theological Seminary of the same place. He was accustomed to write for the secular papers, and for eight years from 1859 he, with other gentlemen, contributed to the editorial department of the Princeton Standard.

In 1862 Mr. Hageman was nominated by Governor Olden, to the Senate, for Prosecutor of the Pleas for the county of Mercer, accepted the appointment, and held the office for the term of five years, when he declined a renomination tendered by Governor Ward. The celebrated trial of Charles Lewis, in 1863, who was convicted and executed for the murder of James Rowand, of Princeton—a remarkable case of circumstantial evidence, which was published in pamphlet, and the several bribery indictments against members of the Legislature, and of its lobby, in 1866, were among the most important and exciting criminal cases which occurred during his term. While holding this official relation to the State, Mr. Hageman and all the other prosecutors in the State were interrogated by the Corresponding Secretary of the New York Prison Reform Association, on the subject of the Administration of Criminal Law. He and Courtlandt Parker, prosecutor of Essex county, were the only ones who responded, and their responses were published in the special report of that Association in 1867. In reference to that report, he contributed, by request, an article for the Princeton Review, in 1868.

Haines, Daniel, LL.D., was born in New York, January 6th, 1801. His father was for many years a well-known and successful merchant in that city. He graduated from New Jersey College, in 1820; studied law, and was licensed in 1823, and as a counsellor, in 1826. He was called to be Sergeant-at-Law, in 1837, one of the last upon whom this distinction was conferred in New Jersey. He settled in Hamburg, N. J., in 1824, where he resided until his death. In 1843 he was chosen Governor by the Legislature. In 1845 he declined the nomination for Governor, under the new Constitution, which then went into effect, but in 1847 he was again nominated and elected, serving the full term of three years. In 1852 he became a Justice of the Supreme Court, and being reappointed, held that office fourteen years. He was elected a Trustee of Princeton College in 1845. When re-elected Governor, he resigned, that another might be chosen in his place, because, as Governor, he became President of the Board. In 1850, on the expiration of his term, he was again made a Trustee, and continued to be so until his death. He held important positions, by appointment of the Governors and Legislatures of New Jersey, during the later years of his life. In 1872 he attended the National Prison Reform Association in London, being appointed by the Governor to represent his State. He was Presiding Officer of the Association on the day it was visited by the Prince of Wales.

Useful and honored as Judge Haines was in political life, he was even more useful and greatly beloved as a pious man. He was made a ruling elder in the North Hardiston Presbyterian Church (New School), in 1837, which office he held forty years. He frequently represented his Presbytery in the General Assembly, where he was placed upon important committees. He was prominent in all the measures adopted for uniting the two branches of the Church, and was a member of the joint committee to whom were referred the difficult legal questions connected with the reunion. He was a corporate member of the A. B. C. F. M., and was active in the American Bible Society, Sabbath-school work, and Temperance. His disposition was gentle, his manners mild, his spirit devout, and his piety was of the Johannean type. He was a man of prayer and constant study of the Divine Word. He was very conscientious in the observance of the Sabbath, and had an ardent desire for the conversion of souls. During all the years of his public life he continued to take an active part in the prayer-meeting. When he was Governor a physician, of Trenton, remarked to a friend, "I have seen a strange sight to-day—the Governor of this State go into the room of a man, a stranger, and kneeling at his bedside, pray for his salvation."

Governor Haines had great influence in private conversation, and thereby led many to the Saviour, some of them members of the Bar of New Jersey. On his last Sabbath afternoon he made a list of families and persons to be prayed for and visited that week. He was a Sabbath-school superintendent for nearly half a century, and generally taught a Bible class. For forty years he made the offer of a copy of the Bible, or of some standard religious work, to every scholar committing to memory the Westminster Shorter Catechism. About the year 1837 he was engaged in a Sabbath-school work near his home, where, upon a mountain, men, women and children from the charcoal burners were gathered in a log house, for religious instruction and for short addresses. The last Sabbath of his life he superintended his Sabbath School, taught his class, attended public service twice, and proposed to conduct a meeting in a private house that evening, but before the hour came he was stricken with death, January 26th, 1877. Thus he brought forth fruit, even in old age, passing away in the still, calm beauty by which his life had been adorned. Gov. Haines was the brother of Mrs. Doremus, who was the founder of Woman's Work for Woman among the heathen, and who was so active among the charities of New York city.

Haines, Mrs. F. E. H., daughter of Sampson Vryling Stoddard and Electa (Barrell) Wilder, was born February 19th, 1819, at Paris, France. Her childhood was spent in Paris, in Bolton and Ware, Mass., and Brooklyn and New York, N. Y.

While in Paris, her father's house was the centre of the evangelical activities of France. The Paris Tract Society was formed in his parlor, in 1818; the Bible Society, in 1819, and the Missionary Society in 1822. In that same room the leading evangelical divines of Europe and America, visiting Paris, were accustomed to meet and worship. It was also frequented by many who have achieved a world-wide reputation in politics, letters or art. Returning to this country with his family, her father's American, like his Parisian, home continued the centre of ceaseless Christian activities, Mr. Wilder being variously connected with twenty-one societies and institutions. He was one of the original founders of the American Tract Society, American Home Missionary Society, American Education Society, and American and Foreign Christian Union. He was also one of the original trustees that founded Amherst College. He was, for many years, President of the Tract Society and a leading director in many others.

Amid such associations, Francis was moulded and prepared for her own life of usefulness and activity. At eleven years of age she was received into active church membership. In 1832 she is active in a juvenile foreign missionary society. Later, she is a working member of the New Jersey State Temperance Alliance; a member of the Executive Committee of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, for N. J., and active in the local work. Mrs. Haines was also, for a number of years, on the Executive Committee of Mrs. Doremus' Union Missionary Society; for ten years a Vice-President of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Presbyterian Church; fourteen pastor of the First Foreign Mission Church, Assenon, Maine, and the New England Free-Trade Foreign Mission Church, Boston, and organized, with others, the American Society of Foreign Missions in New York in 1832. From October, 1837, to 1853, he was pastor of the Williams Seminary, and of the Home Missions in New Jersey, and of the First Foreign Mission Church in New York. He was pastor of the Presbyterian Church, State Street, New York, during which position he was well regarded and successful.

Haines, Selden, D. D., was born in Hartland, Conn., November 27th, 1804, and graduated at Yale College in 1829. He began the study of law with Hays and Tamm in P. H. Keegan, N. Y., and subsequently the bar in Trumbull county, Ohio. From 1830, until he practiced his profession six years, which he relinquished that profession, and was licensed to preach, he was called by the Presbytery of Trumbull, Ohio, September, 1830, and was ordained to that Presbytery in February, 1837, and spent the following nine or ten years in Ohio and Western New York as a home missionary. In January, 1840, he accepted a call from the First Presbyterian Church in H. H. N. Y., where he remained until September, 1846, when the church here in that place has ceased to be an established organization, when which post he resigned, and in 1848, the Rev. Wm. E. Kim became the pastor of the united congregation. Dr. Haines was for three years pastor of the Houston Street Church in New York, and for five years was pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Saratoga, N. Y., and afterwards six years in Champlain and Rossville, N. Y., and is compelled to abstain from preaching since 1877, in consequence of physical debilities. He has labored faithfully and successfully in the Masters' service. He is now the senior member of the Presbytery of Ohio.

Halt, Rev. Benjamin, graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1774, and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, October 25th, 1774, as pastor of the First of July. He was ordained to that office in 1777, and pastored that the Presbytery of New Brunswick, N. J. When settled in that office, he was the first to apply the doctrine of the Cross. He resigned his charge in America, 1783, and was settled in Connecticut, 1784, in New Britain, and died there 1797.

Halbert, Rev. William Rheem, was born in Ohio, 1812, and died in 1880. He studied at the same school as the Rev. Mr. Halbert, and was ordained to the same office in 1837, and pastored that the Presbytery of New Brunswick, N. J. He was settled in that office in 1837, and died there in 1880.

• Halt, Rev. Benjamin, was born in New York, 1774, and was ordained to the same office in 1777, and pastored that the Presbytery of New Brunswick, N. J. He was settled in that office in 1777, and died there in 1797.

1808, as a pastor. He died at Canisus, April 24th, 1884. Mr. Halbert was a man of far more than ordinary social, intellectual, and religious qualities. Amongst his brethren to whom he was known, no one was a more welcome guest. In the churches where he had been invited to preach, no one was more gladly heard. In his own mind, he was a faithful and a capable pastor and preacher.

Hale, George, D. D., was born in Catskill, Greene county, N. Y., June 25th, 1810. He graduated at Williams College, Mass., in 1830, and afterward studied as Theologian two years. After spending three years in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, he was licensed, November 1st, 1836, by the Presbytery of Catskill to begin his labors at Pennington, N. J., November 15th, 1838, and was ordained pastor there by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, February 7th, 1839. His pastoral relation with that church, which was a happy and successful one, was dissolved March 7th, 1839, that he might accept the office of Secretary of the Presbyterian Relief Fund for Dissolved Ministers and their Families. In this office he still continues, ardently devoted to his important work, and cheerfully blessed in securing for it a constant growing prosperity.

Dr. Hale has for ten years a member of the Presbyterian Board of P. W. in Conn., for ten years a member of the Board of Education of the Presbyterian Church, and has been for twenty-two years a Trustee of Princeton Theological Seminary. He is a genial and accomplished gentleman, untiring in his efforts to do good, and, by the excellence of his character and his ability as a minister, has won the esteem of his brethren and the confidence of the Church.

Hall, Charles, D. D., the eldest child of Jacob Hall, was born at Williamsport, Pa., June 23d, 1799, though, while he was yet in his infancy, the family removed to Geneva, N. Y. He graduated at Hamilton College in 1824, with the first honors of his class, studied theology at Princeton, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Newark, April 24th, 1827. In that year he was called to the office of Assistant Secretary of the American Home Missionary Society, in the city of New York, and accepted the appointment. In the Autumn of 1837 he was appointed one of the co-ordinate Secretaries for Correspondence, and in this office he continued until his death October 31st, 1853, discharging its duties with rare ability and fidelity. Dr. Hall was for several years the editor of the Home Missionary, and wrote a considerable part of each of the Annual Reports of the American Home Missionary Society, during the twenty-five years that he was connected with it. He published a tract entitled "Plans and Motives for the Extension of Sabbath Schools" for which there was awarded to him a prize of fifty dollars, the Daily Verse-Expositor, consisting of a brief commentary on the Acts of the Apostles, a Plan for Systematic Benevolence, and a sermon on the Means of the World's Conversion, published in the National Preacher, 1841.

Hall, David, D. D., was born at Slate Lick, Armstrong county, Pa., December 13th, 1828. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1850, and was Principal of the Witherspoon Institute, in Butler, 1850-51. After graduating at the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, in 1854, he took a post-graduate course in Princeton Seminary, 1854-55. He was called, November, 1855, to be co-pastor with the Rev. Dr. James Hoge, in the First Presbyterian Church of Columbus, Ohio. He was ordained by Allegheny Presbytery, November 5th, 1856, and the same day installed pastor of the churches of Union and Brady's Bend. He became pastor of the First Church of Mansfield, Ohio, May 6th, 1866, and was released from that charge March 24th, 1874. On June 30th, 1874, he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Indiana, Pa., where he still is.

Dr. Hall is a man of fine presence and dignified bearing. He is a good speaker, earnest and impressive. In natural disposition and temperament he is rather timid, shrinking from preaching on set occasions. His motto seems to be: "Do all the good you can, and say nothing about it." He likes best to preach to his own people, with a single eye to benefit them. He is a man of fine scholarship and much general culture. His style of preaching is characterized by clearness, simplicity and strength. He abounds in illustrations from nature. In his preaching he emphasizes Christian morality, honor, manliness, integrity, truth, chivalry, charity, helpfulness, as in the sight of God and in the love of Christ. He teaches that salvation is largely character, and exalts Christ's offices of Prophet, or Teacher and King, as well as His office of Priest. He is bold as a lion, in the pulpit, in rebuking wrong-doing, meanness, dishonor and injustice of every kind. He makes an impression on the community, by his efforts to tone up public morals. His ministry at Indiana has been largely blessed, and he is greatly beloved and admired by his people.

Hall, Rev. George, was born at Keene, N. H., June 4th, 1804; was a student at Dartmouth College; pursued his theological studies at Princeton Seminary, and under the direction of Rev. Drs. Erskine Mason and Henry White, in New York city, and was licensed by the Third Presbytery of New York, October 12th, 1835. After being pastor of the Congregational Church at Weston, Conn., from 1837 to 1841, he seems to have been without any settlement until 1860, but temporarily supplied various churches in Connecticut and New York. He was stated supply to Fayette and Ebenezer churches, Miss., from 1849 to 1871, and to Port Gibson Church from 1872 to 1874. He then became stated supply of the Church in Fayetteville, Tenn., from 1874 to 1876. In the latter year he returned to Port Gibson, Miss., where he died, September 4th, 1878. Mr. Hall was a truly noble and good man. He was eminently devoted to the work of saving souls. His memory is warmly cherished in the churches he served in Mississippi, Tennessee, and by all who knew him.

Hall, James, D. D., was born of Scotch-Irish parentage, at Carlisle, Pa., August 23d, 1711. When he was eight years old, the family removed to North Carolina. He graduated at Princeton College in 1741, with a high reputation as a scholar, especially in the exact sciences; studied theology under the direction of Dr. Witherspoon, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Orange, in 1775 or 1776. On April 8th, 1778, he was installed pastor of the united congregations of Fourth Creek, Concord and Bethany, holding this relation till 1790, when he was released from the pastorate of the first two churches, that he might have more time to devote to the cause of domestic missions. His connection with the Bethany congregation continued during the remainder of his life.

During the scenes of the Revolution, Dr. Hall's heart went fully into the American cause, and he declined no service, whether secular or sacred, by which he might hope to promote it. In 1779 he led a select company of cavalry on an expedition into South Carolina, performing the double office of commander and chaplain, and was absent for several months. At the close of the war he set himself, with all his energies, to repair the waste places of Zion, to restore the stated ordinances of the gospel where they had been discontinued, and to elevate the standard of Christian feeling and character. In 1793 he commenced his missionary excursions, under the direction of a Commission of Synod. In the Autumn of 1800, under a Commission of the General Assembly, he commenced a mission to Natchez, together with two other brethren whom the Synod had appointed to accompany him. This was the first in the series of Protestant missionary efforts in the lower part of the Valley of the Mississippi. He was a commissioner to the General Assembly from the Presbytery of Orange sixteen times, and was Moderator of that body in 1803. He died, July 25th, 1826, and his body lies entombed in Bethany churchyard. Dr. Hall was a warm and active friend of revivals of religion. His preaching was distinguished for a clear, earnest and pungent exhibition of the truths of God's Word. He was eminently a man of missions. His heart was in the work of spreading the gospel, and his life was earnestly and successfully devoted to it.

Hall, John, D. D., is of Scotch-Irish parentage, and was born in the County Armagh, Ireland, July 31st, 1829. He entered Belfast College when he was only thirteen years of age, and, notwithstanding his extreme youth, was repeatedly a Hebrew prize man, and uniformly succeeded in obtaining prizes in other departments of his collegiate and theological studies.

He was licensed to preach at the age of twenty, and was at once chosen to labor as "The Students' Missionary" in the West of Ireland, where he did good service for the cause of Christ, was equal to all demands, and received a training of invaluable service to him. In this mission station the young preacher did his work, in the best sense of the word, so conspicuously well that he was chosen pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Armagh, over which he was installed in 1852. In 1858 he was called to the Church of Mary's Abbey, now Rutland Square, in Dublin, where he took a foremost stand among the preachers of that metropolis, and a prominent place among its men of letters and influence. In this high place of the field he pursued his scholarly investigations, edited The Evangelical Witness, demonstrated that he was an earnest friend of popular education, and received from the Queen the honorary appointment of Commissioner of Education for Ireland, which position he filled most judiciously and gratuitously while he remained in Dublin.

JOHN HALL, D. D.

In 1867 he was a delegate from the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland to the Presbyterian churches of the United States, by whom he was received with great warmth and courtesy, and before whom his addresses were extremely eloquent.

After his return to Ireland he received by telegram a unanimous call to the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church in New York, which he accepted, entering upon his labors on November 3d, 1867. In this field he has been increasingly popular, influential and prosperous. The church edifice in which his people worshiped when his pastorate began soon became inadequate for their accommodation, and a magnificent church was erected in 1873-71 on the corner of Fifth avenue and Fifty-fifth street, costing about one million of dollars, which is the largest Presbyterian Church in New York, if not in the world, and the congregation occupying it the most wealthy. The membership is very large; the annual benevolent contributions exceed $100,000, and the charitable work carried on at the several mission chapels supported by the church is so varied and comprehensive that our space will not permit us to enter into detail. It must suffice to state that whatever wealth can furnish and large experience can suggest for aiding, elevating and evangelizing the masses, are used in the furtherance of the good work.

Dr. Hall is often called to preach in other cities, on special occasions, to address public meetings convened to advance in any direction the interests of morality and religion, and to officiate at the funerals even of those who have belonged to other denominations.

The Chancellorship of the University of the City of New York was unanimously offered him, and, without accepting it, he discharged its duties for two years.

He has secured and retains the warmest affection and confidence of his own people, and is regarded by all as a most judicious public citizen, as well as a sympathetic, prudent private adviser.

Dr. Hall appears to speak extempore, but his sermons are written more or less fully, although he never brings the manuscript to the pulpit. His public exercises are never erudite, but always manifest a thorough knowledge of his subject, even to the minutest details. He argues, illustrates, examines, penetrates, convinces, and notably commends the truth to every man's conscience, in the sight of God. He makes no demonstrations, but while calm and moderate in both language and gestures, he is deeply impressive. It is the impressiveness of dignity, of solemnity, of learning; of one who is fully convinced of the truth he is uttering, who has no motive or policy in regard to any person or circumstance, and who is as anxious for the attention and salvation of the beggar as the millionaire.

His language is always simple, chaste and scholarly, arresting the attention of children, and yet instructing, delighting and moving the most cultured. All is said kindly but forcibly, and when his theme requires it, often pathetically.

In 1875 he delivered the course of lectures in Yale Theological Seminary, on "The Lyman Beecher Foundation," has since delivered an annual course of lectures to the students in the same College, and in several other colleges and seminaries, is a frequent contributor to religious and sometimes to secular journals, always manifesting, whether in speech or writing, the same breadth of culture, soundness of judgment, and singleness of aim. He is also the author of several popular religious books. Dr. Hall is above the medium height, with a full, large figure, and a head with marked intellectual characteristics. His manners are dignified, calm, agreeable, and withal cheerful and animated in social intercourse, quickly endearing himself to those with whom he comes in contact. He combines in a rare degree those qualities which are pleasing in social life and invaluable in a public career. There is probably no man occupying a pulpit in America who exercises a wider influence for good, or who has won a truer fame by a consistency and devotedness worthy of all imitation. He is still in middle life, in the fullness of his strength, and it may be has many years of usefulness yet before him.

The new building erected by Dr. Hall's congregation is built mainly of brown stone, and our illustration will give a better idea of its general appearance than any description. It is only necessary to say, that every part is thoroughly constructed. There is no more sham or pretentiousness about it than about the man who now preaches the everlasting gospel within its walls. The audience-room is at least equal to any in the land. It is capacious, cheerful, churchly. The interior walls form an immense ellipse, which must, in a building of the size of this one, be advantageous for its acoustic properties. The ceiling is vaulted in the centre and provided with reflectors for lighting. Five aisles divide the long sweep of pews, which are arranged in semi-circular lines, into convenient lengths. The floor descends from the entrance nearly to the pulpit, and then rises again, so that every sitting will have a comfortable view of the speaker. Broad galleries nearly encircle the room. These are supported on light pillars, which will present little or no obstacle to a view of the pulpit. The organ is behind and above the pulpit, and there is a small choir gallery, which can be made available, if necessary, though Dr. Hall's people are wise and devout enough to do their own singing. The oak and ash of the wood-work, the delicate fresco, simple but elegant, and the light prevailing tone of the stained glass in the windows, which are simple, add vastly to the attractiveness of this spacious place of worship, which, under the Divine blessing, is the source and centre of so much pure and potent influence for the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom.

Hall, John, D. D., was born in Philadelphia, August 11th, 1806; graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, in 1823, and in December, 1827, was admitted to practice at the Philadelphia Bar. In 1832 he relinquished the practice of law, with a view to devote his life to the ministry, and being elected a manager, and afterwards Secretary, of the Mission work of the American Sunday-school Union, his training for the ministry was chiefly in the course of active work in this service. He was editor of the Sunday-school Journal and the Youth's Friend, revised the first five volumes of the "Union Questions on the Bible," and prepared the seven subsequent volumes of the series. He produced nine original works and compiled six others, which have now a place upon the catalogue of the Union. In 1839 he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, and was ordained and installed, August 11th, 1841, pastor of the First Church in Trenton, N. J., and no inducement has been able to make him engage in labor in another field. When he entered upon his pastorate in Trenton, the First had been the only Presbyterian Church for more than a century; now there are six churches in the city. His ministry has been greatly blessed.

In 1852-3 Dr. Hall delivered a course of lectures in the Princeton Theological Seminary, filling a temporary vacancy in the chair of Pastoral Theology. In addition to the works he prepared for the American Sunday-school Union, nine volumes appear on the catalogue of the Presbyterian Board of Publication. He has also published some occasional sermons, and been a frequent contributor to various religious and literary journals. Numerous articles from his pen have appeared in the Princeton Review. Dr. Hall is an able scholar, a vigorous and graceful writer, an instructive and impressive preacher, and has wielded a large influence for good by his pen and from his pulpit.

Hall, John G., D. D., the son of William and Mary Thomas (Haines) Hall, was born at Brooklyn, N. Y., October 16th, 1816. He graduated from the University of the City of New York, in 1836, and took his second degree in 1839. His theological instruction was had at the Union Seminary, N. Y., whence he graduated in 1839; and the same year he was licensed by the Third Presbytery of New York. He has had three pastoral settlements, viz., at South Egremont, Mass., Cherry Valley, N. Y., and Fort Plain, N. Y. For the last few years he has resided at Cleveland, Ohio, without any stated charge, but supplying, for longer or shorter periods, destitute churches in the neighborhood. His honorary degree of D. D. was given him by his Alma Mater, in 1879.

Dr. Hall is full of genial vigor of mind and heart; a warm friend; a valuable Presbyter, freely giving the fruits of his ripe experience and able scholarship in the judicial and ministerial circles of our Church, where he is one of the most prized and useful members. He is entering upon a happy old age, with a large part of his family about him—never willing to be idle, always strong and fresh in thought, full of Christian faith and love, and sure to be an active blessing somewhere in the Lord's vineyard, while he lives.

Hall, John W., D. D., was born in Orange county, North Carolina, January 19th, 1802. In his youth he taught school and studied alternately until he acquired a good classical education; then studied theology with Dr. Gideon Blæckburn. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of West Tennessee, in October, 1824, after which he preached for some two years among the churches, traveling from place to place as an evangelist. He was ordained as an evangelist by the same Presbytery that licensed him. He had a successful pastorate at Murfreesboro, Tenn., for four years, and then took charge, for ten years, of the Church in Gallatin, Tenn., which had been organized by his efforts and flourished under his ministry. Here he organized a female seminary, and acted as President for three years.

In 1840 he became pastor of the Third Street Church in Dayton, Ohio, and sustained this relation for twelve years, his ministry being greatly blessed. For a short time, subsequently, he was pastor of the Church in Huntsville, Ala. For twelve years from 1854 he was President of Miami University, Ohio, his administration being eminently a success. After leaving the University Dr. Hall was for ten years superintendent of the Public Schools of Covington, Ky., where his labors were productive of excellent results. He was eminently successful as an evangelist, pastor, preacher, and as an educator of youth. His preaching was not sensational, but instructive and edifying. His highest ambition was, not to exalt himself, but Christ. He is now, in his eighty-first year, preaching occasionally, as he has opportunity, awaiting the call of the Master to come up higher, and enter into rest. His example, as a self-made man, is full of encouragement to young men.

Hall, William K., D. D., was born in Boston, Mass., November 4th, 1836. He graduated at Yale College, in the class of 1859. He afterwards pursued his theological studies in Yale Divinity School, and in Berlin, Germany. He was ordained in October, 1862, and spent four years in the service of the country. October, 1866, he was installed pastor of the Congregational Church at Stratford, Conn. In 1873 he received a call to the First Presbyterian Church of Newburgh, N. Y., and was installed as its pastor on the first of May following, where he has since labored with great acceptance and success. In 1882 the honorary degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by the University of New York.

Dr. Hall has fine scholarly attainments, and a vigorous and healthy intellectual organization. He combines with an earnest and intelligent interest in the various phases of modern thought, a wise and strong conservatism. He is decidedly a thinker, and shows his New England training in his leaning toward the philosophical and metaphysical aspects of truth. But not less marked are the practical tendencies of his thought, which is always characterized by keen spiritual insight, elevation of tone, width of view, comprehensiveness of grasp, and vigorous common sense. His sermons show marks of careful preparation, literary finish, rhetorical power, and logical sequence of thought, and never lack the directness, earnestness and simplicity which distinguish his ordinary address. His manner in the pulpit is impressive. He combines breadth of sympathy with decision of character and thought. He is a man of public spirit, ready and efficient in the support of every movement for the public good.

Halsey, Rev. Jeremiah, was Tutor in the College of New Jersey from 1757 to 1767. In 1769 the trustees voted a sum of money to him, in consideration of his extraordinary and faithful services," and when he retired from the tutorship, they gave him a certificate recommending him as "a gentleman of genius, learning and real merit." In 1767 he was ordained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, and sent on a missionary tour to the South; afterwards was settled as a pastor, but the place of his location we do not know. He was for eleven years a trustee of the college. Mr. Halsey died in 1799.

Halsey, Job Foster, D. D., the son of Luther and Abigail Foster Halsey, was born at Schenectady, N. Y., July 12th, 1800; graduated from Union College, N. Y., 1819; studied theology with his brother, the Rev. Luther Halsey; was licensed, May 1st, 1823, by the Presbytery of North River; spent three years, 1823-6, at Princeton Seminary; was ordained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, June 14th, 1826, and on the same day installed pastor of the "Old Tennent Church," at Freehold, N. J., where he labored until May 5th, 1828. He was agent in New Jersey for the American Bible Society, 1828-30; in Albany, N. Y., 1829-30, for the American Tract Society, and in Pittsburg, 1830-31, in the Sunday-school cause. He was pastor of the First Church of Allegheny City, Pa., from July 1st, 1831, to April 23d, 1836; a Professor, 1835-6, in the Marion Manual Labor College in Missouri; Principal of Baritan Seminary for Young Ladies, at Perth Amboy, N. J., 1836-41; pastor at West Bloomfield, now Montclair, N. J., from January 8th, 1852, to March 27th, 1856; and installed pastor of the First Church of Norristown, Pa., May 11th, 1856, where he continued to labor twenty-four years when, because of the increasing infirmities of age, he was released, March 7th, 1881, but was continued by his congregation Pastor Emeritus, until his death. This event occurred, March 24th, 1882. Dr. Halsey was an eminently devout man, and in his manner was benign, affectionate, cheerful, frank and honest. His preaching was earnest, often impassioned, tender, biblical and pungent. He was venerated and beloved by his people and by all who knew him.

Halsey, Leroy Jones, D. D., eldest son of John and Lucy Halsey, was born in Goochland county, Va., January 28th, 1812. The family removed to Huntsville, Alabama, when he was six years of age. He graduated at Nashville University, in 1834, and was Tutor of Ancient Languages for two years. He studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was licensed to preach the gospel, by New Brunswick Presbytery, in 1840. For two years he preached as Agent, in Dallas county, Ala. March 21st, 1843, he was ordained, and installed pastor of the Church in Jukes, Miss. His ministry here was most successful. In 1848 he removed to Louisville, Ky., where he labored for ten years as pastor of the Chestnut Street Presbyterian Church. In 1859 he was elected by the General Assembly, to the Chair of Pastoral Theology, Homiletics and Church Government, in the Theological Seminary of the Northwest, at Chicago, Ill., where he has since resided, constantly engaged in seminary duties. Since 1881 he has held the position of Professor Emeritus in the seminary.

As a preacher, Dr. Halsey ranked high in all the best elements of popularity and power. As an instructor, he was full, clear and eloquent. As an author, he is characterized by richness of thought and purity of style. His published works are: "Literary Attractions of the Bible" 1859; "Life Pictures from the Bible," 1860; "Beauty of Emanuel" 1861; "Life and Works of Philip Lindley, D.D." 1866; "Memoir of Lewis W. Green, D.D." 1871; "Living Christianity" 1881. He has also been connected with The Interior newspaper since 1876.

Halsey, Luther, D. D., LL.D., was born at Schenectady, N. Y., January 1st, 1794, and died at Norristown, Pa., October 29th, 1880. He was Professor of Theology in the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa., 1829-35, and in the latter year went to the Chair of Ecclesiastical History and Church Polity in Auburn Theological Seminary, but resigned in 1844. From 1847 to 1850 he acted as Professor of Church History in the Union Theological Seminary, New York city. For several years before his death he lived in retirement. Dr. Halsey was an eminent scholar, and filled the important positions he was called to occupy with great ability.

Hamill, Hugh, D. D., son of Robert and Isabella Todd Hamill, was born at Norristown, Pa., February 28th, 1810; was graduated from Rutgers College, N. J., in 1827, and was a student at Princeton Seminary from November 1827, to April, 1830, afterwards spending the Winter of 1831-2 at New Haven, Conn., Theological Seminary. Mr. Hamill was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 30th, 1830; taught during the following Summer in the boarding-school of the Rev. Robert Steel, at Abington, Pa.; was ordained an evangelist at Buffalo, N. Y., by the Presbytery of Buffalo, October 31st, 1832. He was stated supply at Black Rock, now the Breckenridge Street Church, Buffalo, N. Y., from November 1st, 1830 until November 1st, 1833, then began to preach at Elkton, Md., and Pencader Church, Del., where he was installed pastor by New Castle Presbytery, January 21st, 1834, and from which he was released May 1st, 1837, after a highly successful pastorate. From 1837, he was associated, for thirty-three years, with his brother, the Rev. Samuel M. Hamill, D. D., as Principal of the High School at Lawrenceville, N. J., retiring from this position on account of impaired hearing, which interfered with his duties as an instructor. In the Spring of 1873 he removed to Newark, Del., where he died, August 1st, 1881, exhibiting to the last a most trustful and submissive spirit. Dr. Hamill was retiring and modest, but decided; an accurate, thorough and successful instructor; as a preacher he was clear, concise and forceful; his character was marked by simplicity, godly sincerity, kindliness of heart and unswerving integrity. He possessed fine scholarship, and his life was pure, noble and useful.

Hamill, Robert, D.D., was born at Norristown, Pa. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1839, and was teacher at Lawrenceville, N. J., 1839-42. He was stated supply of the First Church, Norfolk, Va., 1846; ordained by the Presbytery of Huntingdon, May 6th, 1846; pastor of the Sinking Creek and Spring Creek churches, Pa., 1846-75, and has been pastor at Sinking Creek since 1875. Dr. Hamill is an excellent and successful preacher, and faithful in pastoral work. He is greatly beloved by his people, and held in high esteem by his brethren in the ministry. He was elected a Director of the Princeton Theological Seminary in 1868, and has occupied the Moderator's chair of the Synod of Philadelphia.

Hamilton, Alfred, D. D., the son of Archibald and Maria (Shackleford) Hamilton, was born at Culpeper Court House, Va., May 1st, 1805. He graduated at the Western University, Pittsburg, in 1827; at the Western Theological Seminary, in 1830, and was licensed by the Ohio Presbytery. He spent two years as agent for the Board of Domestic Missions in the States of Ohio, Kentucky and Tennessee, when he settled at Elizabethtown, Ky., where he labored very earnestly and usefully for nearly three years. In 1835 he became pastor of the Church at Fagg's Manor, Chester county, Pa., and here his life work was chiefly accomplished. This relation continued until 1858. He then took charge of a newly organized Church in Aurora, Ill., and labored with great assiduity in gathering a congregation, and in securing the erection of a house of worship. He was next pastor, and with much success, of the Church at Mattoon, Ill., from 1862 to 1865. After relinquishing this charge he became associate editor of the Northwestern Presbyterian, and then traveling correspondent and solicitor for that journal. At the time of his decease (September 13th, 1867), he was District Missionary of the Board of Domestic Missions for the State of Illinois.

Dr. Hamilton possessed a good, practical, working intellect, that had been well disciplined by early training, and constantly strengthened and enlarged by life-long reading and reflection. There was something of rare solidity and weight in his character. A man of clearest judgment and of strongest convictions, he was yet gentle and unassuming, modest and retiring. He was diligent and faithful in every department of pastoral labor, while, as a preacher, he was always clear, instructive and earnest in the exhibition of the truth. He was greatly honored and beloved in the congregations he served, and held in the highest esteem among his brethren in the ministry.

Hamilton College, Clinton, N. Y., was designed as a Christian Institution for advanced education. Religion and learning were its proposed purpose, and their promotion its intended work. The fruit it has borne has largely come from pious culture, and largely dropped into the lap of the Church. Much of its record is in ecclesiastical history, and especially in the history of the Synod of Central New York, and it has made no little of the history of the ministers and churches of that Synod.

In 1793, the Rev. Samuel Kirkland, for more than forty years a missionary among the Oneida Indians, devoted a large share of his property towards "laying the foundation and supporting an academy contiguous to the Oneida nation, for the mutual benefit of the early settlers of the country and the various tribes of confederate Indians." After consultation with General Washington, who was at that time an owner of lands in that vicinity, and with other patriotic men of his acquaintance, he granted, by deed to Alexander Hamilton and fifteen others, about three hundred acres of land in trust, for the purpose of building Hamilton Oneida Academy. The collection of the subscriptions in labor and lumber for the building, cost Mr. Kirkland much summoning and urging to the woods, and toilsome leading in the chopping there, but he allowed no "letting-up" or "letting-off," and July 1st, 1794, the corner-stone was laid by Baron Stenben, attended with all the ceremony and display, quite primitive, to be sure, that the times and circumstances permitted. The frame went up, and in a short time the school was opened, under the Rev. John Niles, whose successors were the Rev. Robert Porter, Seth Norton and the Rev. James Robins, all of them, as well as Mr. Kirkland, graduates of Yale College, and, it is believed, well fitted to foster the interests of sound learning and Christian morals.

For eighteen years the Academy existed, and attained to a high degree of prosperity. But with the growth of the neighboring settlements, and the rapid development of western New York, the necessity was felt for an institution which should afford more ample facilities for instruction and a more extended course of study. Clinton and Fairfield became competitors for its location, and college charters of similar character and conditions were granted to each. By a compromise between the friends of the rival locations, Clinton secured the coveted honor. The Institution, bearing the name of Hamilton College, was chartered May 26th, 1812.

Mr. Kirkwood's wooden building, of nameless architecture, three stories high and ninety feet long, and thirty-eight wide, retired, and three large dormitories, each four stories high and ninety-eight feet long and forty-nine wide, and a chapel, three stories high, eighty-one feet long and fifty-one wide, with lecture and recitation rooms, and a hall of natural history, and a laboratory and gymnasium, all of stone, an observatory, at which twenty-seven asteroids have been discovered; a library and a society hall, some of them finely designed, and an elegant President's mansion, have come in its place, with books and cabinets, and instruments and apparatus, worth $120,000. The park in the midst of which the college buildings stand embraces fifteen acres.

Dr. Azel Backus, eminent as a preacher and a scholar, as well as the successor of Tr. Bellamy, at Bethlehem, Conn., was chosen the first President of the College. Upon his death, in December, 1817, Dr. Henry Davis, President, for the previous eight years, of Middlebury College, was elected his successor, and occupied the post until his resignation, in 1833. The successors of President Davis have been the Rev. Dr. Sereno E. Dwight, in 1833; the Rev. Dr. Joseph Penny, in 1835; the Rev. Dr. Simeon North, in 1839; the Rev. Dr. Samuel Ware Fisher, in 1858, and the Rev. Dr. Samuel Gillman Brown, who was inaugurated into the Presidency in 1866, and filled it until June 30th, 1881. The Rev. Henry Darling, D.D., LL.D., was inaugurated as President, September 15th, 1881, and at present holds the position. The Faculty, that began with one member, has been multiplied to sixteen. The Institution is now, under its excellent control, in a highly prosperous condition, the Catalogue for 1883-4 reporting two hundred and ten students.

Hamilton, James, was born in Carlisle, Pa., October 16th, 1793, and there he died, January 23d, 1873. He was an only son of Judge Hamilton, and a lineal descendant of the Rev. Samuel Thomson, the first pastor of the Church at the Meeting-House Spring, which, with that of Silver Spring, was the first Presbyterian charge west of the Susquehanna River. In 1812 he graduated at Dickinson College, and in 1816 became a member of the Bar in his native place. He never married. He was a man of high and varied culture; wrote much, and published several tracts and small books, including "Notes on Prophecy," published anonymously, in 1859, and "The Two Pilgrims," which appeared in 1871. He labored assiduously and persistently in the cause of education. For many years a faithful Trustee of Dickinson College. From 1836 until his death a most efficient public school Director, and first Secretary of the Board. In 1835 he was elected a ruling elder of the Second Presbyterian Church, but modestly declined; and though subsequently elected, in 1856, he was still unwilling to act. He was one of the original Trustees of the Second Church, and first Secretary of the Board. He was an excellent Bible-class teacher, and, for years before his death, the devoted Superintendent of the Sabbath School. He was the warm supporter of prayer meetings and revivals, and in him the young had ever a true and earnest friend. He was a man of ample means, and very generous to the Church and to our several Church Boards, contributing largely of his time and money to educational, benevolent and religious purposes, and was through all his life a friend and helper of the poor and needy. Somewhat eccentric, but eminently good, and modest, and useful, and worthy to be had in grateful remembrance. A few years after his death his former pastor, the Rev. Dr. A. T. McGill, wrote of him as follows: "James Hamilton was one of the best men I ever knew, in any calling of life. Rich, and bashful, and eccentric, as he was, he went about doing good. His conscientiousness gave him diligence and courage, method and force." Though he had almost completed his fourscore years, yet he enjoyed good health and vigor, and, at the end of his mortal course, was very suddenly transferred to a higher and better life—redeemed, and sanctified, and glorified, through the infinite merit of Jesus Christ, in whom alone he trusted, and whom he had faithfully served.

Hamilton, Rev. Lewis, was born in Rockaway, N. J., July 10th, 1810, and studied at Bloomfield Academy, and at Williams and Union Colleges. He was an alumnus of Auburn Theological Seminary. He was ordained pastor at Addison, by the Presbytery of Chemung, July 2d, 1840. His fields of labor were Branchport, one year; Addison, two and a half years; Campbell, four years; Hunt's Hollow, two years; Dunkirk, four years; Clarence, two years; Lima, Ind., two and a half years; Muscatine City, Kan., 1859; Pike's Peak, Col., 1860-3; U. S. Army, 1863-7; Central City, Col., 1869; Denver, 1870-7; Poncha Springs, 1878-80; Irwin, 1881. He was struck by a switch engine of the Denver and Rio Grande Railway, and died December 7th, 1881.

Mr. Hamilton was a remarkable example of activity in the Master's service in old age. Shortly after his death the Rev. John G. Reid wrote to the paper, Presbyterian Home Missions, concerning him:—

"IRWIN, COL.—This little church has been unusually prospered. Its great altitude, 10,500 feet above sea level, rendered it extremely difficult to get a man who could stand the work and remain for any length of time. When the Presbytery was at its greatest perplexity regarding its supply, Rev. Lewis Hamilton, the pioneer of Presbyterianism in Colorado, being the first Presbyterian minister on the field, familiarly known through the State as 'Father Hamilton,' volunteered, at his age (being then over 70), to undertake the charge. A stage journey of a hundred miles, over the mountains, in the Winter season and deep snows, necessitating the use of snow-shoes, lay between him and his work. But nothing daunted, this white-haired veteran of Christ pressed through all difficulties and entered upon his work. A living refutation to the charge that whitening locks unfit a man for acceptable labor, he drew all classes in that new camp to his side, and, shut in by the deep snow, the lofty ranges, and the long journey by stage, he labored faithfully and with signal success. His Sabbath School was especially prosperous."

Hamilton, Samuel M., D. D., is a native of Ireland. He was born at Conlig, Down county, April 19th, 1848. He graduated at Queen's University, Belfast, in 1868, and in theology at the Presbyterian College in the same city, in 1870. After being licensed by the Presbytery of Belfast, in May, 1870, he accepted the pastorate of the Great George's Street Presbyterian Church in that city, and was ordained in November of the same year. Here he labored with great acceptableness and success for two years and a half. In October, 1873, he was installed as co-pastor with Dr. Joseph McElroy, over the Scotch-Presbyterian Church, New York City, and since Dr. McElroy's death has been its sole pastor, blessed in his work and beloved by his people. Dr. Hamilton is a cultivated, warm-hearted gentleman, of intellectual force and firm adherence to principle. He is a diligent student, clear and strong in judgment, and conscientiously devoted to his work. He is eloquent as a preacher, faithful as a pastor, and in both relations discharges his duties with efficiency and success.

Hamilton, Thomas A., Esq., was born at Harrisburg, Pa., of English parentage, August 20, 1820.

THOMAS A. HAMILTON, ESQ.

In the fourth year of his age his parents removed with their family to Newark, N. J., where they continued to reside until 1825, at which time they removed again to Mobile, Alabama. At the age of fourteen the subject of this sketch entered the Sophomore Class in the College of New Jersey, but after passing through the Sophomore year he removed with his father's family to Alabama. Soon after reaching Mobile, he became a clerk in a large hardware store, but after spending about four years in this position, during which period he occupied as much time as circumstances would permit in the improvement of his mind, he commenced the study of the law, to which he had always been inclined. While pursuing his legal studies, he was for a considerable period of time a Deputy Clerk of the State Circuit Court, and Assistant Register in Chancery for the District in which Mobile is located. He was admitted to the Bar in 1842, and for the last forty years has been engaged in the practice of the law with a considerable degree of success.

In the early part of the year 1851, Mr. Hamilton became a communicating member of the Presbyterian Church, and a few years afterwards was elected a ruling elder, which position he still continues to hold. He has never sought office or political position, although always willing to bear his share of the public burdens and to do his part towards the advancement of all enterprises and undertakings which seemed to be calculated to advance the public good. In 1870 he was sent as a Commissioner from the Presbytery of South Alabama to the General Assembly of the Southern Presbyterian Church which met at Louisville in that year, and he was afterwards honored by being appointed as one of the Representatives of the Southern Presbyterian Church at the General Presbyterian Council which met at Philadelphia in the year 1880. The various important positions Mr. Hamilton has been called to occupy attest his ability, and indicate the high esteem which his consistent and useful life has secured.

Hamilton, William Ferguson, D. D., son of Joseph and Margaret (Ferguson) Hamilton, was born in Williamsport (now Monongahela City), Washington county, Pa., March 21st, 1821. He was graduated from Washington College, Pa., in the class of 1844, and from the Western Theological Seminary, in 1849. Immediately after the completion of his theological studies he was licensed by the Presbytery of Ohio (now Pittsburg), and in the following year was ordained by the same body, and installed as pastor of the Centre Church, where he labored for two years. He has since, with ability and success, exercised the pastoral office for ten years in Uniontown, Pa., and for seven years in the churches of Salem and Livermore, in the Presbytery of Blairsville. Since 1875 he has had charge of the Mount Pleasant Church, in the Presbytery of Washington. Residing in Washington, Pa., for the sake of the education of his children, he has been called to render valuable service, for which his talents and scholarship have so well fitted him. One form of this was the instruction of the Senior and Junior classes in Washington and Jefferson College, during the years 1876-80, in Psychology and Ethics. How ably he thus taught may well be left for inference to the readers of his masterly article in the Presbyterian Review of July, 1882, entitled "Recent Ethical Theory," an article which has attracted not only approval, but complimentary notice from high places. Among various fugitive articles, addresses and other pamphlets, which he has published, one claims a prominent place, viz.: An Address delivered at the Centenary Celebration of the Redstone Presbytery, the mother Presbytery of the West, held at Uniontown, Pa., in 1881, which is a rich repository of historical information, concerning one of the most important portions of our country and of the Presbyterian Church.

Dr. Hamilton is still in the full vigor of his faculties. To the ability of an honored minister of the gospel, he adds the pen of a ready and accomplished writer. His wisdom and skill in matters of the Church, notwithstanding his characteristic modesty, compel his service as Stated Clerk of Presbytery, chairman of important committees, and in other representative duties, at the imperative call of his brethren. He was Moderator of the Synod of Pittsburg, in 1873, the fourth annual meeting after the reunion of the Church and the reconstruction of its courts.

Hammond, Rev. Edward Payson, was born at Ellington, Conn., September 1st, 1831. He graduated at Williams College, in 1858; spent two years, 1858-59, at the Union Theological Seminary, New York city; was pastor of Free Church, Edinburgh, 1860-1, and was ordained, January 2d, 1863, an evangelist. Mr. Hammond, whilst at college, was exceedingly active as a Christian among the students and in the neighborhood, and very successful, and the President's son, who became a minister, with many others, was largely indebted to him for saving religious impressions. He has since been devoted to the work of an evangelist in this country and Great Britain, holding, literally, mass meetings in most of the large towns here and abroad, and contributing to multitudes of conversions. The revivals under his labors have been pre-eminently of the class that can be correctly observed only from a standpoint in the midst of them. To some persons they seem to be characterized by too much enginery and too much bustle.

A debt of gratitude is due to Mr. Hammond for the following reasons: 1. His contribution to the service of song; he being among the first to introduce the description of hymns and the style of music which have proved so effective in these latter days. 2. His perpetual use of the Scriptures and his habituating congregations to the same. 3. His exhibition and pressure of faith in Christ, at first, midst and last, and in its simplicity, without mixture with human feelings, frames, purposes and deeds. 4. His labors for the children, and the currency he has given to the conviction that the youngest are old enough to love, and trust and serve the Saviour, and to recognize and lament their disobedience to Him. 5. His incitement of Christian activity and widening the range of it. In the Summer of 1875 Mr. Hammond went to Alaska, when there were no missionaries there, and preached to the natives, and saw some inquiring the way of life. He did all in his power, at that time, through the press and in various ways, to call the attention of the people of the United States to the needs of Alaska. In addition to his earnest labors as an evangelist, Mr. Hammond is the author of some small but useful religious works.

Hampden-Sidney College is in Prince Edward county, Va. It is about seven miles from Farmville, a station on the Norfolk and Western Railroad. Thus facilities of intercourse with all parts of the country are afforded. It owes its origin to Christian patriotism. Hanover Presbytery, in 1771-86 was the sole representative of Presbyterian faith and order, throughout the entire South, West and Northwest. Its members in 1774 did not exceed ten. Having, in 1774, set on foot means to sustain a classical academy in the Valley of Virginia (See Washington College), it was thought desirable, "in view of the large extent of country needing institutions of that grade," to establish another, east of the Blue Ridge. By prompt and energetic efforts, notwithstanding the disturbed political relations of the country, the Presbytery secured available contributions to the amount of £1,300, about $4,000 within three months. By a liberal donation of about one hundred acres of land, in an eligible locality, made by Mr. Peter Johnson, measures were at once taken to prepare buildings, and the academy was organized in 1775. Rev. Samuel Stanhope Smith was appointed Principal and two assistants secured. In a few years, with the spirit of liberty then animating the whole country, the institution was called "Hampden-Sidney Academy," instead of "Prince Edward Academy," and in 1783 the Board of Trustees hitherto existing, to which the Presbytery had committed the management, "reserving forever the right of appointing Trustees and Faculty," was incorporated by the Legislature of Virginia, with an addition to the members by the Presbytery, making it to consist of twenty-seven members. With the exception of a small tract of land, the State, however, never extended to the College any contribution. So deeply were felt, by all, the evils of a union of Church and State, that the civil authorities have ever refused to extend aid to literary Institutions not under their exclusive control, or in any form recognized, by legal action, the Church in its religious character. The Presbytery, however, had disclaimed formally any intention to establish, or permit for itself, the Trustees and Faculty, the use of sectarian influences. Though under the control of the Presbytery, the College was open to all, of whatever religious name, with no plan to disturb the preferences which custom or conscience favored. Relying on the good will of the people, the College, though often embarrassed by poverty, yet "making many rich" has grown, by voluntary contributions to the possession of about $125,000 vested funds and commodious residences for a President and four Professors, with a large boarding-house.

Rev. S. S. Smith resigned the presidency, held for seven years, in 1779, and was succeeded by his brother, Rev. John B. Smith. He resigned in 1789, to give his whole time to ministerial work. Rev. Drury Lacy, as Vice President, continued, for a short period, to conduct the Institution, and was associated, for two or three years of the time, with Rev. A. Alexander. On his retiring, in 1796, Mr. Alexander was elected President. He was succeeded in 1806, on leaving for Pine Street Church, Philadelphia, by Rev. Moses Hoge, who died in 1820. Dr. Hoge was also, from 1812, Synod's Professor of Theology. His successor, in a few years, was Mr. G. P. Cushing, who died in 1835. Then Rev. Dr. D. L. Carroll presided over the college, followed by Mr. William Maxwell, and in 1848 Rev. Dr. Lewis W. Green succeeded, who, in 1858, was followed by Rev. Dr. J. M. P. Atkinson, in a presidency of about twenty-five years, the longest period of any. His resignation, in June, 1883, preceded his death, in August 28th, 1883. Rev. Richard McIlwain, D. D., has now the position, and gives promise to be a worthy successor of this line of one hundred years. With his five able Professors, the prospects of the college are excellent, and it will continue, it is believed, with increasing success, to supply candidates for the ministry of the Presbyterian Church.

Hampton, Rev. John. Whether Mr. Hampton was a native of Scotland or Ireland is unknown. He was called to Snow Hill, in March, 1797, the salary to be paid in tobacco. He was "inaugurated" by Mr. McNish. He also served Pitt's Creek. His death occurred in February, 1721.

Hand, Aaron Hicks, D. D., son of Aaron and Tamar Platt Hand, was born at Albany, N. Y.,

Dec. 3, 1811; graduated at Williams College, 1831; graduated at Princeton Seminary in 1837; was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, April 25, 1837, soon after which he went, in poor health, to Georgia, where he supplied the churches of Roswell and Marietta, 1838-41. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Flint River (Ga.), April 11, 1841, after which he returned to the North and supplied the Church at Berwick, Pa., 1842-45. As pastor of the Church at Greenwich, N. J., from Sept. 2d, 1851, until Nov. 2d, 1870, he labored most efficiently and successfully. He was installed over the Church of the Palisades, June 11th, 1871, and continued in charge of it, until released, Sept. 16th, 1879, in consequence of increasing infirmities. He then removed to Easton, Pa., where he spent his last days. He died, March 3d, 1880.

Dr. Hand was an earnest and faithful minister of the gospel, and through many years of broken health continued to labor, rejoicing if through divine grace he could lead souls to Christ. He was a diligent student and a writer of force and intelligence. For many years he was a Trustee of Lafayette College, and gave to it much self-denying service.

HON. ALFRED HAND.

Hand, Hon. Alfred, was born in Honesdale, Pa., March 26th, 1835. He entered Yale College in the Autumn of 1853, and graduated with a standing among the best scholars of his class. He studied law at Montrose, Pa., under the direction of the Hon. Judges William and William H. Jessup (father and son), and was admitted to the Bar, November 21st, 1859. Soon after, he opened an office, for the practice of his profession, in Scranton, and at once identified himself with the First Church, in which he was ordained a ruling elder, April 17th, 1867. He made himself useful in the work of establishing the organic life of the young city, and soon was called to places of trust. In a few years he stood among the first lawyers of the Luzerne Bar.

March 5th, 1879, he was appointed to the vacant judgeship of the Eleventh Judicial District of Pennsylvania by Governor Hoyt, who knew his worth. Subsequently he was elected Judge of the Forty-fifth District, which was formed out of the Eleventh. This office he still holds, and fulfills its duties with ability and unimpeachable integrity. Judge Hand is a model elder, and as such has accomplished a great work, and enjoys the confidence of the whole Presbytery to which he belongs. His power and efficiency in this capacity have been greatly developed and secured by his generous and persistent giving for the support and extension of the Church. Support of the cause of Christ has always been reckoned by him a part of the business of life. Judge Hand has been frequently sent to the General Assembly, and he has usually been made a member of the Judicial Committee of that body, where his ability, judicial poise and his Christian spirit, have never failed to impress the body. In the Assembly of 1883, he won the regard of his fellow-members by his "minority report," and his earnest advocacy of the measures initiated by a committee of the old Synod of Philadelphia, which measures propose the enlargement of ministerial relief into ministerial support, with a retiring fund for aged ministers, as a reward of service, and a widows' and orphans' fund for the care of their families.

Handy, Isaac William Ker, D. D., was born in Washington, D. C., December 14th, 1815; graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1834, and entering Princeton Seminary, in November, 1835, studied there between one and two years. He was licensed by the Presbytery of the District of Columbia, April 3d, 1838, and was ordained by Lewes Presbytery, November 22d, 1838, and installed, the same day, as pastor of the churches of Buckingham, Blackwater and Laurel. Here he labored six years, until released, October 11th, 1844. He next went to Missouri, where he labored with an earnest missionary zeal and much success for two or three years, at Warsaw and vicinity. Called to the two churches of Drawyers, at Odessa, Del., and Port Penn, Del., he served them, without being installed, as pastor elect, from June 15th, 1848, to June, 1851. He was pastor of Drawyers Church, at Odessa, and the Forest Church, at Middletown, Del., from June 15th, 1851, to April 10th, 1853. From 1853 to 1855 he labored as an itinerant missionary on the eastern peninsula of Maryland, and on April 16th, 1857, became pastor of the First Church at Portsmouth, Va., where he labored most successfully and acceptably until he was released, August 8th, 1865, to accept the charge of the churches at Orange, C. H., and Gordonsville, Va. With these churches he remained five years. Having been called to become pastor of Augusta Church, in Virginia, he was installed there May 13th, 1870, and continued until the close of his life. He died, June 14th, 1878, peacefully trusting in Christ.

Dr. Handy was a man of clear and strong convictions, and of great tenacity of purpose, yet kind, genial and gentle in his intercourse with all around him. He possessed excellent endowments, and they were well cultivated and wisely used. He was a warm-hearted friend. His manners were vivacious, genial and winning. Although decided in his own views, his sentiments and conduct were generous and liberal. He was many years a Trustee of Delaware College, at Newark, Del.; a member of the Presbyterian Historical Society, of the American Scientific Association, and of the Maryland Historical Society. He had a wide and well-earned reputation for accurate research. As a Christian, he was eminent, possessing genuine humility, strong faith, ardent hope. As a minister, he ever watched for souls. His own heart and soul were ever enlisted in the service of Christ.

Handy, Truman P., was born in Paris, Oneida county, N. Y., January 17th, 1807. On reaching his eighteenth year he entered on commercial life, and soon took a position in the Bank of Geneva, N. Y. Here George Bancroft, the historian, had become interested, in a bank in Cleveland, and he selected Mr. Handy, then but twenty-five years of age, to become manager of the Institution. He has remained there ever since, growing in character and influence, and though he has passed the age of seventy-six years, he is still the active President of the Merchants' National Bank, in Cleveland. As an accomplished financier he is most favorably known throughout the land. One year ago the Directors of the Bank of which he is President gave a banquet, in honor of the man who, for fifty years, had stood at the head of all commercial interests in Cleveland. It was attended by the most prominent business men of the city, and distinguished representatives from other cities.

Mr. Handy publicly professed his faith in Christ at the age of thirteen years, and now, for sixty-three years, his religious character has been the most conspicuous fact in his life. When he came to Cleveland, the First, or Old Stone Church, was struggling into existence, and, at the age of twenty-six years, Mr. Handy was made one of its elders, and in that and the Second Church he has served in this office till the present time. During nearly all his life in Cleveland he has served as superintendent in Sunday schools.

Scarcely an elder in the whole Church has served so many times as member of the General Assembly, and he was a prominent member of the committee which arranged so wisely for the reunion which consolidated the divided Church, and all the meetings of this committee he attended. But in his private life his Christian character has been most clearly developed. No Christian activity in the city of his residence has failed to experience his aid and benign influence. In the prayer meeting his unflinching presence has been a benediction, and, so far as the writer knows, all the acts of his life have shown a spirit of consecration to the Master. Though not among our richest men, Mr. Handy's contributions to the demands of charity and religion every year amount to many thousands. In this matter, in hundreds of cases, he practices upon the rule of not letting his left hand know what his right hand doeth, for his benefactions are known only to himself and the individual recipients. Many hearts have been made glad by gifts from him, rendered in a way that leaves them unknown to the public. A more gentle, modest and quiet spirit never adorned a man whose life, from worldly standpoints, was so conspicuous.

Hanna, Rev. John, received his license to preach from the Presbytery of New Brunswick, about 1760. In April, 1761, he was ordained by the same Presbytery, and settled as pastor of Alexandria, Kingwood, and Bethlehem churches, New Jersey, where he remained until his death, in 1801. Mr.

Hanna was also a physician, and practiced quite extensively, but it never interfered with his duties as a pastor, or as a member of the various Church Courts. Dr. Hanna was a warm-hearted patriot, and ever true to the American cause.

Hanover Church. Nearly eleven miles from Harrisburg, Pa., on the Manada, a tributary of the Swatara, are the remains of an ancient stone structure, which, with the walled graveyard, are the only monuments of old Hanover Church, once prominent in the early history of the State. A few years since it was deemed expedient to dispose of the church edifice (the building being in a tumble-down condition), the brick school-house, and other property belonging thereto, the congregation having long since passed away, for the purpose of creating a permanent fund to keep the graveyard in repair. It was a plain, substantial, stone structure, corresponding somewhat to the building at Paxtang (See Old Paxtang Church). The original name of the old Hanover

HANOVER CHURCH, PA.

Church was Monnoday (Manada). The first record we have is of the date of 1735, although its organization must have been some years earlier. In that year Donegal Presbytery sent Rev. Thomas Craighead to preach at Monnoday, and this appears to be the first time the congregation was known to that body. The year following the Rev. Richard Sanckey was sent there, who for thirty years ministered to that flock. Subsequently to the celebrated Paxtang affair, at Conestoga and Lancaster, the Rev. Richard Sanckey, with thirty or forty families of his congregation, emigrated to the Virginia Valley, and Captain Lazarus Stewart, with an equal number, removed to Wyoming, taking sides with the Connecticut intruders. These emigrations cost the church most of its members, and the county some of its most industrious and intelligent citizens. In 1783 the Rev. James Snodgrass, whose remains lie in the graveyard, came to be the pastor. For fifty-eight years he faithfully served the congregation, and was its last minister.

Hanover College, Indiana. Hanover College was the outgrowth of a desire on the part of the Presbyterian Church in Indiana to provide herself with an educated ministry. The Church in the East could not supply the ministry needed for the widely scattered but constantly growing population of the West. Animated with this desire, the Presbytery of Salem, embracing Indiana and Illinois, and connected with the Synod of Kentucky, in 1826, requested the pastor of the Church at Hanover, Rev. John Finley Crowe, D. D., to open and conduct an academy until further provision could be made.

This school was opened, January 1st, 1827, with six pupils, in a log cabin, near where the Presbyterian Church of Hanover now stands. This was the humble beginning of Hanover College, and of the North-western Theological Seminary, at Chicago, Illinois.

In May, 1826, the Synod of Indiana was constituted, consisting of the Presbyteries of Salem, Madison, Wabash and Missouri. The school at Hanover was committed, temporarily, to the Presbytery of Madison. This Presbytery applied to the Legislature of the State for a charter, and that body, on the 30th of December, 1828, passed an act incorporating Hanover Academy.

The Academy was taken under the care of the Synod of Indiana in 1829. The following resolution was adopted by that body:—

Resolved, That this Synod adopt Hanover Academy as a Synodical school, provided the Trustees of the same will permit the Synod to establish a Theological Department, and appoint Theological Professors.

The condition was readily granted, and the Synod at once unanimously elected the Rev. John Matthews, D. D., of Shepherdstown, Virginia, to the Chair of Theology. Dr. Matthews accepted, and, with characteristic zeal, gave his whole time and talents to the interests of the Institution. The Theological Department was continued at Hanover for ten years, when it was removed to new Albany, Indiana, in 1840.

The academy, which was chartered in 1828, had been steadily growing; regular college classes had been formed; and in 1833, by Act of Legislature, the Institution was incorporated as Hanover College.

By active agencies in the East and West funds had been collected and the necessary buildings had been erected for the Preparatory, Collegiate and Theological Departments. The Rev. James Blythe, D. D., of Lexington, Kentucky, of the Presbytery of West Lexington, and extensively known throughout the Church, was, in 1832, secured as the first President of the college. The first catalogue issued after the change in the charter presents for all departments a Faculty of seven Professors and four assistants, and one hundred and eighty-three students: Theological 7; Collegiate 63; Preparatory 143. The Board of Trustees consisted of eighteen members, among whom were those pioneers of the Church and State, Rev. John M. Dickey, President; Rev. James H. Johnston, Secretary; Hon. Williamson Dunn, Treasurer; Victor King, William Reed, Hon. Jeremiah Sullivan, and the Rev. Samuel G. Lowry. The only survivor of the Faculty of 1834, is Hon. Wm. McKee Dunn, LL. D., Washington, D. C.

The location of the college in that day was within the corporate limits of the village of Hanover. All that remains of the old buildings is so much of the principal edifice as is embraced in the present Presbyterian church, and one of the shops, now occupied as a private residence. None of the real estate or property now forms any part of the present property of the college. The farm lay north of the Spear property and west of Professor Garritt's place. The Presbyterian church includes the chapel, two recitation rooms and a part of the second story.

So remarkable was the success of this pioneer institution of our Church in the West, that the catalogue of 1834-5, shows an attendance of 236 students: Theological 10; Collegiate 77; Irregular and Preparatory 149. These students were gathered from a wide territory, embracing every State from Pennsylvania to Texas and Missouri. This is explained by its location on the Ohio river. But this prosperity was followed by a period of darkness and trial. The manual labor system, for aiding poor students, attempted by many Institutions at that day, was tried at Hanover. It failed, and involved the Institution in debt for every day of its continuance. It had to be abandoned; the expense of education was largely increased, and a necessary consequence was the withdrawal of a large number of students. While embarrassed by debt and this partial withdrawal of support, a fearful tornado swept over the place in 1837, and left the principal college edifice in ruins. From these misfortunes the college rallied, repaired its buildings and canceled its debts, but without endowment, was left in a feeble condition.

President Blythe's connection with the college closed in 1836. For two years Dr. Matthews, of the Theological Department, acted as President, and in 1838 the Rev. E. D. McMaster, D. D., LL. D., was elected to that post, where he remained five years, terminating his presidency by a memorable epoch in the history of the college. The Board of Trustees was a small body, a close corporation, but indirectly influenced by the Synod, and liable to the control of a powerful mind and local influences. Under the leadership of this eminent and able man, a part of the Board of Trustees adopted a resolution to surrender their charter to the Legislature, in return for the charter of a university at Madison. Thus the college was divided, right down through Board, Faculty, and students, part going with President McMaster to Madison, and part remaining with Vice-president Crowe at Hanover. The Synod retained all its early convictions of the importance of Christian education by the Church, and it was a day of great men. A struggle followed, in which "Greek met Greek." In the Synod of 1844 Madison University was offered to it as a Synodical College. The offer was declined and the Synod ordered the continuance of its college at Hanover. A new charter was obtained, said to be the most favorable in the State, conferring the powers of a university, and placing the Institution fully under the control of the Synod of Indiana. This it does by giving to that body the right to elect one-half of the trustees, and through them a voice in the election of the other half. The rights and franchises of the original Synod have descended to the present Synod of Indiana. On account of the changes in the Synods since the reunion of the two former branches of the Presbyterian Church, some alterations have been made in the mode of choosing the members of the Board, but only such as are consistent with the charter. For instance, the Alumni Association now annually nominates a member. But the college still remains, as it ever has been, firmly bound to the Presbyterian Church.

Through the trials and sufferings which have almost everywhere marked the history of higher education in America, Hanover College has, at a comparatively small cost, done an immense work for Christian education in Indiana and the Republic. Upwards of four thousand students have been educated in whole or in part within its walls, many of whom have attained high distinction and usefulness in the ministry, law, medicine and science. It has graduated 541 students in the Departments of Science and Arts and Theology, and a much larger number have completed the Preparatory course, and gone out from the lower classes. These students are scattered throughout the Republic and in many foreign lands.

Space permits the mention of but few of the Christian men and women who are identified forever with this early scheme of education by the Church in Indiana. In this latter day it is an honor to be numbered among their successors. To no man, perhaps, do the citizens and Presbyterians of Indiana owe a larger debt of gratitude than to that eminent man of God, Dr. John Finley Crowe, who, for thirty years, with heroic benevolence, self-denial and fortitude, identified his time, talents and interests with the cause of education in our Church. Judge Williamson Dunn is another name illustrious in our early history, among the founders of Hanover and Wabash Colleges, giving first to Hanover, and afterwards to Wabash, the grounds upon which they were severally built. Another pioneer, Mrs. Mary T. Lapsley, of New Albany, has been the most munificent benefactor to this early effort, giving over $30,000—standing steadfastly by the college in its darkest days, and securing an imperishable name among the Christian educators of the West. Another earnest, modest, learned pioneer, the Rev. William A. Holliday, of Indianapolis, left one-third of his estate, now constituting twenty thousand dollars of the permanent endowment of the college. Still another pioneer, John King, Esq., of Madison, after a life of pious devotion and generous gifts to Hanover College, left, by will, $13,000 more. Others, of smaller means, whose names will not be forgotten by God or man in the early annals of Presbyterianism in Indiana, have added, from time to time, to the resources of the college.

The most recent considerable addition to the means of the college has been for the purpose of erecting a suitable building as a home for students.

The college is now out of debt, and is living within its means. But it greatly needs additional funds, both to afford a proper support to the men engaged in its work, and also to enlarge its equipment to the scale which the times and the opportunity demand.

Happersett, Reese, D. D., was born in Brandywine Manor, Chester county, Pa., July 31st, 1810; was educated at Washington College, Pa.; studied theology at Princeton, and was licensed by New Castle Presbytery, in 1839, and ordained by the same Presbytery, in 1841. He was stated supply at Havre de Grace, Md., till August 1st, 1844, when he was appointed agent for the Board of Domestic Missions, and in this capacity he was eminently active and useful. In 1850 he was appointed Assistant Secretary of the Board, and in 1851 Associate Secretary, which position he retained till 1858, when he resigned. In 1859 he was elected Corresponding Secretary, in conjunction with Dr. Musgrave, which relation he resigned in 1861. Soon after he removed to California, and became stated supply of the Church in Sacramento. He died October 2d, 1866. Dr. Happersett preached the gospel with simplicity, with earnestness, and greatly to the acceptance of those to whom he ministered. His generosity, amiableness and frankness made him many friends, and with a heart full of kindness, he sought constantly to serve those who needed his aid or were working for the Church of Christ.

Harding, Nehemiah Henry, D. D., was born at Brunswick, Me., October, 1794. In early life he went to sea, and in time became captain of a vessel trading with Newbern, N. C. One stormy night, while walking the deck of his tempest-tossed ship, Harding was convicted of sin, and his conviction soon ripened into hopeful conversion. Quitting the sea, he entered into business in Raleigh, N. C., and soon began preparation for the ministry. He studied two years at the University of North Carolina. In 1826 he went to Princeton Seminary and studied two years there. He was licensed by Orange Presbytery, November 6th, 1828, and ordained by the same, April 18th, 1829. He was installed pastor of Oxford Church, July 10th, 1830, and in December, 1835, became stated supply to Milton Church, where he remained till the close of life. He was the founder of the Yanceyville Church, and preached at Bethesda part of the time. He received his Doctor's Degree from the College of New Jersey. He died February 17th, 1849.

Dr. Harding was a man of commanding appearance, and the tone of authority imbedded on ship-board never left him in after years. In consequence of this he was sometimes suspected of trying "to walk the quarter-deck of Orange Presbytery." Earnest, decided, courageous, he did nothing by halves. He was an efficient pastor, and eminently a man of prayer. His sermons were plain, pointed, evangelical. He was an impressive speaker; a talker, not a declaimer. He seldom preached without shedding tears, and was in the habit of keeping two handkerchiefs in use in the pulpit. His tearful appeals were deeply impressive, verifying the old maxim, si vis me flere, flendum est tibi.

As an instance of his decision it is related that upon a certain occasion Dr. James Phillips was assisting him at a communion, and as the forenoon services had been long, Dr. Harding requested Dr. Phillips to limit the afternoon services to an hour. Not willing to be hampered, Dr. Phillips said he did not know whether he could finish in an hour, or not. "Then," said Dr. Harding, "I can, and I will." And he did. Dr. Harding left one son who entered the ministry, Rev. Eph. H. Harding, D. D., now of Kentucky.

Harper, James, D. D., was born in Glasgow, Scotland, July 28th, 1802, of parents eminent for their piety and social refinement. In October, 1820, he entered Glasgow College. Passing its curriculum, and five years in Divinity Hall, pupil of Dr. John Dick, he was licensed to preach by the United Secession Presbytery of Glasgow, and after three years, ordained, with the purpose of emigrating to America. He landed in New York in 1833, and spent his third Sabbath in the Presbyterian Church of Galway, Saratoga County, N. Y., to which he was invited as supply for a year, and then as pastor. After five years he removed to Ellicott City, Md., where he was instrumental in organizing a church and adding greatly to its strength. After twenty months he was called to the Church of Shippensburg, Pa., installed its pastor on the 28th of May, 1840, and continued in this relation until June, 1870, when growing infirmities constrained him to retire. In accepting his resignation, his ardently attached congregation unanimously voted him an annuity. Stricken with paralysis, May 9th, 1876, he lingered in peaceful expectation until the morning of the 13th, when the silver cord was loosed and he quietly slept in Jesus.

Dr. Harper was comparatively unknown beyond the immediate field of his labor. Fettered by an innate, invincible diffidence, he shrank from publicity. His degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred by Lafayette College. He was possessed of more than ordinary intellectual grasp and scholarship; and was an indefatigable student through life. An able expounder of the Scriptures, he was yet unostentatious and humble. If he urged any particular doctrine or duty his manner was, first, to evolve it, on divine authority. His sermons were clear, concise and logical; always freighted with the rich doctrines of grace. His style was neat, nervous and sufficiently polished. Remarkable for goodness, he won the love and respect of the whole community. Of devoted personal piety, the charm of his ministry was the infusion of Christ and the gospel into all his teachings. He preached the law fearlessly, assailing every form of vice; ordinarily it was the Cross that warmed his heart and drew forth its most glowing effusions on the people.

Harper, Robert D., D. D., was born at Washington, Pa. In his earlier years his parents removed to Allegheny City. He graduated at the Western University, Pittsburg, Pa., in 1844, studied theology in the United Presbyterian Seminary, Allegheny City, and was licensed to preach in Pittsburg, in 1845. He became pastor of the First U. P. Church, Xenia, Ohio, in 1846. In 1868 he united with the Presbyterian Church, and in the same year was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Indianapolis, Indiana. In 1874 he was called to the pastorate of North Broad Street Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, in which relation he still continues, beloved and prosperous.

In all the congregations of which he has had charge, Dr. Harper's labors have been eminently blessed, and he has enjoyed the confidence and affection of his people. Though dignified in manner, he is genial in disposition, and in all his social intercourse leaves the impression of frankness, sincerity, uprightness, and benevolence. As a preacher, he occupies a high rank. His sermons, which are always carefully prepared, are thorough, logical, solemn, and impressive expositions of Bible truth, accompanied with close, pertinent and practical application, and, with the advantage of a fine voice and a graceful delivery, they both interest and edify his audience. As a pastor he is tenderly and diligently concerned for his flock, and as a presbyter, he is ever faithful in the discharge of his duty. His sound judgment, liberal spirit, and manly bearing, have won him the esteem of his brethren, and his ministerial work in Philadelphia, as his large, active and useful congregation attests, has been one of steady, solid and very gratifying progress.

Harris, Rev. John, came from Wales, while a child, with his father's family, who settled in Maryland. In 1754 he was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle, and in 1756 he was installed pastor of Indian River Church, Del. This charge he resigned in 1759, and removed to the South, and in 1772, we find him pastor of Long Cane and two other churches in South Carolina, where he remained until 1779, when, forced by declining health, he resigned the charge. Mr. Harris was a pious, judicious and exemplary minister of the gospel. Bold, enthusiastic and independent, he was peculiarly fitted for the stirring times in which he lived. His patriotism made him obnoxious to the Tories, and he had many narrow escapes. It is said that he often preached with his gun in the pulpit and his ammunition suspended from his neck, after the fashion of the times.

Harris, Rev. John Montgomery, son of David and Sarah Harris, was born in Baltimore, Md., February 25th, 1808. He received his academical education at Baltimore and York, Pa., but was never graduated from any college. He abandoned the legal profession for the ministry; studied theology at Princeton; was licensed by the Presbytery of Baltimore, October 26th, 1831, and was commissioned by the Board of Domestic Missions to preach to the feeble Presbyterian flock in New Orleans, which he did during portions of 1831-32. Owing to failure of health while at New Orleans, he was never ordained or settled in charge of any church. From New Orleans he returned to his home in Baltimore, and there remained as an invalid several years. In 1837 he made a renewed effort to preach, and for about four years resided in Hampshire county, Va., supplying Bloomingery, Mount Bethel, Zion and Concord churches. He then returned to Baltimore, and soon after purchased a farm in Jefferson county, Va., where he resided some years. Although, through all these years, in extremely delicate health, he was earnest, active, and unceasing in efforts to do good; preaching at Harper's Ferry, Martinsburg, and other churches, as he was able. In 1851, he purchased a farm on Jersey Mountain, about five miles from Romney, West Virginia, where he lived a secluded and quiet life, until his death, still, however, doing good as far as his feeble health permitted, by organizing and teaching Sabbath schools and Bible classes in the country around about. He died February 14th, 1881. Mr. Harris was a man of remarkable gifts, of brilliant oratorical powers, of remarkable culture and attainments, and had he possessed health and strength of body, would undoubtedly have held an eminent position in the Church.

Harris, William, M. D., was born August 18th, 1792, in the beautiful valley of Chester county, Pa. He received a classical education at Brandywine Academy, then entered upon the study of medicine, and graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1812. He at once began the practice of his profession in his own neighborhood, and steadily advanced in a career of great success. At about the age of thirty-seven he united with the Presbyterian Church, Great Valley, Chester county, Pa., and was chosen a ruling elder in the same congregation a short time after. In 1834 he removed to Philadelphia, where, until his retirement from practice, he was well known as occupying a high position in his profession, while his business accumulated in the most substantial way. Besides attending to his round of practice, he delivered a Summer course of lectures, and trained many students for graduation. He was elected to the eldership in the Tenth Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, and faithfully discharged the duties of the office for twenty years. Having removed his church membership, in 1854, to the Seventh (now Tabernacle) Church, he was installed as one of its ruling elders, June 8th, 1856. He died March 3d, 1861.

The pure integrity, high-toned honor and wise judgment of Dr. Harris made him a valuable guardian and guide. He was characterized by a peculiarly intense energy in the discharge of duty. His habits were active in the extreme, sometimes, perhaps, impelling him to exertions which were greater than his system could well endure. He was a polished Christian gentleman. A wide-sweeping law of tender kindness ruled his heart. He loved the Church—"her sweet communion, solemn vows, her hymns of love and praise;" and the Church loved him, and mourned, in his departure, the loss of a good, honored and useful man.

Harrison, Hon. Benjamin, son of John Scott Harrison, and grandson of William Henry Harrison, ninth President of the United States, was born at North Bend, Hamilton county, Ohio, August 20th, 1833. He was educated at Miami University, Oxford, Ohio, where the thoroughness which has characterized his after life exhibited itself in a marked degree. He graduated, with high honor, in 1852, and immediately after began the study of law with Judge Bellamy Storer and Abraham Gwynne, of Cincinnati. Subsequently, in 1854, he located at Indianapolis, Ind.,

HON. BENJAMIN HARRISON.

and entered upon that brilliant professional career which has since won him so prominent and conspicuous a place among the foremost men of the American Bar.

In 1860 he was elected Reporter of the Decisions of the Supreme Court of the State, for a period of four years, but because of his absence in public service, he was permitted to hold the place less than one-half his term. In 1864, although still absent, he was unanimously re-nominated by his party for the place, and he was re-elected. In 1876 he ran for Governor, but was defeated by a small plurality. Two years later President Hayes appointed him a member of the Mississippi River Commission, and in the following year he was elected to the United States Senate, taking his seat March 4th, 1881. His career in the Senate, guided by a high moral standard, has greatly enhanced the general respect and esteem in which he is held by his colleagues, for his legislative ability and legal attainments.

Though belonging to a family such as few men have better reason to be proud of, no one ever relied less upon the advantages of birth than Senator Harrison. He, undoubtedly, inherited rare gifts, but these have been strengthened and supported by great industry, thoroughness in all things, and unswerving integrity. Insincerity, or any approach to dishonesty, is repugnant to his whole nature. He is unassuming in manner, and, although somewhat retiring in disposition, is easy and cordial in his social relations. A vein of kindly humor underlies much that he says. For many years he has been an active member of the First Presbyterian Church at Indianapolis. His love for children and his interest in youth have also made his face familiar in the Sunday-school room. His charities are large, but are bestowed in the quiet, modest manner characteristic of the man.

Harrison, Elias, D. D., the son of Thomas and Nancy (Osborn) Harrison, was born in New York city, January 23d, 1790. He entered New Jersey College in 1812, and was Tutor from 1814 to 1816. He studied theology at Princeton, and was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery. Soon after he was ordained by Baltimore Presbytery, in 1817, and installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Alexandria, Va. This was his only charge. Here he labored faithfully and zealously forty-six years. He died, February 13th, 1863. Dr. Harrison was a very learned man, modest, unassuming, unostentatious and conscientiously attentive to all his duties as a Christian minister. He was eminent in prayer, and deeply interested in missionary operations. He was greatly beloved by his people and by the entire community. His death was peaceful and resigned.

Harrison, Jephtha, D. D., the son of Abijah and Sarah (Ogden) Harrison, was born in Orange, N. J., in December, 1795; educated at New Jersey College, and studied theology in Princeton Seminary. He was first settled over the churches of Fincastle and Salem, Va., where he labored for three years. He removed to Memphis, Tenn., being the first pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in that city, where he was for six years; thence to Florence, Ala., where he was pastor four years. He was agent for the Board of Domestic Missions one year, then pastor of the Church in Aberdeen, Miss., four years. He next removed to Burlington, Iowa, and after four years spent with this people he removed to Fulton, Mo., in 1858, and supplied Auxvasse Church, and at the time of his death (October 30th, 1863) was stated supply of Round Prairie and Augusta churches, in Calloway county, Mo., within the bounds of Missouri Presbytery. Dr. Harrison was an exemplary Christian. He was not a brilliant, but a plain, faithful, gospel preacher, always ready and anxious to work for Christ; of great perseverance and free from guile. In all the communities in which he lived, all classes regarded him with respect and confidence.

Harrison, Rev. Joseph Cabell, the son of Robert C. and Annie (Cabell) Harrison, was born at Clifton, Cumberland county, Va., May 27th, 1793. In 1806 his parents removed to Fayette county, Ky., where his education was received, under the care of friends, Messrs. Blythe, Moore and McAllister. He subsequently attended Transylvania University, but did not graduate. He pursued his theological studies under Robert Bishop, D. D.; was licensed by West Lexington Presbytery, October 6th, 1824, and ordained by the same Presbytery, May 31st, 1826. He entered upon his labors as a missionary in the Green River country. In the Autumn of 1830 he spent three months as a missionary agent in Illinois; in 1833 he preached in Grant county, Ky.; in 1833 he also founded Burlington, Richwood, and Mount Horeb churches, Ky.; in 1837, giving up Lebanon, in Grant county, including Hopewell and Carmel churches, Ohio; in 1835 he confined his labors to Burlington and Richwood churches, and the destitutions of Boone county, Ky., where he resuscitated several feeble churches. In 1845 he was stated supply of Ebenezer Church, Ky., and thus he labored, year after year, as a missionary. During the latter years of his life he was at times without any special charge. These years he devoted to labors among the poor, for which he was eminently qualified. The northern part of Kentucky at that time (1833) was destitute of Presbyterianism, and as a pioneer preacher, he diligently labored in the cause of Sabbath Schools, and Temperance, as well as preaching the gospel. In 1824 he was co-editor with John Breckinridge, D. D., of "The Western Luminary," published at Lexington, Ky. He died September 7th, 1860.

Hart, John Seely, LL.D., was born in Old Stockbridge, Mass., January 28th, 1810. He graduated at the College of New Jersey, in 1830, with the highest honors of his class, and after teaching a year at Natchez, Miss., entered Princeton Theological Seminary, in 1831, where he spent three years. During the last two years of his course he also filled the position of Tutor in the college. In 1834 he was elected Adjunct Professor of Ancient Languages in Princeton College, and filled that chair two years.

Professor Hart was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, August 4th, 1835, but, having determined, after some years, to devote his life to literary and educational pursuits, his license was, at his own request, withdrawn by the Presbytery, October 19th, 1842. In 1836 he purchased Edgemoor School, in Princeton, and resigned his Professorship in the college. He retained the charge of this school until 1842, when he was elected Principal of the Philadelphia High School. He found this institution in a state of feebleness, and placed it on a solid foundation of discipline, accomplishments and popular confidence, making it a representative American institution. Resigning this position in 1859, he became editor of the periodicals published by the American Sunday-school Union, and in this connection he began the Sunday-school Times. In 1862 he was elected Principal of the New Jersey State Normal School at Trenton, and held that position with distinguished usefulness and success until February, 1871. From 1864 to 1870 he also gave courses of lectures on English Literature in Princeton College. In 1872 he was elected Professor of Belles Lettres and English Literature in Princeton College, which chair he filled two years, returning, near the end of 1874, to Philadelphia, where, engaged in literary pursuits, he resided until his death, which occurred March 26th, 1877.

Professor Hart was a man of quiet and retiring manners, yet social and sunny in his temperament; an enthusiast in the cause of education; a devoted Sabbath-school worker, of elegant culture, accurate and wide scholarship; author of many volumes, and possessing great force and earnestness of mind. But, above all, he was an humble, consistent and devout Christian, always seeking, like his Master, to do good.

Hart, Rev. Joshua, after graduating at Princeton College, in 1770, was ordained by the Presbytery of Suffolk, April 2d, 1772, and was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Smithtown, Long Island, April 13th, 1774. In the time of the war, being an ardent patriot, he suffered much from imprisonment by the British, in the city of New York. He was released from his charge, September 6th, 1787. Subsequently he continued to labor as he had opportunity, until his death, October 3d, 1829.

Hastings, Eurotas P., was born July 29th, 1791. He was one of that family known for many years in the Presbyterian churches, especially in the art of sacred song, and of whom Thomas Hastings, of New York, was a distinguished musical composer. Eurotas P. Hastings, in 1825, came to Detroit, Mich., from Geneva, N. Y.; was a banker by profession, and for many years (from 1825 to 1839) President of the Bank of Michigan. He also was officially connected with State affairs during the years 1840 and 1842, when the State of Michigan was under administration of the Whig party. He was conspicuous, however, as an elder of the First Presbyterian Church of Detroit, and originated and kept a set of church books which were a model of completeness in their arrangement. He was ordained an elder in 1841, and continued an energetic, faithful and zealous officer and member, exemplifying all the Christian virtues in a pre-eminent degree until the day of his death, which occurred at Detroit, June 1st, 1866. A sweet fragrance still lingers over his memory in the church in which he was for so many years "a bright and shining light."

Hastings, Prof. Fulton W., was ordained a ruling elder in the Princeton Presbyterian Church, West Philadelphia, in 1861, and has since discharged the duties of this position with great fidelity and acceptableness. He has also been, for many years, the efficient Superintendent of the Sabbath School of that congregation. Prof. Hastings was born in Muskingum county, O., September 30th, 1828. He was educated at West Alexander Academy, and subsequently took a course of private instruction, with a view to a special and thorough preparation as a teacher. After teaching with marked success at West Alexander and Wilkesburg, Pa., in 1859 he organized Mantua Academy, in West Philadelphia, which he has since conducted with signal ability and success. He was a member of the Presbyterian Board of Publication for many years previous to the reunion of the two branches of the Presbyterian Church; was active in the establishment of the Presbyterian Hospital, of which he continues to be a valuable Director, and since 1872 has been a faithful member of the Presbyterian Board of Publication. He is a gentleman of urbanity and dignity of manner, full of energy, generous in disposition, exemplary in character, and always ready to do good, as he has opportunity.

Hastings, Thomas, son of Dr. Seth Hastings, physician and farmer, was born in Washington, Litchfield county, Conn., Oct. 15th, 1784. The family, with a company of neighbors, moved to Clinton, Oneida county, N. Y., in 1796. He early began the study of music, a sixpenny gamut of four pages being his first text-book. After teaching music for some years in central and western New York, in the Autumn of 1823 he accepted the editorial chair of the Recorder, a new religious newspaper published in Utica, and filled it until the issue of the ninth volume. He was no routine teacher of sacred music, neither did he practice his profession merely from a love of music, or as a means of support, and less still for the sake of distinction and gain. He was a reformer in it, and had a distinct idea of what sacred music is, and of the mode in which it should be conducted, and he sought to have it employed for its proper and invaluable purposes.

Mr. Hastings became a prolific writer for the press, particularly in the advocacy of his professional views, setting them forth in the editorials of the Recorder, and for a long succession of years in frequent newspaper articles, and in occasional pamphlets. He published various music books of great value. He composed six hundred hymns, many of them published, and not a few well known and prized, such as "Why that look of sadness;" "Gently, Lord, O gently lead us;" "How calm and beautiful the morn;" "Child of sin and sorrow;" "Why lament the Christian dying;" "Pilgrims in this vale of sorrow." Mr. Hastings was a devout Christian. He was a diligent student of the Scriptures, was in himself a Concordance, and his own copies of the Word of God form quite a little library. He died, May 15th, 1872, and to the last retained his habits of study and of work, and a lively interest in the public affairs of the Church and of the world.

Hastings, Thomas S., D. D., is a native of the State of New York, and was born August 28th, 1827. His father, Thomas Hastings, whose sketch immediately precedes, removed to New York city, where the son pursued his early studies. He graduated at Hamilton College, in 1848, and at the Union Theological Seminary, New York, in 1851, and was licensed and ordained by the Fourth Presbytery of New York. For four years, from July, 1852, he was pastor of the Church at Mendham, N. J. In June, 1856, he was called to the pastorate of the West Presbyterian Church in West Forty-second street, New York. In 1865 the congregation took possession of the unique and beautiful church in Forty-second street which they now occupy. As pastor of this church Dr. Hastings labored with great energy, ability and success, until his election to the Professorship in the Union Theological Seminary, New York, which he now fills.

Dr. Hastings is characterized by great amiability of character. He has much warmth and polish of manners, and his address is affable and cheerful. He is respected and admired by all who know him, for his sterling virtues. He is a scholarly and eloquent preacher, clear, vigorous and stable in his style of thought, and showing thorough information in the whole range of theological and literary culture. His sermons are pervaded by an impressive, religious tone. His election to the important position he now occupies indicates the high degree in which he enjoys the confidence and esteem of the Church.

Hatfield, Edwin F., D. D., the son of Oliver S. and Jane (Mann) Hatfield, was born in Elizabethtown, N. J., January 9th, 1807. He graduated at Middlebury College, Vt., in 1829; studied theology at the Seminary in Andover, Mass., 1829-31; was licensed to preach the gospel by the Third Presbytery of New York, October 6th, 1831, and ordained by the same Presbytery at New York, May 14th, 1832. From October, 1831, to February, 1832, he preached at Rockaway, N. J., as an assistant of the Rev. Barnabas King, D. D.; and from March, 1832, to September, 1832, at Orange, N. J., as an assistant of the Rev. Asa R. Hillyer, D. D.; was pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of St. Louis, Mo., from October, 1832, to February, 1835; of the Seventh Presbyterian Church of New York, from July, 1835, to February, 1856; and of the North Presbyterian Church of New York, from February, 1856, to October, 1863; resigned and retired from the pastoral work on account of loss of health. Remained one year in retirement, when he became special agent of the Union Theological Seminary in New York, December, 1864, and in the following year obtained for the Seminary an endowment of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Two years were then occupied in writing and preparing for the press a "History of Elizabeth, N. J." In May, 1868, he took the place of the Rev. Dr. Kendall, Secretary of the Presbyterian Committee of Home Missions (abroad, for his health), till October, 1868, from which time he was Secretary of the Freedmen's Department of the same Committee. In January, 1870, he again became special agent of the Union Theological Seminary, to raise five hundred thousand dollars, and his labors were crowned with very gratifying success. He was Stated Clerk of the Third Presbytery of New York, since October, 1838, and of the General Assembly, since May, 1846.

Dr. Hatfield's pastoral life was a most active and fruitful one. During his ministry in the Seventh Church in New York, 1556 persons were received into the communion of the church, on examination, and 662 by certificate from other churches, and in all other respects the church was greatly strengthened. The same devotedness which he displayed as pastor he carried into the other work which was devolved upon him, and amidst his activities he found time to become the author of a number of valuable works, of which, in addition to the one already mentioned, the principal are, "Universalism as it is," "Memoir of Elihu W. Baldwin, D.D.," and "St. Helena and the Cape of Good Hope." Dr. Hatfield was elected Moderator of the General Assembly which met at Saratoga, N. Y., in 1883, and discharged the duties of the position with marked ability, dignity and acceptableness. He died in September, 1883.

Hawes, Rev. Lowman, was born October 5th, 1825, at Maysville, Ky.; graduated at Centre College, in 1842, with the first honors of his class, and at the Western Theological Seminary, in 1846, when he was licensed by Allegheny Presbytery. He preached for a few months to the Second Presbyterian Church, Baltimore; then for six months in Richmond, Ky., and subsequently in Fort Wayne, Ind. He was pastor of Concord Church, near Pittsburg, Pa., from 1848 to 1850. In 1850 he took charge of the Church at Huntingdon, Pa., where his labors were highly blessed. Subsequently he supplied the Church at Waukesha, Wis., at the same time officiating as Professor of Languages in Carroll College at that place. He labored a year at Beloit, Wis., with marked success, and then was pastor of the First Church, Madison, Ind., from 1857 until his death, in 1861. In all the relations of life he was consistent and exemplary; in the pulpit he was able, earnest and eloquent.

Hawley, Charles, D.D., was the son of Ezra and Mary (Noyes) Hawley, and was born in Catskill, N. Y., August 19th, 1819. When but twelve years old, he united with the Presbyterian Church, of which his father was ruling elder many years. He pursued his preparatory studies for college in Kinderhook Academy and Classical School, Catskill; entered Williams College in 1836, and graduated in 1840 (the day he was twenty-one years old), with the valedictory oration; spent one year, after leaving college, in Catskill, and read law in the office of Hon. James Powers. Turning from the law to the ministry, he entered Union Theological Seminary in New York city in 1841, and graduated in 1844. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Columbia, in April, 1844, and for three months, from July to September, supplied the pulpit of the American Presbyterian Church, in the city of Montreal, while the pastor, Rev. Caleb Strong, was absent in Europe. In December of the same year he was ordained, by the Second Presbytery of New York, pastor of the Presbyterian Church in New Rochelle, where he remained four years, during which the church was doubled in numbers, and was much strengthened and encouraged, after a long period of feebleness, if not of doubtful existence.

From New Rochelle he was called to the Presbyterian Church in Lyons, N. Y., where he was installed by the Presbytery of Geneva, in November, 1848. Before his coming here, there had been dissension, but the church now became united, and built a new house of worship, nearly twice as large as that before, and his pastorate was one of marked prosperity. From Lyons he was called to the First Presbyterian Church in Auburn, one of the most important churches of central New York, where he was installed November 5th, 1857, and where he still remains, after a ministry of more than a quarter of a century, in which he has had, in a very high degree, the confidence and respect, not only of the churches, but of the whole community. In 1861 he received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Hamilton College.

The confidence of his brethren in the ministry is shown by the fact that he has been the Stated Clerk of Cayuga Presbytery twenty-five years, and six times chosen Commissioner to the General Assembly. In the city of Auburn he is a Trustee of the Theological Seminary, Trustee and Vice-President of the Seymour Library Association, and President of the Cayuga County Historical Society, from its foundation. Fond of local history, he has published a History of the First Presbyterian Church of Auburn (1876); Early Chapters of Cayuga History (1879); Early Chapters of Seneca History (1881); and Memorial Discourses of William H. Seward, James S. Seymour, and Henry Wells; besides several pamphlets and Thanksgiving Discourses.

Hawthorn, James, D.D., was born at Slabtown, Burlington County, N. J., April 1st, 1803. In early life he removed to Kentucky. His education was obtained principally from Rev. A. A. Shannon, of Shelbyville, Ky. After three years' study in Princeton Seminary, he graduated in 1828, was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, February 6th, 1828, and was ordained and installed by the Presbytery of Louisville, November 21st, 1829, as pastor over the churches of Lawrenceburg and Upper Benson, in Franklin County, Ky. This pastoral relation was dissolved April 4th, 1833, after which Mr. Hawthorn preached for various churches in the bounds of the Presbytery, as a supply, for three years. December 29th, 1836, he was installed pastor of the Plumb Creek and Cane Run churches, in Shelby County, Ky. After the dissolution of this relation, April 23d, 1841, he supplied the Lawrenceburg Church, of which he had formerly been pastor, about five years, from 1842 to 1847, when he was transferred to the Presbytery of Mühlenberg.

Dr. Hawthorn next served the Church at Princeton, Ky., for one year, as a stated supply, at the expiration of which time, April 9th, 1848, he was installed as pastor of that church. Here the great work of his life was to be done. For nearly thirty years he performed the duties of this pastorate with great earnestness and faithfulness. Those who knew him best said that the predominant trait of his character was his fidelity. He was a man of spotless integrity, of a lovable disposition, cultivated in mind, Christ-like in spirit. His long rides over rough roads in inclement seasons, while supplying weak congregations, injured his health and laid the foundation for weakness in his later years. He lived, however, to a good old age, and died June 28th, 1877, in his seventy-fifth year. Not only in private life, but among his ministerial brethren, he was loved and trusted as a faithful friend and a wise counsellor.

Hay, John Duffield, was a son of Col. Wm. Hay, "Lieutenant of Lancaster county, Pa.," during the war of the Revolution, and was born near Derry, in 1775. He went to Vincennes, Indiana, in 1803; was married to Sarah Harvey, of Hagerstown, Md. At the organization of the Church in Vincennes, in 1830, he was elected a ruling elder, and sustained that relation until his death, in 1840. He was largely engaged, for many years, in mercantile pursuits in Vincennes, and in all his various social, commercial and religious relations, was widely known as a man of strong convictions, unswerving integrity, and fine Christian character.

Hay, Philip Courtlandt, D. D., was a son of Major Samuel Hay, a gallant and noted officer in our army of the Revolution, and of Jane (Price) Hay; born at Newark, N. J., July 25th, 1793. He took his first degree in the Arts, with honor, at the College of New Jersey, and prepared for the ministry under the instruction of his pastor, Rev. Dr. James Richards. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Jersey, October, 1820, and soon after ordained over the Church at Mendham. For eleven years he was pastor of the Second Church, Newark, until broken health separated him from it. He afterwards accepted an invitation to Geneva, N. Y., where his health again gave way under a laborious and prosperous ministry of several years. He then sought recovery and usefulness at the head of a family school. Subsequently he accepted a call to Oswego, but he could not sustain the charge, and in 1855 he returned to the home of his childhood, and after resting for a time, undertook the management of a classical school. He died December 27th, 1860. While strictly attentive to the local churches committed to his charge, Dr. Hay's activity of temperament and concern for the Redeemer's kingdom engaged him in constant service for the Church at large. Every good enterprise for the public commanded his support; and habitually in his place, in ecclesiastical bodies, he was always fulfilling some stated or occasional part in them, and, in 1849, filled the Moderator's Chair in the General Assembly. By an exceedingly genial disposition and agreeable manners, he won universal esteem. Continuous results followed his labors in his sacred vocation, and frequently large gatherings.

Hayden, Rev. Daniel, was skeptical in early life, but was hopefully converted during a revival of religion. He was born April 9th, 1781, in Western Pennsylvania; entered Jefferson College in 1801, and graduated in 1805. After leaving college he took charge of the Greensburg Academy, and retained his connection with it until 1807 or 1808, when he was licensed as a probationer for the gospel ministry, by the Presbytery of Erie; became pastor of the Pleasant Ridge Church, under the care of the Presbytery of Cincinnati, in 1809, and died August 27th, 1835. Dr. Wilson represents Mr. Hayden as having been an eminently faithful and zealous minister.

Hays, George Price, D. D., the fourth son of John Hays and Orpha (Cornwell) Hays, was born near Canonsburg, Pa., February 2d, 1838. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1857. At the previous contest he was chosen to represent the Franklin Literary Society, and came off victorious. He studied theology for one year, under the direction of his brother, Rev. I. N. Hays, pastor of the Church of Middle Spring, Pa., then two years in the Western Theological Seminary, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Pittsburg, April, 1859. For six months after leaving the seminary he was assistant pastor to Dr. Painter, at Kittanning. In March, 1861, he was installed pastor of the Second Church, Baltimore, and in this field of labor a very admirable work was accomplished, and many souls gathered to the Saviour. In the Fall of 1868 he accepted the financial secretaryship of the University of Wooster, Ohio, and in this position was peculiarly successful. In November, 1869, he was called to the Central Presbyterian Church, Allegheny City, where he met with the special favor of God; the church being visited with an outpouring of the Spirit, which extended throughout nearly the whole year of his pastorate. September 21st, 1870, he was inaugurated President of Washington and Jefferson College, and in the following Spring took charge, as stated supply, of the Second Church of Washington, which two offices he continued to fill, with great acceptance, until July, 1881, when he resigned them both, to accept a call to the Central Church, Denver, Col., of which he is at present pastor. His administration of the affairs of the college was quite a success, and his pastoral work in Washington was eminently blessed. Dr. Hays is a gentleman of great energy. He is an earnest and impressive preacher. Perhaps, his strongest point is as a public speaker, or platform orator. As a participant in debate or before a public assembly he is deservedly popular and always heard with interest.

Hays, Isaac N., D. D., brother of the Rev. George P. Hays, D. D., was born near Canonsburg, Pa., April 17th, 1827. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1847; studied theology at the Western Theological Seminary, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Ohio, April 18th, 1850. He was installed pastor of the Church of Great Conewago, Adams county, Pa., October 10th, 1850. Here he gathered in some very precious fruit during the four years of his ministry. In May, 1851, he took charge of the church of Middle Spring, Cumberland county, Pa. Here he remained for fourteen years, and witnessed some very precious manifestations of the power of God. In December, 1868, he became pastor of a new enterprise in Chambersburg, Pa., and as a result of six years' labor, a handsome church building was erected, and the membership of the church largely increased. In the Winter of 1871 he received a unanimous call to the First Church of Junction City, Kansas, where his prospect of usefulness was in some degree blasted by the protracted drought and clouds of locusts with which that region, the following Summer, was visited. He was soon after called to the Principalship of the State Normal School, at Shippensburg, in the bounds of his old pastoral charge at Middle Spring. Here he remained three years, and then accepted a unanimous call to the pastorate of the Central Church, Allegheny City, where he was installed, Sept. 20th, 1878, and still labors, with good results, in the midst of a large congregation of very kind and warmly attached friends. Dr. Hays is a faithful preacher, and an earnest laborer in the Master's vineyard.

Hays, John Smith, D. D., whose two ministerial brothers have just been noticed, was born near Canonsburg, Pa., August 2d, 1830. He graduated at Jefferson College during the Summer of 1850, and the same Fall entered the Western Theological Seminary. Licensed to preach in the Spring of 1853; in June of that year he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church of Charlestown, Ind., where he remained almost four years, and was successful in his ministry. In March, 1857, he took charge of the Second Church, Nashville, Tenn., where his labors were greatly blessed. He spent the Spring and Winter of 1861 and 1862 in the Central Church of Cincinnati, and during that time there was an outpouring of God's Spirit, which resulted in a large addition to the communion of the Church. In May, 1862, he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church of Frankfort, Ky., where he also witnessed a goodly ingathering of souls. In the Spring of 1867 he took charge of the Walnut Street Church, Louisville, Ky., and its roll of members during his pastorate was largely increased. In 1871 he was called to the Biblical and Ecclesiastical History Professorship in the Danville Theological Seminary, and whilst holding this position he supplied feeble churches in the vicinity of Danville. He was installed pastor at Quincy, Ill., May 1st, 1883. Dr. Hays is a good preacher, a gentleman of scholarly attainments, and earnestness and energy of character, and labors diligently and successfully in whatever position he is called to occupy.

Hazen, James King, D. D., was born in West Springfield (now Agawam), Mass., April 29th, 1833. He is the son of Rev. R. S. Hazen and Eunice King Hazen. At an early age his parents removed to Connecticut, where he prepared for college. He entered Williams College, Mass., September, 1852, and graduated, with full honors, in the class of 1856. For nearly a year after his graduation he taught in Connecticut, and in 1857 removed to Prattville, Ala., where, for three years, he was engaged in manufacturing business, with which interests he was more or less identified for many succeeding years. His collegiate course had been pursued with a view to the ministry, which had been abandoned, for reasons that seemed, at the time, to be imperative. An active Christian life attracted the attention of leading men in the Church, and Mr. Hazen was urged to enter the ministry, with a view to the pastorate of the Prattville Presbyterian Church. He was licensed by the Presbytery of East Alabama, in 1860, and assumed charge of the Prattville Church January 1st, 1861, being ordained and installed the March following. The degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him by the Southwestern University, Clarksville, Tenn., in 1878. The General Assembly of the "Presbyterian Church in the United States," at New Orleans, May, 1877, elected him Secretary of the Presbyterian Committee of Publication, which position he has filled with marked ability and rare business tact, bringing its affairs into a sound financial condition, and placing the work upon a basis that promises a prosperous future.

Dr. Hazen's life and labors in Alabama were marked with peculiar success, and his influence for good, in Prattville and all the surrounding country, is felt to this day. Commencing his work there with a church of some twenty-four members, it grew and strengthened, under his faithful ministration, until its numbers reached nearly two hundred, with three branch churches, in a circuit of some fifteen miles, and four comfortable church buildings, as the tokens of God's blessing upon the consecrated labors of His servant.

Headly, William O., was born in Headleyville, N. J., about six miles west of Newark, March 12th, 1815. In early life he entered upon a carpenter's apprenticeship. In 1838, when foreman of a sash and blind factory in Brooklyn, N. Y., he made a profession of faith, in the Second Presbyterian Church of Brooklyn. He established the business which he had learned, in Newark, in connection with a partner. Afterwards he engaged, in the same place, in the manufacture of trunks and valises, and his business developed within a few years into large proportions, giving employment to hundreds of employees, of whom he was not only a strictly just, but generous employer. He identified himself with the Central Presbyterian Church, Newark, June 23d, 1840, and became a member of its Session. He died February 23d, 1875. He was an eminently exemplary and useful man. He gave himself first to the Lord, and then to the Church, by the will of God. The sincerity of his belief was manifested by the fruits which it brought forth. In all the relations of life which he sustained, he deported himself in accordance with his Christian profession, and gave practical proofs, to those who took notice of him, of the power of the gospel on the human heart. His religion was characterized by the spirit of sympathy, benevolence, love, and well-doing. He walked in wisdom toward them that were without, winning them, by his consistent and cheerful piety, to a favorable consideration of the things that belonged to their everlasting peace. He was ever modest and unassuming, but ever zealous and untiring in the service of Christ, and in efforts after usefulness.

Heaton, Austin C., D. D., was the third son and fifth child of William and Martha Childs Heaton, and was born in Thetford, Vermont, May 28th, 1815. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1840, in a class numbering nearly one hundred. He was among the best, and was elected a fellow of the "Phi Beta Kappa Society." After teaching for a time, during part of which he studied theology under private supervision, in September, 1849, he entered the Theological Seminary of Princeton, N. J.; remained there until 1851, and was then licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick. In August, 1851, he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Harper's Ferry, Va., and labored there, with great acceptance and success, during about three years. He received, in 1854, a call to the Third Presbyterian Church of Baltimore, and labored there for several months. In November, 1855, he was installed pastor of the Manokin Church, Princess Anne, Somerset county, Md., having commenced his labors there in the preceding June. In this field, having also in conjunction with it supplied the neighboring Church of Rehoboth for about five years, he continued a full quarter of a century, closing his labors with that people on the twenty-fifth anniversary of his engagement with them.

During his pastorate in Maryland, Dr. Heaton was prominently useful in the cause of popular education and in the great Temperance reform, which has been so successful in that county, and his counsels and ministerial labors, which were very popular and in great demand, contributed much towards the prosperity of all the neighboring Presbyterian churches. Dr. Heaton is now pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Lewes, Delaware. There his labors have been abundant and successful, and that church, formerly distracted and weakened, has now become very much enlarged, and is in a most prosperous condition. He is a sound theologian, an effective preacher, and a most sympathizing and faithful pastor.

Heaven. The saints, having been openly acknowledged and acquitted in the day of judgment, will make their triumphant entry into the place designed for their reception. "These shall go away into everlasting life." The place is called heaven, by which we understand that region of the universe in which angels and the spirits of the just now dwell, and all the righteous shall be finally assembled. Where it is situated, we do not know. We speak of it as above us, but the phrase is used in conformity to a notion founded upon the appearance of the visible heavens. "What is above us at this moment will be beneath us twelve hours hence, in consequence of the revolution of the earth, and what is beneath us seems to be above to those who are on the opposite side of the globe. Our ideas of its situation are, therefore, vague, and there is only one thing which it seems warrantable to conclude, that it lies beyond the limits of the visible creation.

That it is a place, we have no reason to doubt. Our Lord has a body like our own, and this cannot be omnipresent, and wherever He is corporeally there is heaven—"Where I am, there shall also my servants be." Enoch and Elias have bodies; all the saints will have bodies, and these cannot be everywhere. We read of "the hope laid up for us in heaven;" of "entering into the holy place;" and "I go," says Jesus to His disciples, "to prepare a place for you." But, though it is really a place, we must chiefly consider it as a state. Even now happiness does not essentially depend on what is without us. What was Eden to Adam and Eve, after sin had filled them with shame, and sorrow and fear? But Paul, in prison, was infinitely happier than Caesar on the throne of the nations.

What, then, are we allowed to reckon upon as the grand component parts of this exalted state?

I. Pre-eminent Knowledge. This is a world of action rather than of science; and the wiser men are, the more readily will they confess that their present knowledge is unspeakably less than their ignorance. In whatever direction they attempt to penetrate, they are checked and baffled. Laboriousness attends every acquirement; and doubts and uncertainties diminish the value of every possession. The difference between the knowledge of Newton and the most illiterate peasant will be far exceeded by the difference between the knowledge of the Christian on earth and in heaven. "The light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun seven-fold as the light of seven days, when the Lord bindeth up the breach of his people, and healeth the stroke of their wound." Now they understand as children; then they will know as men. Now they see through a glass darkly; but then face to face. Now they know in part; then they will know even as they are known. How delightful the thought—amidst our present perplexities and obscurities; and under a sense of the penury of our talents, and in the want of means and opportunities of improvement; that "Messiah cometh who is called Christ; and that when he is come, he will tell us all things."

2. Perfect Purity. This announcement has little attraction for those who never saw the beauty of holiness, and never abhorred themselves, repenting in dust and ashes. But O! to a Christian it is worth dying for, to leave behind him the body of this death; this law in the members warring against the law of his mind; this inability to do the things that he would; this presence of evil ever with him; this liability, this proneness to sin, even in his holy things—tarnishing every duty, wounding his own peace, and vexing and grieving the spirit of his best friend. To be freed from the enemy, and to have nothing in us that temptation can operate upon! To be incapable of ingratitude, and unbelief, and distractions in duty! To be innocent as the first Adam, and holy as the second! What wonder, the Christian exclaims, with Henry, "if this be heaven, oh that I was there!"

3. The most delightful associations. We are formed for society. Much of our present happiness results from attachment and intercourse. Who knows not "the comforts of love?" Yea, and who knows not its sorrows also? We must weep when the objects of our affection weep. The arrows that pierce our friends wound us also. We tolerate, we excuse their imperfections; but we feel them. And the thought of absence—separation—death; is dreariness—pain—and anguish. Hence, some have been ready to envy the unrelated, unconnected individual, whose anxieties and griefs are all personal. But it is not good for a man to be alone in any condition. It is better to follow the course of Providence; to cherish the intimacies of life; to improve and to sanctify them; and under the disadvantages which now mingle with them, to look forward to a state where the honey will be without the sting, and the rose without the thorn; and attachment and intercourse without the deductions arising from pain, and infirmities, and pity, and fear. In the Scriptures heaven is always presented as a social state. We have now few holy companions; the many are going another way. "But," says John, "I beheld, and lo! a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands, and cried with a loud voice, saying, 'Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb.'" And we will have access to them all. We will there have the most embodied society; for it will include those to whom we were so tenderly related by nature, or pious friendship, and at parting with whom we sorrowed, most of all, that we should see their faces and hear their voices no more; and also those we left behind us with reluctance and anxiety in a world of sin and trouble; with these, our fellowship, after a brief separation, will be renewed, improved, and perfected for ever. The society will also be the most dignified, and without its present embarrassments. There are now personages so superior that we seem reduced to nothing at the thought of them. We esteem and admire them, and wish to hear, and see, and mingle with them; yet we shrink from the presence of such genius, wisdom and goodness. But we will feel nothing of this, when we sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and Moses, and with prophets, and apostles, and martyrs, and reformers, in the kingdom of God. Nor will saints only be our companions; but those glorious beings who never sinned; who excel in strength; who are proverbial for their wisdom; who are our models in doing the will of God on earth; who are our ministering spirits, invisibly watching over us in our minority—the innumerable company of angels. And though they will not be able to say, "He hath redeemed us unto God by his blood," they will cry with a loud voice—though we will endeavor to be louder—"Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing."

4. The most glorious employment. We should as soon think that heaven was a nursery of vice as a state of inaction. Indolence is no more irreconcilable to virtue, than perfectly incompatible with happiness.

"A want of occupation is not rest;

A mind quite vacant is a mind distress'd."

All the powers conferred by a wise Creator necessarily imply their application and use, and the more life any being possesses, the more energy and activity will distinguish him, unless he is in a state of perversion or restraint. But what are the employments of heaven? Many have speculated much on this subject. Some of their conjectures are probable, and all pleasing. But we dare not follow them. Of this we are sure, that there will be none of those mean and degrading toils which arise now from the necessities of our nature, or from luxury and pride. Neither will there be any of those religious exercises which pertain to a state of imperfection. Repentance will be hid from our eyes. There will be no more warfare and watchings. Neither will there be any more prayers, with strong cryings and tears. Yet it is said, "They serve him day and night in his temple." And their powers will be equal to the work; for neither the fervency nor the duration of the service will produce exhaustion or languor. The common notion of always standing up and singing is too childish to be entertained. We have no doubt but that there may be stated assemblies for adoration and praise. But Christians are said to be still praising Him now; and they do this, not by acts of worship only, but by performing His will, by filling up their stations in life properly, and promoting the welfare of all around them; and His work, even here, is honorable and glorious.

On the presence and sight of the Saviour, in whom dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, we may reckon; and we will reckon—and reckon supremely—if we are Christians. "Ah!" says Paul, "I long to depart, and to be with Christ, which is far better." We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and present with the Lord." What would everything be in His absence? Could the place, the company, the harp, be a substitute for Him? But here is the consummation—we shall serve "Him, and see his face." We need not envy those who knew Him after the flesh; we will have access to Him; we will see the King, and see Him in his beauty. He is now with us. He knows our soul in adversity, and comes to us as a friend, and helper, and comforter. But we are now in prison. His visits, when he looks upon us through the bars, and brings us supplies, and communes with us in the cell, are relieving. They solace the confinement; we wish them multiplied; we expect them with joy. But the best of all these visits will be the last, when He will come not only to us, but for us; when He will open the doors of the dungeon, and knock off the fetters, and take us home to His palace. Then we will be with Him: we will "walk with" Him "in white;" we will "eat and drink at His table in His kingdom;" we will "be forever with the Lord." It is hardly necessary to say, that we may reckon upon—

The most equisite enjoyment. This will spring abundantly from all the foregoing sources, and especially the last. It will far transcend every feeling we have had of delight and ecstasy here. The state itself is expressed by it. "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." Jude says, we shall be "presented before the presence of his glory, with exceeding joy." And says David, "In thy presence is fullness of joy, and at thy right hand are pleasures evermore."

Let it be observed once more, that this felicity will be heightened by the knowledge that it is everlasting. In heaven there is no apprehension of evil, which disturbs our best hours upon earth, and is excited partly by the suggestions of conscience, and partly by our experience of the vicissitudes of human affairs. Here we ought to rejoice with trembling; and often in our most cheerful moments we are visited with the unwelcome forebodings of a change. Who can say, without presumption, "To-morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant?" The joys of religion are equally subject to mutation as those of a temporal nature; either because the saints are not at all times disposed to receive them, and by the unhappy influence of unbelief they are excluded from their souls; or, because God is pleased to suspend them, for the trial of their faith and the chastisement of their sins. The state of heaven is totally different. The duration of all created beings is progressive, and is made up of moments following each other in perpetual succession; but that of the saints will bring no change of circumstances, and may be compared to the duration of the sun and the stars, which, from age to age, are fixed in the same point of space, and shine with undiminished splendor. Eternity will then have commenced, which, as it flows on, carries all things along in a uniform, uninterrupted stream of bliss or woe. The very possibility of an end would mar the felicity of the righteous. It would be suspended while the question was asked, Will our joy last forever? and the doubt implied in that question would make fear pass over the mind, as the shadow of a cloud, and dim the lustre of the surrounding scenery. Still more fatal would be the effect, if there were positive ground to suspect that their joy would come to an end. The idea of annihilation, from which nature recoils, would be doubly terrible. Who could bear the thought of losing life in its highest perfection; of closing his eyes on this transcendent glory to behold it no more; of sinking into eternal insensibility after ages of rapturous bliss? But it is an eternal redemption of which Jesus Christ is the author. The last change which His followers experience is death; or, if you will, the resurrection, when the separate spirits will be again embodied. They then enter upon a career which will never be finished. Ages will run on more rapidly than hours among mortals; but thousands of ages will take nothing from their felicity. God has made them, by His gift, what He Himself is in His own nature; and of them, as well as of Him, it may be said, that their years shall have no end. "There is no night there." "The sun shall no more give light by day; neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee; but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory. The sun shall no more go down; neither shall the moon withdraw itself; for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended."

It should never be forgotten that, as heaven is a prepared place, so is it for a prepared people. Those who occupy it must have been "made meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light." The meetness or fitness is expressed in two terms in the passage just quoted. Relative meetness is expressed by the word "inheritance." It is assigned to "heirs." Our natural heirship is forfeited by sin. Redemption has brought back the inheritance, but we become heirs by becoming children, and we are made the children of God by the faith which secures to us the blessing of justification. Till this blessing is obtained there is no meetness of relation; the inheritance is not mine, and I am forbidden to hope for it. If I die under the delusion of finding admission into heaven while my sin is unforgiven, I shall be awfully disappointed. My name shall not shine forth in the book of life till my guilt is canceled and my person adopted, for it is only when we are "justified by His grace that we are made heirs according to the hope of eternal life."

Personal meetness is indicated by the term "saints." The word signifies hallowed, sanctified persons. Mark the correspondence, the fitness, between a hallowed state and heaven. Shall we illustrate this by contrast? Dwell, then, for a moment, upon it. Here is a man that has a distaste to God's service. It is a weariness to him. He avails himself of every pretext to neglect it, and when he does engage in it, he is restless and unhappy. Is he meet to be employed in the worship of God day without night forever? Would heaven be to him a place of rest and joy? Here is another, who shuns the full light of truth, lest he should be reproved. Can he go into that pure and searching element which shall set his secret sins in the full light of His countenance forever? Would he voluntarily choose such a place as "the lot of his inheritance?" Here is a third. So enervated is his heart that nothing spiritual or eternal lays hold upon a single affection. What shall meet the gross taste of this man in the spiritualities of that world of light? Take a fourth. He is a trifling lover of pleasure, or a sensualist. Take a fifth. He is cankered with envy, fumes in anger, lowers with revenge, swells with pride, or is contracted with selfishness. You see no meekness there. Let no man deceive himself. It cannot be that persons with these dispositions should have any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God. Before any one can enter that light it must shine into his heart, to give the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. Before he can join that society, love and charity must ameliorate his temper. Before he enters upon those hallowed meditations his meditation upon Him must be sweet on earth. Before he sees God in heaven, He must manifest Himself to him here. He must, in a word, be a man sanctified, hallowed to God, before he can ever approach that holy Being, those saints in light, that holy heaven. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." "Without holiness, no man shall see the Lord."

Heberton, Rev. Alexander, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., May 21st, 1803. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1823; in 1824 entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia in October, 1826. At the close of the year 1827 he was ordained junior pastor to the Rev. Robert Russell, of the Allentownship Settlement Church, and at Mr. Russell's death he became sole pastor. During this pastorate he organized a church in the county town of Lehigh, which has been in successful operation for over fifty years. In 1832 he became pastor at Kingston, Luzerne county, and his labors were blessed with a precious revival. He subsequently was pastor at Salem, N. J., 1834-40; at Berwick, Pa., until 1848, and at Williamsport, Pa., until the close of 1858. From 1858 to 1865 he labored most successfully at Ridley Church, Pa. Removing to Philadelphia, in 1865, the General Assembly elected him City Missionary, upon the death of Dr. Junkin, under the Boudinot fund, left for that particular kind of work. Mr. Heberton has been a zealous and faithful minister of the gospel, and in his advanced years is very active in doing good, as he has opportunity.

Heckman, George C., D. D., son of John and Mary S. Heckman, was born at Easton, Pa., January 26th, 1825. He graduated at Lafayette College in 1845, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in May, 1848. He accepted a call to the Church at Port Byron, N. Y., and on February 8th, 1849, was ordained and installed its pastor. During a pastorate of over eight years the church grew to be one of the strongest in the Synod. He then accepted a call to the church of Portage, Wis. His next charge was at Jamesville, Wis., where he labored fourteen months. In August, 1861, he accepted a call to the Third Presbyterian Church, Indianapolis, Ind., and in a ministry of more than six years the church greatly prospered. He accepted a call to the State Street Presbyterian Church, Albany, N. Y., where, during a pastorate of three years, his labors were largely blessed. He was next elected President of Hanover College, and during his administration of nine years, over one hundred thousand dollars in property and endowment were added to the college; debts of long standing were paid, teachers added, and salaries raised. Resigning the presidency in 1879, he accepted a call to the Avondale Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati, O., which charge he still retains. Dr. Heckman is a fine scholar, an able, popular and successful preacher, a useful member of the Church courts, and highly esteemed for his zeal and fidelity in every good work.

Helm, James Isbell, D. D., son of Henry Helm, M. D., and Matilda (Cosson) Helm, was born in Washington county, Tenn., April 11th, 1811. He was graduated from Greenville College, Tenn., A. D. 1833. He entered Princeton Seminary in the Fall of 1833, and was regularly graduated in 1836. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, August 5th, 1835, and after spending two years—1836-38—in missionary labor in Giles county, Tenn., was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of West Tennessee, at Pulaski, Tenn., June 23d, 1838. After serving it two years, 1840-42, as supply, he accepted a call to the Church at Salem, N. J., and was installed October 17th, 1842, and labored there eleven and a half years, until released, April 20th, 1852, after which he taught for several years at Edgehill Seminary, at Princeton, N. J., and subsequently a school for young ladies in the city of Philadelphia. In 1860 Dr. Helm entered the Protestant Episcopal Church.

Hemphill, Rev. Charles Robert, A. M., Professor of Biblical Literature in Columbia Theological Seminary, S. C., is of Scotch-Irish descent—son of the Hon. James Hemphill, and grandson of the Rev. John Hemphill, an Associate Reformed minister. He was born at Chester Court House, S. C., April 18th, 1852. He spent one year, 1868, at the University of South Carolina; the two succeeding years at the University of Virginia; became a member of the Presbyterian Church in 1871, and immediately resolved to enter the ministry, instead of his previously chosen profession of law. He graduated at the Columbia Theological Seminary, in 1874, and was licensed to preach by Bethel Presbytery, March 25th, 1873. Before graduating at the seminary he was elected Tutor of Hebrew, which position he filled with eminent ability for four years, resigning to accept a Fellowship in Greek in Johns Hopkins University, at Baltimore. For three years, from June, 1879, he filled, with entire satisfaction, a Professorship in the School of Ancient Languages, in the Southwestern Presbyterian University, at Clarksville, Tenn. In July, 1881, he was unanimously elected Associate Professor of Biblical Literature in the Theological Seminary at Columbia, which position he now holds. Since his licensure to preach Prof. Hemphill has served various churches, and is at present ministering to the Church in Columbia, S. C. As a preacher he is sound, edifying and attractive. The Church has evinced her appreciation of him, as a trained teacher, and an able and trustworthy instructor of her rising ministry, by calling him to occupy the place he now fills, and for which he is so well qualified.

Henderson, Frisby, one of the two elders chosen by the congregation of Elkton, Md., at its organization, in 1833, was born June 16th, 1767, at Frenchtown, near that place. His parents were Thomas Frisby Henderson and Hannah Henderson, who had lately emigrated from the county of Harford, in the same State. His father was a Revolutionary soldier, a captain in the service, and died while on military duty in New Jersey, in 1777. His mother was said by her children to have been converted under Whitefield's preaching, at one of his great meetings in Harford county. She was a member of Penceader Church, where her children and posterity for several generations were afterwards regular attendants and members. Frisby Henderson was a member and elder in Penceader Church for many years. He was a man whose religious character was manifested by his daily life, in his business transactions, as well as his church relations. With abundant means, he was given to hospitality, mindful to entertain strangers; the prophet's chamber in his hospitable mansion was always ready for ministers of the gospel. His acts of benevolence extended as well to the poor and the destitute of his neighborhood as to the agencies of the Church for the extension of the kingdom of Christ. During many years of his life he lived at or near Frenchtown, being largely interested in the line of steamboats and stages that then constituted the only line of travel between the cities of Baltimore and Philadelphia. In the war of 1812 his property, consisting of warehouses at Frenchtown, was burned by the British. Soon after the war, he moved to Elkton, where he lived until his death, in April, 1845, greatly lauded as the main pillar for the support of the church in that place. During his life he had filled many places of public trust, having been a member of the State Legislature, as well as a Judge of the Orphan's Court.

Henderson, Rev. Isaac J., D.D., belonged to a family well known in the region of Natchez and New Orleans. He was born in the former city, January 6th, 1812. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1831, and took the full three years' course of study at Princeton Seminary, where he was greatly beloved by his fellow students. He served as a missionary under the Synod of Mississippi, spending two years in this capacity in Mississippi, Arkansas and Louisiana. He subsequently spent seven years in Galveston, Texas; was pastor at Jackson, Miss., and of the Prytania Street Church, in New Orleans; resigned this charge on account of impaired health, and, after a season of rest, was installed pastor of the Church at Annapolis, Md., March 12th, 1867, continuing to labor there until his death, which occurred December 8th, 1875. Dr. Henderson was a man of great natural amiability and gentleness of character, to which grace added a devoted piety. As a preacher, he was faithful, practical, and very interesting to all classes. When asked, in his closing moments, if Jesus was near, he replied: "Oh, yes! I know whom I have believed. The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin."

Henderson, Rev. James Sebastian Hamilton, son of James and Sarah (Graff) Henderson, was born in Frederick county, Md., September 26th, 1816. He received his academical education under the instruction of the Rev. John Mines. At the age of eighteen years he united, on profession of his faith, with the Rockville and Bethesda Church, Maryland. After spending two years in the Union Theological Seminary, New York, he entered Princeton Seminary, where he was regularly graduated in 1842. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, April 23d, 1841; was ordained as an evangelist, by the Presbytery of Nashville, Tenn., December 17th, 1841; was stated supply at Smyrna, Tenn., 1842-43; stated supply at Augusta, Ky., 1843-52; was installed pastor of the Big Spring Church, at Newville, Pa., November 18th, 1852; was released from this charge, after ten years of faithful service, October 8th, 1862. He then removed to Middlebrook, Md., where he spent more than a year without charge. In 1864 he began his ministry in the Neelsville Church, Md., in which he labored with great success for eighteen years, until his death. In this charge, as in all his others, he proved himself a faithful pastor, and an able and earnest minister of the Word. He died August 17th, 1882, in his sixty-seventh year. His body was borne, by the surviving members of the Session, to the cemetery adjoining the church, attended by a great concourse of the loving people to whom he so long preached the precious gospel which he exemplified in a life of consistent Christian piety and usefulness.

Henderson, John, was one of the original bench of ruling elders ordained over the Presbyterian Church at Natchez, Miss., and is entitled, more than any other man, to the distinction of being the founder of that church. He was born in Greenock, Scotland, in the year 1755. His father was a practicing physician. His grandparents were zealous supporters of the Covenant, and suffered severely in the persecution of 1680. At an early age he emigrated to America, and after residing successively in Virginia, North Carolina and Havana, settled at Natchez, in 1787. The "Natchez District" was at that time in the possession of the Spanish authorities, and public worship by Protestants was rigidly interdicted. In 1798 the Spaniards evacuated the District, and a territorial government was set up by the Congress of the United States. Mr. Henderson's name appears at this time attached to a protest against Sabbath desecration in the Territory, and also to a memorial presented to Congress, praying for aid "in establishing and supporting a regular ministry of the gospel and schools for the education of youth." In 1812 the corner-stone of a house of worship after the Presbyterian order was laid, and in 1817 a church was regularly organized. From this time till his death, in 1841, Mr. Henderson continued to exercise the office of ruling elder. He was engaged in the business of a general commission merchant, and secured a competency for himself and a large family, without amassing wealth. In an age of great immorality, he gave the world the spectacle of a man who made religion his business, by carrying the principles of religion into every secular transaction. He was a staunch Presbyterian, with a firm persuasion of the authority and sufficiency of the Scriptures as a rule of faith and practice; and walking in the light of God's Word, maintained a simplicity of character and a probity of life which gained him the confidence and respect of the whole community. His fidelity in rearing his family was so conspicuous, and was so owned of God, that he had the joy of seeing all his children united with him in the fellowship of the Church. He died at the age of eighty-five, full of years and honored by his generation.

Henderson, Rev. Joseph Washington, was licensed by the Presbytery of Donegal some time between 1778 and 1781, and became the pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Great Conewago, Pa., where he remained until 1797. From 1799 to 1821 he was pastor of the churches of Bethlehem and Ebenezer, in Western Pennsylvania.

Henderson, Hon. Robert M., son of William M. and Elizabeth (Parker) Henderson, was born near Carlisle, Pa., March 11th, 1827. He graduated at the High School, Carlisle, among the first under the common school system. He graduated at Dickinson College, in 1845, studied law with the Hon. John Reed, and was admitted to practice in August, 1847.

He was elected a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature in 1851, and re-elected in 1852. He was appointed Additional Law Judge of the Twelfth Judicial District of Pennsylvania, April, 1874, and was elected to the same office, without opposition, in November of the same year. On January 1st, 1882, he became President Judge of the district; resigned the position in March, 1882, and resumed the practice of the law at Carlisle. Judge Henderson has discharged the duties to which he has been called with great success and acceptableness. He is an able lawyer, a wise counsellor, an eloquent speaker and a useful citizen. His social qualities make him a very agreeable companion. His entire influence is cast in favor of the right and the true. For many years he has been a Trustee of the First Presbyterian Church, Carlisle, Pa., and in 1871 he was elected a ruling elder of that congregation.

Henderson, Thomas, the son of John Henderson, noticed above, was born at Natchez, Miss., in January, 1798. He was ordained a ruling elder in the church in that city, February 25th, 1838. His education had been obtained at such imperfect schools as were accessible at that day, in the community in which he lived. Gifted, however, naturally, with a singular perspicacity of mind, and a well balanced judgment, his intellect was further quickened by divine grace, so that, in his clear discernment of the principles of rectitude, and the forms and proportions of truth, and in the propriety and felicity with which he performed his public duties as a Presbyter in the Church, he had few superiors. He was successful in business, and used his wealth with a princely liberality, conscientiously disbursing it as a steward of the Lord. The contributions of the Natchez Church to benevolent and missionary objects ranked, for a series of years, largely through his efforts, with those given by the wealthiest churches in New York and Philadelphia. He died March 6th, 1863, universally lamented by the community, who seemed to feel that in his departure a presence which had been a safeguard and a blessing had been withdrawn from them. His son, John Waldo Henderson, a representative of the third generation, is at the present date (1883) a ruling elder in the Natchez Church.

Henderson, Thomas, M. D., a native of Monmouth county, N. J., studied medicine and practiced in his native State. He was early appointed a Judge of the Court of Common Pleas. From 1779 to 1780 he was a delegate to the Continental Congress, from New Jersey. Dr. Henderson was in the House of Representatives, under the Constitution, from 1795 to 1797. He was a man of sterling worth, and of unblemished reputation. For many years he was an elder in Mr. Tenment's Church at Freehold.

Hennen, Alfred, an elder of the First Presbyterian Church of New Orleans, La., was descended from Archbishop Sharpe, of England, whose granddaughter, married to James Hennen, of Ireland, was the great-grandmother of Alfred Hennen, of New Orleans. His father was a physician, who emigrated to the United States. He was born October 17th, 1786, at Elk Ridge, Maryland. For a time he was a merchant's clerk in Philadelphia, but taking no interest in mercantile pursuits, determined to enter professional life. After graduating at Yale College with honor, winning the Berkely prize, he studied law at New Haven and Nashville, Tenn. In 1808 he descended the Mississippi river to New Orleans, on a flatboat, making the voyage in three months. He took with him to New Orleans a well selected library which he had gathered at College, and to which he constantly added until the week of his death. He accumulated the largest private library in the southwest, both in law and literature. His books afforded him the greatest pleasure of his life. He kept up his intimate acquaintance with the Greek and Roman classics until the end.

None of the great lawyers who formed the jurisprudence of Louisiana contributed more to its construction than Mr. Hennen. He was a thorough and most laborious student all his days, and was the master of six languages. A man of vast learning, in the preparation of his cases he drew, with marvelous memory, upon a storehouse of ancient wisdom that astonished his colleagues and overwhelmed his adversaries, while he enlightened and informed the Court. He was engaged in all the celebrated causes of his time. To them all he brought tireless industry, exhaustless patience, vast learning, great practical wisdom, sound judgment, and a sincere love of justice. Several times he was offered an appointment on the Bench of the highest Courts, which he as often declined, preferring the greater activity and independence of the Bar. In the second war with England, on the advance of General Packenham upon New Orleans, Mr. Hennen volunteered to defend his country, was a member of General Jackson's staff, and participated in the battle of New Orleans.

Mr. Hennen was one of the first Protestant Christians in New Orleans. Before there was a Presbyterian Church, he was a vestryman in the first Episcopal Church. On the arrival of Sylvester Larned, in 1818, he became the coadjutor of that eloquent preacher. He was one of the original twenty-four who, in 1823, organized the First Presbyterian Church, of which he was ordained a ruling elder in 1828, continuing to fulfill the functions of that office until his death, January 19th, 1870, in his eighty-fifth year.

Mr. Hennen was the faithful friend and earnest helper of all the ministers of the Church of God who came within his reach. He was a man of commanding presence, tall, strong, and vigorous, yet of great benignity and love of his fellow-men. He never tasted distilled alcoholic liquor or tobacco, and never used spectacles. His greatest delight, after his books, was to teach the young and the ignorant. For many years before his death he was Professor of Common and Constitutional Law in the University of Louisiana, and he always had a number of young men reading law in his office, to whom, with infinite pains and patience, he gave gratuitous instruction. When in his rural retreat, he always taught his negro slaves the Bible and Catechism, and employed teachers to instruct them in his absence. When in the city of New Orleans, his habit was, on Sabbath afternoon, to visit the orphan asylums, to teach the little orphans the gospel of the blessed Jesus, whom he loved.

Henry, Alexander, Esq., was born in the north of Ireland, June, 1766. He came to Philadelphia in 1783, then eighteen years of age, and at once engaged as a clerk in the dry goods trade, in which he soon achieved the honors and emoluments of a successful commission merchant. He united with the Second Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, August 4th, 1803, and was ordained a ruling elder in the same church, January, 1818. In June, 1832, when the Central Presbyterian Church was organized, Mr. Henry's name was standing at the head of the list of its members. He was one of its first two ruling elders, the first president of its Trustees, and one of the most liberal contributors to its support. June 7th, 1831, he was elected President of the Board of Education, which position, amid many days of trial to the cause, he very ably filled for sixteen years, until the day of his death, August 13th, 1847, in the eighty-second year of his age. As a Christian merchant, as a ruling elder, as a Sabbath-school teacher, as a distributor of religious tracts—first introduced by him into America—as the President of the Board of Education, of the House of Refuge, of the Magdalen Society, and of the American Sunday-school Union, Mr. Henry won the esteem of his colleagues, and the love and admiration of all for whom he labored. Long before the organization of the Board of Education, he generously assisted pious youths in their preparation for the gospel ministry. The life of such a man is his best eulogy.

Henry, Rev. Hugh, graduated at Princeton College in 1748, and, having studied theology, was ordained by the Presbytery of New Castle, in 1751, and settled as pastor of the churches of Rehoboth, Wicomico and Monokin, in Maryland. President Davies spoke of him as promising great usefulness. He was a laborious and highly esteemed minister. Mr. Henry died in 1763.

Henry, J. Addison, D.D., son of the Rev. Dr. Symmes Cleves Henry, who was from 1820 to 1857, the time of his death, the gifted, faithful and successful pastor of the Church of Cranbury, N. J., was born at that place, October 28th, 1835. He graduated at New Jersey College in 1857; studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was ordained and installed pastor of the Princeton Church, Philadelphia, in 1860, in which relation he still continues. Dr. Henry's success in this his first and only charge has been marked. The congregation, which was comparatively feeble when he was placed over it in the Lord, has very largely increased. It is now one of the most flourishing congregations of our Denomination in the city, is admirably organized and equipped for good service, and fills the capacious and beautiful edifice which it has erected for its use. Dr. Henry is a sound, earnest and faithful preacher, and a most diligent and devoted pastor. He has the united and ardent affection of his people. As a presbyter he is judicious, active and influential. His genial, frank and manly spirit has won him the esteem of his brethren. He has been, and is, a valuable member of several Boards of the Church, and for a number of years was a useful director of the Presbyterian Hospital.

Henry, Rev. John, was ordained by the Presbytery of Dublin, and came to Maryland in 1709, having been invited, on the death of Mr. Makemie, to be his successor. He was admitted a member of Presbytery in 1710, and received a call "from the good people of Rehoboth," Messrs. Hampton and Davis preaching at his "admission." He stood high as a citizen and a divine. He died before September, 1771.

Henry, Joseph, LL.D., late Secretary and Director of the Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D. C., was an honor to his country and his age.

Professor Henry was born in Albany, N.Y., December 17th, 1799. He became Professor of Mathematics in the Albany Academy, in 1826; Professor of Natural Philosophy in the College of New Jersey, at Princeton, in 1832; and was elected the first Secretary and Director of the Smithsonian Institution, in 1846. He received the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws from Union College, in 1829, and from Harvard University, in 1851. He was President of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, in 1849; was chosen President of the United States National Academy of Sciences, in 1868; President of the Philosophical Society of Washington, in 1871, and Chairman of the Light House Board of the United States, in the same year. The last three positions he continued to fill until his death. Professor Henry made contributions to science in electricity, electro-magnetism, meteorology, capillarity, acoustics, and in other branches of physics; he published valuable memoirs in the transactions of various learned societies of which he was a member, and devoted thirty-two years of his life to making the Smithsonian Institution what its founder intended it to be, an efficient instrument for the "increase and diffusion of knowledge among men." It may be specially mentioned that the greatest triumph of the genius and the reward of the patient labor of Professor Henry was the discovery of the telegraph. In 1825 Mr. Barlow, of the Royal Military Academy, published a pamphlet which was accepted as the demonstration that the telegraph was impossible. In 1830 Professor Henry had a telegraph in successful operation, of over a mile and a half in length, and a little later, one of several miles in length. A writer (Mr. E. N. Dickerson) who, as counsel in a patent case, had occasion to examine this matter thoroughly, says: "The thing was perfect as it came from its author, and has never been improved, from that day to this, as a sounding telegraph." And he further calls attention to the fact that the subsequent invention of an alphabet impressed on paper strips has been abandoned, and to-day men read the telegraph phonetically, as Professor Henry did at the first. How can we estimate the influence on the world's history, on the progress of nations, on the individual lives of men, of the man who gave to the world, without money and without price, the discovery that made the telegraph possible?

Professor Henry died in Washington, May 13th, 1878, and his funeral took place on the 16th, at the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church, of which he had been a member. On this occasion the President of the United States, the Vice-President of the United States, the members of the Cabinet, and the leading officials in every other branch of the Government, men eminent in science, in literature, in diplomacy, and in professional and business life, were present. On January 16th, 1879, memorial services, in honor of the distinguished and lamented dead, were held in the Hall of the House of Representatives, in which the President of the United States, with his Cabinet, the Vice-President, the Chief Justice and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court, both Houses of Congress, and a large assembly of eminent persons of various professions took part. By order of the House of Representatives these memorial exercises, accompanied with a portrait of the deceased, were published in a handsome MEMORIAL VOLUME.

As a student of science, Professor Henry was ardent and enthusiastic in his love for the chosen pursuit of his life. He was characterized by great reverence in the pursuit of truth; never suffering the advancement of his own opinions to warp his judgment or govern his investigations. As an investigator, he was characterized by great patience and thoroughness in his work of observation, and by broad, well-considered, and far-reaching generalizations. Combined with his thoroughness, there was great fertility of mind. He was distinguished, not in one branch of physics, but in all. His character was adorned by purity, simplicity and benevolence. Above all, he lived and died in the communion of the Christian Church. "While," said his pastor, Rev. S. S. Mitchell, D. D., in his funeral address, "human learning and science are pressing forward to do honor to him who was known and loved as a leader, I come, in the name of the Christian Church, and in the name of my Saviour, to place upon this casket a simple wreath of immortelles, forming, weaving the words, JOSEPH HENRY, THE CHRISTIAN."

Henry, Rev. Robert, a native of Scotland, was licensed by the Presbytery of New York; in 1752, was sent by the Synod to Virginia; in 1753, was ordained by the Presbytery of New Castle; and on June 4th, 1755, was installed as pastor of Cub Creek, in Charlotte county, Va., and Briary, in Prince Edward county, both then in Lunenburg county. Mr. Henry's success was most remarkable. He was a man of eccentric manners, but most devotedly pious. He was called to the Steel Creek Church, in North Carolina, in 1766, but never entered upon the charge, dying May 8th, 1767.

Henry, Thomas Charlton, D. D., was born in Philadelphia, September 22d, 1790. He graduated at Middlebury College, with high honor, in 1814. He commenced his preparation for the pulpit before the close of his college life, and immediately after his graduation entered the Seminary at Princeton, where he remained for two years. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 17th, 1816, but in October following was dismissed, to join the Presbytery of New Castle, by which he was subsequently ordained. For two successive years he performed gratuitously the work of a missionary. Several months of this period were passed at Lexington, Ky., where he had great popularity as a preacher. In November, 1818, he was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Columbia, S. C. In January, 1824, he became pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church in Charleston, S. C., and labored in this connection during the rest of his life. In 1827 the yellow fever prevailed extensively in Charleston, and Dr. Henry, feeling that it was his duty to remain with his flock as long as Providence might enable him to do so, was attacked with the disease. From the beginning of his sickness he manifested unqualified submission to the Divine will, and he conversed with his friends in the most comforting and even rapturous manner, testifying to the power of his Redeemer's love and grace, till he had reached the very end of the dark valley. He died October 4th, 1827.

From the time of his first appearance in the pulpit Dr. Henry took rank among the most popular preachers of the day. Besides having a finished elocution his discourses were written with great care, and were rich in evangelical, practical truth, expressed in a style of more than common force and beauty. It was evident to all that his ruling passion was to do good, and especially to be instrumental in saving the souls of his fellow men, a work in which he was greatly encouraged by the blessing of God upon his labors in Charleston. In addition to several sermons, he published a little volume on "Popular Amusements." His "Letters to an Anxious Inquirer," which possess great value, were passing through the press at the time of his decease.

Henry, Thomas Charlton, an elder in the First Presbyterian Church of Germantown, Pa., was born in Philadelphia, April 20th, 1828. He has been successively engaged in the dry goods, wool, and lumber trades. In October, 1871, in view of his wide reputation among business circles for integrity, financial skill and energy, he was elected the first active President of the Philadelphia Warehouse Company, which owes much of its success to his excellent management of its interests. He also faithfully fills the positions of a Director of the North American Insurance Company, and President of the Saving Fund Society of Germantown. Mr. Henry is an active supporter of the Church. By his consistent and agreeable character, he has won many admirers and warm personal friends. His private life has been an example of unobtrusive usefulness and benevolence.

Henry, William Wirt, was born February 14th, 1831, at Red Hill, in Charlotte county, Va. His parents were John Henry and Elvira McClelland. In October, 1847, he entered the University of Virginia, where he received the degree of Master of Arts in July, 1850. In 1853 he came to the Bar, having settled at the county seat of his native county. In 1855 he became a member of the Presbyterian Church, and was within a year placed in the eldership. He was sent as one of the representatives of his Presbytery, West Hanover, to the General Assembly which met in Rochester in 1860.

In 1873 Mr. Henry removed to the city of Richmond, and was soon afterwards elected an elder in the Second Presbyterian Church in that city. He has been placed by the General Assembly upon several of its committees, and has represented his city twice in the Legislature of the State, once as a member of the House of Delegates, and once as a member of the Senate.

Heroy, Rev. Peter Badeau, was born at Mahopac Falls, N. Y., July 16th, 1815; graduated at Lafayette College in 1841; for a time was a teacher; was ordained an evangelist by the Second Presbytery of New York, October 23d, 1845; was stated supply at Delhi, N. Y., 1845, and pastor, 1846-50; stated supply at Highland Falls, 1850; pastor, 1851-56; pastor of Second Church, Bridgeton, N. J., 1856-57, and of Bedford Church, New York, 1857-78. He died October 16th, 1878. Mr. Heroy's ministry was characterized especially by unceasing fidelity and great kindness. He was a loving friend and pastor to all his flock, and cared for their welfare with untiring zeal. All who knew him, and especially his co-Presbyters, felt, when he died, that a truly good man had fallen, and one who had made full proof of his ministry.

Herron, Francis, D.D., was born near Shippensburg, Cumberland county, Pa., June 28th, 1774. He belonged to that honored and honorable race, the Scotch-Irish, memorable in the history of the world, but especially in our country, for a thorough devotion to evangelical truth and constitutional liberty. He graduated at Dickinson College, May 5th, 1791; studied theology under Robert Cooper, D.D., his pastor, and was licensed by Carlisle Presbytery, October 4th, 1797.

He entered upon the service of his Divine Master as a missionary, going out into the backwoods, as it was then called, passing through Pittsburg, Pa., then a small village, and extending his tour as far West as Chillicothe, Ohio. Stopping for the night in a tavern at Six Mile Run, near Wilkinsburg, Pa., the people prevailed upon him to stay till the following Sabbath, which he did, and under the shade of an apple tree did this young disciple break the bread of life to the people. His journey was resumed the next day, and with a frontier settler for his guide, he pushed on to his destination, through an almost unbroken wilderness, his course often guided by the "blazes" upon the trees. Two nights he encamped with the Indians, who were quite numerous near what is now the town of Marietta, Ohio.

On his return from Chillicothe he visited Pittsburg. The keeper of the tavern where he lodged proved to be an old acquaintance, and at his request, he consented to preach. Notice was sent, and in the evening a small congregation of about eighteen persons assembled. The house he preached in was a rude structure, built of logs, occupying the site of the present First Presbyterian Church. And such was the primitive style of that day, that during the services the swallows, who had their nests in the eaves, flew among the congregation.

At this time the churches in that portion of our country were visited with a season of refreshing grace, and Mr. Herron entered into the revival with all the ardor of youth, filled with hopefulness and zeal. He preached for the Rev. Dr. John McMillan, at the Chartiers Church, during a revival season. He also preached at the Buffalo Church, where his fervid eloquence made a deep impression, and the people presented him a call, and strongly urged it upon his attention. He, however, concluded to return to the vicinity of his home, especially as a call from Rocky Spring was awaiting him. This call he accepted, and he was ordained and installed as pastor of that church, by Carlisle Presbytery, April 9th, 1800.

After a very successful pastorate of ten years at Rocky Spring, Mr. Herron was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Pittsburg, Pa., in June, 1811. Here he labored with great zeal and energy, and with remarkable success. In 1850, having reached his seventy-sixth year, he pressed his resignation upon his congregation, which they accepted, with the understanding that he would accept a thousand dollars per year for life. He died December 6th, 1860.

Dr. Herron was elected Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, at its session in Philadelphia, in 1827. He was a man of note, unbounded in his hospitalities, abundant in labors, and wielded an influence such as no other man exerted in the community in which he so long lived, among all classes of citizens, and among all denominations of Christians. His public spirit, and the wisdom of his counsels were acknowledged by all. His integrity of character and purity of motive were doubted by none. His sermons were scriptural, doctrinal, practical and pungent, full of the marrow of the gospel, and delivered with convincing earnestness. As a pastor he was deeply interested in the welfare of his flock. He trained a most efficient eldership, and taught his people, both from the pulpit and by his own example, the pressing claims of Christian benevolence, so that his church took rank with the most liberal in the land. Missionary operations in the West found in him a warm friend and an earnest advocate. And the Western Foreign Missionary Society, from which our Foreign Missionary Board sprang, and from the beginning of which the Board should date its origin, received his hearty and effective co-operation. Foreign missions and missionaries had a prominent place in his large and honest heart.

For many years Dr. Herron was an active Trustee of Jefferson College. And the Western Theological Seminary, of whose Board of Directors he was long the faithful President, with its Professors and students, was to him, from its origin, a subject of heartfelt and prayerful solicitude. In the darkest hour he never yielded to despair, but always spoke the cheering word, opened the liberal hand, and rallied his own people to the rescue. And in the day of its final success none rejoiced more heartily than he. He loved young men, especially candidates for the holy ministry. No worthy student of theology ever went to him for advice or assistance without receiving it.

Herron, Rev. John, was born at Ridge Church, Harrison county, Ohio, July 19th, 1851. He pursued his college studies in Washington and Jefferson and Lafayette; graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary, in 1876; spent the following year in evangelistic work in Ohio and Michigan, and was licensed to preach, by the Presbytery of Steubenville, April 28th, 1875, and ordained by the Presbytery of Lake Superior, November 8th, 1876. He received a call to the Church in Atlantic, Iowa, in July, 1877, and after a few months was installed its pastor. Here his ministry has been largely blessed. He is an able preacher. Energetic, patient, abundant in labors, original in methods, pleasing in address, studious in habit, and of single and intense purpose, he is an efficient keeper of the trust committed to him. He is a favorite orator on popular occasions. Several of his sermons, orations and addresses have been published.

Herron, Robert, D. D., was born April 10th, 1817, in Washington county, Pa. He graduated at Muskingum College, Ohio, in 1845; at Allegheny Seminary, in 1847, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Washington, October 4th, of the same year. A little later he became assistant to the Rev. John Rea, D. D., pastor of Beech Spring Church, Harrison county, O. December 13th, 1848, he was installed pastor of Ridge Church, Harrison county, O. Until January 1st, 1861, he ministered, too, as stated supply for one-third of his time to the neighboring Church of Centre Unity. From that date to 1874 he occupied his entire time with the Ridge Church. Then, closing a period of twenty-six years, he surrendered his charge. April 1st, 1876, after two years in a sick room, he undertook to preach for the Church of Pleasant Hill, in the Presbytery of Steubenville, and continued in that engagement until December, 1878, when he was again prostrated by illness, and accepted his ministry as ended.

Dr. Herron was intellectually vigorous, and of a generous heart. He was an able theologian, an excellent preacher, a faithful pastor, an accomplished debater in ecclesiastical assemblies, and an admirable organizer. He was for twelve years Stated Clerk of the Presbytery of Steubenville, and for fifteen years a Trustee of Washington College, Pa., and of Washington and Jefferson College, its successor. Ridge Church, during his ministry, grew into a large, prosperous congregation. Seven young men went out from his pastoral care into the Presbyterian ministry.

Hewitt, Rev. J. D., was born in Wysox, Bradford county, Pa., December 4th, 1838. He graduated at Princeton College in 1865, and for two years was Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science in the Susquehanna Collegiate Institute, Towanda, Pa. He studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Susquehanna in 1869. In 1870 he was installed the first pastor of the Kirkpatrick Memorial Church, Ringoes, N. J., and during his pastorate of seven years there were frequent revivals, and large numbers were gathered into the church. In 1877 he went, under the Home Missionary Board, to Helena, Montana. During the two years that he was there the church, from depending on the Board for almost its entire support, became self-sustaining. By earnest solicitation he accepted from Presbytery the appointment of Superintendent of Missions for Montana. But as, after consultation with the Secretaries of the Board, it was not found good policy at that time to sustain Presbyterian Missionaries in the far West, Mr. Hewitt felt free to accept, in June, 1879, an invitation to Wichita, Kansas, his present field of labor, which he is cultivating with diligence and success.

Hewitt, Nathanael, D. D., was born in New London, Conn., August 28th, 1788, and graduated at Yale College in 1808. He studied theology at Andover Seminary, and was licensed by the New London Congregational Association, September 11th, 1811. He became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Plattsburg, N. Y., in July, 1815. In 1820 he accepted the pastorate of the Congregational Church in Fairfield, Conn. In 1830 he took charge of the Second Congregational Church in Bridgeport, Conn., resigning it in 1853. The First Presbyterian Church of that place was formed by a large number of his friends, and he became pastor of it, and continued so until his death, February 3d, 1867. During Dr. Hewitt's ministry, of more than fifty years, he maintained, unblemished, the character of a virtuous and godly man, an eloquent and instructive preacher of the whole counsel of God, and a fearless defender of the faith once delivered to the saints. His exertions as one of the pioneers of the Temperance Reform were, by the divine blessing, signally successful. No man in our country did more to brand indelibly with the stigma of merited disgrace the traffic in ardent spirits, and their use as a beverage, than Nathanael Hewitt, the "Apostle of Temperance."

Hibbard, Hon. Homer Nash, LL. D., the son of Samuel and Edith (Nash) Hibbard, was born in Bethel, Vt., November 7th, 1821. His education was obtained, by his own efforts, in the University of Vermont, class of 1850, and the Harvard Law School, class of 1853. He practiced law one year in Chicago, and six years in Freeport, Ill. Here he held the offices of President of the Board of Education, Master in Chancery and City Attorney. Since 1860 he has practiced law in Chicago, being, since 1869, Register in Bankruptcy of the United States Court. He is, or has been, connected with the management of the Academy of Sciences, the Astronomical Society, the Academy of Fine Arts, the Prisoners' Aid Association, various public movements and insurance and banking companies. A Trustee of the University of Vermont, he was for some years President of its Alumni Association. He is a Trustee of Lake Forest University, and Lecturer to the University, on "The Law, in its Relations to Business and Professional Life." He has resided in the suburb of Hyde Park since 1860, being President of the Board of Education and identified with all local interests. A member of the Church since 1850, he has been Elder, Trustee, Chairman of the Building Committee, and Superintendent of the Sabbath School in the Hyde Park Church. He was a Commissioner to the General Assembly of 1883 and is a member of the Assembly's Board of Aid for Colleges and Academies. Mr. Hibbard has a large and commanding presence, clear and humorous thought, a tender and strong heart, a courteous and kindly bearing, is interested in all means of doing good to men, and is every way, and always willingly, useful in the Church of Christ.

HON. HOMER NASH HIBBARD, LL. D.

Hibben, Rev. Samuel, the son of Samuel E. and Margaret (Galloway) Hibben, was born in Hillsborough, Ohio, January 31st, 1831. He received his collegiate education at Hanover, Indiana, then at Miami University, Ohio, where he graduated with the highest honors. He graduated at the Theological Seminary at Danville, Ky., in 1858. In the same year he took charge of the churches of Mount Leigh, Winchester, and Eckmansville, in Southern Ohio, burning with zeal and indefatigable in the discharge of his pastoral work. In the short space of two years more than eighty precious souls, through his instrumentality were gathered into the fold. The leadings of Providence directing him to Peoria, Ill.; he accepted a call to the Second Presbyterian Church of that city. There, "for the space of three years, he ceased not to warn every one, night and day, with tears," and again experienced that God is faithful to His promise, proving that they who sow in tears shall reap in joy. June 10th, 1872, his earthly labors closed, and he entered upon his reward.

Mr. Hibben was a man highly gifted of God. In intellectual endowments he had few equals among the young men of our ministry. In the power of a ready and clear apprehension of truth, in strength of memory, and in fertility of imagination, he had few superiors. His social qualities were not inferior to his intellectual; the suavity of his manners, the brilliancy of his conversation, and the manifest kindness of his heart, gave him a ready and strong hold upon the affections of those with whom he mingled in social intercourse. As a preacher, he was always instructive and often powerful and eloquent; but his piety was the crowning glory of his life. He loved God supremely, and his brethren with a pure heart, fervently. Christ was "all and in all" to him in his experience, his conversation, his ministry. "For him to live was Christ, and to die was gain."

Highland University, Kansas. This is the only established working Christian college belonging to the Presbyterian Church in Kansas, or west of the Missouri river and east of the Sierra Nevada mountains. It was chartered by the Territorial Legislature in the year 1858. Its history is interesting and worthy of record.

In the year 1837 the Presbyterian Church, through its Board of Foreign Missions, planted a mission station among the Iowa and Sac Indians, who at that time occupied the country and ground where the college now stands. When the mission was commenced the Indians and missionaries had the most positive assurance that this land west of the Missouri river should be the Indians' home forever. This promise was well kept, and the missionaries were blessed in their work, till the year 1854, when the Kansas and Nebraska bill passed Congress, and the country was opened to the whites. As soon as this bill passed the missionaries became thoughtful as to how they could best prepare for the coming white people, who evidently were soon to have possession. The conclusion was reached that to plant a Christian college, where the Bible and Christianity should be the "chief corner-stone," would be a plant that might bring forth fruit for coming generations. This was before the fortieth parallel of latitude was run or State lines established. When these lines were run the spot where the institution now stands was found to be very near the fortieth parallel, and though in Kansas, was in sight of Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska, and near enough to accommodate either or all of these States.

As soon as the Territorial Legislature of Kansas was ready to act, a liberal charter was obtained. Among the original corporate members we find the names of the Rev. C. Van Rensselaer, D. D., of Philadelphia, the Secretary of the Board of Education, and Hon. Walter Lowrie, so long the honored Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions. These names are a "tower of strength," and, of themselves, give character to the Institution. Walter Lowrie himself, while visiting the Indian missions, often passed over these grounds, giving advice and encouragement; and it was on these beautiful grounds that he said, "If we let this Institution fail, we should take the name Presbyterian away from our Church." Dr. Van Rensselaer, too, was a warm friend and patron of the Institution, and the Church has now come to his broad views, so clearly advocated in his life, in favor of organized effort for planting and endowing Christian colleges. That great man, though dead, yet speaks, through this Institution; and this may explain, at least in part, why it is that the Fifth Section of the Charter secures the control of it forever to the General Assembly. It is in these words: "Section 5. If at any time the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the United States should see fit to take the charge and oversight of the affairs of this corporation, they shall, and hereby have full power to do so, by appointing, in part or in full, a Board of Trustees, who shall have full right and power to go forward with the business of this corporation, according to the provisions of this Charter."

Under this charter the Institution has been in successful operation over twenty-five years, and through all the vicissitudes of the civil war and the changes common to a new country it has not missed a single day of school since its commencement, in 1856. Of course it was impracticable if not impossible to commence with a full college curriculum; the country was new and uninhabited. It was commenced with a little primary school in a "log cabin." This soon gave place to a good frame building, and it became a Presbyterian Academy under the care of Highland Presbytery. The next step was a good brick building, with chapel, recitation, chemical and library rooms, and the Institution was taken under the care of the Synod of Kansas. It was not until the year 1869 that a full course of classical and college instruction was fully adopted. Since that time a full course of instruction has been kept up.

The financial history of the Institution is a matter of some interest. To commence a work of this magnitude in a country so new, and one really without inhabitants, was a task which required both faith and works. Notwithstanding we find that, with God's blessing on the effort, in the year 1869, just at the union of the two branches of the Church, the buildings, property and investments, above and beyond all liabilities, were worth $51,927.03. This was the conclusion of an able committee.

The year of the union, or what is sometimes called "Memorial Year" (1870), an attempt was made at sudden and expensive enlargement. A loan of money was obtained, that involved a debt of $10,000, at ten per cent. interest per annum. A President was employed, at a salary of $2000 per year, and a full corps of professors engaged, at comfortable salaries; new buildings and improvements were undertaken, which drew upon the funds; but memorial contributions failed to come in, as was expected; President and Professors drew more from the funds of the Board than they were able to bring in; balances accumulated on the wrong side, until the year 1879, when it was found that much of the original investments was gone, and a debt of over $18,000 was resting on the Institution. In that year, however, by a vigorous effort on the part of its friends, and very liberal concessions on the part of its creditors, the entire debt was wiped out. No debt has accumulated since, and the Institution is now estimated, by a competent committee, to be worth $22,100.

The literary, moral and spiritual history has been more satisfactory, and is itself compensation for all of money and labor that has been given. From the quarter centennial report of the Alumni of the college, just published, we learn that sixteen ministers, nine lawyers, five physicians, five professors, besides a very large number of teachers, both male and female, have been graduated or in part helped in their literary course by this Institution; and, so far as is known, all the students of the school are doing well. During the year just closed, there have been in attendance 118 students, with three Professors and one Tutor.

During the past winter it has pleased God to visit the Institution and vicinity with a very precious revival of religion. It is believed by those most intimately connected with the work, that over sixty persons experienced a change of heart within its walls, a large majority of whom were students of the university.

The influence of this good work is felt in many ways. A wealthy gentleman of the town has offered himself to endow the chair of mathematics with the sum of $20,000, provided the citizens of the village and vicinity will endow the first chair with a like sum, and it is now believed these conditions can and will be met, which, with the property on hand, history and experience, must be of value to the Church and the world.

Hill, Professor Cornelius H., son of William R. and Sarah A. (Simmons) Hill, was born in Milton, N. C., September 2nd, 1830. He was educated in a preparatory school at Milton and a classical Institution in Granville county, N. C. For three years he was a merchant in Milton, N. C., and Richmond, Va. In December, 1860, he accepted a Professorship in the North Carolina Institution for Mutes and Blind, at Raleigh, and held it until 1865. In 1865 he became Principal of an academy in Danville, Va., where he remained one year. He then joined his brother, Rev. H. G. Hill, in conducting an academy at Hillsboro, N. C., and at the same time read law. In December, 1866, he again accepted a Professorship in the North Carolina Institution for Mutes and Blind, at Raleigh, and held it for nearly two years. From January, 1869, to June, 1870, he taught a special school in Tunica county, Mississippi. In September, 1870, he accepted a Professorship in the Maryland School for Deaf and Dumb, at Frederick City, Md., which position he now holds. In December, 1873, he was elected Principal of the West Virginia Institution for Deaf and Dumb, but declined. In 1862 he was ordained deacon of the First Presbyterian Church in Raleigh, N. C., Rev. Joseph M. Atkinson, D. D., pastor; and in January, 1872, he was elected and ordained a ruling elder of the Presbyterian Church in Frederick City, Maryland.

Professor Hill is a gentleman of kind spirit, cultivated manner and winning address. As a Professor, he is characterized by great patience and thoroughness in his instructions, and he has met with marked success. As an elder, he is able and efficient, and well informed in the doctrines, government and history of the Presbyterian Church. He takes an active part in the meetings of the church, especially in the prayer meetings.

Hill, Rev. George, was born in York county, Pa., March 13th, 1764, and when about nineteen years of age, removed with his father and family to Fayette county. His literary studies were prosecuted chiefly under the direction of the Rev. James Dunlap; his theological studies probably under the Rev. Jacob Jennings; and he was licensed, by the Presbytery of Redstone, to preach the gospel, December 22^d, 1791.

On November 13th, 1792, he was installed pastor of the united congregations of Fairfield, Donegal and Wheatfield. On April 11th, 1798, he resigned his charge of Wheatfield, and a new congregation, called Ligonier, having been formed between Donegal and Fairfield, he continued to labor in these three last named churches until the time of his death, June 9th, 1822.

Mr. Hill was a faithful and laborious pastor, and exposed himself frequently to considerable danger in fulfilling his engagements on the Sabbath. Having to cross the Conemaugh, in going to one of his places of preaching, he was known, in times of high water, to swim the river on horseback, preach in his wet clothes, recross the river, and return to his own house—a distance of ten miles—the same day. Such, however, was the vigor of his constitution, that he suffered no injury from it. He was a man of great sensibility, exceedingly modest and humble in his deportment. When duty required, however, that he should take decided ground, and appear in the defence of the truth, he showed himself to be equal to the crisis, and displayed much firmness of character, as well as acuteness of intellect.

Hill, Rev. George, D. D., was the son of John and Jane (Moorhead) Hill, and was born in Ligonier Valley, Westmoreland county, Pa., September 18th, 1815. He graduated at Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa., in 1837, and at the Western Theological Seminary in 1840. He was invited to preach at Blairsville and Salem, and did so, as health permitted, until December 14th, 1841, when he was ordained and installed, by the Presbytery of Blairsville, as co-pastor with the Rev. Thomas Davis, who had labored alone in this large field for seventeen years. This relation was very harmonious, and lasted till the death of Mr. Davis, May 28th, 1848. In October of the same year Mr. Hill was released from Salem, and gave all his time to Blairsville, where he still labors. In 1850 he founded Blairsville Female Seminary. Under the efficient care of Rev. T. R. Ewing, this school is doing excellent service for Christian education. In 1847 or 1848, Mr. Hill was elected a director of the Western Theological Seminary; in 1870, first Vice-President of the Board, and in 1883, President, in the room of the lamented Dr. C. C. Beatty. In 1861 he was Moderator of the Synod of Pittsburg, and he is a member of the General Assembly's special committee on the relations of the Board of Home Missions to the Presbyteries.

Dr. Hill is an earnest, humble Christian, sincere, straightforward, and hating shams and double dealing; sometimes despondent, on account of ill health, but usually cheerful, and very social with those with whom he is acquainted. He is thoroughly orthodox, and a Presbyterian from the deepest convictions of his nature. His mind is vigorous and well-informed, his thought clear and his utterance forcible. He gives no uncertain sound. He is a faithful pastor, an instructive, interesting and eloquent preacher, and fearless in the expression of his views. He has few superiors as a presbyter and is no mean antagonist in debate. On the thirtieth anniversary of his pastorate the ladies of his congregation and the brethren of the Presbytery of Blairsville gave him valuable tokens of their affectionate regard, and in 1883 the young ladies of his church remembered him in a similar way.

Hill, Halbert G., D. D., the son of William R. and L. A. Hill, was born in Raleigh, N. C., November 20th, 1831. He went to school in Milton, N. C., till he was thirteen years old; then clerked in a store till he was twenty-one. After teaching a while and preparing himself for college, he entered Hampden-Sidney College, in Virginia, in 1854, whence he was graduated in 1857. He then became Principal of a female seminary in Clarksville, Va., and continued teaching till the Fall of 1861, when he entered Union Theological Seminary, in Virginia. He was received under its care by Orange Presbytery, in October, 1860, and was licensed by the same at Ashboro, in April, 1862. In the Fall of 1863 he took charge of Hillsboro and Grier's churches, and was ordained and installed at Hillsboro, June 11th, 1861. In December, 1866, he took charge of a female seminary in Oxford, N. C., and preached in the Oxford and Grassy Creek churches. While here he took steps that led to the establishment of a church at Henderson. In March, 1868, he became pastor of the Church of Fayetteville, in Fayetteville Presbytery, where he still remains.

Dr. Hill has held many ecclesiastical offices, such as Moderator of Presbytery and Synod, Synodical Agent of Home Missions, and Director in Union Theological Seminary. Wielding the pen of a ready writer, he has furnished for the press "A Prize Essay," several tracts, and many contributions to the secular and religious papers. He was for a time editor of the North Carolina Presbyterian.

Dr. Hill is a fluent extempore speaker, a ready debater, and an earnest, glowing preacher of the gospel, an enterprising leader in our Church courts, having a thorough and practical knowledge of affairs, and fruitful in every good word and work. In the full prime of physical and intellectual vigor, there lies before him the prospect of many years of successful labor for the cause of Christ.

Hill, William, D. D., the son of Joseph and Joanna (Read) Hill, was born in Cumberland county, Va., March 3d, 1769. He graduated at Hampden-Sidney College in 1788; shortly after commenced the study of theology, under the direction of President Smith, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Hanover, July 10th, 1790. For two years immediately succeeding his licensure he acted as a missionary, under the commission of Synod, in the lower counties of Virginia, as far down as the Chesapeake Bay, and through the upper counties to the Blue Ridge, from Tennessee to Maryland, and especially in the counties in the lower part of the Valley. He then settled in Berkeley (now Jefferson) county, Va., where his labors, though prosecuted amidst many discouragements, were marked by great vigor and boldness, and were followed by highly important results. In 1800 he took charge of the Presbyterian Church in Winchester, where his influence was widely and powerfully felt. In 1834 he became pastor of the Briery Presbyterian Church, in Prince Edward county, where he remained two years, and then accepted the pastorate of the Second Presbyterian Church, Alexandria, which, by reason of growing infirmities, he resigned in two years. He died in Winchester, November 16th, 1852. Dr. Hill's piety was based upon fixed principles. He was highly gifted with the social graces, and real pleasantness and suavity of manners. He possessed an intellect of great clearness and vigor. He was a man of great firmness of purpose. As a preacher he was clear, energetic and impressive. He was conspicuous as a member of the judicatories of the Church. His sixty-six years of service in the cause of the Saviour were years of full devotion of both his intellect and heart to Him who redeemed him with His own blood.

Hill, William Wallace, D. D., was born in Bath county, Ky., January 26th, 1815. He graduated at Centre College, Ky., in 1835; studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, April 24th, 1838. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Louisville, October 3d, 1838, and the same day installed as pastor at Shelbyville, Ky. He served this church faithfully, and was greatly beloved by it; but, after a few years, his voice and his health failed, and he was released from his charge, September 13th, 1842. He then took the editorial charge of The Protestant and Herald, at that time published in Bardstown, Ky., afterwards removing it to Frankfort, Ky., and again, in November, 1844, removing it to Louisville, Ky., where its name was changed to The Presbyterian Herald. His career as an editor continued until 1862, and was eminently successful and useful. Cut off from his subscribers by the war, he felt compelled to discontinue the paper.

From 1845 to 1860 Dr. Hill was also Corresponding Secretary of the Western Executive Committee of the Board of Domestic Missions, and rendered much valuable service to the Church in that position. He then founded Bellewood Female Seminary, about twelve miles from Louisville, and continued to be its honored and beloved Principal, from 1862 to 1874. During these years he also preached more or less regularly as stated supply at Plumb Creek, in 1848; at Middletown, from 1853 to 1872; and at Anchorage, from 1872 to 1874. In 1874 he accepted the charge of the Synodical Female College, at Fulton, Mo., engaging also to supply the Presbyterian Church at Fulton. Under the joint labors of himself and Dr.

Fisher, there was at Fulton one of the most wonderful works of grace ever seen in that region. In 1877 he removed to Sherman, Texas, where he commenced teaching in Austin College, at the same time preaching to the church. His health soon broke down, and he returned to Fulton, where he died, May 1st, 1878, in the sixty-fourth year of his age. In dying, he was conscious, calm, and peaceful in mind.

Few better, purer, more devoted, more frank and sincere men than Dr. Hill have ever lived. He possessed a clear intellect, fine conversational powers, a warm heart and sound judgment. He was tenderly loved wherever he was known.

Hillhouse, Rev. James, from Pendleton District, South Carolina, settled at Greensborough, Greene county, Ala., in 1822, where he labored for many years, with the zeal and energy of an apostle. He organized the church in that place, and also that of Carmel, Fairview, Marion, and Cedar Grove. He was an unusually popular and effective preacher. His command of language was remarkable, and his feelings were easily excited. No man was more abundant in labors, and none ever labored more cheerfully. It was the joy of his heart to spend and be spent in the cause of Christ. His appeals to the church and to the world were truly powerful, and for years, under God, his was the controlling mind in all the meetings in which he participated. He died at Greensborough, November 17th, 1835.

Historical Society, Presbyterian. The origination of the Presbyterian Historical Society was due to the intelligence, zeal and liberality of one man, Mr. Samuel Agnew, for many years a ruling elder in the Second Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. Being a man of means, Mr. Agnew, for many years, eagerly laid hands upon any choice work that came under his notice and within his reach, bearing upon the subject upon which his heart was set. If he saw an advertisement of a library sale in New York, Boston, Cleveland or Cincinnati, he at once took rail for the spot, and secured, often at large cost, the object he desired. Not unfrequently, to obtain one desiderated volume, he would purchase the whole package in which it lay hidden. Should a sale be advertised in London, Edinburgh or Glasgow, Mr. Agnew, through his agent, who was always under instruction, made sure for his collection of any coveted work.

At length, at his instance, a society was formed, a Board of Trustees elected, a charter of incorporation obtained, the treasures in his possession passed over to their custody, and the interest of Presbyterians throughout the land awakened in the enterprise. The supreme judicatories of all the Presbyterian bodies in the country, North and South, have again and again commended this library to the attention and liberality of the people. The result is a collection of about twelve thousand volumes, of some of which no duplicates exist; about thirty-five thousand pamphlets, magazines and reviews; between three hundred and four hundred volumes of newspapers; many rare manuscripts; portraits of distinguished ministers and ruling elders, pictures of church edifices, some of them hallowed by scenes of revival-awakening in other days, and other precious memorials of by-gone times. In anticipation of the Centennial year, an effort was made to secure the preaching and remission to the Society of historical sermons from as many ministers as possible, and somewhere near a thousand histories of individual churches in every part of the land came to the library. And, as not unfrequently, in this country, the history of a church is to a great extent the history of the community with which it grew up, the amount of historical matter embraced in these sermons is very large and very valuable. Donations to this collection reach the Society from all parts of the world, even from far-off China. Very valuable gifts have been received from the Rev. John McNaughton, of Belfast, Ireland.

For many years these precious treasures were stored here and there, in lofts and cellars, where they were every hour exposed to injury from various causes, to loss by theft and destruction by fire. At last money was raised, largely through the personal self-denying efforts of the venerable George W. Musgrave, D. D., and a fireproof building erected at a central point in the city of Philadelphia, where the collection is as secure as man can make it. The Society is now in condition to receive and keep in safety the records of churches and Church judicatories, and any other historical matter of value. In past years records and documents of incalculable worth have been irretrievably lost, for want of some secure place of deposit.

The Board of Trustees meet every month, and push forward measures for the furthering of the work in hand. Occasional lectures are delivered before the Society, by distinguished men in the Church, and thus much valuable matter is obtained. Among those who have favored the Society in this way have been Albert Barnes, Dr. Charles Hodge, Professor Archibald Alexander Hodge, Dr. John Hall, Dr. S. Irenaeus Prime, and Professor James C. Moffat. When the full scheme of the Society shall be realized, it will have not only the library and museum, but an endowment fund which will enable it to secure regular courses of lectures, and to add constantly to its collection, which is destined to become one of the largest and most valuable in the country. Here the toiling historian will find ready to his hand the material he needs with which to instruct the Church, stimulate its zeal, and fire the enthusiasm of Presbyterians in the propagation of their principles, and in serving their Divine Master.

The house of the Historical Society has a front of forty feet, and on one side it reaches the full length of the lot, one hundred feet. It has thirteen rooms.

nine of which are occupied by the Society. The fireproof portion is twenty feet front, and eighteen feet deep. The walls are lined with portraits of distinguished Presbyterians, Dr. Chalmers, Dr. Duff, Dr. Archibald Alexander, Dr. William Adams and many others. One year brought in two hundred and ninety-three historical and memorial discourses. Another year six hundred church histories, twenty histories of Presbyteries and Synods. Another year the Society received more than eleven hundred volumes, among them sixty-five volumes of the acts of the Free Church of Scotland, and a box of books of standard value from the Rev. John McNaughton, of Belfast.

The aim of the Society is to gather within reach, and make accessible to all, the whole story of what God has done and is doing through the Presbyterian Church, for the weal of the world and the glory of his name.

The original corporate members of this Society were David Elliott, William M. Engles, W. R. DeWitt, Albert Barnes, George H. Stuart, J. B. Dales, J. T. Cooper, James Hoge, Charles Hodge, Samuel Hazzard, Samuel Agnew, Robert J. Breckinridge, William Chester, George Howe, William B. Sprague, Henry A. Boardman, C. Van Rensselaer, John C. Backus, John Leyburn, William S. Martien, Alfred Nevin, Thomas H. Skinner, John A. Brown, Samuel H. Cox, Peter Force, Edwin F. Hatfield, George Duffield, George Duffield, Jr., Henry B. Smith, Matthew W. Baldwin, Henry J. Williams, B. J. Wallace, J. N. McLeod, John Forsyth, James Wood, Thomas Beveridge, James M. Wilson, T. W. J. Wylie, S. J. Wylie, Thomas Smyth, M. L. P. Thompson, and J. F. Stearnes.

Hitchcock, Henry L., D.D., was born at Benton, O., October 31st, 1813. His father, Peter Hitchcock, who settled in Northern Ohio in 1806, was Judge of the Supreme Court of the State for twenty-eight years. He also held other important public positions at different times, as member of the State Legislature and of the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States. Dr. Hitchcock received his academic education at Benton Academy. In September, 1829, he entered the Sophomore Class of Yale College, and graduated in 1832. For two years after graduating he taught in Benton Academy. He then spent one year in theological studies, reciting to his pastor, the Rev. Dexter Witter, after which he was a student in Lane Theological Seminary. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Grand River, July 25th, 1837. He was ordained and installed by the same Presbytery over the Church of Morgan, O., November 29th, 1837. In June, 1840, he was dismissed from this charge to accept a call from the Second Presbyterian Church of Columbus, O., which had then been organized a little more than one year. Dr. Hitchcock commenced preaching in Columbus, July, 1840, and was installed pastor of the church November 24th, 1841, by the Presbytery of Marion (afterwards Franklin). In this charge he remained fifteen years, during which the church became strong and influential, and the Third Church of Columbus was organized from its membership. This church afterwards became Congregational, and is now a large and useful church. Dr. Hitchcock became President of Western Reserve College, Hudson, O., in July, 1855, in which position, in addition to the duties of the Presidency, he was pastor of the College Church, which, under his ministry, recovered from its depression, and attained a good degree of prosperity. He died July 6th, 1873, at Hudson, O.

Hodge, Archibald Alexander, D. D., LL. D., the eldest son of Dr. Charles Hodge, was born at Princeton, N. J., in July, 1823. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1841, and after being Tutor for a year, he entered the Princeton Theological Seminary. On leaving the Seminary he was ordained as a missionary; sailed for India in August, 1847, and was stationed at Allahabad two years, but, owing to the ill-health of his wife, he returned, in May, 1850. In 1851 he accepted the charge of the Church of Lower West Nottingham, Maryland, and in the Fall of 1855 resigned this pastorate for that of Fredericksburg, Va. While here he composed his "Outlines of Theology," which was published in 1860, and has been republished in 1878 in a new and much enlarged edition; has been republished in Great Britain, and translated into Welsh, modern Greek and Hindustani. In 1861 he became pastor of the Church at Wilkesbarre, Pa., where he was greatly beloved, and eminently useful.

In May, 1861, Dr. Hodge was elected, by the General Assembly, to the Chair of Didactic, Historical and Polemic Theology, in the Western Theological Seminary, and he removed to Allegheny City in the Fall. In 1867 he published his work on "The Atonement," and in 1869 his "Commentary on the Confession of Faith." In 1877 he was elected Associate Professor of Theology in Princeton Seminary, and in 1878, Professor of Didactic and Polemic Theology in the same Seminary, which position he now holds. Dr. Hodge is justly distinguished for his vast and varied scholarship. As a preacher, he is always listened to with pleasure and profit. His sermons are rich with Bible truth, logically constructed, clothed in captivating language, delivered with solemnity, and addressed with no less earnestness to the heart than to the intellect. The works which he has given to the public are all characterized by marked ability, orthodoxy and vigor of style, and, whilst indicating thorough erudition and profound research, are peculiarly adapted to interest and instruct the popular mind. As a Professor, he fully meets the demands of the position, by his masterly treatment of the great themes assigned to his department of instruction.

Hodge, Charles, D. D., LL. D., was born in Philadelphia, December 28th, 1797. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1815; entered Princeton Seminary in November, 1816, and remained in the Institution for a full three years' course. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, October 21st, 1819, and during the Winter of 1819-20 preached regularly at the Falls of Schuylkill, the Philadelphia Arsenal, and Woodbury, N. J. In May, 1820, he was appointed Assistant Instructor in the Original Languages of Scripture, in Princeton Seminary, which position he held until 1822. He became a member of the Presbytery of New Brunswick, July 5th, 1820, and continued as such all the remainder of his life. Under appointment of Presbytery, in 1820, he supplied the churches of Georgetown and Lambertville for a season, and Lambertville and Trenton, First Church (now Ewing Church), during parts of the years 1820-23. He was ordained sine titulo at Trenton, November 28th, 1821.

Dr. Hodge's connection with the Seminary continued to the end of his life. In May, 1822, he was elected by the General Assembly to the Professorship of Oriental and Biblical Literature; in May, 1840, to that of Exegetical and Didactic Theology, and after 1854, was added to these, Polemic Theology. In 1846 he was elected Moderator of the General Assembly. In 1825 he commenced the Biblical Repository. The same year he went to Europe, and spent three years in the universities of Paris, Halle, and Berlin. During his absence the Repository was under the direction of Professor Robert Patton, then connected with the College of New Jersey. In 1829, the name of the work was changed to The Biblical Repository and Princeton Review, and its scope was greatly widened. It soon became a mighty power in the Presbyterian Church, and continued such until the close of its editor's life.

Dr. Hodge was a voluminous writer, and from the beginning to the end of his theological career his pen was never idle. In 1835 he published his "Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans," his greatest exegetical work, and one of the most masterly commentaries on this Epistle that has ever been written. Other works followed, at intervals of longer or shorter duration—"Constitutional History of the Presbyterian Church in the United States," 1840; "Way of Life, 1841; republished in England, translated into other languages, and circulated to the extent of thirty-five thousand copies in America; "Commentary on Ephesians," 1856; on "First Corinthians," 1857; on "Second Corinthians," 1859. His magnum opus is the "Systematic Theology" (1871-73), of three vols. 8vo, and extending to 2260 pages. His last book, "What is Darwinism?" appeared in 1874. In addition to all this, it must be remembered that he contributed upwards of one hundred and thirty articles to the Princeton Review, many of which, besides exerting a powerful influence at the time of their publication, have since been gathered into volumes, and as "Princeton Essays," "Hodge's Essays" (1857), and "Hodge's Discussions in Church Polity" (editor Rev. William Durant, 1878), have taken a permanent place in our theological literature.

On the 23d of April, 1872, the fiftieth anniversary of Dr. Hodge's election as Professor, there was observed in Princeton a semi-centennial commemoration or jubilee. Four hundred of his former students enrolled themselves as having come up from every part of the land to pay their respects to their aged Professor. The Faculties of all the Presbyterian Theological Seminaries, and several of those belonging to the Episcopal, Methodist, Congregational, Lutheran and Reformed churches were represented. All branches of the Presbyterian churches of Great Britain and Ireland saluted him, by letter or representative, with expressions of their respect, confidence and love. Episcopal bishops, venerable professors, and pastors of all communions sent him congratulatory addresses. Dr. Joseph T. Duryea, then of Brooklyn, delivered an oration on "Theology as a Science." Dr. H. A. Boardman, of Philadelphia, delivered to Dr. Hodge, in the name of the Directors and Alumni of the Institution, a congratulatory address.

Dr. Hodge died June 19th, 1878, in his eighty-first year; his nervous system exhausted, his physical life ran gently out, while his mind was as clear and his spirit as free and strong as ever. He died with all his family around him, as the setting sun glorifying the lower heavens, with the peaceful brightness of his faith and love. To a weeping daughter he said, "Dearest, don't weep. To be absent from the body is to be with the Lord. To be with the Lord is to see Him. To see the Lord is to be like Him."

As a man, in all the manifestations of his inward life in his family, and with his intimate friends, Dr. Hodge was a Christian of the type of John. He was reverent, tender, joyous, full of faith and hope and love. He spontaneously cast off whatever tended to depress him, and always looked on the bright side of things. When he looked Godward his attitude was adoring love; when he looked manward his face radiated benevolence.

As a teacher he had great power, which resulted in part from his character and the reverence that excited, partly from the fullness of his knowledge and the clearness of his statements, and partly from his method. He possessed an almost perfect skill in practicing the Socratic method, in eliciting thought, and leading to conclusions by questions. He stimulated thought, and taught his students how to use their faculties, and brought them to fixed convictions through personal experience of the truth, and its relation to the conscience and the life.

As a preacher, Dr. Hodge was instructive and edifying. His sermons were elaborate expositions of some fundamental doctrine of the gospel, often exhibited on the side of experience and practice. He read them quietly, without gesture, but with great solemnity and tenderness of tone and manner.

As a controversialist, for forty-five years, he was characterized by entire fairness, great clearness of style, thoroughly logical arrangement of material, and consequent development of the principles adopted; by absolute fidelity to truth as he conceived it, and devotion to its maintenance, for the glory of Christ and the good of souls, without a shadow of a thought as to the approbation or offence of men. Yet, though firm and decided in his views, and always ready to defend them, he was devoid of all personal animosities.

In all these relations and functions, Dr. Hodge's distinguishing attributes were great tenderness and strength of emotion, and power of exciting it in others; an habitual adoring love for Christ, and absolute submission of his mind and will to His Word; a chivalrous disposition to maintain, against all odds, and with unvarying consistency, through all the years of a long life, the truth as he knew it; crystalline clearness of thought and expression, and an unsurpassed logical power of analysis, and of grasping and exhibiting all truths in their relations. As he sat every Sabbath afternoon in the Conference of students and Professors, he spoke on all questions of experimental and practical religion; freely, without paper, in language and with illustrations suggested by the moment. The matter presented was a clear analysis of the Scriptural passage or theme, doctrinal or practical, chosen for the occasion, an exhaustive statement and clear illustration of the subject, a development of each doctrine on the side of experience and duty, and a demonstration of the practical character of all doctrine, and of the doctrinal basis of all genuine religious experience and practice. As to the manner, the entire discourse was in the highest degree earnest, fervent, and tender to tears, full of conviction and full of love.

By universal agreement, Dr. Hodge was one of the brightest and best ornaments of the Presbyterian Church. When he died, the whole Christian Church felt his loss, and exclaimed, "A prince and a great man is fallen this day in Israel." Nor can any of his former pupils ever lose the impressions made upon them by his loving heart, his wonderful intellect, and his eminent piety.

Hodge, Rev. Edward Blanchard, was born at Philadelphia, February 5th, 1841. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, 1859, and entered upon the study of medicine. His theological training was received at Princeton. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Burlington, April 28th, 1864, since which time he has been the earnest, beloved and successful pastor of the Presbyterian Church in that place.

Hodge, Francis Blanchard, D. D., the youngest son of Dr. Charles Hodge, was born at Princeton, N. J., October 24th, 1838. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1859, and four years later completed a theological course in the Seminary at Princeton. He was ordained by the Presbytery of New Castle, and installed over the Presbyterian Church of Oxford, Pa., May 9th, 1863. For five years he was the faithful and much beloved pastor of this Church. With great regret he was parted from when Presbytery decided that he should be transferred to a larger and more promising field of labor. He was installed over the First Presbyterian Church of Wilkesbarre, in 1869, where, for fourteen years, he has maintained a steady hold upon the affections of his people, and established a reputation as a strong and eloquent preacher of the gospel, and a zealous, fearless defender of the evangelical faith. The social qualities of Dr. Hodge are very attractive, and win for him numerous friends. He excels in conversation. He possesses a deeply sympathetic nature, that goes out in kindness toward suffering and sorrow as soon as beheld. His whole being revolts against wrong when seen or heard, and he spares not severe words in denunciation thereof, when opportunity offers.

As a preacher, he may be classed among those who are strongly emotional, influencing the affections of the people. He is always logical and clear, and commands the attention of his audience, whether using a manuscript or preaching extempore, both of which methods he has practiced successfully. He is a good Presbyterian, and few in our Church courts talk better or present their points with clearer or more convincing force.

Hodge, Hugh L., M. D., was the son of Dr. Hugh Hodge, of Philadelphia. His mother was Mary Blanchard, of Boston. He was born in Philadelphia, June 27th, 1796. When he was two years old, his father died, leaving Mrs. Hodge in very limited circumstances, with two infants, the younger being Charles Hodge, then only six months old. These little lads owed much to their mother, who for years devoted all her energies to them. She had the satisfaction of living to see them both successfully engaged in their professions, and giving clear evidence that they would attain the high positions in each that they afterwards did. The boys were educated in Philadelphia and Somerville, and graduated from Princeton College. Hugh L. Hodge studied medicine in the University of Pennsylvania, and in 1820 began to practice in Philadelphia. The next year he taught the anatomical class of Dr. Horner, who was then in Europe. In 1823 he was appointed to a lectureship on surgery, in a school which afterwards became the "Medical Institute." In 1835 he was elected Professor of Obstetrics in the University of Pennsylvania; he retained the position until 1863. No teacher ever gave a more thorough or a more conscientious course of lectures. The strong feature of his teaching was not to display knowledge but to impart it. His resignation was occasioned by his failure of vision. With the aid of an amanuensis and his son, he was able to prepare several important medical works for the press.

He had seven sons, of whom five survived him. Four entered the ministry, and one, bearing his father's name, who is noticed below.

Dr. Hodge's grandfather, Andrew Hodge, took a prominent part in the organization of the Second Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. In this church Dr. Hodge was born, and continued until his death. He professed his faith in 1830. As a church member no one showed a greater consistency, a broader philanthropy, a more unstricted liberality, or set a brighter example of loyal Christian faith. He was identified with all the enterprises of the church. He was elected ruling elder, but declined, because of his professional engagements and the loss of his eyesight. When, in 1868, the congregation determined to move from Seventh and Arch streets, and built on the corner of Walnut and Twenty-first streets, Dr. Hodge was chosen chairman of the building committee, and labored earnestly to accomplish the result. He lived to see the beautiful building erected, and was present at its dedication. He died suddenly, of angina pectoris, on the 23th of February, 1873.

Hodge, H. Lenox, M. D., was born in Philadelphia, July 30th, 1836. His father was the eminent physician, Dr. Hugh L. Hodge. He received a collegiate education, which terminated in 1855, in his native city, and afterwards studied medicine at the University of Pennsylvania, where he graduated in 1858. In the Fall of the same year he became resident physician of the Pennsylvania Hospital, retaining that office till the Spring of 1860, when he opened an office for the practice of medicine in Philadelphia. He was appointed Demonstrator of Surgery in the University of Pennsylvania, and, in 1861 commenced giving instruction to private classes, on Chestnut street, between Ninth and Tenth streets, and subsequently lectured in Chant street, on Anatomy and Operative Surgery. In 1870 he was appointed Demonstrator of Anatomy in the University of Pennsylvania, and was, for nearly ten years, attending surgeon at the Children's Hospital. At the opening of the Presbyterian Hospital, in 1872, he was appointed attending surgeon to that institution. Dr. Hodge, by his talents, industry, integrity and energy, attained a high rank in his profession. He was a gentleman of polished address and peculiar benevolence. For a number of years he was an exemplary, active and useful ruling elder in the Second Presbyterian Church. Removed by death, in the midst of his years, June 10th, 1881, he bore his last and lingering illness with marked resignation, and left the record of one who had adorned all the relations of life by his cultivated intellect, kind disposition, and exemplary Christian character. At the time of his decease he was a member of many medical societies and associations.

Hodge, John Aspinwall, D. D., was born in Philadelphia, Pa., August 12th, 1831. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1851, and studied theology at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Luzerne, April 22d, 1857; was stated supply of the Church at Mauch Chunk, Pa., 1856; pastor 1857-65, and since 1866, has been pastor of the First Church, Hartford, Connecticut.

Dr. Hodge is a gentleman of genial spirit and scholarly attainments; an excellent preacher, an exemplary pastor, and a valuable presbyter. Descended from good Presbyterian stock, he is not given to speculation in theology, but faithfully, earnestly and successfully proclaims the truth of God's Word as set forth in the Standards of our Church.

Hodge, Samuel, D. D., second son of Francis and Priscilla (King) Hodge, was born in the Fork, Sullivan county, Tenn., June 7th, 1829. Having graduated at Washington College, Tenn., in 1850, he entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J., in September of that year, and completed the usual three years' course of study. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, April 27th, 1853, and in September began Home Missionary work in the churches of Rock Spring and Walnut Grove, Washington county, Va. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Montgomery, in September, 1854. In 1855 he began the supply of New Providence Church, Hawkins county, Tenn., being also for one year the Principal of New Providence Academy. In 1857 he accepted a Professorship at Washington College, where he remained until the outbreak of the civil war, and the consequent disbanding of the College. During his Professorship, and afterwards during part of the war, he supplied the churches of Salem and Leesburg. Leaving Tennessee, in 1865, after a few months spent in Missouri, he came to Iowa, where he accepted the Professorship of Languages in Lenox Collegiate Institute, at Hopkinton; also supplying the Milo Church, twelve miles distant. The Synod of Iowa (O. S.) elected him President of Lenox Institute, in October, 1866, and the Hopkinton Church sought his services as pulpit supply. He performed these double duties with rare ability and success, for ten years, when he withdrew from the care of the church and gave his whole time to the college. He resigned the presidency in 1882, after sixteen years of continuous and wearying labor, during which the school increased constantly in numbers and influence. He now resides at Rockford, Ill.

Dr. Hodge has a fine reputation as an instructor and manager of youth. He is a thorough scholar, well informed in all the branches of general knowledge, and especially fitted by mental culture, accurate scholarship, long service and general aptitude for imparting instruction, in mental and moral philosophy and the languages, to classes in college of high grade. He ranks among the foremost of Western educators.

As a preacher, Dr. Hodge stands high among thinking men. With a keen liking for philosophical research, and a rare power of analysis, he unites an ardent love for the old doctrines, which he maintains with energy and eloquence. His sermons are models of careful preparation, combining purity of style with precision of thought, and glowing with spiritual truth.

Hofford, Rev. M. Lowrie, A. M., son of John and Hannah (Lowrie) Hofford, was born near Doylestown, Pa., January 27th, 1825. He pursued a part of his college course at Lafayette College, and was graduated at the College of New Jersey, in 1849. He studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia, in June, 1851. For one year he was stated supply of the Church at Tamaqua, Pa. In 1852 he organized the First Presbyterian Church of Beverly, N. J., and opened a select and classical school, which was continued till 1863. In that year he was elected Principal of the Seminary at Allentown, Pa., which became quite flourishing under his administration, and was incorporated by the State as Muhlenburg College. Upon retiring from this Institution to Beverly, in 1868, he organized the Fairview Presbyterian Church, erecting a house of worship. In 1870 he organized the Presbyterian Church of Delanco, erecting a house of worship. In 1873 he organized the Calvary Presbyterian Church of River-ton. In 1878 he accepted a call to the pastorate of the Morrisville Presbyterian Church, Pa., his present charge. Mr. Hofford is a faithful preacher and pastor. He has been a frequent contributor to the religious press. He is the author of "Gospel Hymns," which have found their way into numerous Sabbath schools and devotional collections.

Hoffman, Christian J., an elder of the North Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pa., was born in Lewistown, Pa., November 18th, 1819. In early life he learned the printing business, but abandoned it in favor of commercial pursuits. After serving as a clerk in Philadelphia, in 1847 he embarked in the flour and grain trade, in which he attained great success. He was elected a member of the City Council in 1852, and filled the position one year after the consolidation of the city. In 1861 he was elected President of the Corn Exchange Association. He has served faithfully, for a number of years, as one of the Directors of Girard College, and as a Trustee of the Presbyterian Hospital in Philadelphia. Mr. Hoffman is a gentleman of great energy and admirable executive ability. He is kind in disposition, liberal and active in the support of all good causes, and justly held in high esteem for his integrity of character.

Hoge, James, D. D., the son of Rev. Dr. Moses and Elizabeth (Poage) Hoge, was born at Moorfield, Virginia, in 1781. He was chiefly educated by his father, and was licensed to preach the gospel by Lexington Presbytery, Virginia, April 17th, 1805. Under a commission from the General Assembly, he went as a missionary to Ohio, arriving at Franklin-ton, November 19th, 1805, where he organized a church, February 18th, 1806. Early in the Fall, on account of impaired health, he returned to his native State, but, his health having improved, he accepted, September 25th, 1807, a call from the Church of Franklinton for three-fourths of his time. Not long after this he was solicited to preach at Columbus, on the opposite side of the river, and the acceptance of this request resulted in the organization of the First Presbyterian Church of that city, of which he continued to be pastor until February 28th, 1858, when, on account of his age and feeble health, he resigned. He continued to reside in Columbus, where he died, September 23d, 1863.

The vast and varied powers of Dr. Hoge were not confined to the individual church of which he was pastor, but were largely enjoyed by the whole denomination to which he belonged. He may be justly called the father of the Presbytery of Columbus, and even of the Synod of Ohio. He was very influential in our Church courts. He was the pioneer of the great Temperance reform in the State in which he so long resided. For many years he was trustee of two of the universities of the State. He was one of the warmest advocates of the Bible Society in the West. He was largely instrumental in securing the establishment, by the Legislature, of Institutions for the deaf, the dumb and the blind, and he rendered efficient aid in the establishment of the lunatic asylum. His life was one of great usefulness, and he has left an abiding influence in the church in which he lived, labored and died.

Hoge, Rev. John, was the son of William Hoge, "an exile for Christ's sake," from Scotland. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, October 10th, 1753. In 1755 he was ordained by the Presbytery of New Castle, and became the first pastor of the churches of Opequon and Cedar Creek, Va. In 1760 we find him the pastor of Tuscarora, Opequon and Back Creek churches. About 1762 Mr. Hoge, on account of the remissness of his people in giving him a support, resigned his charge and removed to Pennsylvania.

Hoge, Rev. John Blair, a son of the Rev. Moses Hoge, D. D., was born in Jefferson county, Va., in April, 1790. After assisting his father for some time, in a school which he had established at Shepherdstown, he entered Hampden-Sidney College, at an advanced standing, where he graduated about the year 1808. He afterwards became a tutor in the college, his father having, in the meantime, become its President. He commenced the study of the law with great promise, but, determining to prepare for the gospel ministry, he became a student of theology under his father, and on the 20th of April, 1810, was licensed by the Hanover Presbytery. October 12th, 1811, he was ordained and installed pastor of the congregations of Tuscarora and Falling Waters, giving a portion of his labors also to Martinsburg. From his first appearance in the pulpit, Mr. Hoge's preaching attracted great attention. For the sake of needed relaxation from labors, he crossed the ocean, leaving home in 1814, and returning in 1816, in various ways benefited by his tour. He was now even more sought after as a preacher than he had ever been before, but his popularity never seemed to occasion the least self-exaltation. September 7th, 1822, he became pastor of the church on Shockoe Hill, Richmond. Here his usefulness was enlarged; but ere long his health began to decline, and he died March 31st, 1826. Mr. Hoge was one of the most gifted sons of old Virginia. His talents, taste and acquirements were acknowledged, by all who knew him intimately, to be of the first order. In his private intercourse, he was a model of all that is gentle, discreet and exemplary. His enduring monument is in the hearts of many whom he guided to the Saviour. Dr. D. H. Riddle, referring to him as the friend of his youth, says—

"None knew thee but to love thee,
Or named thee but to praise."

Hoge, Moses, D. D., was born in what is now Frederick county, Va., February 15th, 1752. He served, for a short time, as a soldier in the army of the Revolution, but under what circumstances cannot now be ascertained. He entered Liberty Hall Academy, at Timber Ridge, in 1778; completed his studies there in 1780; on the 25th of October of that year was received as a candidate by the Hanover Presbytery. During the pendency of his trials for licensure, he prosecuted his theological studies still further, under the direction of the celebrated Dr. James Waddel, and was licensed to preach in November, 1781. He became pastor of the congregation named Concrete, in Hardy county, December 13th, 1782, and during his pastorate taught a school, which secured important advantages to the youth in the neighborhood. After spending about five years on the south branch of the Potomac, and finding the climate injurious to his health, notwithstanding the devoted attachment of his people, and their earnest wish to retain him, he removed, in the Autumn of 1787, to Shepherdstown, where he very soon gathered a large congregation, and acquired great popularity throughout the whole region.

In 1807 Dr. Hoge was invited to take charge of the academy in Charlestown, about ten miles from Shepherdstown, and to divide his ministerial labors between the two places, but he declined the offer. Shortly after this he was appointed President of Hampden-Sidney College, in place of Dr. Alexander, who had removed to Philadelphia, and at the same time was invited to be assistant preacher in Cumberland and Briery congregations, each of them about ten miles distant from the college. After considerable hesitation, he consented to remove. He was inaugurated as President of the College during the sessions of Synod in the month of October, and was welcomed to his new field of labor with every expression of good will and confidence.

The subject of education for the ministry having been discussed by the General Assembly in 1809, it was resolved to send down to the Presbyteries the inquiry whether there should be one or more Seminaries established. A divided answer was returned to the Assembly, but the Presbyteries in Virginia determined in favor of Synodical Seminaries, and the Assembly having consented to this, wherever it should be preferred, while yet they determined on establishing a central one, the Synod of Virginia, in 1812, resolved to establish a Seminary within their bounds, and unanimously appointed Dr. Hoge their Professor.

From this time till his death he held the two offices of President of the College and Professor of Divinity, under the appointment of the Synod.

In 1819, Dr. Hoge's constitution, under his multiplied and onerous labors, was found to be giving way. For several months he was confined to his chamber, and part of the time to his bed, but he still, even in his feeblest state, continued to hear the daily recitations of his class. In the course of the Summer his health was so far recruited that he paid a visit to his friends in the Valley about Shepherdstown and Winchester, which proved to be his last. In the Spring of 1820 he attended the meeting of his Presbytery, in Mecklenburg county, and was appointed a delegate to the General Assembly, to meet in Philadelphia. He extended his journey as far as New York, with a special view to attend the anniversary of the American Bible Society. This desire being gratified, he spent a little time at Princeton, and then proceeded to Philadelphia. Here, while attending the sessions of the Assembly, he departed this life, July 5th, 1820. His remains repose in the burying ground of the Third Presbyterian Church in that city, by the side of those of his intimate friend, Dr. John Blair Smith, who had formerly been President of Hampden-Sidney College.

Dr. Hoge was of a kind and benignant spirit. His mind was uncommonly vigorous, capable, at once, of accurate discrimination and profound research, and withal richly stored with the treasures of scientific knowledge. His preaching was characterized by much depth and originality of thought, richness and force of illustration, and clear and cogent reasoning. As a teacher, he had not only great patience, but great skill. He had an admirable facility at clearing up difficulties, and illustrating the harmony of the Christian system. At the same time he was an eminent example, to his pupils, of the Christian spirit. He was concerned, not more to impart to them a knowledge of the truths of the gospel, than to lead them to cultivate an ardent piety, and duly to appreciate the responsibilities of the work to which they were devoted. He was honored as the instrument of bringing into the ministry many faithful laborers; was eminently conscientious and useful in all his relations, and was much esteemed and beloved wherever he was known.

Hoge, Rev. Samuel Davies, was the fourth son of Rev. Moses Hoge, D. D., and was born in Shepherdstown, Va., in 1791. When his father removed to Prince Edward, to become the President of Hampden-Sidney College, Samuel Davies accompanied him, and there graduated, in 1810. He prosecuted his theological studies under the direction of his father, and was licensed to preach by the Hanover Presbytery, May 8th, 1813. While pursuing his theological studies, he was employed as Tutor in the college, and after his licensure occupied, for some time, the place of Professor and Vice-President. He was installed by the Presbytery of Hanover, in 1816, pastor of the churches of Culpepper and Madison, in Virginia, where he continued to labor with great acceptance, fidelity and success, until April, 1821, when he removed to Ohio. As pastor of the churches of Hillsborough and Rocky Spring, in Highland county, of that State, he ministered, with his wonted diligence and success, some two years. Having accepted the Professorship of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in the Ohio University, at Athens, including also the opportunity of preaching in the college chapel and in the church of the town, and in the vicinity as often as his health would allow, he entered on his duties near the close of the year 1823. Under his influence, in connection with that of three other able instructors, the prosperity of the university was not a little increased. His preaching, likewise, both in the college and in the church, was highly acceptable and useful. He died in 1826, enjoying great peace. Mr. Hoge, as a pulpit orator, only lacked voice and physical strength to have ranked with the first preachers of his age. His style was pure, simple, and energetic, expressing with greatest exactness the nicest shades of thought. And his subject matter was always evangelical truth, presented in such a way as to instruct as well as deeply affect his hearers. The growth of believers in holiness and comfort, and the conversion of sinners to the glory of God in Christ, was his controlling aim, and his ministry was attended with a rich blessing from on high.

Hoge, Rev. William James, was the son of pious parents, and had the blessing of an ancestry eminent for learning and piety. Left an orphan at a tender age, yet the mercies of the covenant were richly and effectually bestowed on him, and he grew up to manhood with the blessings of early piety and a liberal education. Licensed in 1850, he soon gave evidence of rare powers in the pulpit. In 1852 he was settled over the Westminster Church, in Baltimore, and in 1856 called to the Professorship of Biblical (New Testament) Literature in Union Seminary. After three years of successful work, the more remarkable as he had never enjoyed the advantages of a regular theological training in a seminary, in 1859 he was settled collegiate pastor of the Brick Church, New York. The breaking out of the war, in 1861, rendered a continuance in New York undesirable, and he returned to Virginia. After a short service in the Church of Charlottesville, Va., he was called to the Tabb Street Church, in Petersburg, in 1863. But his labors among his people and in army hospitals wore out his robust frame, till, thus weakened, he fell a prey to typhoid fever. The uproar of war and the bombardment of the city occasioning his exposure to personal danger in his home, he found refuge in a Christian family in the country; and there, surrounded by his weeping relatives and friends, he "fell asleep in Jesus," July 5th, 1864. His last words were, "I am dead, physically dead, but spiritually alive in Christ Jesus, forevermore."

Holden, Horace, Esq., was born at Sudbury, Mass., November 5th, 1793. When quite young, his father's family removed to Newark, N. J., where he pursued his studies under the direction of the Rev. William Woodbridge, D. D. He was admitted to the Bar of New York city in 1814. The war of 1812 was still in progress, and through the influence of his father, who was an officer on the staff of General Washington, in the Revolutionary war, he obtained a position on the staff of General Colfax, and was stationed at Sandy Hook during the few remaining months of the war. He united with the Brick Church, New York, in 1820, and in 1823 was ordained a ruling elder. No man was more punctual, prompt, or diligent in his high vocation; with him it was a calling, not of honor and trust merely, but of responsibility and service. He took a deep interest in the spiritual and temporal welfare of the church, and his religious history, his personal comfort and usefulness were so associated with it, that it would be difficult to specify the earthly object that was so dear to his heart. He was also a Trustee, and for many years the instructive and laborious superintendent of the Sabbath school.

Mr. Holden was a liberal giver. God had prospered him in his secular vocation, and his hand was open to every good cause. In addition to the Boards and benevolent operations of his own Church, which were objects of his ardent sympathy and practical support, he maintained an active interest in the great benevolent institutions of the age in which he lived. He was elected one of the Board of Managers of the American Bible Society, in April, 1835, and was one of the most judicious and faithful members till his death, being for twenty-three years a member of the Committee on Legacies, and much of that time its chairman. He was chosen a corporate member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missionaries in 1842, and always took a deep interest in its work. He was a prominent member of the New York Sabbath Committee, and the first meetings of its organization were held at his house.

Mr. Holden was distinguished in his profession as a lawyer. His simplicity and purity of character, his uncompromising integrity, and his warm and friendly spirit, were always recognized by his professional brethren, and won for him an enviable reputation in the community. His prudence and integrity made him the depository of many public and private trusts, which he discharged with great ability and fidelity. He died, as he had lived, in the triumphs of faith, March 25th, 1862, leaving behind him a name unsullied and blessed, as an upright man, fearing God and loving his fellow men.

Holladay, Rev. Albert Lewis, was born in Spottsylvania county, Virginia, April 16th, 1805. He was distinguished for his scholarship, in the extensive course of instruction he pursued, in the University of Virginia. He professed faith in Christ while teaching a school in Richmond, Va. Thence he removed to Charlottesville, where he taught school for a short time, until called to the Professorship of Ancient Languages in Hampden-Sidney College. In the year 1833 he gave up his position in college and entered the Union Theological Seminary, and took the full course. After spending eleven years as a missionary in Persia, he returned to his native State, took the pastoral charge of the South Plains Church, near Charlottesville; also again engaging in teaching. He was eminent as an Oriental scholar, and his last literary labor was the preparation of a Syriac Grammar. On his dying bed he received information of his election to the presidency of Hampden-Sidney, which office, it was understood, he signified his willingness to accept. But God had a higher honor, to which he was soon called. On the 18th of October, 1856, he was called "from a mourning and dependent family, and a devotedly attached congregation," to be "present with the Lord, in the heavenly and eternal home." His modest demeanor, and simple and sincere piety through life, justifies the belief just expressed; and, to this day, his name is never mentioned, by those who best know him, without exciting deep regret for his irreparable loss.

Holladay, Prof. Lewis L., son of Dr. Lewis L. and Jean T. Holladay, was born February 23d, 1832, in Spottsylvania county, Va. He graduated at Hampden-Sidney College, with high honor, in 1853, and was appointed a Tutor in the Institution, in the same year. After serving one year in this capacity, he entered the University of Virginia, where he spent the session 1854-5, and graduated in several of the schools. In the same year he was elected to the chair of Chemistry and Natural Philosophy, in Hampden-Sidney College, a chair which has been held by a number of men remarkable for scientific attainments, among them the late distinguished Dr. John W. Draper, of New York, who made the first discovery of the daguerrotype while in this chair. From 1855 to 1883 Prof. Holladay has filled this chair with much ability and success, doing excellent work for the Church and the State, not only as a teacher of science, but also by his wisdom in the guidance and control of young men, by his kindness and geniality, and by his noble example as a Christian gentleman of pure life and broad charity.

Professor Holladay was made an elder of the Hampden-Sidney Church in 1871. He is a man of high intellectual gifts and fine executive abilities. He is modest and unambitious, and contented, in an unassuming way, to perform his important duties at his Alma Mater, the noble old Presbyterian College, which, founded in prayer, amid the patriotic fires of the Revolution, has accomplished a century of grand work, and still holds on its high career of usefulness, challenging the good will and support of all lovers of consecrated learning.

Holliday, Rev. John C., was born at Martin's Ferry, O., December 29th, 1850. He graduated at Monmouth College, Ill., in 1874, and at the Western Theological Seminary in 1878. He was licensed to preach by St. Clairsville Presbytery, April 25th, 1877, and was ordained by it, an evangelist, April 25th, 1878. After supplying Unity Church for one year, he spent a year in advanced theological studies in the University and New College, Edinburgh, Scotland. In 1880 he took charge of the Broadway Presbyterian Church, Rock Island, Ill., where he is now laboring successfully. He has ever been a diligent student, and stood among the first in his class, both in college and seminary. His sermons are characterized by strength of thought, and clearness, beauty and force of expression. As a speaker he gains and keeps the attention of his hearers. Already has his ministry been blessed to the ingathering of many souls.

Holliday, Rev. William Adair, the son of Samuel and Elizabeth (Martin) Holliday, was born in Harrison county, Ky., July 16th, 1803. He graduated at Miami University, in 1829, after which he made a journey on horseback to the then far-off East, for the purpose of enjoying the instruction of Drs. Alexander, Miller and Hodge, in the Princeton Theological Seminary. After being licensed to preach, he was stated supply of the First Presbyterian Church, Indianapolis, Ind., for two years. Subsequently he devoted himself to missionary labors, in various parts of Indiana, among feeble churches, and also to teaching, finally making his home in Indianapolis, where his prayers, and counsels and influence were always heartily given to every good work. He was Professor of the Latin Language in Hanover College, 1864-66. He was a close student through life. He was a man of deep piety, of much learning, and of a most excellent spirit. His diligence prevented his prominence. Many a man with far less talent and attainment, and more self-confidence, has made quite a figure in the world. He died December 16th, 1866.

Holm, Rev. John William, was born in the town of St. Thomas, in the Island of St. Thomas, Danish West Indies, in 1837. While yet an infant his parents died, and he came under the care of his grandparents, who were living at Tortola, a small island to the east of St. Thomas, belonging to Great Britain. They were poor, but belonged to the people of God, and did all they could to have him instructed. After their death he returned to St. Thomas, and lived there with his uncle, Alexander Barron, as an apprentice to the trade of cigar making. In 1859 he left for New York, on his way to Liberia, the land he had adopted for his future home. Soon after arriving in the United States, he became acquainted with Rev. John B. Pinney, LL. D., the highly esteemed Secretary of the American Colonization Society, who, learning of his long cherished purpose of becoming a gospel minister, urged him to remain and obtain an education. He, however, took passage for Liberia, but on his arrival, finding how great was the need of educated men, after a short stay he returned to the United States, to follow Dr. Pinney's advice. Aided by William E. Dodge, Esq., of New York, he entered Ashmun Institute (now Lincoln University), in which he studied two years, thence to the Theological Seminary, Auburn, N. Y., entering as a member of the Junior Class, in 1861. In 1862 he was licensed by Cayuga Presbytery, and during the Summer of 1863 he was laboring as a stated supply to the Siloam Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. While thus engaged in his Master's cause, he died, of typhoid fever, September 10th, 1863. Mr. Holm, though but a short time in the land of his adoption, was there long enough to imbue with pity the impulses of his generous heart, and awaken within him all the ardor and zeal of a new convert to a noble purpose. He was accustomed to say that, from the time he gave himself unreservedly to the work of benefiting his race, "God had not ceased to smile in blessings upon him." As a student at the Institute, he gave good evidence of piety, industry, and progress in his studies. In the Seminary, and in his first efforts in preaching, his utterances, simple, spiritual, earnest, indicated his sincerity and the spiritual tone of his piety. In his manners he was modest and retiring. "His death," says Dr. Pinney, "was a serious bereavement to us and the cause of Christ."

Holman, Rev. Robert. As early as 1826, Mr. Holman, a native of Kentucky, and then a licentiate of the Presbytery of Transylvania, joined the little band of Presbyterian ministers in Alabama. For several years he did the work of a missionary, under the direction of the committee of the Presbytery. Having been ordained by the Presbytery which licensed him, he was received as a member of the Presbytery of South Alabama, April 3d, 1828, and after fifteen years' faithful and untiring service in the ministry, he died at Wetumpka, July 7th, 1843, having just settled there as their pastor. Mr. Holman was eminently useful and universally beloved. His influence as a man and minister was widespread, extending alike to the Church and to the world. Though his preaching talent was respectable, it was not commanding, and yet he was one of the most successful ministers the Presbytery ever had. Being the first Presbyterian minister to settle in that section of the State known as the Cherokee purchase, his wide missionary field allowed him but little time for study. For a number of years, most of his thinking was done on his Indian pony, as he threaded the Indian trail from one preaching place to another, feeding his Master's scattered sheep. The Apostolic injunction was the measure of his duty: "But to do good and to communicate, forget not."

Holmes, Daniel, was born in Saratoga county, N. Y., July 3d, 1789, and died in Wilson, N. Y., May 26th, 1858. In 1811 he confessed Christ publicly and united with the Presbyterian Church. In June, 1817, he journeyed on foot, with a pack on his back, to Niagara Falls and vicinity, and purchased a wild farm on the shore of Lake Ontario, now in Wilson, completing a journey of over seven hundred miles on his return. To this new country he moved his family in 1818, into a rude log house. Pained to see the few inhabitants of that region hunting and fishing on the Lord's day, he at once appointed a meeting in the little log school-house, conducting the services himself, and reading one of the first sermons ever heard in that region, from Rom. i, 16, by Burder. His custom was, to walk five miles westward and hold a service and Sunday-school, then to conduct this service, with a Sunday-school, held for some time in a new barn, until January, 1819, when the Presbyterian Church was formed, consisting of his father and mother, himself and wife, and a sister and her husband, himself and father being ruling elders. For fifteen years they only enjoyed the occasional services of a Home Missionary, but Elder Holmes regularly kept up the ordinances of the preaching service, prayer-meeting, and the Sabbath-school, and converts were added, so that in 1835 they numbered 117.

Mr. Holmes was an eminently devout and useful man. Governor Hunt, while a member of Congress, wrote, respecting him: "He is not only one of my constituents, but one of my most sincere and valued friends. I have never known a man of purer purposes or more generous qualities. He is universally loved and esteemed for his many virtues. His fine intelligence and known integrity secure him the confidence of all who know him, and in the range of my acquaintance I do not know a more worthy or a more useful man."

Holmes, John McClellan, D. D., the eldest son of Rev. Edwin and Sarah (McClellan) Holmes, was born at Livingston, N. Y., January 22d, 1834. He made a profession of religion at sixteen years of age. He was graduated at Williams College in 1853, afterwards spending a year in the special study of Philosophy and English Literature. After a three years' course of theological study at New Brunswick, N. J., he was licensed to preach, by the (Reformed Dutch) Classis of Rensselaer, in May, 1857. In July, 1857, he was ordained by the Classis of Long Island, and installed pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church of East Williamsburg, L. I. His other pastorates in that Denomination were Lee Avenue, Brooklyn (installed November, 1859), and Hudson, N. Y. (installed October, 1865). He then accepted a call to the State Street Presbyterian Church of Albany, N. Y., where he is still pastor.

Dr. Holmes has always been sought for to fill positions of trust and honor. In the Reformed Church he was, for several years, a member of the Boards of Education and of Foreign Missions; a member of the committee to revise the Constitution, and an associate editor of the Christian Intelligencer. He was President of General Synod in 1876, and also represented that body in the General Synods of the German Reformed and Lutheran churches, and was appointed a delegate to the Pan-Presbyterian Council, at Edinburgh. He received the degree of D. D. from Rutgers College, in 1870. He visited Europe for several months, in 1874.

In the Presbyterian Church he has been Commissioner to the General Assemblies at Pittsburg (1878) and Springfield (1882). In the former he was Chairman of the Committee on Church Erection, and in the latter Chairman of Committee on the Narrative. He was Moderator of the Synod of Albany in 1881. He has written considerably for the religious and other papers, and a number of his sermons and addresses have been published in pamphlet form or in periodicals. Dr. Holmes combines, to an unusual degree, the qualities for a successful minister. His personal appearance is pleasing, and his manners cordial and courteous; his elocution vigorous and graceful; his mind well stored and disciplined, and his heart full of love to God and men. His preaching is always largely attended, and attractive. He is systematic and conscientious in his pastoral work, and has always been surrounded by a thoroughly organized and working, as well as loving, people. He has been peculiarly successful in his work among young men. His tact, geniality, sympathy, practical wisdom and executive ability, are consecrated instruments of great power and usefulness. His sermons are characterized by clearness and finish of style, systematic analysis, scripturalness of matter, doctrinal conservatism, and faithful appeal and application. His ministry has been marked by continuous conversions and ingatherings into the Church.

Holy Scripture—Its Credibility. It is proposed in this article to discuss, as fully as the allotted space may permit, the credibility of the Scripture, the grounds being succinctly stated on which we receive it as containing truth. The investigation must, of course, be mainly directed to the historical parts. The prophecies in it have a confirmation of their own. For, if it can be shown, as it has been by able writers, that many of them have been remarkably fulfilled, long after they were delivered, it can hardly be alleged that they were the happy guesses of sagacious men; they must have proceeded from One who could declare "the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done." (Isaiah xlvii, 10). The doctrines, also, taught in Scripture have other authentication; their sublimity, the mighty power by which they have been enforced, the revolution they have effected in the world, are proofs that they are not the mere devices of the human brain.

Historically, then, we want to see if we may rely upon the narratives of Scripture; if it is what it professes to be—a genuine record of past events; if the persons of whom we read in it really lived and acted as we are told they did; if the picture of human life it gives is a faithful representation, which we may accept without misgivings. The proofs of all this may be taken from various sources. Let us sift some of these proofs.

That the Scripture has come down to us uncorrupted and substantially the same as when its several parts were originally written, is sufficiently clear. It has always been watched over with jealousy, and endeavors to tamper with it have been checked at once. Manuscripts of the New Testament have been preserved, dating but three or four hundred years after our Lord's time, and the numerous citations by the very earliest authors, Christian, heretic, and even pagan, carry up the proof still higher. With regard to the Scriptures of the Old Testament, they have the sanction of Christ himself; and, besides, we have a translation of them made into Greek between two and three centuries before the Christian era. Therefore we may fairly assume that we are dealing with works of the most remote antiquity, composed, as can be distinctly proved of many of them, by those who witnessed or took part in the events they describe. In estimating the credibility of a book, we must ascertain whether the writer was well informed, and whether he would be likely to tell the truth. Now, several of the Scripture writers claim to be eye-witnesses of what they record. Paul, in some respects the most eminent and active of the first Christian teachers, was, it is acknowledged on all hands, the author of several of the letters which have come down to us. Some of the earlier books of Scripture were, there is the strongest reason for believing, from the pen of Moses, the great Hebrew lawgiver. Some of the Psalms were composed by David, the renowned king. Ezra, the restorer of the Jewish polity, has left annals. And, though there are anonymous books in the volume, yet the absence of the name by no means, when the fact is properly explained, detracts from the value of the documents preserved. There are in every country annals and state papers the hand that penned which has never been identified; and yet no man, on that account, impeaches their authority.

We cannot then impute want of information to the Scripture writers. They must have known whether Israel was in servitude in Egypt and was delivered thence. They must have known whether a royal line reigned in Judea, and whether God was worshiped with magnificent rites in Jerusalem. They must have known how the country was ruined, and what were the calamities inflicted by the Assyrians and Chaldeans. They must have had perfect knowledge of the life of Jesus, of his teaching, his rejection, his death, and the promulgation and success of his gospel. They were not—this succession of writers—the mere collectors of old legends, obliged to a painful search amid half-obliterated records; they lived among the men and scenes which they described. So that, if they have misrepresented matters, if they have given a false coloring, they must have acted on design, they must have had some purpose to serve, for which they were content to disregard truth, and were anxious to deceive the world. They were Hebrews. Had the history they composed been a panegyric on their nation, had it even been flattering to their own vanity, or served the purpose of advancing them in the world, we might have viewed their productions with suspicion. But what do we really find? There is no glossing-over of the faults of their most renowned ancestors: the national history is exhibited in dark tints; and we know that it was at the risk of life, or at least of losing all that could render life desirable, that several of these writers gave their testimony. If any book, therefore, comes to us with fair presumption of truthfulness, from the character and circumstances of the writer, the Scripture has the strongest claim of the kind to be believed.

It must not be forgotten that it proceeds from a succession of authors in various ranks of life, extending in a lengthened chain over fifteen centuries. Some of these were contemporary; so that we have the same things from different pens. Some took up the thread where earlier laborers left it, and carrying it on for a while, devolved it on those that came after. When ordinary historians write, they begin with correcting their predecessors. They have detected partiality or misapprehension; they have obtained access to fresh sources of information. And so they give a perfectly new face to things; and it is not uncommon to find a statesman, a warrior, a monarch stigmatized by one writer, highly lauded by another. Bind up all the modern histories of any century or reign together, and see if you will have a consistent whole. By the binding together of the Scripture records into a single volume, you subject their credibility to the severest test.

In examining the internal structure of a book, the first element of credibility is the consistency of one part with the rest. Faithful history does not contradict itself. It is true that, such is the imperfection of human knowledge, the most trustworthy writers are occasionally in error, and the most impartial let their own opinions color the narrative they deliver. But we do not for small variations impeach any one's general credibility, nor, if we are unable exactly to reconcile different statements in regard to some event, do we at once throw aside the whole as a mere figment. On the contrary, when we see different writers agreeing in the main, though differing in particulars, we receive them as independent witnesses, and place the more reliance on the facts to which each, after his special manner, gives satisfactory testimony. Now the Scripture, though subjected to a severe test, is seen to be throughout consistent. The events recorded in the earlier books are assumed as true and confirmed in the later. Thus the creation, the flood, the call of Abraham, the bondage of Israel in Egypt with the deliverance, the histories of David and Solomon, the Babylonish captivity, etc., etc., appear again and again; the later authors never treating these events as legendary or mythical, but basing argument and admonition upon them as acknowledged facts. In the parallel histories, too, of the Kings and Chronicles, and of the Gospels, we find the same things repeated, with additional circumstances doubtless, but yet without essential variation. And it is worth notice that the more remarkable stories, which in themselves might give rise to question, receive in this way strong confirmation. For example, the history of Balaam, and the portent of the dumb ass speaking with intelligent tongue, recorded in the Pentateuch (Numb. xxii. 21–35), are referred to by an apostle (2 Pet. ii. 15, 16); and the swallowing of Jonah by a fish, and his mission to Nineveh (Jonah i. 17, iii), reappear in the Gospels with the solemn sanction of our Lord Himself (Matt. xii. 40; xvi. 4; Luke xi. 29–32). There are yet more particular proofs of consistency. Theological writers, as Paley in his Horæ Paulinæ, and Blunt in his Undesigned Coincidences, have used a kind of cross-examination, and have thus produced most satisfactory and really marvelous evidence of the credibility of Scripture. Had there been fraud, it would have come out under such a process. And to add to the weight of the argument, it must be always borne in mind that fraud, if committed, must have been carried on for centuries. If the Scripture, consistent in its various parts as we have seen it to be, be untruthful, there must have been a combination, not of a knot of men at one particular juncture, not of the members of a sect which flourished for a while, but of persons living in widely-separated ages and in distant lands, of persons in all grades of society, with jarring interests and dissimilar objects, of hostile principles, Jews and Christians, opposed in everything else but accordant in this—to palm upon the world as facts events which never happened, annals life-like but of no authority, chronicles of kings, accounts of revolutions, and religions testified to by all of them, but yet baseless and imaginary. Such a combination the world never has heard of; it is contrary to all experience; the 'verifying faculty' of reasonable men's minds must reject it.

It is true that objections have been taken to Scripture as exhibiting discrepancies. We are not concerned to discuss these here. For, even if we admit them, they do not shake the general credibility of the book. But yet we may reply that very many of these disappear on more careful examination, that the advance of general knowledge has tended to unravel difficulties heretofore considered inexplicable.

and that it is but fair to conclude that, if we had fuller acquaintance with all the circumstances, many more perplexities would disappear. Such discrepancies have been considered by various biblical critics; and to their works the reader must be referred. But it is necessary and fair to add that the great mass of the alleged discrepancies are of trivial moment, concerning dates and numbers and names, where especially transcribers were liable to error; and that minute accordance is the rule, the instances of discrepancy but exceptional.

The credibility of Scripture has been argued on the ground of its internal consistency; we may also notice the moral phenomena of which, if true, it offers a satisfactory solution. There is much apparent in the present state of the world to perplex the most acute minds; and philosophers of the highest name, sensible of their own inability to grasp all that they desired to know, have expressed their ardent longing for some divine teacher. The state of man, the prevalence of disease and death, offer problems which mere reason finds it very hard to solve; the existence of an all-wise, all-merciful, and all-powerful Being being pre-supposed, the Creator and Sustainer of the world. The Scripture pours a flood of light upon such topics. Herein it stands apart from all other books. It contains the highest philosophy, and has taken a hold upon mankind which no other has ever done. It fits in with all the existing phenomena of the world. If it does not reduce that which is infinite to the level of finite comprehension, it does at least deliver that rational history of man's formation and man's duties, of his responsibilities and the penalties of failure, which is sufficient for all practical guidance. There is philosophy in it most pure, there is intelligence most exalted, there is a key to mysteries which other theories and other books have left in their darkness. The preservation of the Jews, again, as a separate people, diffused everywhere yet not amalgamated with other nations, is accounted for in Scripture. The spread and prevalence of Christianity cease to be strange if we accept the narratives which we find in Scripture. A multitude of particular examples might be produced; it must suffice to say that, when we find here adequate reasons for what we see, we have no contemptible proof that the record which supplies them is truthful—more especially when we remember that this record was produced among a people whom the rest of the world have disliked and contemned, and that it is the only record which is in consistency with the moral condition of mankind. Can such a book be untrue? We should then have the marvel of mighty effects flowing from no adequate cause.

But, still further, we have collateral evidence of the truth of Scripture. Such collateral evidence, indeed, in regard to many parts of the Bible, it was hard to find. For several of the books comprised in it are, or at least profess to be, the most ancient in existence. Where there are no contemporary histories, we cannot look for that full authentication which is readily forthcoming in an age of books. The earliest facts of Scripture, then, are to be confirmed by traditions, by ritual observances, by inscriptions and monuments, all fragmentary in their nature, and such as it requires diligent research to collect and marshal. But the labors of archeologists have not been unrewarded. There are in various parts of the world traditions of the creation, the flood, the dispersion of mankind, the destruction of Sodom, etc., which, though distorted, must be taken to point to facts—the very facts which are detailed in Scripture. Writers have done good service in collecting these traditions. As we proceed down the stream of time, such corroborative evidence is more abundant and precise. The histories of Egypt, of Assyria, of Babylon, of Persia, of Rome, furnish much weighty attestation. We know from these independent sources how the Assyrian power extended itself, how great was the magnificence of Babylon, how that mighty city was captured by Cyrus, and how Judea was reduced to a Roman province—the very facts that we find narrated in Scripture. There is Josephus, also, the Jewish historian, living in the apostolic age, who draws out in his works the ancient fortunes of his people, and describes events passing before his eyes. The names of personages mentioned in Scripture repeatedly occur there; their actions are commemorated; their characters are described; and thus a general corroboration is given to the record. We must be prepared to find differences. Thus Tacitus the Roman writer (Hist., lib. v, 2-8) strangely misrepresents the origin of the Hebrew nation. Yet his narrative, warped as it was, goes to confirm the fact of the deliverance from Egypt, preserves the name of Moses, and exhibits some of those peculiar usages which the law, as we have it in the Pentateuch, distinctly specifies. There is also the testimony of writers immediately subsequent to the apostles, Christian, heretic and pagan, who concur for the most part in facts, however they may differ in interpretation or in the doctrines to be deduced from them. It is not too much to say that no history is so largely corroborated as the Scripture history, in all those ways which contribute to the settling of belief; so that, if we are to discredit the Scripture, to believe it a romance rather than a history, we are much more bound to discredit every history, of Greece, or Rome or England, which exists in literature.

It may be fairly supposed that there are now few persons—so strong is the confirmatory evidence—who do not admit the general credibility of the Scripture. But it has been alleged that with true history there is much mixed up that cannot be literally received; that a supernatural coloring has been given, a mythical or legendary element introduced, for which allowance must be made in sifting out real facts. These objections are directed almost exclusively against the miraculous parts of the Scripture narrative; and it is held that a writer whose grave account of kings and of the events in common life may be implicitly trusted, must be set down as a mere enthusiast, or as adopting pious fraud, when in the same paragraph he details with equal gravity the occurrence of a wonder or a sign. The subject of miracles we have not room to discuss here; but it may be well to remark that supernatural relations are so closely interwoven with the rest, that the events most objected to are so earnestly insisted on, being those in which the essence of Scripture teaching consists, that if you reject these as "unhistoric" there is little, if anything, that you can retain. Take, for example, the New Testament history; strip it of its supernatural character; suppose Jesus a mere man, born in a natural way, only living a peaceable, beneficent and philosophic life; suppose that He was put to death unjustly, but that His memory was fragrant among His followers, and that hence they endeavored to dignify Him by attributing to Him divine power, and maintaining that He was restored to life after His execution; denude His story of all that shows the direct interference of God, and what have you? The disciples contending, suffering, dying for a phantom. The whole is a mere episode. It is a foolish attempt to strain very ordinary occurrences into something marvelous. So that you cannot, if you set aside the wonderful, have anything worth preserving. All left, the Scripture must stand or fall together. (See Miracle.)

Besides, very many of the supernatural accounts in Scripture were written by those who profess to have been eye-witnesses of them. Even if we were to allow, which yet is by no means to be allowed, that those wrought at the deliverance from Egypt, in Babylon, etc., were chronicled only by later writers, yet we have, unquestionably, in the New Testament, the evidence of contemporaries. It cannot be said, then, that these extraordinary recitals are just the exaggerations with which credulous men or poets are wont to deck out events imperfectly known, dimmed with the haze of vast antiquity. They stand upon the same ground with the records of common occurrences; so that the fair inference is that the writers, if credible in the one class of narrative, are credible also for the other; if they can be convicted of untruthfulness in what they relate of supernatural events, it is useless to contend for their veracity as to other matters. This is the plain rule continually acted on in judicial enquiries. If a witness is corroborated so far as to gain credit for his statements generally, he is believed when he charges home a crime upon a culprit. The business of life could hardly otherwise go on.

But in addition to the more vague corroborations of Scripture, which have already been referred to, there are other testimonies of a more particular kind, which may be properly introduced here. They are the rather valuable, because they are independent; they are continually gaining force, and they apply to some of those statements which have been most keenly contested. It is true that we cannot point to a modern confirmation of miracle; but we can exhibit existing proofs of the fulfillment of Scripture prophecies. The present state of Babylon, of Tyre, of Jerusalem, of Judea generally, witnesses most forcibly to the credibility of Scripture. It is proved to demonstration that the threatenings against these countries and cities were uttered while they were prosperous and populous, at a time when no political foresight could have discovered the fate that was in reserve for them. It is proved to demonstration that the desolations occurred just as they had been long before described; and there they are at this very day, patent to all who will journey thither, testifying that the Scripture is true, and its declarations to be relied on.

Another branch of particular evidence is to be found in the relations travelers give us of the geography, the botany, the manners and customs of biblical countries. The Scripture is still the best guide-book to Palestine, which others can only illustrate. Towns and villages are found where Scripture places them; hills and mountains and springs and brooks are just as Scripture has described them; articles of food are still used such as Scripture mentions. And it is a general remark that men who have traveled in Scripture lands, even if they had their doubts before, have been convinced by what they saw of the credibility of Scripture writers. To those who have not had the advantage of visiting Palestine the published works of accomplished travelers have furnished nearly the same amount of testimony. Among such may be named Dr. Robinson's "Biblical Researches," and Dr. Thomson's "The Land and the Book." It would be perfectly useless to argue with any one who, in studying these works, did not find in them evidence not to be gainsaid, that the authors of Scripture wrote in good faith and are deserving of confidence. Such researches have furnished a full answer to innumerable objections. Thus, for instance, when it is said that in one small district of Bashan there were threescore great cities, "fenced with high walls, gates and bars," (Deut. iii, 4, 5; 1 Kings iv, 13), skeptics have been ready to deride the credulity of such as would receive the statement as a literal fact. But travelers have visited the region, and have found the cities, desolate, it is true, but still standing in their extraordinary grandeur, the massive walls there, the streets with their ancient pavement unbroken, the houses complete and habitable, as if finished only yesterday, and even the very doors and window shutters in their places.

Take, again, the account of St. Paul's voyage and shipwreck (Acts xxvii). Mr. James Smith, of Jordanhill, England, in his work, has carefully investigated the localities; he has ascertained the character of the prevalent winds; he has calculated, after communication with experienced naval officers, the rate of drift and the direction a vessel would naturally take.

and he finds the statements of Scripture minutely accurate. "A searching comparison of the narrative with the localities where the events so circumstantially related are said to have taken place, with the aids which recent advances in our knowledge of the geography and the navigation of the eastern part of the Mediterranean supply, account for every transaction, clear up every difficulty, and exhibit an agreement so perfect in all its parts as to admit of but one explanation, namely, that it is a narrative of real events, written by one personally engaged in them" (Introduct., p. xviii).

The explorations made of late years in Nineveh and Babylon have tended to confirm the credibility of Scripture in many disputed points. It is true that we must receive the evidence so produced with caution. Inscriptions and monumental records are more likely to exaggerate the successes than to chronicle the disasters of the people by whom they were made. We could not reasonably expect to find in Egyptian monuments any detail of the judgments which forced the release of Israel. Neither was it likely that Sennacherib would record the fatal overthrow, when by God's immediate power his vast army perished in Judea. But much information may be and has been obtained by incidental notices. Thus, it had been questioned whether such a king as Nebuchadnezzar ever reigned. His name, it was said, did not appear in Herodotus; and objectors, ready to avail themselves of every opportunity of carping at the sacred volume, if they did not deny the existence of the conqueror, at least insinuated that a petty satrap had been magnified into a great king. But now bricks in abundance have been disinterred, inscribed with the mighty Nebuchadnezzar's name, and proving that there was, indeed, foundation for the boast that it was he that had built and adorned his magnificent capital (Dan. iv, 30). Yet more serious doubt was expressed in regard to Belshazzar; and consequently the narrative of his feast and the awful signs which interrupted it was pronounced a fable. But it is now distinctly proved, by the discovery of unquestionable records, that a sovereign of that name was associated in power with his father, during the last days of Babylon's independence.

It would be easy to fill pages with particular examples of corroborative testimony to the truthfulness of Scripture, derived from coins, tombs, ancient seals, from the thousand particular monuments and existing proofs which God's providence has uncovered, to give living testimony of what occurred in ancient times. We have, therefore, the strongest reason to affirm that the Scripture writers were truthful, that the facts they chronicle really occurred, that the histories they deliver are credible. Nor is this evidence set aside by the assertion not unfrequently now made, that the later books of Scripture were the work of earnest, conscientious men, who have given us, indeed, truly, the facts of their own times, but who ignorantly attributed to the earlier books, the writings of a more remote age, that authority which they do not really possess, and who based much of their teaching upon fragments which are now found to crumble beneath the pressure. The credibility of the early part of Scripture has been proved beyond question by learned men, and the way in which Christ used the oldest portions of the Scriptures may well be taken as guiding us to a right estimation of their value. To those, indeed, who regard Him as a mere man, an appeal to His authority will seem of little weight. But with such the present argument does not deal. To men, however, who admit that Christ was a divinely-commissioned teacher, His sanction, not merely to the ordinary facts of Scripture, but to the supernatural occurrences therein narrated, is of infinite importance. He, the founder of the new dispensation, besides assuming, as the accounts we have of Him testify, the power of working miracles Himself, admitted without question the miracles of the Old Testament (e. g. Matt. xxiv, 37-39; Luke iv, 25-27), and threw no doubt upon the narrative which embodied in it such wonders. The only alternative which remains is, if the credit of these facts is denied, to deny the competency of our Lord as a public instructor, imputing to Him—with reverence be it spoken—ignorance and imperfection of judgment which would place Him far behind the doctors of the present age. It is trusted that no reader of the present article is prepared for this awful alternative.

In Scripture, then, we must acknowledge a book credible and of the highest authority, proceeding, as many other evidences might be adduced to show, from persons commissioned by the living God. The objections which have in modern times been urged against Revelation and Scripture truth do not really meet, much less disprove, the positive arguments by which its authority is affirmatively attested. Not a proposition of them has been overthrown; not an argument has been weakened; not a fact changed; not a conclusion even involved in a doubt. Such is the deliberate judgment of the wisest and best men of the age and the century.

Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America; Board of. The first Presbytery in the United States was formed about the year 1700. And the first Synod in 1717. On nearly every page of the Minutes of the first Presbytery and Synod, and afterward of the General Assembly, organized out of the Synod in 1789, are found what they called "supplications" from new and feeble and distant settlements, for missionaries, and the means to aid in their support. To secure the means, the Presbytery and the old Synod ordered annual collections from all their churches, to be used in the support of the missionaries in these feeble settlements. The first recorded grant of missionary money was made to the First Presbyterian congregation of New York, in 1719, to enable it to support the gospel.

The General Assembly was organized in 1789, out of the materials of the old Synod. At the very first meeting, it was unanimously resolved "to send forth missionaries, well qualified to be employed in mission work on our frontiers, for the purpose of organizing churches, administering ordinances, ordaining elders, collecting information concerning the state of religion in those parts, and proposing the best means of establishing a gospel ministry among the people." And in order to provide means for defraying "the necessary expenses of the mission, it is strictly enjoined on the several Presbyteries to have collections made during the present year, in the several congregations under our care, and forwarded to Isaac Snowden, Esq., Treasurer of the General Assembly, with all convenient speed." This collection amounted to £80 12s. 10d. The usual salary allowed a missionary was $400 per annum.

As the boundaries of the country grew, and its frontiers were extended South and West and North, and the importance of the work increased, the General Assembly appointed a Standing Committee of Missions, in 1802. Its nomination of missionaries was made to and confirmed by the General Assembly in open session.

The population increased, and settlements extended very rapidly, after the War of 1812. The missionary wants and work extended as rapidly as the population, and beyond the power of the Standing Committee on Missions to supply. To meet this growing demand, and render the management of the work more efficient than it could possibly be, either by the Standing Committee or the General Assembly itself, in the few days of its annual session, it organized, in May, 1816, "The Board of Missions." It was the first of all the Boards, and has been the model, ever since, for all similar agencies for the work of the Church.

After the organization of the Board, in 1816, the work of Home Missions increased in extent and interest rapidly, for ten or twelve years, until after the organization of the American Home Missionary Society, in New York, in 1826. After the division of 1838, the New School branch conducted its missionary affairs in connection with the American Home Missionary Society, until a conviction of the desirableness and necessity of distinctive denominational work led to the appointment of the Church Extension Committee, in 1855, which was merged, in 1861, into the organization of the Committee of Home Missions.

The Board of Missions remained after the division in 1838, in connection with the Old School branch, and was the instrumentality through which the Church labored to evangelize the land.

From 1802 to 1816, the Standing Committee of Missions sent out 311 missionaries, and collected $49,319.

The Board of Missions, from 1816 to the division in 1838, sent 2,486 missionaries, and collected $231,504.

From the division in 1838 to the reunion in 1870, the Board sent 16,113 missionaries, and collected $2,805,375.

After the organization of the Committee of Home Missions by the New School General Assembly, it sent forth, from 1861 to 1870 (the time of reunion), 3,281 missionaries, and collected $962,947. It is greatly to be regretted that the numbers of missionaries and the amounts of money contributed by the New School Presbyterian Church, from 1838 to 1861, to the American Home Missionary Society, cannot be ascertained. The number of missionaries is carefully estimated at about 8000.

The glorious reunion of the two Assemblies was accomplished in 1870. At the reunion the Board of Missions and the Committee of Home Missions were united under the legal name and style of "The Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America." The Board, since its reorganization in 1870, has sent out fifteen thousand nine hundred and seventy-two missionaries, and collected $47,319.89. Thus the Home Missionary work of the Church, before and during its division, and since its reunion, presents a grand total, from 1802 to 1883, of forty-six thousand nine hundred and sixty-three missionaries, and $7,818,217 contributed for the cause. In 1871 the reunited General Assembly organized the Sustentation Committee, which, in 1874, was transferred to the Board of Home Missions, to be conducted as a separate department. In 1878 the Woman's Executive Committee of Home Missions was organized, and became a department of the Board. In 1882 the Rev. Sheldon Jackson, D.D., offering to present the Board with the Rocky Mountain Presbyterian, which he had published since 1872 as a Home Mission paper, the offer was accepted, and the Board commenced the publication of the paper, as its official organ, under the name of Presbyterian Home Missions.

Hooper, T. W., D.D., is a son of Joseph and Elizabeth C. Hooper, and was born in Hanover county, Va., November 2d, 1832. He graduated with the first honor of his class, and took the Orator's medal of the Union Society, at Hampden-Sidney College, in 1855. Spending four months at Union Seminary, N. Y., he returned to Union Seminary, Va., from which he was called to be pastor of "Pole Green Church," where his father had been an elder, and he had been baptized in January, 1858. Having been licensed by Hanover Presbytery (N. S.) the year before, he was ordained and installed pastor in February, 1858.

In 1863 he was installed pastor of Liberty Church, and in September, 1865, he was installed pastor of Christiansburg Church. From here he was called to the Second Presbyterian Church of Lynchburg, Va., and was installed in September, 1870. From here he was called to the First Presbyterian Church, Selma, Ala., which he still served in November, 1876.

Dr. Hooper is a man of medium size, not very robust health, but known as one of activity and energy. For twelve years he was Stated Clerk of Montgomery Presbytery, and also chairman of the Presbyterial Committee of Home Missions. Having lived in different sections of his native State, there is not a city and scarcely a village in the State where he has not preached. He is also a trustee of Hampden-Sidney College, and the title of D.D. was conferred on him by Roanoke College, in 1876.

He has been a constant contributor to the secular and religious press for twenty-five years, as evinced by the columns of the Christian Observer, New York Observer, Central Presbyterian, etc. Several sermons and addresses of his have been published, and also two tracts, by the Presbyterian Board of Publication of Philadelphia, and two by the American Tract Society of New York.

At present he is pastor of the largest church in the Synod of Alabama, a member of the Executive Committee of the Colored Theological Institute at Tuska-loosa, and chairman of the Executive Committee of the Orphan's Home, at Tuskegee, Alabama.

Hope, Assurance of. There are three kinds of assurance spoken of in the Word of God. 1. "The assurance of understanding" (Col. ii, 2), which means a clear, comprehensive, heart-establishing acquaintance with divine truth. 2. "The assurance of faith" (Heb. x, 22), which signifies an entire persuasion of the truth of the gospel. 3. "The assurance of Hope" (Heb. vi, 11), which imports a confidence of personal interest in Christ.

How is a prevailing and satisfactory conclusion as to our spiritual state to be obtained? This is a most momentous question. It is said by the apostle, "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God" (Rom. viii, 16). Now, as it is witnessed, or testified by the Spirit, that we are the children of God, we naturally ask, in what manner is this testimony borne? This must either be in the way of a direct revelation to our mind, or by enabling us, on a comparison of the Spirit's work in the heart with the description of the Spirit's work in the Word, to draw the conclusion that we are truly born again. Some believe that there is granted to each regenerated soul a direct witness, in the way of suggestion, or impression, of its spiritual birth. This, however, does not appear to us to be the meaning of the apostle. It does not accord with the context, which is obviously practical, and speaks of the influence of the Spirit as received for mortification of sin, and for the productions of all the dispositions and habits of the Christian life, especially the spirit of adoption. It is unsupported by any other passage where assurance is spoken of; it would, if this were its meaning, come under the head of a revelation from God, and seem to require something else to authenticate it; it would open a door for mistake and self-deception; it has never been received by multitudes who have been sincerely and eminently pious, and it is unnecessary, because, without being supported by the inferential evidence, it is not to be trusted. It is much safer and more correct to consider the witness of the Spirit as purely inferential. The case stands thus: "The Holy Spirit speaks in the Word. The same Spirit operates in the heart. There must be a correspondence between His testimony in the Word and His operation in the heart. The evidence lies in this correspondence. We take the Divine Word as dictated by the Spirit, and containing a declaration of His mind; we see there what He testifies; we see especially the description which He there gives of the faith and character of God's children, of the principles and dispositions, the affections and desires, the hopes and fears, and the peculiar walk and conversation by which they are distinguished. If our spirits in the court of conscience, and before the Father of our spirits, bear witness to a correspondence between this description and what has been effected in us by the same Divine Agent, then there is a concurrence of the testimonies; the testimony of God's Spirit and the testimony of our spirits agree; the one witnesseth with the other. What the Spirit of God has wrought in us harmonizes with what the Spirit of God testifies in the Word; and in proportion as our spirits have the inward consciousness of this harmony, do we possess the witness of the Spirit to our being the children of God."

This is in strict accordance with what is said in other places of Scripture. "These things," says the apostle John, "have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God, that ye may know that ye have eternal life" (1 John, v 13). We are to know that we have eternal life, by the evidence of what is written, and, of course, by the comparison of our heart and life with it.

In reply to the question, how any one may know that he is a child of God, we answer, by consciousness, and a comparison of his state with the Word of God. The apostle says, "We are all the children of God by faith in Jesus Christ" (Gal. iii, 26). "I am conscious," says an assured Christian, "that I do believe, and therefore I know I am a child of God." And suppose he were in any doubt about the reality of his faith, he pursues the subject and says, "The Word of God says, 'in whom believing we rejoice;' I have peace and joy! To them that believe He is precious; Christ is precious to me. 'Faith worketh by love;' I love God, Christ, his people and holiness. 'This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith.' I have overcome the world. 'We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren;' I love the brethren; therefore, I conclude I am a child of God. The fruits of my faith which I discern in myself answer to the description of them given in the Word."

It is not, then, by any such methods as by dreams, or the suggestions of texts of Scripture to the mind, or visions, or impressions upon the mind, or strong persuasions of our eternal election, that we are to obtain this blessed hope of personal interest in the mercies of redemption, but by comparing our hearts with the Word of God. We will here quote the beautiful language of the celebrated RALPH CUDWORTH, in a sermon preached before the House of Commons during the Commonwealth: "The way to obtain a good assurance of our title to heaven, is not to climb up to it by a ladder of our own ungrounded persuasions, but to dig as low as hell, by humility and self-denial in our own hearts; and though this may seem the farthest way about, yet it is indeed the nearest and safest way to it. We must, as the Greek epigram speaks, 'ascend downward and descend upward,' if we would indeed come to heaven, or get any true persuasion of our title to it. The most triumphant confidence of a Christian riseth safely and surely on this low foundation, that lies deeper under ground, and there stands firmly and steadfastly. When our heart is once turned into a conformity with the Word of God, when we feel our will to concur with His will, we shall then personally perceive a spirit of adoption within ourselves, teaching us to say, Abba, Father. We shall not care then for peeping into the hidden records of eternity, to see whether our names be written there in golden characters; no, we shall find a copy of God's thoughts concerning us written in our own breasts. There we may read the characters of His favor toward us; there we may feel an inward sense of His love to us, flowing out of our hearty and unfeigned love to Him. And we shall be more undoubtedly persuaded of it, than if one of those winged watchmen above, that are privy to heaven's secrets, should come and tell us that they saw our names enrolled in those volumes of eternity."

In this way, and, as it appears to us, in this way only, is our personal interest in the blessings of salvation to be ascertained. It will be evident then, that our assurance will be more or less full, according to the measure of our piety. It admits of degrees of certainty, and these will be regulated by our degrees of vital, experimental godliness. Hence the force of the apostolic exhortation, to give all diligence to make our calling and our election sure; i. e., sure to ourselves, as a clear and well-attested fact, that we are called according to the purpose of God.

Hope, Rev. Matthew Boyd, M. D., was born in Millin county, Pa., July 31st, 1812. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1830, then studied theology at the Seminary at Princeton until 1832. Having concluded to go out as a missionary to India, he studied medicine at the University of Pennsylvania in the two following years, and was licensed and ordained as a missionary, by the Presbytery of Huntingdon, in 1835. He received an appointment from the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and labored two years at Singapore, an island off the northern extremity of the Malay peninsula, where he was sunstruck, and, on partial recovery, was recommended by his physicians to return to his native land. The homeward voyage was beneficial to him, and he was able, in a short time, to act as agent for the Colonization Society, and in 1839 he was appointed Financial Secretary to the Presbyterian Board of Education, and in 1842 Corresponding Secretary. In this office he continued until 1846; but in 1845 was elected to the Professorship of Belles Lettres and Political Economy in the College of New Jersey, a relation which he held until his death, which occurred December 17th, 1859. During his funeral all the places of business in Princeton were closed, as a mark of respect.

Dr. Hope was a man of great simplicity of manner, direct, yet full of genial kindness. His life was an earnest one—full of solemn purpose and active effort to do good. For years his strong and enterprising intellect had to effect its purposes through, and often in spite of, a frail and hopelessly shattered body. Although not a brilliant man, nor of extraordinary scholarship, yet as a faithful and effective worker, and a benign Christian power, Princeton has never enjoyed the labors of a superior to Dr. Hope.

Hopkins, Henry Harvey, D. D. Of the parentage of Mr. Hopkins, his earlier years and his education prior to his entering on the study of theology, we have been able to learn nothing. He was born in Chester county, Pa., November 12th, 1801; entered Princeton Seminary in the Fall of 1829; graduated there in 1832, and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle, April 4th, 1832. At his request he was dismissed to the Presbytery of Mississippi, December 25th, 1832. After preaching at Clinton about two years, he accepted a call to the churches of Big Spring and Taylorsville, Ky.; was received as a licentiate by the Presbytery of Louisville, October 2d, 1831, and installed as pastor April 25th, 1835. This relation continued about nine years, and was dissolved April 2d, 1844, but he continued to be a member of Louisville Presbytery for the remainder of his life. These nine years of his first pastorate were years of great profit, both to himself and to his people. He was active, laborious, and successful in his work, and his two churches became strong, both spiritually and externally.

After leaving his first pastorate, Dr. Hopkins took charge of the two churches at Cane Run and Plum Creek, in Shelby county, Kentucky, over which he was installed, in May, 1845. This relation was dissolved December 25th, 1846, as he had accepted an invitation to serve the Church at Owensboro, Ky. Over this, which was to be his longest and his last pastoral charge, he was installed May 1st, 1847. He served this important church more than twenty-two years, and his labors were followed by its steady growth and prosperity. He was obliged, by a bronchial affection which disabled him from preaching regularly, to resign his charge, and the pastoral relation was dissolved, October 19th, 1869. He continued, however, to the end of his life, to reside at Owensboro, always actively engaged, and embracing every opportunity to preach the gospel. He made a free use of the press in doing good, and made himself felt in the community in which he lived and died, as a wise and public-spirited citizen, as well as an earnest and spiritually-minded minister of the gospel. During his last illness, he evinced a firm faith in the goodness and the grace of God. He died April 19th, 1877.

Dr. Hopkins was a faithful and devoted pastor, a wise counsellor, practical, judicious, and of large Christian experience. He was a good Presbyterian, a good theologian, a good Greek, Latin and Hebrew scholar, a good preacher, and above all, a good man.

Hopkins, James S., son of John Hopkins and Mary S. Speed, and grandson of General Hopkins, of Revolutionary fame, was born at Danville, Ky., January 6th, 1799. Having studied law with his brother, Hon. John Speed Smith, he practiced that profession for only a short time. In 1825 he began farming, which he followed until death. In 1842, and chiefly through his influence, Boyle county was formed, and Mr. Hopkins was chosen its first representative in the Kentucky Legislature, to which he was returned during the seven succeeding years. In 1828 he united with the Church at Danville, and was soon after elected a ruling elder. During the years 1833-36 and 1849-58 he was a member of the Board of Trustees of Centre College, and for the last three of these years he was President of that Board. In 1858 he removed to Pettis county, Missouri, and was soon after chosen ruling elder in the First Church of Pettis, and continued such until June 24th, 1873, when he closed a protracted and useful life.

Mr. Hopkins was a man of fine natural intellect, a warm-hearted Christian, and, while always unassuming, his religion was conspicuous, and his influence for good marked, in whatever sphere he acted. To his large Christian liberality both the college and seminary at Danville are deeply indebted. His generous beneficence assisted many ministers in the course of their preparation. No enterprise of the Church was forgotten. He did what he could for the cause of his Master. A truly Christian gentleman, in business the soul of honor, cheerful, candid and pure in his daily life, sin felt rebuked in his presence. His acquaintances all loved him, while the young both honored and revered. A great sufferer for many months before his death, his faith in his Redeemer never wavered; no complaint, nor even an expression of impatience, escaped his lips. Active in Christian effort to the end, when James S. Hopkins died society and the Church suffered a heavy loss, but the Church of the First-born, which is written in heaven, received one more ransomed and happy accession.

Hopkins, Josiah, D. D., was born in Pittsford, Vermont, April 26th, 1785. He was installed pastor of the Congregational Church in New Haven, Vermont, in 1811. He subsequently became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Auburn, N. Y., but his health failing, he removed to Ohio, where he labored as a Home Missionary in several churches in the "Western Reserve." On his return, he took charge of the Presbyterian Church of Seneca Falls, N. Y. His last ministerial labors were performed with the Church of Union Springs, N. Y., and were blessed with a most precious revival. He died June 27th, 1862. Dr. Hopkins was earnest in his love of the truth, and his perceptions of it were clear and discriminating, his explanations harmonious, and his defence of it most hearty and faithful. He was often sought as a counsellor by others, while his genial and kindly spirit endeared him to all who approached him.

Hopkins, Myron P. was born at Warren, Conn., April 29th, 1806, and he died at Medina, N. Y., October 29th, 1878. He resided in Medina fifty years, and was a member of the Presbyterian Church there forty-four years, serving as a ruling elder thirty-eight years. He was "a good man and just." He was a man of positive character, and influentially connected with the business and spiritual interests of Medina for half a century. He was an able and a faithful elder, of good report, guileless, fervent in spirit, benevolent and kind, watchful and prayerful, respected and beloved, and great in personal consistency and goodness. To elder Myron P. Hopkins, as much as to any man, is the Church of Medina indebted for its present temporal and spiritual prosperity.

Hopkins, Hon. Samuel Miles, LL.D., was born in Salem, Conn., May 9th, 1772, and united with the church in Moscow, N. Y., in 1815. He graduated from Yale College in 1828. He was admitted to the Bar in 1793, and practiced his profession at Oxford, 1793-4; New York from 1794, and Albany, 1821-31. He was Judge of the Circuit Court of New York, and Trustee of Auburn Theological Seminary, 1832-6. He received the Degree of LL.D. from Yale College in 1828. Judge Hopkins published a volume of Chancery Reports, and various treatises on Temperance, State, and National Legislatures, Crime, Prison Discipline, etc. He died at Geneva, N. Y., March 9th, 1837.

Hopkins, Rev. Theodore W., was born in Cincinnati, O., January 5th, 1841. His father was one of the seceders from Lane Seminary, on anti-slavery grounds, and removed to Oberlin, O., in 1848, where Theodore pursued his preparatory studies, and nearly completed his college course. He subsequently spent two years in the study of English literature and vocal music, chiefly in New York. In September, 1862, he entered Junior at Yale College, and graduated July, 1864. The following year he was Principal of a musical school near Providence, R. I.; then, for four years, Assistant Principal of the Central High School of Cleveland, O. He pursued a full course of theological study in the Rochester Seminary, graduating in 1873. The same year he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Rochester, and called to the Chair of Church History in the Theological Seminary (Congregational), at Chicago, the duties of which he discharged with distinguished ability, the next seven years. June 29th, 1880, he was ordained as an evangelist by a Council in Chicago. When he resigned the Professorship it was his intention to devote himself to literary work, at home and abroad; eighteen months were thus employed, habitually preaching on the Sabbath, when the importunity of the Central Church of Rochester induced him to change his plans, and take their pastoral oversight. Here, for the past three years, his labors, in the pulpit and out of it, have been eminently satisfactory and successful. Beside furnishing various review articles, Mr. Hopkins has had printed, but not published, a valuable, scholarly work, on "The Doctrine of Inspiration; An Outline Historical Study." From early childhood he has been passionately fond of Church history, and his familiarity with its philosophy and events leads him not unfrequently to enrich his discourses with the most apt and striking illustrations from this source.

Hopkinsianism. The main principles of this theological system are either taught or implied in the writings of Dr. Samuel Hopkins, of Newport, R. I. Those principles have been unfolded and somewhat modified by his three friends, Dr. Stephen West, Dr. Nathanael Emmons and Dr. Samuel Spring. As logically connected with each other, and as understood by the majority of its advocates, the system contains the following principles: (1) Every moral agent choosing right has the natural power to choose wrong, and, choosing wrong, has the natural power to choose right. (2) He is under no obligation to perform an act, unless he has the natural ability to perform it. (3) Although in the act of choosing every man is as free as any moral agent can be, yet he is acted upon while he acts freely, and the divine providence, as well as decree, extends to all his wrong as really as to his right volitions. (4) All sin is so overruled by God as to become the occasion of good to the universe. (5) The holiness and the sinfulness of every moral agent belong to him personally and exclusively, and cannot be imputed, in a literal sense, to any other agent. (6) As the holiness and the sin of man are exercises of his will, there is neither holiness nor sin in his nature, viewed as distinct from these exercises. (7) As all his moral acts before regeneration are certain to be entirely sinful, no promise of regenerating grace is made to any of them. (8) The impenitent sinner is obligated, and should be exhorted, to cease from all impenitent acts, and to begin a holy life at once. His moral inability to obey this exhortation is not a literal inability, but is a mere certainty, that, while left to himself, he will sin, and this certainty is no reason for his not being required and urged to abstain immediately from all sin. (9) Every impenitent sinner should be willing to suffer the punishment which God wills to inflict upon him. In whatever sense he should submit to the Divine justice punishing other sinners, in that sense he should submit to the Divine justice punishing himself. In whatever sense the punishment of the finally obdurate promotes the highest good of the universe, in that sense he should be submissive to the Divine will in punishing himself, if finally obdurate. This principle is founded mainly on the two following. (10) All holiness consists in the elective preference of the greater above the smaller, and all sin consists in the elective preference of the smaller above the greater, good of sentient beings. (11) All the moral attributes of God are comprehended in general benevolence, which is essentially the same with general justice, and includes simple, complacential and composite benevolence, legislative, retributive and public justice. (12) The atonement of Christ consists not in his enduring the punishment threatened by the law, nor in his performing the duties required by the law, but in his manifesting and honoring by his pains, and especially by his death, all the divine attributes which would have been manifested in the same and no higher degree by the punishment of the redeemed. (13) The atonement was made for all men; the non-elect as really as the elect. The epithet "Hopkinsian" was invented in 1769 or 1770, by Rev. William Hart, of Saybrook, Conn., and was applied, not to the whole system of Dr. Hopkins, but to the principles marked (7) and (8) above.

Hornblower, William H., D.D., was the youngest child of Joseph Courten Hornblower, Chief Justice of New Jersey for fourteen years; who was the youngest child of Josiah Hornblower, an eminent patriot in the Revolutionary war, and a member of the first Congress of the United States of America; and of Mary Burnet, daughter of William Burnet, M. D., and grand-daughter of William Burnet, M. D., Surgeon General of the United States Army, in the Revolutionary war, first President of the New Jersey Medical Society, an influential and conspicuous man all his life. He was born March 21st, 1820, and graduated at Princeton College, 1838, and at Princeton Theological Seminary, 1843. After serving as a missionary in the pines of New Jersey for five months, he was ordained to the ministry, and installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Paterson, New Jersey, January 30th, 1844. October 1st, 1871, he became "Reunion Professor of Sacred Rhetoric, Church Government, and Pastoral Theology," of the Western Theological Seminary of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, at Allegheny, Pa. Dr. Hornblower filled, with ability and acceptableness, the eminent position in which the Church placed him, for training young men for the ministry. As a preacher, he was instructive and impressive. His life was one of growing usefulness, and he enjoyed the cordial esteem of his brethren, and of the people among whom he lived and labored. He died July 16th, 1883.

Horton, Rev. Azariah, graduated at Yale in 1735, and was ordained by New York Presbytery in 1740, and entered on his labors among the Indians on the east end of Long Island. Two churches still exist, the remains of the fruit of his toil; one at Poosepatrick, on the Great South Bay, in the south of Brookhaven, the other at Shinnecock, the largest settlement, two miles west of Southampton. He became pastor of South Hanover, N. J., the congregation having been set off from Hanover in 1748; for a long time it was called Battle Hill, and now is known as Madison. He was dismissed in November, 1776, and died March 20, 1777, aged sixty-two.

Horton, Rev. Francis Allen, was born in Philmont, Columbia county, N. Y. He graduated at Rutgers College, in 1862. After a three years' course of theological study at New Brunswick, N. J., he was licensed to preach by the Classis of Hudson. He was pastor at Glenham two years, when he accepted a call to the Reformed Church in Catskill, where he had a very successful pastorate of seven years. Nine years ago he was called to the Case Avenue Church in Cleveland, Ohio. Six months ago he was called to the pastorate of the large and prosperous Church in Oakland, Cal., which he accepted, and to which place he removed, in April, 1883. He left his Cleveland church with a large membership, strong in influence and in all respects prosperous. Mr. Horton's ministry in Cleveland was characterized by industry and great zeal in the service of the Master. Many souls were given him as seals of his ministry. Not only in Cleveland, but throughout his Presbytery and Synod his influence was felt for good. As a platform orator he excelled, and his many addresses in behalf of the several causes of benevolence quickened many a church to increased liberality.

Horton, George Firman, M. D., was born in Terrytown, Pa., January 2d, 1806. He graduated at the Van Rensselaer School (now the Van Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute), of Troy, N. Y. After studying medicine under Dr. Samuel Hayden, he commenced practice in 1829, at his native place, where he has always lived, and where he has continued in the work of his profession for fifty-four years. He soon acquired an extensive practice and a wide reputation as an able physician and a skillful surgeon, and has been a frequent contributor to medical societies and periodicals. He has been one of the most active members of the Bradford County Medical Society from its organization. He is a member of the Pennsylvania State Medical Society, which elected him its presiding officer in June, 1862, also of the American Medical Association, and honorary member of other medical societies.

Though constantly engaged in the work of his profession, Dr. Horton has not been indifferent to other literary pursuits, and especially Natural History, of which he has been an enthusiastic student. In 1858 he wrote the report of the geology of Bradford county, which, accompanied by a map, was published in the "Transactions" for that year. In 1876 he published the "Chronicles of the Horton Family." In the Fall of 1872 he was elected delegate from the Fourteenth Senatorial district of Pennsylvania to the Convention for revising the Constitution of the State, the duties of which position he performed with credit to himself and satisfaction to his constituents. Dr. Horton took a leading part in the early discussions on the question of Temperance. For more than forty years he has been a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church. Since the organization of the church at Terrytown, he has taken a prominent place in its active work, and he is a frequent attendant of the meetings of Presbytery and Synod. In all the walks of life he has exemplified the truth, that "the Christian is the highest style of man."

Houston, Rev. Alexander, received his license from the Presbytery of Lewes, about 1763, and was ordained in 1764, and installed as pastor of Murderhill and Three Runs churches, in Delaware, where he remained until his death, January 3d, 1785. Mr. Houston was a man greatly beloved, and a most earnest and laborious minister. Many tears were shed at his early decease.

Hovey, Jonathan Parsons, D.D., was born in Waybridge, Vermont, October 10th, 1810, received his collegiate education at Jacksonville, Ill., and at South Hanover, Ind.; studied theology at the Auburn Theological Seminary, and was ordained in March, 1837. He had four different settlements, at Gaines, N. Y., at Burdette, N. Y., at Richmond, Va., and in New York city, where he was installed pastor of the Eleventh Presbyterian Church, September 23d, 1850. Dr. Hovey labored in this field for thirteen years, with great earnestness and with truly remarkable success. He commanded the confidence and affection of his brethren in the ministry to a degree that is not often equaled. Large numbers were added to the church through his instrumentality. He was prudent, discreet, genial and sympathetic, faithful and earnest as a pastor. His preaching was peculiarly evangelical, solemn and effective, keeping ever in view the one object—the salvation of souls. Dr. Hovey died December 16th, 1863.

Howard, William D., D.D., was born in Philadelphia, July 28th, 1814. At the age of fifteen he became a member of the Second Presbyterian Church of that city, then under the care of the Rev. Joseph Sanford. In the following year he began his studies with a view to the ministry, in the Manual Latin Academy at Germantown, Pa. When this Institution was merged into Lafayette College, at Easton, he removed to that place and continued his studies there. In 1833 he returned to Germantown, and pursued theological studies under the superintendence of the Rev. William Neill, D. D. He was licensed to preach by the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia, October, 1837, and on March 13th, 1838, he was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Frankford, Pa. Here his ministry was a highly successful one. On May 16th, 1849, he was installed pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Pittsburg, and continued in this relation until his death, September 22d, 1876. Under his ministry the church greatly prospered, and increased largely in numbers, liberality and efficiency.

For several years Dr. Howard was a Trustee of Washington College, Pa. He was President of the Board of Trustees of the Western University of Pennsylvania. In 1849 he was elected a Director of the Western Theological Seminary. For many years he was a member of the Boards of Foreign and Domestic Missions of the Presbyterian Church. From the organization of the General Assembly's Committee on Freedmen, he was a member of it, and was, for the first year, its Chairman. In 1857 he preached a sermon before the General Assembly, at Lexington, Ky., by appointment of the previous Assembly, in behalf of Domestic Missions. This discourse was afterwards published by the Board. He was the author of many sermons, published by request. A number of these were preached before the Synod of Pittsburg; the others were delivered on various special occasions, as installations, in commemoration of deceased friends in the ministry, etc. Dr. Howard was a fine specimen of a Christian gentleman. As a friend, he was sincere and ardent. His preaching was earnest and instructive. As a Presbyterian, he was faithful to duty; and as a pastor, he was universally beloved and abundantly useful.

Howe, Rev. John, was a native of South Carolina, and was in part educated there. He pursued his classical studies in the Transylvania Seminary, and subsequently studied theology under the Rev. James Crawford, then pastor of Walnut Hill Church. He was licensed to preach by the Transylvania Presbytery, in 1795. For several years he preached alternately in Glasgow, the county seat of Barren, and Beaver Creek Church, in the same county, at the same time being engaged in teaching a school. Subsequently, he taught some eighteen years in Greensburg, Greene county, preaching during the time, to two small congregations in the neighborhood. In advanced life he went to Missouri to reside with his daughter, where he died, December 21st, 1856. He is represented as having been an uncommonly amiable man, remarkably unostentatious in his manners, and a very popular and successful preacher.

Howe, Samuel Henry, D. D., was born in Fleming county, Kentucky, December 18th, 1837. Graduating A. B. at Hanover College, Indiana, in 1861, and receiving his theological education at Princeton Seminary, he was licensed by the Presbytery of Madison in 1864, and ordained the following year by the Presbytery of Vincennes. He has filled four charges: Vincennes, Ind. (1865-7), Independence, Mo. (1867-69), Cortland, N. Y. (1869-72), and Georgetown, D. C., where, from 1872 to the autumn of 1883, he continued to labor, at which time he was installed pastor of the Park Congregational Church, Norwich, Connecticut. His pastorates have been in a high degree harmonious and successful. A Christian character, of profound sensibility and wide sympathies, has always enshrined him in the warm love and confidence of his people. As a preacher, he is eminently acceptable, a pervasive spirituality making luminous a pure natural taste and fine culture. His publications have been a number of occasional sermons. The honorary degree of D. D. was conferred upon him in 1877.

Howell, Lewis, was a native of Missouri, having been born in St. Louis county, in the year 1800. When quite a young man he united with the Dardenne Church, in St. Charles county; about the year 1826 became a ruling elder in the same, and continued in this relation for fifty years. In him, from the day of his conversion to the close of his active and useful life (1876), the power and purity of the gospel of Christ shone with undiminished splendor. One who was his pastor for thirty-four years testifies that "his zeal for the glory of God, the welfare of his Church, and the salvation of souls was absorbing." No one ever suspected that he was, in the least, recreant to his trusts or neglectful of any duty. His piety was a constant flame, and his path that of the just. He was a teacher in God's house, as well as a ruler, joyfully and profitably leading the people in public worship in the absence of a minister to break to them the bread of life. In the Sabbath-school work he was actively engaged as superintendent, from youth to old age. From house to house he carried the tidings of salvation, superintended the financial affairs of the church, kept its records, faithfully attended the Church courts in the face of hardships, constrained always by the love of Christ. He was universally recognized as a great and good man in Israel, bestowing his charities with a liberal hand, and bringing forth daily the fruits of righteousness and peace.

Howell, Rev. Lewis Dunham, was born in Albany, N. Y., December 25th, 1803. He graduated from Cincinnati College in 1822, and was Tutor there 1822-3. He studied theology at Auburn Seminary, and was ordained at Cincinnati, O., by Presbytery, April 26th, 1830. He was pastor of the Church at Springport, N. Y., 1828-9, and of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati, O., 1830-1; Professor of Languages in Lane Seminary nearly two years; pastor at Maysville, Ky., 1832-3; Binghamton, N. Y., 1834; Springport, 1835; of the Congregational Church Derby, Vt., 1836-8, and at Onondaga Hollow, N. Y., 1839. He was Agent of the American Tract Society, for Western New York, 1839-42, and of the Educational Society, residing in Geneva, from 1842. He died at Geneva, September 5th, 1846.

Howey, Rev. J. Dagg, was born in Carroll county, Ohio. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1856; at the Western Theological Seminary in 1859, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Steubenville, and ordained and installed over the churches of Sugar and Mill Creeks, by the Presbytery of Venango, in September, 1859. After a successful pastorate of six years, in which his work was greatly blessed, he was called to Chesterville, Ohio, in 1862, but declined the call. He removed to Ohio in 1865, and took charge of the churches of Worthington and Liberty, till 1869, which were greatly revived and strengthened by his ministry. In August, 1869, he removed to Illinois, and took charge of the Church at Vermont, which was also greatly revived under his ministry. He was called to the Church of Prairie City in 1871, and was installed pastor and remained five years, during which there were three special revivals. He was called to Kewancee, October, 1876, and remained three years, and was favored with a precious ingathering of souls. He is now pastor of the Church of Altona, Knox county where he is blessed in his work.

Hoyt, Ova Phelps, D. D., was born in New Haven, Vt., May 26th, 1800; graduated at Middleburg College, in 1821; finished his theological course at Andover, in 1824, and was soon licensed by a Congregational Association. He was pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Potsdam, N. Y., from 1825 until 1830. From Potsdam he went into the agency of the American Home Missionary Society, and resided in Utica. While there he edited the Western Recorder, for a year and a half. Afterward he was pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Old Cambridge, N. Y., where he remained until 1838. Having resigned this charge, he continued to act as Secretary for the American Home Mission Society, and resided in Cleveland, O., for a time, and as stated supply of the First Presbyterian Church in Detroit, Mich. In the Spring of 1840 he was called to Kalamazoo, Mich., and was pastor of the Presbyterian Church in that place until 1849, when he became District Secretary for Michigan and Northern Indiana, of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, in which work he continued ten years. In 1861 he became stated supply, for a few years, of the Church in Elkhart, Ind. He died February 11th, 1866.

Dr. Hoyt was successful and greatly beloved in all the congregations to which he ministered. His ardent love for God and man was under the control of a well-balanced and cultivated mind. He was gentle and courteous to all. As a pastor he was most discreet in his words and acts, and his influence was always on the side of peace and love. As a preacher his manner was impressive, and his matter sound and instructive. His death was a fitting close to a beautiful life, in its peace and triumphant hope.

Hubbell, Rev. Nathanael, graduated at Yale in 1723, and became the pastor of Westfield and Hanover, N. J., in 1727, the latter including the present congregations of Morristown, Chatham, and Parsippany. The Westfield congregation gave him as "a settlement," on his accepting their call, one hundred acres of their parsonage lands, in fee-simple, and it would appear that Hanover congregation did the same. "A settlement" was the uniform New England custom, and was frequent in Pennsylvania, it being understood that the minister was to spend his days in their service. At Westfield, all who chose bound themselves by a covenant to be assessed according to their property, to make up whatever was deficient in the pastor's salary. In 1730, Mr. Hubbell gave up the charge of Hanover. His death occurred about 1745.

Hubbell, Rev. William Stone, son of Stephen Hubbell and Martha Stone Hubbell, was born at Wolcottville, Conn., April 19th, 1839; graduated at Yale College in the class of 1858, entered the Junior Class of Andover Theological Seminary in the Autumn of 1859, and studied there two years, afterwards spending another year in that institution. His mother was the author of a well-known little volume entitled "The Shady Side."

Mr. Hubbell was assistant minister to Rev. Dr. Richard S. Storrs, at Braintree, Mass., from September 1866 to January, 1868; was ordained pastor of the South Evangelical Church, West Roxbury, Mass.,

January 29th, 1868; was installed over the First Congregational Church of Somerville, Mass., January 31st, 1872; and was installed pastor of the North Church, Buffalo, December 22d, 1881. As a minister Mr. Hubbell has everywhere inspired for himself the warmest personal friendships. A ready, fluent and forcible speaker, with remarkably felicitous diction and graceful manners, he never wearies and is always instructive.

Hudson, Thomas Boyd, D. D., was born in Auburn, N. Y., July 8th, 1826; was graduated from Hamilton College in 1851; served the college two years as a Tutor, 1854-6, and received from its trustees the Doctorate of Divinity in 1871. He was graduated from Auburn Theological Seminary in May, 1859, and in August, 1859, was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Union Springs, N. Y. He was pastor at Fulton, N. Y., 1862-3, and at Northeast, Pa., 1864-9. In 1869 he was called to succeed Rev. Dr. Albert Erdman, as pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Clinton, N. Y. Here he has labored fourteen years, with well-directed earnestness and fidelity. The burning of the historic "Old Stone Church," of Clinton, in 1876, brought to a severe test his various gifts of wisdom, patience, enthusiasm and influence in the community, and the rebuilding of the church on a larger scale turned a seeming disaster into an agency for growth and permanent prosperity. As a preacher, Dr. Hudson presents the truths of the gospel with clearness, simplicity and power. As a pastor, he knows how to combine courtesy and tenderness with a fearless discharge of duty. His pastorate is of longer standing than any other now unfinished in the Utica Presbytery. His church has nine elders, each holding office for three years. In its membership and contributions to benevolent objects, his church holds the fourth place in the Utica Presbytery, the larger churches being in Utica and Rome. Dr. Hudson is dearly loved by his people, who lean upon his strength and sympathy in hours of trial, and are heartily with him in all efforts to promote the welfare of the church.

Huey, Samuel Culbertson, son of John Huey and Margaret Culbertson, was born in Indiana, Pa., on July 21st, 1813. His parents were both members of the Presbyterian Church. He removed to Pittsburg in 1828, and in 1834 united with the First Associate Reformed Church, then under the care of Rev. Joseph R. Kerr. In 1844 he removed to Philadelphia, where he connected himself with the First Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church (now the Second United Presbyterian Church) Rev. Dr. J. B. Dales pastor. In 1845 he was elected a trustee and Superintendent of the Sabbath school. In 1846 he was elected a ruling elder, but declined to serve. In 1848 he was again elected and duly ordained. In 1861, having become a resident of West Philadelphia, he started a mission school at the corner of Lancaster avenue and Market street, and for several years superintended it. Out of this mission has grown the Tenth United Presbyterian Church. In 1870 he became a ruling elder in the North United Presbyterian Church, and when, in 1875, its members organized the "Church of the Covenant," Presbyterian, he was elected and installed as one of its elders. He remained in that church until 1881, when he united with the North Broad Street Presbyterian Church, where he now worships.

Mr. Huey was a merchant, from boyhood until January 1st, 1870, when he was elected President of the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company of Philadelphia, which position he still holds. He has repeatedly been a delegate to Synod and General Assembly, and has always been a liberal supporter of all the benevolences of the Church, and of his city. As an instance of perseverance in well doing, it may be mentioned that he became a teacher in the Sabbath school in 1831, and continued in the service, as teacher and superintendent, until 1877, a period of forty-six years.

Hughes, Rev. James, was a native of York county, Pa. About the year 1780 he removed, with his mother and family, to Washington county, his father having died about a year before. His education, so far as is known, was prosecuted under the direction of the Rev. Joseph Smith, of Upper Buffalo, in that county, with whom it is also probable that he studied theology. While associated with Mr. Dod he acquired, or rather there was developed in him, a taste for the accuracies and intricacies of science, which he still improved, until he became the first President of Miami University. Mr. Hughes was licensed to preach the gospel, April 15th, 1788, by the Presbytery of Redstone, being the first preacher of the gospel licensed in the West. His labors seem to have been very acceptable to the churches, as three several calls were presented to him, one from the united congregations of Short Creek and Lower Buffalo, one from Donegal, Fairfield and Wheatfield, and one from New Providence and the South Fork of Ten-Mile. The first of these calls he accepted, and was ordained by the same Presbytery, and installed the pastor of Short Creek and Lower Buffalo, April 21st, 1790.

Hughes, Rev. Samuel Kelso, was born August 11th, 1818, near Lebanon, Ky., and was the son of Edward and Letitia W. (Reid) Hughes. His early life was spent on a farm. In the eighteenth year of his age he gave his heart to Christ, and devoted himself to His service in the ministry. He studied for some time at Centre College, Ky., but afterwards went to Jefferson College, Pa., from which he was graduated in 1842. He immediately afterwards entered Princeton Seminary, where he spent three years, and was regularly graduated in 1845. He was licensed April 23d, 1845, by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, after which he spent some time in missionary work in Kentucky and Missouri, but finally preached as a licentiate and supply, for the churches of Worthington and Liberty, in Columbus Presbytery, Ohio, from April, 1848, to April, 1849. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Marion, October 16th, 1849, and afterwards served the united churches of Liberty and Radnor, until the Spring of 1853, when he relinquished the church of Liberty, but continued to supply that at Radnor, in connection with two small churches in the vicinity, until the Spring of 1855, when he was installed pastor of Chesterville Church, Ohio, in September, 1855. From this charge he was released April 15th, 1858. At the same time he supplied the Church at Harmony. Both of these enjoyed times of precious refreshing under his care. In 1859 he became stated supply of Canaan Church. In the Spring of 1861 he became stated supply of the churches of Mt. Salem and West Unity, in the Presbytery of Maumee, but after about a year of active service his health failed, and he retired to a farm near by, in hope of recovery from open air exercise. On this farm he continued to live until his death, earnestly preaching, however, from time to time, as he had strength and opportunity. When, in the Winter of 1866, God poured out His Spirit upon the churches of Mt. Salem and West Unity, the services of Mr. Hughes were very precious to them. He died at his home, near West Unity, Williams county, Ohio, May 18th, 1878.

Hughes, Rev. Thomas Edgar, was from York county, Pa. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Ohio, October 17th, 1798. On the 27th of August, 1799, he was ordained and installed pastor of the Church of Mount Pleasant, Beaver county, Pa., where he labored successfully for upwards of thirty years. He afterwards removed to Wellsville, Ohio, and was pastor of a Presbyterian church in that place for three years. He died, May 2d, 1838. He was the first minister of the gospel who settled north of the Ohio river. He performed at least two missionary tours to the Indians on the Sandusky river, and in the neighborhood of Detroit.

Hughes, Rev. William, son of the Rev. Thomas Edgar and Mary (Donahy) Hughes, was born at Griersburg (now Darlington), Beaver county, Pa., May 20th, 1802. He was graduated from Jefferson College, Pa., A. D., 1826. After leaving college, he spent about eighteen months at home, pursuing his studies with a view to the ministry, under the guidance of his father, and subsequently entered Princeton Seminary, in the Fall of 1827, where he remained one year. He was licensed June 24th, 1829, by the Presbytery of Hartford (afterwards Beaver, and now Shenango), and was ordained an evangelist, by the same Presbytery, April 5th, 1830. A few weeks after his licensure he began preaching to a small church at Perrysville, Ashland county, Ohio, and at other points in the surrounding country, as a missionary. On this field of his first choice he continued to labor through the whole of his long life. April 12th, 1836, he was installed as pastor over Perrysville and Lake Fork Cross Roads churches, by the Presbytery of Richland. His relation to the second of these was dissolved April 8th, 1851. Two of his other preaching stations, viz.: Loudonville and Clear Fork, were subsequently organized into churches, towards which he sustained the relation of pastor for longer or shorter periods. Over Loudonville Church he was installed in June, 1851, for one-third of his time, and was released from it April 14th, 1859; and over the Church of Clear Fork he was installed in 1854, and from it he was released October 14th, 1863. He remained pastor of Perrysville Church until released, October 20th, 1866. Mr. Hughes' influence was widely felt for good. He was an industrious and faithful minister of the gospel, possessing great force of character, was genial and pleasant in manners and conversation, and a favorite with both the aged and the young. He was of a Levitical family, the son of a minister, the brother of three ministers, and the father of three more. He died, August 1st, 1880, in the exercise of cheerful faith, peace and hope.

Huguenot Church, Charleston, S. C. This is the only one remaining of four churches founded by the French Protestants who fled to South Carolina on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Three of these churches, established outside of the city, were at length merged in the English Establishment. The church in Charleston remains as the sacred and endeared depository of the faith, and memorial of the faithfulness of the Huguenot exiles. It was at first called "L'Eglise Reformee Francaise de Charleston." Its date is nearly coeval with that of the city itself. Documentary evidence exists of its organization in 1686. The first edifice, built upon the present site, was destroyed by fire in 1710, and with it the early records. The second church building was also consumed, in the great fire of 1796, and the pastor, the Rev. Mr. Bourdillon, died soon after, from exhaustion caused by his efforts to save the church edifice from the flames. It was soon rebuilt, the new building afterwards replaced by the present chaste and beautiful Gothic temple, in 1845, and the services continued. During the late civil war the church building was injured by shells. The injury was fully repaired. The interior walls of the building are adorned with beautiful memorial tablets to the early exiles. Prominent among these is that to the Rev. Elias Prioleau, the first pastor, whose descendants are still officers and members of the Church. The doctrines of the Church are set forth in the articles entitled, "A Confession of Faith, Made by Common Consent of the Reformed Churches of the Kingdom of France," in 1539. It was composed by John Calvin. The administration of the Church is by a Consistory of Elders, elected periodically, of which Consistory the pastor is President. The temporal affairs of the Church are in the care of a Board of Corporators. The service is almost wholly liturgical, the form of worship being that of the churches of Neufchâtel and Vallangin, editions of 1737 and 1772, translated into English. Among the pastors of the Huguenot Church have been the Revs. Pierre Lescot, Francis Guischart, John Pierre Tetard, Bartholemi Henri Himeli, Pierre Lerrier, John Paul Coste, Peter Daniel Bourdillon, Martin De Lamy, Robert Henry, Mr. Courlat, Charles Wallace Howard, T. R. G. Peck. The present pastor, who was called in 1866, is Charles S. Vedder, D. D. The Church is well endowed with means.

Huguenots, a designation given to the Reformed, or Calvinists, of France. The origin of the word is involved in great obscurity. Though Francis I used every effort to prevent the principles of the Reformation from spreading in France, and persecuted the Calvinists, by whom they were most zealously propagated, yet they took root in the same proportion as they were attempted to be suppressed. The persecutions of such as professed them were frequently most cruel and bloody, owing to the cupidity of certain parties at court, who thought to enrich themselves by seizing on the estates of the heretics. Under Francis II. the Huguenots were made a hand-bill to gratify the political intrigues of the day. They were dreadfully harassed by the Princes of the House of Guise, through whose influence a chamber of Parliament was established, called the burning chamber, the duty of which was to convict and burn heretics. Still they suffered in a most exemplary manner, and would not have thought of a rebellion, had they not been encouraged to it, in 1560, by a prince of the blood, Louis of Condé, to whom they leagued themselves, having previously consulted lawyers and theologians, both in France and Germany, as to the legality of such a measure. In pursuance of their plan, it was determined that on an appointed day a certain number of Calvinists should appear before the King at Blois, to present a petition for the free exercise of their religion, and in case this request was denied, as it was foreseen it would be, a chosen band of armed Protestants were to make themselves masters of the city at Blois, seize the Guises, and compel the King to name the Prince of Condé regent of the realm. The plot, however, was betrayed, and most of the armed conspirators were executed or imprisoned. The contest between the two parties became yet more violent in the reign of Charles IX, but, from motives of policy, the Protestants were allowed the privilege of toleration, chiefly owing to the influence of the Queen mother; but her instability and intrigues at last only rendered their case the more deplorable, and produced the horrible St. Bartholomew massacre, in 1572. After many struggles, they had their civil rights secured to them under Henry IV, by the Edict of Nantes, in 1598, which gave them equal claims, with the Catholics, to all offices and dignities, and left them in possession of the fortresses which had been ceded to them. In the reign of Louis XIII they were again molested, again took arms, but were again worsted, and ultimately obliged to surrender all their strongholds. They were now left at the mercy of the monarch, but were not disturbed till Louis XIV, led on by his confessor and Madame de Maintenon, was induced to persecute them, with a view to bring them back to the true Church. In 1681 he deprived them of most of their civil rights, and sent large bodies of dragoons into the provinces, to compel them to renounce their principles. Though the frontiers were vigilantly guarded, upwards of five hundred thousand Huguenots made their escape to Switzerland, Germany, Holland and England. Supposing them either to be extirpated or converted to Catholicism, Louis revoked the Edict of Nantes, in 1685.

Long before the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, the stream of Huguenot emigration set in toward New Netherland. The first band of settlers, sent over (1623) by the Dutch West India Company, consisted of thirty families, chiefly Walloons. These were the founders of the city of New Amsterdam (New York), where French was spoken, and the Huguenot faith was professed from the outset. Other Walloons and French settled at an early day on Long Island and Staten Island, and upon the banks of the Delaware, and, in 1660, founded New Paltz on the Hudson. As the severities visited upon the Protestants in France increased, large numbers of refugees came to this country, establishing themselves in New York, in Boston, in Maryland and Virginia, and in Charleston, S. C. Detachments from these bodies of emigrants settled in Oxford, Mass.; Kingston, R. I.; New Rochelle, N. Y., and on the Cooper and Santee rivers, South Carolina. In all these places churches were organized, and ministers of the French Reformed Church officiated. The French settlements in Oxford, Mass., and Kingston, R. I., were soon broken up; the others continued for several generations to maintain a distinct character. The French Church in Boston lasted until the year 1748, having for its pastors Pierre Daillé (1696-1715) and André Le Mercier (1716-48). The French congregation in New York, long flourishing and influential, had a succession of Reformed pastors, the last of whom submitted to Episcopal ordination in 1806, when the Church adopted the Episcopal rite, and took the name of "L'Eglise du Saint Esprit." In New Rochelle, N. Y., two churches were maintained almost until the outbreak of the American Revolution, the French Reformed Church, founded in 1688, and a French Episcopal Church, organized in 1709. In New Paltz the Dutch language superseded the French in public worship, about the year 1735. Three of the four Huguenot congregations of South Carolina went out of existence, or became merged with neighboring English-speaking churches; the French Church in Charleston, of which an account precedes, alone survives to the present day.

No precise statement can be ventured as to the number of Huguenots that came to America, but it is certain that they must have reached several thousands. The influence of this element in moulding the character of the American people has been considerable, and out of all proportion to the extent of the immigration; and the prominence of Huguenot names in the roll of patriots, statesmen, philanthropists, ministers of the gospel, men of note in every calling, in the United States, is a noticeable and significant fact.

Humility, a virtue opposed to pride and self-conceit, by reason of which a man thinks no more highly of himself than he ought to think (Rom. xii, 3), and places himself in subjection to him to whom he owes subjection. This person is primarily God; so that humility is, first of all, the sense of absolute dependence upon Him. In the strict sense of the term, humility is proper only in man's relations to God, and modesty in man's relations to man. It is not merely the sense of God's infinitude over against human limitation, but of God's holiness over against man's moral deficiency and guilt. Sophocles came nearest to the true conception of humility in classical antiquity. It runs like a thread through all the piety of the Old Testament (Gen. xvii, 1; Mic. vi, 8), down to John the Baptist (Matt. iii, 2). Christ, although without sin, was imbued with childlike humility (Matt. xix, 17; John v, 30), and made it a condition of entrance into the kingdom of heaven (Matt. v, 3; xviii, 2). It must actuate the Christian at all times, and remind him to work out his salvation with fear and trembling (Phil. ii, 12). Love, which is the pulse-beat of the Christian life, is influenced by it, and held back from the errors of mysticism and quietism, and converts it into adoring reverence for God, trust in and obedience to Him, even in sufferings (1 Peter v, 6). A sham humility betrays itself in its behavior to mankind (Luke xviii, 13). It is free from all vain self-conceit, but, at the same time, is conscious of man's dignity in the sight of God, and may be said to ascend upward on the six steps of patience, meekness, kindness, friendliness, peaceableness and placability, virtues which the Apostles so urgently insist upon.

Humphrey, Edward Porter, D. D., LL. D., eldest child of Rev. Dr. Heman and Sophia Porter Humphrey, was born in Fairfield, Conn., January 28th, 1809. He graduated at Amherst College in 1828, and in theology, at Andover Theological Seminary in 1833. He was pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Louisville, Ky., 1835-53. Elected Professor of Church History in Danville Theological Seminary in 1853, he continued in this position until 1866. From 1866 to 1870 he was pastor of the College Street Presbyterian Church in Louisville, Kentucky. He was joint editor of the Danville Review in 1861-65.

Dr. Humphrey was elected Moderator of the General Assembly which met in St. Louis, Mo., in 1851, and presided over its deliberations with great dignity and ability. He is a gentleman of cultivated manner and winning address. As a preacher he stands in the front rank. His sermons are clear, logical, direct, full of instruction, indicating an earnest spirit, expressed in the happiest style, and having the advantage of a graceful delivery. In his pastoral charges he was eminently successful, and greatly beloved by the people to whom he ministered and the community in which he lived. As a Professor he was thorough in his instructions, and won the cordial esteem and regard of his students. As a writer he is vigorous and attractive, always exhibiting a force and freshness which both edify and please. In the judicatories of the Church, in which he takes an active part, he is regarded as a wise counsellor, and exerts a strong influence by his ability as a speaker, his soundness of judgment and his manifest sincerity of motive and purpose. Dr. Humphrey now resides in Louisville. In October, 1883, by appointment, he made an address at the Centennial of Presbyterianism in Kentucky, before the Synod. His life has been one of marked usefulness and merited honor.

Humphrey, Rev. John, born in Fairfield, Conn., March 17th, 1816, was the son of Heman Humphrey, D. D., LL. D. He graduated at Amherst College in 1835, with an enviable name for scholarship and deportment. For a year he was the popular Principal of the Academy at Prattsburg, N. Y. After graduating at Andover Theological Seminary, he became pastor of the Church in South Berwick, Me. Here he remained but a few months, and then supplied a pulpit for some time, in Springfield, Mass. October, 1842, he took charge of the Winthrop Church, Charlestown, Mass., where for three or four years he preached, with great acceptance, but his constitution was impaired, and he sought escape from the strain upon it, in repose at Pittsfield. So much refreshed did he feel, that early in 1848 he ventured on the care of the First Church, Binghamton, N. Y., but overcome by it, he was obliged to ask a dismissal, March, 1854. He then consented to serve as Professor of Rhetoric in Hamilton College, and as pastor of the students, but before entering upon the duties of the place he went to Europe, with the hope of invigorating his health. This hope was not realized, and he returned to his home to die. This event occurred December 24th. Mr. Humphrey was remarkable for amenity of manners, gentleness and affectionateness, sweetness of temper, refinement and delicacy of feeling, scholarly culture, and a beautiful harmony of mental development and moral character. As a preacher he was both attractive and impressive, his style blending, in happy proportions, strength with beauty, precision of diction and logical sequence of thought with the graces of a flowing rhetoric. His manner in the pulpit was grave, yet animated, unaffectedly simple, but indicative of a controlled enthusiasm, and often awakening a like emotion in the hearer.

Humphrey, Zephaniah Moore, D.D., son of Heman Humphrey, D.D., and brother of E. P. Humphrey, D.D., was born at Amherst, Mass., August 30th, 1824, and died in Cincinnati, November 13th, 1881. He graduated at Amherst College and at Andover Theological Seminary. He was pastor of churches at Racine and Milwaukee, Wis., 1850-59; of First Presbyterian Church, Chicago, 1859-68; of Calvary Church, Philadelphia, 1868-75; Professor of Ecclesiastical History and Church Polity in Lane Theological Seminary, Cincinnati, 1875-81, and Moderator of the General Assembly at Chicago, in 1871. Dr. Humphrey was a gentleman of lovely spirit and scholarly attainments, a gifted preacher, and a faithful servant of Christ.

Hunt, Rev. Holloway Whitefield, son of the Rev. James Augustine and Ruth (Page) Hunt, was born at Ringwood, Hunterdon county, N. J., March 31st, 1800. He was graduated from the College of New Jersey, A. D. 1818; spent a year in teaching a classical school at Lancaster and Easton, Pa.; then entered Princeton Seminary, and was regularly graduated thence in 1822; was licensed by the Presbytery of Newton, October 2d, 1822; was ordained by the same Presbytery, April 23d, 1824. He was installed as pastor of the West Galway Church, N. Y., September 1st, 1824, and released August 31st, 1825; was installed at Metuchen, N. J., April 23d, 1828; the pastoral relation was dissolved May 7th, 1844, after sixteen years of faithful and successful labor, but he continued to supply the congregation about eighteen months longer. For nine years (1850-9) he preached to the Congregational Church at Patchogue, Long Island, and for six years (1860-66), was stated supply of the Presbyterian Church at Centerville, Orange county, N. Y. The increasing infirmities of age then led him to retire from the active duties of the ministry. Still he continued to preach as opportunity offered. In all his fields of labor he acquitted himself as an able and earnest preacher; a faithful and sympathizing pastor, and a devoted Christian. The last years of his life were spent at Metuchen, N. J., among the people to whom he had given so many years of pastoral service. He died April 28th, 1882, in the eighty-third year of his age. He was a man of warm heart, gentle, humble, prayerful, and greatly beloved.

Hunt, Rev. James, was the son of James Hunt, conspicuous in the scenes of a religious nature in Hanover county, Va., during the times of the Rev. Samuel Davies. He was ordained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick in 1760. In 1761 he made a missionary tour through North Carolina, being at this time a member of Hanover Presbytery. On his return, he preached for some time in Lancaster county, Va. Mr. Hunt passed the greater part of his ministerial life in Montgomery county, Md., where for many years he was at the head of a flourishing classical school. William Wirt was for some years one of his pupils, and for two years a member of his family. Mr. Hunt died at Bladensburg, in 1793.

Hunt, Rev. Thomas Poage, an eminent ecclesiastical debater and eloquent advocate of Temperance, was born in Charlotte county, Va., in 1794. He came of distinguished ancestry. A violent attack of whooping cough in childhood caused a deformity of person that made him noticeable wherever he went. He graduated at Hampden-Sidney College, in 1813; studied theology under Dr. Moses Hoge and Dr. John H. Rice; and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Hanover, in 1824. After a few years' labor as a pulpit supply in Virginia, and Raleigh and Wilmington, N. C., he entered the field as a Temperance lecturer. In this capacity he attained a national reputation. In 1830 he produced the well-known Total Abstinence Pledge for the Young—

"I do not think I'll ever drink
Whisky or gin, brandy or rum,
Or anything that'll make drunk come."

Mr. Hunt's first appearance North was in 1833, as a delegate to the General Assembly in Philadelphia. During 1834-5 he lectured in Philadelphia, New York, and other towns, and almost every night, for a year and more, drew overflowing houses. In 1836 he removed to Philadelphia, and in 1839 to the Wyoming Valley, Pa., where his later life was spent. He acted for a time as agent of Lafayette College. He was the author of several works. "The Bible Baptist" has had an extensive circulation. "The Wedding Days of Former Times," "The Drunkard's Friend," "It will not injure me," "Liquor-Selling a System of Fraud," with various tracts, were published by him.

During Mr. Hunt's life, he visited twenty States in the interest of his work, and delivered upwards of ten thousand lectures and sermons. He labored often as a revivalist. He had few superiors in the logical, incisive presentation of truth, and few could equal him in his exposure of the sins and foibles of society. He excelled in satirical and humorous description, and the tender and pathetic was often portrayed with great power by him. No more fearless, persistent, unwavering advocate of the Temperance reform has arisen in our country. He died, December 5th, 1876.

Hunter, Rev. Andrew, the son of a British officer, was born in Virginia. He was licensed to preach by the First Presbytery of Philadelphia, about 1773, immediately after which he made a missionary tour through Pennsylvania and Virginia. In 1778 he was ordained, and was appointed a Brigade Chaplain in the American army. In 1794 he was teaching a school at Woodbury, N. J., and in 1803, on account of ill health, was cultivating a farm on the Delaware river, near Trenton. In 1788 he was elected a trustee of the College of New Jersey, which position he held until 1804, when he was appointed Professor of Mathematics and Astronomy. In 1808 he resigned his professorship, and took charge of an academy at Bordentown, N. J., but was soon after appointed a Chaplain in the Navy, and was stationed at the Navy Yard at Washington until his death, which occurred February 24th, 1823.

Hunter, Rev. William A., was born in Cincinnati, O., May 7th, 1852. He graduated at Hanover College, Indiana, in 1876. In 1874 and 1875 he was Tutor in the college, and filled the position with ability. He graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1879. Licensed to preach by Schuyler Presbytery in 1878, he was installed pastor of Wythe Presbyterian Church, Warsaw, Ill., December 9th, 1879. Since that time he has acceptably and successfully ministered to that congregation. His affable manner and pleasing address peculiarly adapt him to efficient pastoral work. His style in the pulpit is clear, forcible and logical, reverential in diction, pathetic in appeal, and devoid of boisterous and coarse oratory. His sermons show the desire of his heart to instruct his hearers, and to stimulate them to fidelity in the discharge of their duties in all the relations they sustain.

Hunting, Henry, a descendant of John Hunting, who came from England and settled at Dedham, Mass., in 1638, was born in Southold, L. I., May 6th, 1818. He fitted himself early for the duties of Justice of the Peace in his native town, and consented to fill this office for twenty-five consecutive years, from 1851 to 1875, being six times re-elected by his fellow-townsmen. He was for several years, by the votes of the county, upon the bench of the Suffolk county court, as Justice of Sessions. When the Southold Savings Bank was incorporated, in 1858, he became its Treasurer and Secretary, as he continues to be, and its remarkable prosperity has been chiefly due to his wisdom and fidelity, and the perfect confidence of the public in him. He has most satisfactorily done much business as executor of wills, administrator and trustee of estates, and in other fiduciary offices. He became, in 1863, the Treasurer and Secretary of the Board of Trustees of the First Church of Southold, as he continues to be, and its financial prosperity has been greatly owing to his munificent generosity and unceasing Christian zeal. During the twenty years of his service, its chapel and its academy have been erected, without debt, its church edifice has been greatly improved, its parsonage enlarged and made convenient, its cemetery both doubled in size and not a little beautified, and other real estate purchased and fitted for useful purposes, so that its property has been increased in value 100 per cent.

He entered the full communion of the Southold Presbyterian Church in 1869, after he had attained the age of fifty years. He soon after yielded to the desire of the church, that he should be ordained as a ruling elder; and he has ever since, in every good work, been more than willing to show the best example to others. He has been, throughout his full membership in the church, a most faithful teacher of the Bible to youth, in the Sabbath school. He promotes, in a high degree, the beneficent effectiveness of the academy, making it helpful to some who could not, without his aid, possess its advantages; and in many other ways he manifests his deep interest in its welfare and Christian usefulness. He has been very active, for many years, in the gratuitous distribution of the best Christian literature. Every wise undertaking for the public good finds in him a generous contributor and a personal supporter.

Hunton, Hon. Logan, an elder of the Mizpah Church, St. Louis county, Mo., was born in Virginia, in 1806, and died in 1880. While he was yet a youth his father moved to Kentucky, and settled in Lincoln county. He enjoyed the advantages of a good education in Centre College and Transylvania University; entered the law, and settled, in the practice of his profession, in Stanford. He served with distinction in the Legislature of Kentucky, besides filling, with ability and honor, other important posts of public trust. In 1838 he located in St. Louis, Mo., and in 1844 in New Orleans, where he filled the position of United States Attorney for the District of Louisiana, to which he was appointed by President Taylor. While resident there he united with the Lafayette-Square Presbyterian Church, under the care of Rev. Dr. B. M. Palmer. Returning to St. Louis, he continued to reside there until about eleven years before his death, when he fixed his residence within the bounds of the Mizpah Church, St. Louis county. He was made an elder in that church in 1871, and served the cause with marked efficiency through the remainder of his life.

Judge Hunton was one of the most worthy and highly esteemed citizens of Missouri. He was eminent and able in his profession, prominent in the courts of the Church, and a valuable member of the Board of Trustees of Westminster College, and also of the Board of Trust of that Institution. He was scholarly in his attainments, and during the larger part of his life was the intimate associate and friend of many of the foremost men of the nation. In the resolutions adopted by the St. Louis Bar, on the occasion of his death, it was said of him: "Professionally, Mr. Hunton was distinguished for sound learning, ability and integrity of character. * * * And in private life he was much loved and respected for his kindness of heart, honesty of purpose, and firm adherence to truth and right, as he conceived them, and illustrating in his whole character in an eminent degree, the virtues of the Christian gentleman."

Huston, Rev. Alexander, son of Samuel Huston, was born in Dublin, Ireland, and came to Delaware in the early part of the eighteenth century. He graduated at Princeton College, New Jersey, in 1760, and received his license from the Presbytery of Lewes, Delaware, about 1763. He was ordained in 1764, and installed as pastor of Murderhill and Three Run churches, where he remained until his death, January 3d, 1785. He was a man greatly beloved, and a most earnest and laborious minister. In connection with the historical incidents of the State he bore a conspicuous part, and it was his custom, during the Revolutionary War, to pray "That the Lord would send plenty of powder and ball to greet their enemies with." One Sabbath, while he was engaged at his church, a detachment of British soldiers came to his house and left their compliments, by boring their bayonets through the panels of his doors, and destroying more of his property than was congenial to the feelings of his heart.

Hutchinson, Charles, D. D., was born July 15th, 1820, at Norwich, Vermont. He graduated at Dartmouth College in the Summer of 1848; studied theology two years at Lane Seminary, and one year at Andover Seminary, and was licensed to preach the gospel, by the Essex Congregational Association, in May, 1851. He began his ministry as a home missionary at Edinburgh, Ind., and after two years of labor at that place he was ordained and installed pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church, New Albany, Indiana, May 21th, 1854, and there his work continues, by the blessing of God, until the present time. As the visible result of his ministry, he has welcomed more than one thousand souls to church fellowship, the most of them on the profession of their faith in Christ.

Dr. Hutchinson has been privileged to aid in special revival services in almost the entire Southern part of the State; has attended more than a thousand funerals, and preached over three thousand sermons during his long pastorate. He has been widely useful in all educational work, having served for many years on the Board of Trustees of Wabash College, Indiana, of which Board he is still a member. As a pastor, his work has been marked by faithful, persevering and tender service among the people. He has thus exerted a wide and most salutary influence in the city of his home. As a student he has kept up his Hebrew and Greek studies with system and care, going to the original Scriptures for his views and expositions of truth. His preaching has been characterized by fidelity to truth, loving interest in his people, and a single purpose to bring them into the deepest fellowship with God and His work. As a presbyter he has wrought in season and out of season, always fulfilling his appointments, serving in every position to which he has been called with scrupulous fidelity. He has contributed largely, by prayer and personal service, to the success of the Presbyterian Church in the State of Indiana, making his ministry and personal influence as a man of God felt throughout the entire commonwealth.

Hutchinson, John Russell, D. D., was born in Columbia county, Pa., February 12th, 1807, and was prepared for college at the academy of his uncle, the Rev. John Hutchinson, of Millintown, Juniata county, Pa. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1826, and entered Princeton Seminary in the Fall of the same year, remaining about two years. Licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 22d, 1829, he went in the following October to Mississippi. The remainder of his life was spent in the Southwest.

From November, 1829, to July, 1830, he preached at Rodney, Miss. In July, 1830, he was ordained and installed pastor of the Church at Baton Rouge, La., where he continued two or three years, and in January, 1831, he became connected with the College of Louisiana, at Jackson, at the same time serving the church there as a supply. January 1st, 1837, he became pastor of the Church at Vicksburg, Miss., and continued in this relation until October 31st, 1842. In this year he was called to the Chair of Ancient Languages in Oakland College, Miss., which he occupied until 1854. While at Oakland, he also supplied the pulpit of Bethel Church, in its vicinity, from 1848 to 1852. In 1851, at the death of Rev. Jeremiah Chamberlain, D. D., President of Oakland College, the duties and responsibilities of President of the Institution devolved for a time on Professor Hutchinson. In 1851 he removed to New Orleans, establishing a classical school of a high order, at the same time supplying the pulpits of the Prytanea Street, Carrollton, and other churches within easy distance. In 1860 he removed to Houston, Texas, whither his oldest son had gone some years before, and conducted an academy, at the same time preaching to the Presbyterian Church. After the close of the war he did much service as an evangelist, within the bounds of the Presbytery of Brazos, of which he was a member.

Dr. Hutchinson died, February 24th, 1878. He was a preacher for nearly half a century, and in his prime, a man of mark. He was a fine classical scholar, and an admirable instructor, genial, humorous, sympathetic and tender in his nature.

Hutton, Rev. William, was born in Ireland, April 16th, 1838; graduated at Hamilton College in 1864, and at the Union Theological Seminary, New York. He was licensed by the Fourth Presbytery of Philadelphia, in April, 1867; ordained an evangelist on the 27th of October, following, and on the 8th of December took charge of a mission enterprise in Philadelphia, which grew into a church organization, named "Greenwich Street Presbyterian Church," over which he was installed pastor, November 5th, 1868. He still continues in this charge, with the divine blessing upon his labors. Mr. Hutton has been Moderator of Presbytery three times, twice a Commissioner to the General Assembly, and in 1874 was a delegate to the General Assembly of the Irish Presbyterian Church, meeting in Belfast. After his return from abroad, he published a volume entitled, "Wanderings in Europe." He is an earnest, faithful minister, a graceful writer, an agreeable companion, and esteemed by his brethren.

Hyde, Rev. Smith Harris, was next to the youngest child of Dr. John A. and Sarah (Smith) Hyde, and was born in Youngstown, Niagara county, N. Y., September 28th, 1834. Having graduated at Yale College, New Haven, Conn., in 1857, he entered the Theological Seminary in Auburn, N. Y., the same year, and there pursued the full course of study, graduating in 1860. The year previous he was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Niagara. The same year he accepted a call to the Rock Hill Church, Missouri, and was ordained and installed pastor, April 19th, 1861. After more than four years' labor he became pastor of the Presbyterian church in Carrollton, Ill., settling there in November, 1864. This pastorate pleasantly continued over fifteen years, when, in February, 1880, he removed to East St. Louis, Ill., to engage in missionary work with the church there, which he prosecuted for two years. He then became pastor of the Church in Carthage, Ill. For some ten or more years he was Stated Clerk of Alton Presbytery, and for some four years the Stated Clerk of the Synod of Illinois South. Mr. Hyde has been blessed in his ministry, and is highly esteemed by his brethren.

Hypocrisy, is a seeming, or professing to be, what in truth and reality we are not. It consists in assuming a character which we are conscious does not belong to us, and which we intentionally impose upon the judgment and opinion of mankind concerning us. The name is borrowed from the Greek tongue, in which it primarily signifies the profession of a stage-player, which is to express in speech, habit and action, not his own person and manners, but his whom he undertakes to represent. And so it is, for the very essence of hypocrisy lies in apt imitation and deceit; in acting the part of a member of Christ without any saving grace. The hypocrite is a double person; he has one person which is natural, another which is artificial; the first he keeps to himself, the other he puts on, as he does his clothes, to make his appearance in before men. It was ingeniously said by Basil, "that the hypocrite has not put off the old man, but put on the new upon it."

Hypocrites have been divided into four classes:—
1. The worldly hypocrite, who makes a profession of religion, and pretends to be religious, merely from worldly considerations (Matt. xxiii, 5). 2. The legal hypocrite, who relinquishes his vicious practices, in order thereby to merit heaven, while at the same time he has no real love to God (Rom. x, 3). 3. The evangelical hypocrite, whose religion is nothing more than a loose conviction of sin, who rejoices under the idea that Christ died for him, and yet has no desire to live a holy life (Matt. xiii, 20; 2 Pet. ii, 20). 4. The enthusiastic hypocrite, who has an imaginary sight of his sin and of Christ, talks of remarkable impulses and high feelings, and thinks himself very wise and good, while he lives in the most scandalous practices (Matt. xiii, 39; 2 Cor. xi, 14).

I

Ignorance of our Future Mode of Existence. There is something that is ours, which is to be a thousand years hence, a million of years hence, a million of ages hence, a millions times that—and so forward; it is ours, for it is certain to be, and certain to be inseparable from us. It is to be even ourselves, as absolutely ours as the state we are to be in to-morrow is so—nay, as much as the state we are in this moment belongs to us. The case being so, in thoughtful minds the question arises, Why are we so precluded from a foresight which would in some measure enable us to realize, to our apprehension, that future state of ourselves?

To this question an able writer thus replies:—

One obvious thing in answer is, the essential impossibility. Reflect, how very imperfectly we comprehend even our present existence, after all manner of experience of it, and intimacy with it. Diminutive as we are, we involve a world of mystery. The acutest, the profoundest investigators have been baffled. What is life? What is soul? What is even body? How combined? And if we had the means of pursuing the inquiry into our future state, it may be presumed that every mystery would be aggravated upon us. It is true, that the great "Revealer of secrets" could have told us, by revelation, some things respecting the future state which we might, in some superficial, general manner, have understood. For example; whether the disembodied spirit will have a material vehicle? Whether there will be a distinct formal process of judgment on it at death? In what place it shall dwell till the resurrection? Whether it will, during that interval, be apprised of the transactions on this earth? Whether it will have sensible, intimate communications with superior spirits? Whether it will have a clearer, vaster manifestation of the grand scene of the creation? Whether it will have a luminous foresight of what it will become at the resurrection? When, and of what kind, will be the local habitations thereafter? What the employments will chiefly consist of?

All this, however, would have reached but a little way into the eternal progression! even if so far it gave us light. But what we would insist on is, that all disclosures given of the future state would have been, to us, faint and inefficient information. For if it had been given in terms merely general, it would have left our conceptions in a state nearly as vague and unsatisfactory as ever, no definite substance; and, in particular and specific terms it could not have been given, without becoming either unintelligible or degraded; for it must have been given either in terms of very close analogy with our present state, or in terms, if any such could have been found, fitted and true to the nature of a vastly different economy. Suppose the former; that is, terms and images belonging to our present state, then the descriptive information would have been degraded. For then the whole vision, that should have been so grand, would have been brought down towards the level, though not quite to it, of our present notions and state—our modes of life, of habitation, of narrow, limited activity, of imperfect social communication. There would be a servile analogy or resemblance to our manner of relation to place, to surrounding elements, to the modes and sources of pleasure, and to our means and instruments of knowledge and power. In short, the whole revealed description must have been conformed to the apprehensions of beings living in these gross bodies, and having all their ideas modified by their bodily senses. But this would be to humiliate, to degrade the description and theory of a superior state; and not only would the description be degraded,—but it would not be true. On such accounts, a thinking and aspiring mind feels little satisfaction or complacency in any of those imaginary particular representations of what the economy of a superior world may be supposed to be. There is a recoiling feeling—"that is far too like things as they might be here; that is making only a superior terrestrial state."

But suppose, on the other hand, the revealed specific description of a future state to be given in terms truly appropriate to a quite different and higher economy—and then it would have been unintelligible. But in truth the supposition itself is unintelligible and absurd. That would be the language of another world. No terms could convey to us a totally different order of ideas; no human language could do it, and any other would be but the mysterious emblems of eternity—bright, indeed, on yonder side, toward heaven, but dark on this, toward us. Such a revelation would be a sun in total and perpetual eclipse.

We say, then, that it does not “yet appear what we shall be,” plainly because it is impossible.

If we went no further in the inquiry than merely the state immediately after death, the separate state, we can instantly conceive that when the soul is taken out of this body, with all its senses, and therefore out of the whole system of relations with the senses, and all the modes of perception belonging to the senses, it must be in a state of which no specific ideas can be conveyed to us.

Even supposing, contrary to all this, that some specific conceptions of the future state could be and were conveyed to us, the effect would not be what we are ready to imagine. We are apt to fancy how mightily and permanently striking and commanding such ideas would be. But no; they would become gradually familiarized among our ideas, and lose their extraordinary and, so to speak, extra-mundane quality and power of impression. They must be mingled with our ordinary conceptions, be adverted to in our ordinary language, and would soon cease to be like messengers sent to us from the dead and the world of spirits.

A far stronger impression is made on thinking spirits, and on others nothing makes an impression, by an undefined magnificence, by a grand and awful mystery, when we are absolutely certain that there is a stupendous reality veiled in that mystery; when quite certain, too, that it relates to ourselves, and that it will at length be disclosed.

Such a grand reality, thus mysteriously veiled, attracts thinking spirits most mightily—like the mystic and awful recess in the inmost part of the temple. It keeps in action the inquisitiveness, conjectures, expectation. It sets the mind on imagining the utmost that it can of grandeur and importance; and the idea still is, after the utmost efforts, “It is far greater than even all that!”

Thus, if we will think, this grandeur veiled in darkness has a more powerful effect on the mind than any distinct particulars made palpable to our apprehension, and brought down to our level in order to be made so. So far, then, it is better that it should not “yet appear what we shall be.”

In this life men are placed in this world's relations; a system of relations corresponding to our inhabiting a gross, frail, mortal body, with all its wants and circumstances; here we have to perform all the various business of this world. That there are innumerable thoughts, cares, employments, belonging inseparably to this our state; and that, therefore, there must not be such a manifestation of the future state as would confound, stop and break up this system, is plain. It is true, that what we have been saying nearly amounts to this, that no revelation in words, such as we could clearly understand, would so take hold on our minds as to produce any such effect. To produce such an effect, there must, then, be mighty and portentous circumstances and appearances, extraordinary interferences, things to astonish and shake the constitution of our nature; or else, perfectly extraordinary impressions forced on our minds to give us intimations and specimens of another state of existence, and produce overpowering emotions concerning it. This could be, if God so willed; but this must not be, because it would unfit men for the regular performance of the business of this life.

We add that other plain reason for our being kept in such ignorance of the exact nature of the future state; that faith is to be the grand principle of our feelings and conduct respecting hereafter. We are to believe, to be persuaded, and to act conformably to that persuasion; the whole present system must be consonant with this. This appointment of faith to be the actuating principle is partly, as we see, because it cannot be otherwise; and partly because, to be governed by the declaration and will of God is the vital essence of all the obligations of his creatures.

But now, will it not be said, that the latter part of these representations does in effect contradict the former; that we first make it a reproach to men that they so little direct their thoughts and imagination to a future state; and that next we acquit them, by showing the impossibility of forming any clear conceptions of it, if they did so direct their minds? What is the use, it may be said, of indulging our musings and inquisitive conjectures on the unknown? We answer, it is necessary; when there is such a stupendous reality for certain before us, it is evidently a primary duty to think of it, and with deepest interest; and we cannot think of it as one simple, single, invariable idea. The mind must go, or attempt to go, in some degree, into special modes of conception respecting it.

It is an elevating and spiritualizing exercise of the mind. It tends to carry the soul a little way toward its proper region, and to lessen the false importance of the things of this world, and to slacken their hold. It contributes to obviate that unnatural and pernicious estrangement and dissociation between our present and future state. It tends to habituate the spirit to seek and find the grand importance of its existence in its hereafter, and to awake a lively and a sacred curiosity—which is surely a right and a worthy state of feeling with which to go toward another world, and to go into it. It may help to turn to valuable account the varieties in the present system of our existence, the facts in surrounding nature, the immediate circumstances of our own being, by prompting, on each particular, the thought and the question, "What corresponding to this, what in contrariety to this, what instead of this, may there be in that other world?" It may aid to keep us associated with those who are gone thither. It may give new emphasis to our impression of the evil of sin, and the excellence of all wisdom, holiness and piety, by the thought, "What manner of effect is this, or this, adapted to result in, in that future state?"

By this exercise of contemplative anticipation, we may make excellent use of those figures and emblems in which revelation has shadowed out the future state, carrying the thoughts as far as we can from the mere figure, to what would in a higher sense best correspond to it. In such an exercise, the particular character of the individual's mind, his taste, his less or greater abstraction in thinking, will, and very properly may, have a leading influence. Many pious minds may love to imagine something very considerably in analogy with the present order of existence, only greatly raised and refined, but never losing sight of the parallel; and this will no doubt greatly contribute to a distinctness of ideas; an analogous order of senses, and as adapted to them, beautiful and sublime scenes, enchanting music of sounds, etc.

With others the wish will be to go so far away from resemblance as is possible without going into absolute and impalpable abstraction, into an unrealizable vacuity; and this, we think, is strongly warranted by what is said of the nature of the body which shall be constituted at the resurrection, and by the consideration of its immortality. Something widely, immensely different from all that belongs to it now, is surely implied by the assertion that it is to be like "the glorious body" of the Mediator. What can we imagine of that body? Very far, surely, from any close analogy with this earthly structure. Consider it, too, as capable of rising to "meet the Lord in the air." Consider that pointed contrast, rather than any parallel, which the apostle exhibits in his account of it—a body raised in "glory," in "power," in "incorruption," and to crown all, a "spiritual" body. He displays this body in lofty triumph over the present body. The description gives the full impression of something not only immensely different, but specifically and essentially different. Then consider the strange, the mysterious circumstance of its immortality. A bodily structure immortal! adapted to live for ever and ever. Here we are carried away out of all conceivable analogy, as by the whirlwind that took Elijah away.

In this, its immortality, we are not to suppose the operation of a perpetual miracle, but that it will be naturally immortal, by the same essential law as the soul is so: that it will not have, either in its material consistence or its vital organization, any inherent principle of decay. But how confounded is all intellect, or created and fixed within the feeling itself, simply a fancy, in the attempt to conceive of such a body, or of its senses, partial or vital action! If we attempt to imagine a material scenery, and order of elements, corresponding in quality to such a body, how lost we are again! Yet such a representation calls upon us not to forbear thinking on the mysterious subject, but to aim at thinking sublimely.

After all, and amid all our efforts to conceive of the mode of the future existence, it will be well to occupy our contemplations much upon the grand general elements of the future felicity: Holiness, charity, wisdom, power, immortality, enjoyment of the divine presence and benignity.

Let no curiosity of high speculation beguile us for a moment out of recollection of the one mighty difference, of the two grand opposites, in the future state, the condition of the redeemed and purified, and the unbelieving and unrighteous.

Imbrie, Charles Kisselman, D. D., was born at Philadelphia, Pa., December 15th, 1814, and graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1835. After teaching for a time, he was Tutor in the college, 1838-40. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Elizabethtown, January 5th, 1841, and pastor of the First Church, Rahway, N. J., 1841-52. He was Recording Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions, 1857-70; editor of the New York Evangelist, 1869-70, and since 1852 has been pastor of the First Church, Jersey City, N. J. Dr. Imbrie is an excellent preacher, faithful in the discharge of pastoral duty, a good writer, and diligently devoted to his work as a minister of the gospel of Christ.

Imputation. By the term "impute" is meant to lay to the charge or credit of any one, as a ground of judicial punishment or justification. This is the sense in which the phrase "to impute sin or righteousness" is used in the Bible. By the imputation of Adam's first sin, it is not intended that his personal transgression becomes the personal transgression of his posterity, but that the guilt of his transgression is reckoned to their account. And it is only the guilt of his first sin, which was committed by him as a public representative, that is imputed to his posterity, and not the guilt of his future sins, after he had ceased to act in that character. The grounds of this imputation are, that Adam was both the natural root and the federal head, or representative, of all his posterity. The former is the only ground mentioned in chap. vi, sec. iii, of our Confession, probably because the representative character of Adam in the covenant of works has not yet been brought into view; but in the succeeding chapter this is distinctly recognized. And both in the Larger Catechism (Question 22) and in the Shorter (Question 16) the representative character of Adam in the covenant made with him is explicitly assigned as the principal ground of the imputation of the guilt of his first sin to all his posterity.

We do not see how the universal corruption of mankind can be accounted for, without admitting that they are involved in the guilt of his first transgression. It must be some sin which God punishes with the deprivation of original righteousness; and that can be no other than the first sin of Adam. The doctrine of imputation is clearly taught in Scripture; particularly in Romans v. it is so plainly stated, so often repeated, and so formally proved, that it must be acknowledged to be the doctrine of the apostle. In support of this doctrine, we might appeal to the universality of the effects of sin, especially to the death of infants. The apostle affirms, in the most express terms, that death is the effect of sin (Rom. v. 12); and experience, as well as Scripture, shows that death passes upon all men. It passes even upon those who are incapable of committing actual sin; for "death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression." Rom. v. 14. This is generally understood as referring to infants, who are incapable of sinning personally and actually, as Adam did; and since they have never, in their own persons, violated any law, their exposure to death can only be accounted for on the ground of the imputation to them of the sin of Adam. This doctrine also derives confirmation from the analogy between Adam and Christ, as stated by the apostle in the same chapter. In verse 14 he affirms that Adam "is the figure of him that was to come," and he traces the analogy in the subsequent verses, particularly in verses 18, 19. "Therefore, as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so, by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life. For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous." "These verses," says Dr. Chalmers, "contain the strength of the argument for the imputation of Adam's sin. As the condemnation of Adam comes to us, even so does the justification by Christ come to us. Now we know that the merit of the Saviour is ascribed to us, else no atonement for the past, and no renovation of heart or of life that is ever exemplified in this world, for the future, will suffice for our acceptance with God. Even so, then, must the demerit of Adam have been ascribed to us. The analogy affirmed in these verses leads irresistibly to this conclusion. The judgment that we are guilty is transferred to us from the actual guilt of the one representative, even as the judgment that we are righteous is transferred to us from the actual righteousness of the other representative. We are sinners in virtue of one man's disobedience, independently of our own personal sins; and we are righteous in virtue of another's obedience, independently of our own personal qualifications. We do not say but that through Adam we become personally sinful, inheriting, as we do, his corrupt nature. Neither do we say, but that through Christ we become personally holy, deriving out of his fullness the very graces which adorned his own character. But, as it is at best a tainted holiness that we have on this side of death, we must have something more than it in which to appear before God; and the righteousness of Christ, reckoned unto us and rewarded in us, is that something. The something which corresponds to this in Adam, is his guilt, reckoned unto us and punished in us; so that to complete the analogy, as from him we get the infusion of his depravity, so from him, also, do we get the imputation of his demerit. "Adam" is not merely the corrupt parent of a corrupt offspring, who sin because of the depravity wherewith he has tainted all the families of the earth; but who have sinned in him, to use the language of our old divines, as their federal head, as the representative of a covenant which God made with him, and, through him, with all his posterity.

Sinners, as already hinted, obtain an interest in the righteousness of Christ, for their justification, by God imputing it to them, and their receiving it by faith. We now refer to the imputation of the righteousness of Christ itself, and not merely to its effects. To say that the righteousness of Christ, that is, His obedience and sufferings, are imputed to us only as their effects, is to say, that we have the benefit of them, and no more, but imputation itself is denied. So say the Socinians: but they know well enough, and ingenuously grant, that they overthrow all true, real imputation thereby. The effects of Christ's righteousness are communicated to us upon the ground of the imputation of His righteousness itself; but they are really imparted, and not imputed to us. Many, we apprehend, oppose the doctrine of imputation, owing to their misconception of its proper nature. It does not signify the infusion of holy dispositions, or the actual transference of the righteousness of Christ to believers, so that it becomes inherently and subjectively theirs; that is impossible, in the nature of things; but the meaning is, that God reckons the righteousness of Christ to their account, and, in consideration of it, treats them as if they were righteous. God does not reckon that they performed it themselves, for that would be a judgment not according to truth; but he accounts it to them for their justification. "There are certain technical terms in theology," says Dr. Chalmers, "which are used so currently that they fail to impress their own meaning on the thinking principle. The term 'impute' is one of them. It may hold forth a revelation of its plain sense to you, when it is barely mentioned that the term impute in the 6th verse (Rom. iv.), is the same in the original with what is employed in that verse of Philemon where Paul says, 'If he hath wronged thee, or oweth thee ought, put that on mine account.' To impute righteousness to a man without works, is simply to put righteousness down to his account, though he has not performed the works of righteousness."

The doctrine of the imputation of Christ's righteousness is clearly taught in Scripture. We are represented as being constituted righteous by the obedience of Christ, as we are constituted sinners by the disobedience of Adam; and this can only be by imputation, Rom. v, 19. We are also said to be made the righteousness of God in Christ, as he was made sin for us; and this, likewise, could only be by imputation, 2 Cor. v, 21. We are expressly told that God imputeth righteousness without works, Rom. iv, 6. This imputation proceeds upon the grounds of the believer's federal union with Christ from eternity, and of his vital union with him in time. Christ, as the surety of his spiritual seed, engaged from everlasting to fulfill this righteousness for them; he fulfilled it in their nature, and in their room; and when they become vitally united to him by the Spirit and by faith, God graciously accounts his righteousness to them for their justification.

Inability, in theology, means a want of power to do God's will. It may be natural, when the cause is extrinsic to the will, moral, when the cause is inherent in the will. The New School Calvinistic theologians contended that man has not natural, but merely moral inability; consequently he can serve God if he will. The Old School denied him ability of any kind. The Arminians do the same, but affirm gracious ability, whereby man is enabled to be saved. Adam in his estate of innocency, says Dr. A. A. Hodge, was a free agent, created with holy affections and moral tendencies, yet with a character as yet unconfirmed; capable of obedience, yet liable to be seduced by external temptation, and by the inordinate excitement of the propensions of his animal nature, such as in their proper degree and due subordination are innocent. Of this state of a holy yet fallible nature we have no experience, and consequently very imperfect comprehension.

As to man's present estate, our Standards teach (1) that man is still a free agent, and able to will as, upon the whole, he desires to will. (2) That he has likewise ability to discharge many of the natural obligations which spring out of his relations to his fellow-men. (3) That his soul, by reason of the fall, being morally corrupted and spiritually dead, his understanding being spiritually blind and his affections perverted, he is "utterly indisposed, disabled and made opposite to all good, and wholly inclined to evil" (Conf. Faith, ch. vi, § 4, and ch. xvi, § 3; L. Cat. Q. 25); and hence he "hath wholly lost all ability of will to any spiritual good accompanying salvation," so that he "is not able of his own strength to convert himself," or even "to prepare himself thereunto." Conf. Faith, ch. ix, § 3. The same view is taught in all the Protestant Confessions, Lutheran and Reformed.

This inability is (1) absolute. Man has no power, direct or indirect, to fulfill the moral law, or to accept Christ, or to change his nature so as to increase his power, and so can neither do his duty without grace, nor prepare himself by himself for grace. (2) It is purely moral, because man possesses since the fall, as much as before, all the constitutional faculties requisite to moral agency, and his inability has its ground solely in the wrong moral state of those faculties. It is simply the evil moral disposition of the soul. (3) It is natural, because it is not accidental, but innate, and inheres in the universal and radical moral state of our souls by nature; that is, as that nature is naturally propagated since the fall. (4) It is not natural in the sense of belonging to the nature of man as originally formed by God, or as resulting from any constitutional deficiency, or development of our natural moral faculties as originally given by God.

That this doctrine is true is proved (1) from direct declarations of Scripture. "Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots? then may ye also do good that are accustomed to do evil." Jer. xiii, 23. "No man can come unto me except the Father who sent me draw him.....No man can come unto me except it be given him of my Father." John vi, 44, 65; Rom. ix, 16; 1 Cor. ii, 14. (2) From what Scriptures say of man's state by nature. It is declared to be a state of "blindness," and "darkness," and of "spiritual death." Eph. iv, 18; Col. ii, 13. The unregenerate are the "servants of sin" and "subject to Satan." Rom. vi, 20; v, 6; 2 Tim. ii, 26; Matt. xxii, 33-35. (3) From what the Scriptures say of the nature and the universal and absolute necessity of regeneration: "Except a man be born again, he cannot enter the kingdom of heaven." John iii, 3. It is called "a new birth," "a new creation," "a begetting anew," "a giving a new heart." In this work God is the agent, man is the subject. It is so great that it requires the "mighty power of God." Eph. i, 18-20. All Christian duties are declared to be the fruits of the Spirit. Gal. v, 22, 23. (4) From the experience of every true Christian. (5) From the consciousness of every convinced sinner. The great burden of all true conviction is not chiefly the sins committed, but the sinful deadness of heart and aversion to divine things which is the root of actual transgression, and which remains, immovable in spite of all we do. (6) From the universal experience of the human race. If any man has ever naturally possessed ability to perform his spiritual duties, it is certain that no one has ever exercised it.

Indiana, Synod of. The Northwestern Territory, organized in 1787, of all the region lying between the Ohio and Mississippi rivers and the Lakes, included what is now known as Indiana. In 1790 Winthrop Sargent, under direction of Governor St. Clair, of Marietta, came to Vincennes, and laid off Knox county, including the most of Indiana, Illinois and Michigan. At Vincennes he found 143 heads of families, mostly French, the place having been originally settled by French traders, the first of whom came here in 1702.

On May 7th, 1800, the Territory of Indiana was organized, including what is now Indiana, Illinois and Michigan, and with a civilized population of 4875. Gen. W. H. Harrison was its first Governor, at Vincennes, from 1800 to 1812. In 1801 a large part of the Louisiana Purchase, including Missouri and Arkansas, was added to Indiana. On June 30th, 1805, Michigan was cut off. On March 1st, 1809, Illinois was cut off, and the present boundaries of Indiana were defined. By Act of Congress, December 11th, 1816, she was formally admitted as a State into the Union.

In this formative period of her Territorial and State life, the Church was securing a position within her borders. The first Presbyterian sermon ever preached in the Territory was in the home of Governor Harrison, who, with his Presbyterian wife, extended to Dr. Cleland, the preacher, a hearty welcome. The first Presbyterian Church, and probably the first Protestant Church, in the Territory, was organized by Rev. Samuel R. Robertson, of Kentucky, in a barn owned by Col. Small, about two miles from Vincennes, and which, from its being the only one in the Territory, was appropriately called "The Presbyterian Church of Indiana." Rev. Samuel T. Scott took charge of this Church in 1808, and remained in charge of it until his death, December 30th, 1827. During most of this time, he conducted an academy, now known as Vincennes University, and resided in Vincennes. He had taught here a considerable part of the time between 1802 and 1808, although in the meanwhile licensed and ordained, and for a time, a pastor in Kentucky.

Before his death, in 1827, this pioneer minister saw the one church expand into fifty-seven, with over 2000 communicants in a state with a population of over 250,000. His own church at this time had 118 members. The church at Washington had 86; at Charlestown, 68; at Madison, 79; at Salem, 95; at Livonia, 119; at Bloomington, 84; at Hanover, 77; at Sand Creek, 63; at Pisgah, 53; at Corydon, 52; at Shiloh, 60; and at Indianapolis, 50. This was about the condition at the organization of the Synod of Indiana, in October, 1826.

Indiana was in Transylvania Presbytery, Synod of Kentucky, until, in 1815, it was placed in Miami Presbytery, Synod of Ohio, by the action of the General Assembly, making the Ohio river the boundary between the two Synods. In 1817 all of Indiana west of a line drawn north from the mouth of the Kentucky river was transferred to Louisville Presbytery, Synod of Kentucky. In 1823 all of Indiana belonging to the Synod of Kentucky was organized into Salem Presbytery, which also included most of Illinois. In 1824 the southwestern corner of the State, from the mouth of Green river to the mouth of White river, was transferred to Muhlenburg Presbytery, Synod of Kentucky. In October, 1827, this corner was brought back to Salem Presbytery, and on October 15th, 1829, it became a part of Wabash Presbytery. For, in October, 1825, Salem Presbytery had been divided, and Wabash Presbytery to the west, and Madison Presbytery on the east, had been organized. In October, 1828, that part of Illinois which had been a part of Salem Presbytery was organized into the Centre of Illinois Presbytery. On May 27th, 1848, the General Assembly changed the boundary line between the Synods of Ohio and Indiana, and gave back to Indiana Synod the narrow strip east of the line drawn north from the mouth of the Kentucky river. Since then the Presbyterian Church in Indiana has had all and only her own territory.

The Synod of Indiana was constituted by act of the General Assembly, May 29th, 1826, out of Salem, Madison, Wabash and Missouri Presbyteries. The first meeting was with the Church of Indiana, at Vincennes, in the Court House, on Wednesday, October 18th, 1826, lasting until Saturday, the 21st; the second meeting was at Salem, from Thursday till Saturday, October 18th to 20th, 1827; the third meeting was at Vincennes, October, 1828, at which meeting so great a religious interest was manifested that sixty persons were converted and united with the Church.

The division into Old School and New School took place October 10th, 1838, at Franklin, each body retaining the name of "The Synod of Indiana."

The Old School Synod was divided in 1843, the General Assembly, on May 29th, 1843, erecting the Synod of Northern Indiana out of Lake, Logansport and Michigan Presbyteries. On May 21st, 1849, the boundaries were slightly changed, the National Road being the dividing line; the churches in Indianapolis and in all the villages on the road west of Indianapolis belonging to the Synod of Northern Indiana, and all the churches in villages on the road east of Indianapolis belonging to the Synod of Indiana.

The New School Synod was divided in 1851, the northern part taking the name of "The Synod of Wabash," and the southern part retaining the name of "The Synod of Indiana," and being composed of Salem, Madison, Indianapolis and Greencastle Presbyteries.

At the reunion of 1870 the Church in Indiana was organized into two Synods. The Synod of Indiana South comprised all the part of the State south of the northern lines of Wayne, Henry, Hancock, Marion, Hendricks, Putnam, Clay and Vigo counties. It met in the Third Presbyterian Church, Indianapolis, July 5th, 1870, and reconstructed its Presbyteries.

The Synod of Indiana North comprised all the rest of the State, and met for the first time, June 28th, 1870, in the First Church, Logansport.

By act of the General Assembly, May, 1882, making Synodical lines coterminous with State lines, the Synod of Indiana was constituted successor of the Synod of Indiana North and the Synod of Indiana South. It held its first meeting in the Second Church, Indianapolis, October 10th, 1882, and was opened with a sermon by Dr. Rev. J. F. Tuttle, President of Wabash College. Rev. Dr. D. W. Fisher, President of Hanover College, was elected Moderator, and Rev. E. E. Whallon was elected Stated Clerk.

The Synod is composed of the Presbyteries of Crawfordsville, Fort Wayne, Indianapolis, Logansport, Muncie, New Albany, Vincennes and White Water. Its second meeting was held October 11th, 1883 in the Second Presbyterian Church of Fort Wayne. Rev. D. W. Moffat, D. D., of that city, was chosen Moderator. The Synod at present has 184 ministers, 306 churches, and 27,973 communicants. During the past year it has raised, for self-support and benevolence, $296,673.

Infant Salvation. The teaching of the Westminster Confession on this subject is as follows:—

The grace promised in baptism is not only offered, but really exhibited and conferred, by the Holy Ghost, to such, whether of age or infants, as that grace belongeth unto, according to the counsel of God's own will, in His appointed time. (xxxvii, vi.)

"Elect infants dying in infancy are regenerated and saved by Christ, through the Spirit, who worketh when and where and how He pleaseth."—x, iii.

But in the Second Scotch Confession (1580), it says:—

"We utterly detest the cruel judgment against infants dying without baptism."

The phrase "elect infants," as quoted above, is not intended to suggest that there are any infants not elect, but simply to point out the facts: (1) that all infants are both under righteous condemnation; and (2) that no infant has any claim, in itself, to salvation; and hence (3) the salvation of each infant, precisely as the salvation of every adult, must have its absolute ground in the sovereign election of God.

The Holy Spirit usually works by means, and the Word read or preached is the ordinary means which He renders effectual to the salvation of sinners. But He has immediate access to the hearts of men, and can produce a saving change in them without the use of ordinary means. As infants are not fit subjects of instruction, their regeneration must be effected without means, by the immediate agency of the Holy Spirit on their souls.

Dr. Charles Hodge, whose orthodoxy is unquestioned, teaches, emphatically, the salvation of all infants who die in infancy, and asserts that this is the "common doctrine of evangelical Protestants." (Systematic Theology, i, 26.) Beyond question, this is the prevailing, and, as far as we have ever heard or read, the universal opinion of the ministers and members of the Presbyterian Church in our country. This opinion has nothing in it contrary to the perfection of God, or to any declaration of the Holy Scriptures, and it is highly agreeable to all those passages which affirm that where sin hath abounded, grace hath much more abounded. Surely, He, through whose blood alone adults or infants can be saved, and who said, "Suffer the little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven," will not shut that kingdom against those who die in infancy.

Inglis, James, D. D., was born in Philadelphia, in 1777, of Scotch and Huguenot ancestry. He graduated at Columbia College, N. Y., in 1795, at the age of eighteen, and commenced the study of the law with General Hamilton, but becoming a subject of divine grace, abandoned the law for theology, which he studied under Dr. Rodgers, of New York. In February, 1802, he succeeded Dr. Patrick Allison as pastor of the First Church of Baltimore, where he continued till his death, in 1820. He died in his bed, of apoplexy, on Sunday morning, while the congregation were waiting for him to commence the usual services. One of his sons was Judge John A. Inglis, Professor of Commercial Law in the University of Maryland, and Chief Justice of the Orphans' Court of Maryland.

Dr. Inglis was a sound theologian and a good scholar. He was one of the most polished and elegant orators this country has ever produced, according to such judgments as those of Drs. Stanhope Smith, Dwight and Sprague. He used manuscript in the pulpit, but was not slavishly confined to it. His perorations were composed in a lofty style, and were particularly startling and impressive. His prayers were premeditated, and not less devout and solemn than his sermons. His manner was stately and not familiar. His published writings were several occasional discourses, a posthumous volume of sermons, accompanied with forms of prayer. Dr. Inglis was Moderator of the General Assembly in 1811.

Inglis, John A., LL. D., was born, August 26th, 1813, in the city of Baltimore, Md. His father was the Rev. James Inglis, D. D., pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Baltimore, and his mother the daughter of Christopher Johnston, a merchant of that city. At the early age of eighteen he graduated from Dickinson College, at Carlisle, Pa., and soon after went to South Carolina. He studied law, and rapidly rose to a high rank in that profession, becoming a Judge of the Court of Common Pleas and General Sessions; afterward, one of the four Chancellors who administered equity law in the four judicial circuits into which the State was divided; and subsequently, an Associate Judge of the Supreme Court of South Carolina. He returned to Baltimore in 1868, and entered at once upon the practice of his profession. In 1870 he was chosen Professor of Commercial Law, Equity, Jurisprudence, etc., in the Law department of the University of Maryland. In March, 1874, he was appointed Chief Judge of the Orphans' Court, which position he occupied until the time of his death, which occurred August 26th, 1878. He united with the Presbyterian Church at Carlisle, Pa., May 15th, 1831. For several years previous to his death he served as a ruling elder in the Franklin Street Presbyterian Church, of Baltimore.

Judge Inglis was an able counsellor, an upright judge, a consistent Christian, a kind and affectionate husband, father and friend, loved and highly esteemed by all who knew him. He was, moreover, a godly man, and served well the church of which he was a member. The cause of the Master was dear to him; and much of his time, and thought and labor, were expended in earnest and faithful Christian work.

Inspiration. If it be granted that a revelation at all is made to men, the reason of the thing shows that the writers of the book in which it is contained must be divinely commissioned. If the Bible be no more than a collection of histories, of letters, of moral precepts, and devotional reasonings, flowing only from human thought, its authority must be very light. The productions of gifted men may be admired and approved, but they may be superseded by others; so that we could have no assurance that the conclusions of to-day might not be recalled or overshadowed by those of to-morrow. The divine element is required to produce a standard. It would be easy to suppose greater poetic power than that manifested by the sacred poets, a larger intellect than was possessed by the simple-minded fishermen of Galilee; and we may call such genius, such philosophic capability, inspiration, if we will; but, if it lacks the essential quality of being the authoritative message of the Deity, such inspiration is in its nature diverse from that of writers who were to convey heaven's message to the men of earth. That message may be conveyed in a rude and homely shape; it is not the outward accompaniment, it is the internal authority which constitutes the communication a veritable word of truth, announcing the will of the Highest to his creatures. So that, if there is any authoritative declaration of God's will in the Bible, any standard established to be a certain rule for human conduct, it cannot be merely of man's devising; by the reason of the thing, it must, in some way, come from God.

The mode in which the Scripture has always been treated is no contemptible proof of a divine original. First of all placed solemnly before the Lord, when but a portion of it was written (Dent. xvii, 18; xxxi, 9, 25, 26); regarded afterwards, as it grew, as the very message of Jehovah (Psalm xix, 7-11; cxix); submitted to as of divine authority (2 Kings xxii, 8-11; Zech. i, 6); held fast, in spite of tyrannical persecution (1 Macc. i, 57); appealed to by Christ himself as settling controversy (Matt. xxii, 29-32, 43-45; Luke x, 26), and preserved for ages, even by those whose conduct it most severely censured, while other books have been mutilated and lost. How can all this be accounted for, except on the supposition that these books were from God? Whence came the reverence paid to them? Was it a mere fancy, a superstitious notion, grounded on nothing, and transmitted onwards without any of the sages through whose hands the Scripture passed detecting and exposing the delusion? Such a continuous mistake is more hard to be believed than the fact that God has really spoken to men.

Again, the contents of the Bible offer additional proof. Granting that it is generally credible, it delivers things which could not have been known but by divine help. The narrative of creation, the notices of angels, the announcement of God's counsels, the description of the happy future inheritance of the righteous, and specially the utterances of prophecy, cannot have proceeded from man's unassisted powers. Either those high mysterious announcements are the vain speculations of an unbridled imagination, or they have been communicated by some divine teaching. Either the predictions of the Bible are the mere guesses of sagacious men, or they are veritably the oracles of God. But see for a moment if they can be happy guesses. Let all license be given for explaining events by calling them coincidences; let the times when they were uttered be brought down as low as ingenious critics desire to bring them; you have still the fact that, in the age of Christ, nay, two centuries before Christ, there was a body of writings, referring to the future condition of the Jews, of Tyre, of Egypt, of Babylon, which the events of successive centuries, even to our own days, have been only more clearly confirming; so that we have standing proof before our eyes that things have happened, contrary to the probabilities of the times when these prophecies were delivered, but in singular accordance with the prophecies themselves. How is this to be explained? The only satisfactory conclusion is that the writers of such words were divinely guided. Any other hypothesis presents difficulties of the most formidable cast.

Further, how came the wonderful scheme of man's salvation into any one's thoughts, unless by a divine communication? Christianity, so wonderful in its plan, so gracious in its purpose, so marvelously adapted to human wants, so productive of human happiness, how was it devised? Was it the offspring of Grecian wisdom, or excogitated by the masculine mind of Rome? Did Egyptian sages discover it? Or can you trace it to Persian lore? Nay, none of these suppositions can be maintained. The volume in which you find that wonderful delineation of a perfect character, in which you have adequate notions of the Deity produced, was composed by despised Jews. Who guided their minds to achieve such a moral wonder?

And again, the Scripture consists of a multitude of books, written in different ages, by men of different ranks and natural gifts. How is it that a unity pervades the whole? that you have in the first the germ of a religious system of which the last are but the harmonious development? This fact alone is sufficient to prove that there is something more than mere human composition in the Bible. One may conceive of a single fanatic; but a series of them, through successive centuries, all with the same bias, one taking up the strain where another ceased, producing only louder, clearer gushes of the same harmony, how can you account for this, save on the principle that the influence of one master mind pervaded all, the master mind of the changeless Deity, with whose message these, his servants, were entrusted?

Still further, the writers of the books of Scripture most distinctly claimed for themselves and their fellows to have the positive assistance of God. Large parts of the Bible are prefaced with the solemn formula, "Thus saith the Lord." The writers give special words which they say the Deity uttered: they convey messages with which they say He commissioned them: they denounce threatenings which they say are by his command. And the later writers affirm of their predecessors that "all Scripture is given by inspiration of God," "the Holy Scriptures" being "able to make wise unto salvation" (2 Tim. iii, 15, 16), and that "holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (2 Pet. 1, 21). Now it is clear either that these assumptions and declarations are based upon a lie, or that there was really some divine influence exerted. And that divine influence is said to be of the Holy Ghost, in such a way that the sayings of the ancient prophets are sometimes quoted as the sayings of the Holy Ghost (Acts 1, 16; xxviii, 25; Heb. iii; 7. ix, 8); at other times these prophets are described as speaking in spirit (Matt. xxii, 13; comp. 2 Sam. xxiii, 2). Corroborative testimony is found in the fact that our Lord promised his disciples that in pressing emergencies they need not be solicitous as to the way in which they should defend the faith: "For it is not ye," He said, "that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you" (Matt. x, 20). And they were instructed to suspend the assumption of their office as teachers of the gospel till they were endued with power from on high. That power was imparted in the miraculous descent of the Holy Spirit on them on the day of Pentecost (Luke xxiv, 49; Acts 1, 8; ii, 1-4). And afterwards in deciding a weighty point of Christian doctrine, they did not hesitate to say, "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us" (xv, 28). If in the decision of controversy, if in promulgating the gospel generally, they had this supernatural assistance, they had it surely in their authoritative writings. The Scripture, therefore, there can be no doubt, emphatically claims for itself a divine element; it claims to be not merely "the word of man;" but "the Word of God." This claim has been allowed in the Christian Church. So that testimonies of fathers and ecclesiastical writers in abundance might be produced, exhibiting the universal consent of Christendom to the fundamental truth that the Holy Ghost spoke by prophets and apostles.

It has been objected to the inspiration of the writers of the Bible, that they speak of natural things according to the notions of their age, which we now know to be erroneous. But this objection is baseless. For what purpose was the Bible composed? It was not to teach astronomy or physics, except so far as to lead the mind up from created works to the creative hand; not to deliver history, except so far as to expound the divine governance of the world; not to settle chronology, further than to illustrate the times and fitting seasons in which God's great plans were to be developed. We must not look for scientific information in the Holy Book. We may freely admit that the sacred penmen spoke on these topics as men of their day would ordinarily speak. And hence we should expect, as we find, the usual incorrect expressions of the sun's rising and the sun's setting. And we need not stumble at the poetical description of this luminary, coming, as it were, from his tabernacle, like a bridegroom, from his chamber, and making his circuit from one end of the heaven to the other (Psalm xix, 4-6). Such expressions are common now; nor would the most accomplished astronomer hesitate in speaking or writing thus. There are necessary imperfections in language. When we have to speak of God, we must describe his piercing eye, his powerful hand, his melting heart. Is there anything inconsistent with the dignity of inspiration in this? any ground for a charge of inaccuracy? Considerations like these dispose of a large mass of objections taken against the notion of Scripture inspiration. And we must add to them, that, if the sacred writers had not spoken in a popular way, not only would their contemporaries have misunderstood them, but the multitude in every age would have been puzzled. "Science," says Dr. Whewell, "is constantly teaching us to describe known facts in new language; but the language of Scripture is always the same; and not only so, but the language of Scripture is necessarily adapted to the common state of man's intellectual development, in which he is supposed not to be possessed of science. Hence the phrases used by Scripture are precisely those which science soon teaches men to consider as inaccurate; but they are not on that account the less fitted for their proper purpose. For, if any terms had been used adapted to a more advanced state of knowledge, they must have been unintelligible among those to whom the Scripture was first addressed." Among ourselves, when knowledge has increased, and scientific research been widely diffused, works written with scientific accuracy of expression would unquestionably be beyond the comprehension of the people. For the Bible to come home, as it was intended, to every man's house and heart, it must meet him on the threshold of his own knowledge and notions; it must intertwine itself with his every-day thoughts; else it could be but a sealed book to him, and it would lose one of its grandest characteristics as the book, not of an age, or a class, or a station, but of ancient and modern times, of old men and children, of princes and peasants, of Jews and Gentiles, of bond and free, the book for all, emphatically for the race of man. So that it has never grown antiquated: it travels, as it were, along with successive generations, and, it must be acknowledged, even by those who question its accuracy, that, though written, most of it, in a distant antiquity, the Bible does not shock us, as some other professedly sacred books do, by absurdities and violent misstatements.

Institute for Training Colored Ministers.

This Institute is under the care of the General Assembly of the Southern Presbyterian Church. The subject of educating a colored ministry had been under consideration several years, and it was finally determined to establish a Seminary for that purpose, with the view to the formation of an "African Presbyterian Church." This was effected in 1876, and the Institution placed under the care of Rev. C. A. Stillman, and located at Tuscaloosa, Ala. The exercises were commenced in October, 1876, Rev. Andrew Flinn Dickson being the first Professor, a man eminent for his learning and his life-long devotion to the spiritual interests of this people. He labored with great zeal and patience in this work, until his lamented death, in January, 1879. The Rev. Dr. I. W. Kerr conducted most faithfully the exercises, till the end of the session, in July, when Rev. D. C. Rankin was elected Professor, who served with great zeal and fidelity, until his resignation, in July, 1883.

Meanwhile the school had grown steadily, so that the Executive Committee reported to the Assembly of 1883 that there had been connected with it during the year thirty-one students, sixteen of which were Presbyterians. The number of the latter has now increased to twenty. The advantages of the school have always been freely extended to other evangelical Churches.

Rev. W. H. Richardson was elected a second Professor, in July, 1881, and served one year, when his place was filled by Rev. I. I. Anderson.

In September, 1883, Rev. D. D. Sanderson, D. D., of Eutaw, Ala., was elected to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of Rev. D. C. Rankin.

In 1877 the Institute was placed under the direction of an Executive Committee, upon a footing with the other evangelical agencies of the Church, and a day fixed for an annual collection in all the congregations, for its support. It has an excellent building, well furnished, and a valuable library. The churches, thus far, have provided amply for its support. It has never been in debt, but, having no endowment, it depends on the liberality of the people. It may now be considered as permanently established, is growing in the confidence of the churches and of the colored people, and, it is believed, has before it a career of great usefulness.

"The Interior." One of the immediate results of the reunion was the establishment of this paper by the Presbyterians of the Northwest. The enterprise was projected in 1869, and by the first of February, 1870, a capital stock of $50,000 had been subscribed, and in March the first issue was published, Rev. Dr. Arthur Swazey appearing as the chief editor. The capital stock was exhausted in the enterprise before the first of October, in the following year (1871). On the 9th of October the city of Chicago was burned, and The Interior, without capital, and its friends prostrated by the great losses, was supposed to be wiped out of existence. Mr. W. C. Gray, of Cincinnati, however, undertook to restore it, and after a year's effort the Hon. Cyrus H. McCormick came to his rescue, assuming the entire financial burdens. At this date (1883), the paper has an assured circulation of about 17,000, and is highly prosperous. The Hon. Cyrus H. McCormick is now the proprietor, and Wm. C. Gray, PH. D., the gifted editor.

Iowa, Synod of. The Synod of Iowa, as defined by the General Assembly of 1881, includes "all the presbyteries within the State of Iowa, and all the ministers and churches under the care of said presbyteries. There are eight of these presbyteries, Dubuque, Cedar Rapids, Iowa City, Iowa, Des Moines, Waterloo, Fort Dodge and Council Bluffs. The general location and relative position of these is indicated by their names, taken from chief towns within their bounds, with the exception of Iowa, which, as the original Presbytery of the Old School branch of the Church retains its old name, but covers only a little more than seven counties in the Southeastern corner of the State.

There are now under the care of this Synod 252 ministers, 6 licentiates, 30 candidates for the ministry, 352 churches, 20,941 communicants, 25,241 pupils in the Sabbath schools.

There are three flourishing educational institutions immediately under the care of this Synod: Coe College, located at Cedar Rapids; Lenox College, at Hopkinton, and Parsons College, at Fairfield. For the years 1882-3, there were in Coe College fifteen professors and teachers and two hundred and thirty-four students in the literary, art and music departments; in Lenox College, five professors and teachers, one hundred and forty-seven students in the literary and forty-eight in the musical department; in Parsons College, twelve professors and teachers; one hundred and seventy-eight students in the literary and thirty-six in the musical department.

The Synod is now a delegated body, in accordance with the provisions of the following overture, transmitted to the Presbyteries in 1882, and by them approved the following Spring: 1st. The Synod of Iowa shall be a delegated body. 2d. The basis of representation shall be the same as for the General Assembly, viz.: the number of ministers on the roll of the Presbyteries. 3d. The ratio of representation shall be one minister and one elder for every four ministers enrolled, and for any residual fraction equal to two.

The present officers of Synod are: Moderator—Rev. T. H. Cleland, D. D.; Stated Clerk—Rev. David S. Tappan; Permanent Clerk—Rev. Harris G. Rice. The history of this Synod may conveniently be divided into three periods. 1st. That previous to the reunion of 1870. 2d. From reunion to the reconstruction of Synods in 1882. 3d. From 1882 to the present time.

First Period. Of the separate Old School and New School branches of the Church.

Old School Branch. Among the earliest settlers within the territorial limits of the present State of Iowa were many sturdy Presbyterians from the East. While it was still a part of the territory of Michigan and claimed by the Indians, these settlers began to gather at convenient points along its Eastern border, bringing with them from their former homes their attachment to the pure doctrines and simple forms of their ancestral faith. Presbyterian churches were soon established in every considerable settlement. On the 24th of June, 1837, Revs. L. G. Bell and Samuel Wilson, acting for the Presbytery of Schuyler, organized the church of West Point, consisting of eleven members. This was soon followed by others, so that in three years there were enough to form a Presbytery. The Synod of Illinois, sitting at Rushville, October, 1840, organized the Presbytery of Iowa, to embrace the territory of that name. This new Presbytery met for the first time at Muscatine (then called Bloomington), November 6th, 1840, when the following churches were placed upon its roll: First Burlington, West Point, Madison, Round Prairie, First Davenport, First Iowa City, Spring Creek, First Rockingham and First Mount Pleasant.

In 1852 this Presbytery, together with those of Cedar and Des Moines, to which it had given birth, were detached by the General Assembly from the Synod of Illinois and constituted the Synod of Iowa, which met and organized at Muscatine, October 14th, 1852. The Presbytery of Dubuque was set off from that of Cedar, in 1855. In the same year the Presbytery of Minnesota, called afterwards St. Paul, was attached to the Synod, remaining in this connection until 1860, when the Synod of St. Paul was erected by the General Assembly.

In 1856 the Presbytery of Des Moines was divided so as to form the Presbytery of Council Bluffs. And the year following the General Assembly set off from the Synod of Iowa the Presbyteries of Iowa, Des Moines and Council Bluffs, constituting the Synod of Southern Iowa, which met and organized at Fairfield, October 8th, 1857. The Synod of Iowa now embraced the Presbyteries of Cedar, Dubuque and Sioux City, which had been organized the year previous. To these were added, in 1860, the Presbytery of Toledo, the name of which was changed to Vinton, in 1866, the Presbytery of Fort Dodge in 1865, and the Presbytery of Frankville in 1867.

The Synod of Southern Iowa. As already seen, when organized it consisted of the Presbyteries of Iowa, Des Moines and Council Bluffs. In 1860 the territory was further divided so as to form the Presbytery of Fairfield. In 1858 the Presbytery of Nebraska was attached, the name of which was the following year changed to Omaha, which in 1861 was united with the Presbytery of Council Bluffs, the new organization being called the Presbytery of Missouri river.

New School Branch. Among the early settlers were many whose sympathies and connections had been with this side of the Presbyterian family, and with the same zeal that characterized their brethren of the other branch, they labored to establish churches of their own wherever they located. The Yellow Springs (now Kossuth) Church was organized, September 12th, 1840, with eleven members, by Rev. James Carnahan, of Indiana. Near the same time churches were also organized at Ft. Madison, Toolsboro, Iowa City, Muscatine and Burlington.

The Presbytery of Des Moines was organized at Yellow Springs (now Kossuth), April 28th, 1842, having under its care the six churches just mentioned and four ministers.

In 1852 this Presbytery and those of Iowa City and Keokuk, formed from it, were detached from the Synod of Illinois, and constituted by the General Assembly the Synod of Iowa. The first meeting was held, and the organization effected at Yellow Springs, September 1st, 1853. In 1855 the Presbytery of Dubuque was formed out of that of Iowa City. Cedar Valley Presbytery came into existence in 1857, and a year later its name was changed to Iowa Valley. In 1865 it was again merged in the Presbytery of Dubuque. In 1859 the Presbytery of Chariton was formed, and in 1865 that of Cedar Rapids. To these was added, in 1867, the Presbytery of Omaha, embracing Nebraska and the counties of Iowa bordering on the Missouri river.

Second Period. From the reunion, 1870, to the reconstruction of Synods, in 1881.

At the time of the union of the two branches of the Church there were occupying the territory of the State of Iowa three Presbyterian Synods, Iowa (N. S.), Iowa (O. S.) and Southern Iowa (O. S.)

Out of these two new Synods were formed, called Synod of Iowa, North, and Synod of Iowa, South, the former being made the legal successor of the two former Synods of Iowa, the latter that of the Synod of Southern Iowa. The South line of the counties of Clinton, Jones, Linn, Benton, Tama, Marshall, Story, Boone, Greene, Carroll, Crawford and Monona was made the boundary between these Synods. The Synod of Iowa, South, was also made to include the State of Nebraska and the Territory of Wyoming. The Synod of Iowa, North, was organized at Cedar Rapids, July 5th, 1870; that of Iowa, South, at Des Moines, July 13th, 1870. The former comprised the Presbyteries of Cedar Rapids, Dubuque, Waterloo and Fort Dodge; the latter those of Iowa, Iowa City, Des Moines and Missouri River. In 1872 the Presbytery of Missouri River was divided so as to form three Presbyteries, Council Bluffs, Omaha and Nebraska, the last two, being in Nebraska, were cut off in 1874, when the Synod of Nebraska was formed.

Third Period.—The reconstructed Synod of Iowa. In 1881 the General Assembly consolidated the Synods of Iowa North and Iowa South, constituting the Synod of Iowa, and making it coterminous with the State of the same name. This measure went into effect January 2d, 1882, and the new Synod was organized at Des Moines, October 19th, 1882.

Growth.—In 1855 there were, in both branches of the Church, as near as can be ascertained, 78 ministers, 116 churches and 3753 communicants.

The statistics of the two branches at the time of the reunion, as given in the Minutes of the General Assembly for 1870, excluding anything outside of the State, were as follows:—

	Ministers.	Licentiate.	Candidates.	Churches.	Whole number of communicants.	Sabbath-school attendance.	Amount given to the Board and for miscellaneous objects.	Amount given to the General Assembly and for congregation-bound purposes.
O. S.....	119	3	33	195	10,357	9,274	$13,682	$97,092
N. S.....	69	1	7	81	3,522	4,300	3,504	32,604
Total.....	188	4	40	276	13,879	13,574	$17,186	$129,696
1883.....	252	6	30	352	20,944	25,241	$48,945	$221,359
Difference ...	64	2	10	76	7,065	11,667	$21,759	$91,663

It is thus seen that in everything there has been an encouraging growth, with the single exception of candidates for the ministry, in which there has been an actual falling off of twenty-five per cent.

Irving, David, D. D., was born in Annan, Scotland, August 31st, 1821; ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Western District, in May, 1846; missionary in India, 1846-49; stated supply at North Salem, 1850-55; pastor of the First Church, Morristown, N. J., 1855-65, and has been one of the Corresponding Secretaries of the Board of Foreign Missions since 1865. Dr. Irving rendered valuable service on the foreign field, until impaired health necessitated his retirement from it. Whilst in the pastoral work he labored with great diligence and success. He is a gentleman of decided ability, untiring energy, and exemplary Christian character. His heart is absorbed in the great work to which, as Secretary, he has devoted so many years, and he advocates its claims with ability and eloquence.

Irwin, Rev. Nathanael, was born at Fagg's Manor, Chester county, Pa., October 17th, 1756. He graduated at Princeton, in 1770, along with James (afterward President) Madison. He was ordained over Neshaminy Church, November 3d, 1774, and continued there till his death. A shrewd knowledge of human nature and an uncommon business tact, fitted him to exert a great influence in the Church courts; as a proof of which he was Clerk of the old Synod, Moderator of the General Assembly in 1801, and the next year Permanent Clerk, till 1807. Though his manners in private life were stiff and unbending, he was forcible and pathetic in the pulpit. He was fond of music, and was a proficient on that clerical instrument, the violin. He was of a scientific turn, and was John Fitch's first patron. He also took a lively interest in local politics, and laid himself open to animadversion on account of it. For several years he held the office of Register and Recorder of Bucks county. He had a powerful voice, and a long head, both physically and intellectually. His name is the first in the list of Moderators without a title.

Mr. Irwin's remains were deposited, as he desired, at the spot in the burying-ground over which the pulpit in the original church of Neshaminy once stood, and on a horizontal marble tablet over his grave is the following inscription:—

REV. NATHANAEL IRWIN,
DIED MARCH 3d, 1812.

Aged 65 years, 4 months, 15 days.

To this sad tomb, whoever thou art, draw near;
Here lies a friend to truth; of soul sincere,
Of manners unaffected and of mind
Enlarged, he wished the good of all mankind;
Calmly he looked on either life, for here
His peace was made, and nothing left to fear.

J

Jack, Rev. Alexander B., is the youngest son of the late Rev. Dr. Alexander Jack, of Dunbar, Scotland, and a grandson of the once celebrated Rev. Dr. Robert Jack, of Manchester, England. He graduated at the Universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh, and after spending two years at the U. P. Hall, was induced to visit this country, and complete his studies at the Associate Reformed Seminary, then under care of Professors McCarrell and Forsyth. He was licensed by his Presbytery in 1859, and since then has preached with great success in Union Church, Newburgh, N. Y., and Mahoning Church, Danville, Pa., and at present he is pastor of Hazleton Presbyterian Church, Hazleton, Pa.

With a striking individuality, a strong and piercing intellect, Mr. Jack is a conspicuous ornament in the ministry and a man of superior pulpit power. His sermons, whenever committed to the press, are eagerly sought and read. For years he has been famous for the splendor of his word painting and very unusual eloquence. His manner in the pulpit is quite peculiar, but this is soon forgotten after he has begun to speak. The originality of his conceptions and the brilliant imagery in which he clothes them, at once arrest attention. Figures abound in his discourses, but they are not mere tropes, they are at once graphic delineations and perfect symbols. No preacher in the Church could with so much propriety adopt the famous saying: "Omnia que sunt in celo, sunt in terra terrestri modo, et omnia que sunt in terra, in celo caelesti modo." Gifted with a strangely bold and vivid imagination, he seizes the outline of a fact or of an event and invests it with a lovely and altogether unexpected light. One is astonished at the ease, the fluency and the extreme rapidity with which his illustrations fall upon the ear, all rounded and polished, like stones from the workshop of the lapidary. Some of these are so pertinent, and yet so ablaze with the coruscations of genius and poetry, that his hearers bear them away, refer to them, and repeat them again and again. In private he is quiet and unaffected, full of easy goodness and the slyest humor. With no airs or pretensions, he seems obliged to say some good things because they are in the way to be said.

Jackson, General Andrew, President of the United States from 1829 to 1837, was born in South Carolina, 1767. His father was an Irish emigrant. At the age of sixteen he took part in the war of Independence, at the close of which he became a law student, and was thus enabled to fill efficiently some high legal offices in Tennessee, to which he was subsequently appointed. On the breaking out of the war with England, in 1812, he took vigorous measures for the defence of the menaced territory. In 1814 he was appointed Major-General, and, among other exploits, which raised him to the highest point of popularity, he gained the decisive victory over the English, January 8th, 1815, at New Orleans, which put an end to the war. The same success attended his arms against the Creek tribes of Indians, whom he repeatedly subdued. In 1821 he was appointed Governor of Florida, and his gallant deeds being still fresh in his countrymen's recollection, he was brought forward by the Democratic party as a candidate for the Presidency, elected in 1828, and re-elected in 1832. His period of office is chiefly remarkable for the extension of Democratic tendencies which then took place. He obtained from France the payment of an indemnity of twenty-five millions of francs, for injuries done to the commerce of the United States during the empire. His refusal to renew the charter of the United States Bank, in 1833, was followed by one of the most violent financial crises on record. General Jackson was endowed with inflexible will and an ardent patriotism. He loved his country intensely, faithfully, and fearlessly, labored for its welfare, and his name is justly enrolled among its greatest men, even those who did not agree with him in his political principles and official measures according to him strict and stern honesty of purpose in his administration of the affairs of the Government. After his Presidential career terminated he retired to "The Hermitage," near Nashville, Tenn., and a short time before his decease made a profession of faith in the Presbyterian Church of that city.

The following extract from the sketch by Dr. Foote, in his "Sketches of North Carolina," of the Sugar Creek Presbyterian Church, about three miles north of Charlotte, will here be read with interest. "The log meeting-house that stood here, whose foundations you may in part see, the second occupied by the congregation that now worship in that brick house, was the place of worship while Mrs. Jackson and her son Andrew made Sugar Creek their refuge. The widow, an emigrant from Ireland, had buried her husband on the Waxhaw, then claimed by North Carolina, but now within the settled bounds of South Carolina, and, compelled by the sufferings of war, had fled for refuge to Mecklenburg.

"After the fall of Charleston, the British army spread out over the country. Col. Buford, from Bedford, Virginia, moving along the Waxhaw, as he supposed, out of danger, was suddenly set upon by Tarleton, who had been upon his trail. . . . The event of the battle is well known. Before night, the Waxhaw meeting-house was a hospital, and Buford's regiment killed, wounded, or dispersed. The females and children fled, to escape the ravaging torch of the relentless enemy. Mrs. Jackson took up her abode, with her two children, in Sugar Creek congregation, with widow Wilson, and remained a part of the Summer.

"This brave woman, and two of her sons, perished in the war, and left her youngest son a solitary member of the family. Her death was occasioned by a fever, brought on by a visit to Charleston, to carry necessaries to some friends and relations on board the prison-ship, whose deplorable sufferings she, with four or five other ladies, was permitted to relieve. On her way home she was seized with the prison fever, and soon ended her days. Somewhere between what was then called 'Quarterhouse' and the city of Charleston is her unknown grave. Men have often wondered how her son Andrew, in his most thoughtless days, always treated a faithful minister of the gospel so respectfully, and why, after encouraging his wife in a religious life, he himself should, in his age, become a member of the Presbyterian Church. The cause is found laid deep in his childhood. His mother was a member of the Waxhaw congregation, and he had seen and felt the influence of faithful ministers when a child."

Jackson, Sheldon, D. D., the only son of Samuel Clinton and Delia (Sheldon) Jackson, was born at Minaville, Montgomery county, N. Y., May 18th, 1831. He graduated at Union College, N. Y., in 1855; at Princeton Theological Seminary, in 1858, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Albany, May 14th, 1857, and ordained by the same Presbytery, May 5th, 1858. On the 18th of May, 1858, he was married to Miss Mary Voorhees.

On the 16th of September, 1858, they started for Spencer Academy, Indian Territory, reaching there October 6th, and remaining until the following Spring, as missionaries of the Board of Foreign Missions. His health failing in that malarious climate, he became a Home Missionary for Western Wisconsin and Southern Minnesota, from 1859 to 1864, with headquarters at La Crescent, Minn. In 1861 he accepted the pastorate of the Church at Rochester, Minn., and the general oversight of the mission work in Southern Minnesota, which relation continued from 1861 to 1869. In 1869 the Presbyteries of Ft. Dodge, Des Moines and Council Bluffs united in commissioning him as Superintendent of Missions for Northern and Western Iowa, Dakota, Nebraska and "the regions beyond," comprising one-fourth of the United States. In 1869 he removed his family to Council Bluffs, and gave special attention to the organization of churches in Western Iowa, Nebraska, and along the Union Pacific Railway. During the year, unexpectedly receiving a commission from the Board of Domestic Missions, as Superintendent of Missions for the Rocky Mountain Territories, in 1870, he removed his family to Denver, Colorado, discontinued his work in Iowa and Nebraska, and took charge of the vast and almost unknown region of country along the Rocky Mountains, from British America to Old Mexico, and covered by the great territories of Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona and Utah. He remained in this work until January, 1882, when he was removed by the Board of Home Missions to the Mission House, New York City, and made Business Manager of "The Presbyterian Home Missionary." In March, 1872, he established the "Rocky Mountain Presbyterian," elsewhere noticed in this volume. Dr. Jackson's field of work being among the exceptional populations of the country, he became the originator and one of the chief promoters of the "Woman's Executive Committee of Home Missions."

In 1879, and again in 1880, he was commissioned by the General Government to collect Indian children in New Mexico and Arizona and bring them to the Indian Training Schools at Carlisle, Pa., and Hampton, Va. He was a commissioner to the General Assemblies of 1860, '65, '67, '70, '75 and '80. He was the pioneer minister, organizing the first Presbyter-rian missions or churches in the Territories of Wyoming, Montana, Idaho, Utah, Arizona and Alaska. He was the founder of the Alaska Mission; secured the missionaries, raised the larger portions of the funds for the building, and made four visits to the country during the first six years of the missions. He assisted in the organization of the Synods of St. Paul in 1860, and Colorado in 1871, of the Presbyteries of Chippewa in 1859, Southern Minnesota in 1865, Colorado 1870, Wyoming 1871, Montana 1872 and Utah 1874; having previously organized the majority of the churches composing these several Presbyteries. Over one hundred churches owe their existence to his labors.

In the prosecution of this work he traveled, from 1869 to December, 1881, an aggregate of 315,027 miles, or an average of 26,540 miles a year. Much of this traveling was by stage coach, and some of it on mule-back or on foot, over the dangerous trails of the mountains. Several trips involved each 1500 miles of staging through a desolate and wild Indian country; twice he staged it across the plains and over the mountains, to the Pacific; twice he made trips of 2000 miles each, by stage and horseback; twice, dangerous canoe trips of several hundred miles, along the Alaskan coast, with wild Indians for his companions. To ride in the stage coach day and night, from early Monday to late on Saturday, without stopping, except for meals, was not an uncommon experience. To make a new way in the wilderness, ford rivers, climb mountains, cross the track of the avalanche and the trail of the murderous Indian; to be gaunt with hunger or parched with thirst; to blister under the semi-tropical sun of Arizona, or shiver in a northern "blizzard;" to sleep upon the ground, without shelter, exposed to the poisonous reptiles of the South; or dig a bed in the snows of the high mountains, or toss in a canoe on the waves of the North Pacific, have been the necessary vicissitudes of his work.

Dr. Jackson's wide experience, his fervid zeal, and his practical pungency, make him a very effective platform speaker, and he frequently visited the East, to arouse the Church on the subject of Missions. From 1869 to 1882 he delivered over nineteen hundred mission addresses.

Jackson, General Thomas Jonathan, was born January 21st, 1824, in Clarksburg, Harrison county, Va. His great-grandfather, an Englishman by birth, emigrated to the western portion of Virginia, and Edward Jackson, grandfather of T. J., was Surveyor of Lewis County for a long time, and represented it in the Legislature. His son, Jonathan Jackson, father of the subject of this sketch, moved to Clarksburg, where he studied law, and commenced the practice of the profession with his cousin, Judge John G. Jackson, acquiring considerable reputation. After a series of misfortunes, he died, in 1827, leaving four children, Thomas being the youngest, and at this time three years of age.

Soon after the death of his parents, he was taken to the home of his uncle, in Lewis county, and remained with him till he reached the age of seventeen years. Here he labored on the farm in Summer, and went to school three months in the Winter, gaining the rudiments of a plain English education. What he acquired subsequently was due to his stay at West Point, and his ultimate studies at the Virginia Military Academy. His orphan condition excited great sympathy among the neighbors, who knew and respected the good character of the Jackson family, and every assistance was extended to him in his struggle to carve out his future way in life and secure an honorable independence. A proof of this friendly sympathy is found in the fact that, at the age of sixteen, he was elected Constable of the county of Lewis, the duties of which office he discharged with intelligence and credit. He entered West Point in 1842, and in July, 1846, at the age of twenty-two, he graduated with distinction.

In 1852 he became Professor in the Virginia Military Institute. In personal appearance General Jackson was tall, raw-boned, and had a peculiar stride in walking. He was absent-minded, and he would often pause suddenly, and fix his eyes upon the ground; and in riding, had a habit of slapping his sides and raising his arm aloft, whether from some physical ailment which he thus relieved, or in prayer, is not known. He talked little with strangers, and was brief of speech, but never failed to return the salute of the humblest person, treating all men with the most kindly courtesy. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church, and earnest and active in religious movements. He died in 1863, and was buried in Lexington, Va., by request.

Jacobs, John Adamson, was born in Leesburg, Loudon county, Va., in 1806; taken in his infancy to Lexington, Ky., but reared in Lancaster, Garrard county, Ky.; lost both his parents in 1819; taught school in Madison county, before he became fourteen years of age; in his seventeenth year went to Centre College, at Danville, Ky.; while a student there was appointed a teacher in the State Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, by the Trustees of Centre College, who were Trustees of the Deaf and Dumb Institution also; went to Hartford, Conn., to qualify himself under Gallaudet and Clerc; reported for duty and entered the Kentucky Institution November, 1825, and died in office November 25th, 1869, after a most useful and honorable career.

Mr. Jacobs was one of the best instructors of the deaf and dumb in America, or in the world. He prepared for them two text-books which have been highly commended in Canada and in England. He was a man of general reading, and quite fond of poetry. He read law, also, and obtained license to practice. What was of great service to himself and others, he was a superior financier, and managed the business affairs of the Institution with admirable skill. About 1841, learning that the finances of Centre College were in a chaotic condition, he offered his services, to be rendered gratuitously, and in course of time put the college on a sound monetary basis. The large private estate which he left behind him would have been far larger if he had not generously relinquished considerable emoluments accruing from his office, and accepted in lieu a small salary. In addition to this, he made a gift to the Institution, of all its household and kitchen furniture, cows, etc. Mr. Jacobs was a life-long Presbyterian, liberal to other churches, pure and blameless in life, devoted to his work, and a genuine philanthropist. The Kentucky Institution for the Feeble Minded owes its existence to his efforts.

Jacobs, Rev. William Plumer, son of Rev. F. Jacobs, D. D., was born in Yorkville, S. C., March 15th, 1812. Graduated at the College of Charleston, S. C., March, 1861. He served as Reporter, for a time, on the Charleston Courier, Mercury, and other papers. He was licensed by Charleston Presbytery, April, 1863, and, after completing his studies at Columbia Seminary, was ordained to the charge of the united churches of Duncan's Creek (founded 1760) and her two daughters, Shady Grove and Clinton. By 1870 the Church of Clinton had grown so large as to require his entire services. In 1872 the colored members were organized into Sloan's Chapel, in connection with the Northern Assembly. In 1873 the Thornwell Orphanage was founded under his care. In 1875 mission work was begun at Rockbridge, and also at Goldville. In 1880 Clinton College was founded. He is still (1881) pastor of the Clinton Church, which has increased from thirty to two hundred members, and has sent off a colored colony of over one hundred members.

Jacobus, Melancthon Williams, D. D., LL. D., was the son of Mr. Peter Jacobus, an honored elder in the First Presbyterian Church, Newark, N. J. He was born in that city, September 19th, 1816. He graduated at Princeton College in 1831, with the highest honors of the Institution, and in 1835 entered Princeton Theological Seminary, where he not only regularly graduated, but spent a fourth year in study, at the same time assisting Prof. J. Addison Alexander, in the department of Hebrew. Licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, April 24th, 1839, he was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Brooklyn, N. Y., September 15th, of that year. Under his care and labors for nearly twelve years, the church prospered greatly, and at the close of his pastorate was one of the most flourishing churches in that city. In 1848, while in Brooklyn, he published the first volume of his Notes on the New Testament. Other volumes followed at intervals, the two volumes on Genesis appearing in 1864. These commentaries have had an immense sale, and are found among all denominations of Christians. Besides these, he was the author of many other and smaller works.

In the Fall of 1850 Dr. Jacobus' health gave way, and he made a tour through Europe, Egypt and Palestine, and returned with greatly improved health. During his absence the General Assembly, in May, 1851, elected him Professor of Oriental and Biblical Literature, in the Theological Seminary at Allegheny, which position, on his return, he accepted, and was released from his pastoral charge and dismissed to the Presbytery of Ohio, October 21st, 1851. In January, 1858, in addition to his work in the Seminary, he accepted a call to the Central Church of Pittsburg, which he served for twelve years with marked success. In 1866 he made a second tour of Europe. He was Moderator of the last General Assembly of the Old School Church, in 1869, and conjointly with Rev. P. H. Fowler, D. D., presided at the opening of the first re-united Assembly, in 1870. He presented the able Report on Sustentation, which was adopted by the General Assembly of 1871, and was Secretary of that scheme for three years, until it was merged into the Board of Home Missions, in 1874. In this department of church work, his labors were arduous and unintermitted, and had much to do with the failing of his health two years before his death. In 1876 he was elected Secretary of the Board of Education, but declined the position, so that he might continue to expound the Word of God, to which work he had devoted his life.

Dr. Jacobus stood in the front rank of the Biblical scholars of his age. As a preacher, he maintained all through his ministry a high position, while on the platform his addresses were always happy and effective. He was a most energetic and persistent worker, and his industry was untiring. October 28th, 1876, he was cut down in the very midst of life, usefulness and responsibilities, and was widely and deeply lamented.

James, Rev. Robert Wilson, was born in Williamsburg District, South Carolina, June 3d, 1793. His father, Captain John, and grandfather, Major John James, were distinguished for their patriotism in the war of the Revolution, and were also consistent members of the Presbyterian Church. He graduated at the South Carolina College in 1813. His theological studies, which were commenced and prosecuted for a time under Rev. Dr. James W. Stephenson, and Rev. Dr. M. Wilson, were completed at Princeton Seminary, in 1817. On the 3d of June, of the same year he was licensed by Concord Presbytery (N. C.), to preach the gospel, after which he labored for several months, as a missionary within its bounds, in company with the venerable Dr. Hall. In May, 1819, he was ordained and installed over the churches of Indian Town and Bethel, in Williamsburgh District, S. C., where, during a pastorate of nine years, the work of the Lord, to some extent, was made to prosper in his hand, and particularly among the colored people, many of whom became hopeful subjects of grace under his ministry. He subsequently became pastor of Salem Church, in which relation he continued, faithful in labor, for over thirteen years. He died April 13th, 1841.

As a minister, Mr. James was both doctrinal and practical. In his public ministrations he gave special attention to the colored portion of his flock. As a theologian, he was much respected by his brethren. As a member of the judicatories of the Church, his opinions were highly valued, and often determined the most important questions. His mouth and his purse were ever open to advance the institutions of religion and learning. As a man, he was truly benevolent, gentle and urbane, and possessed that kind of magnanimity which led him cordially to despise everything that was envious, little, or selfish. As a Christian, he was exemplary, and enjoyed the comforts of that religion which he preached to others. His death was one of triumph.

James, Rev. William Henry, third son of Lewis Mulford and Harriet Davis James, was born in Deerfield, N. J., July 16th, 1833. He graduated at Lafayette College in 1862, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1865. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Passaic, April 19th, 1864. For one year after leaving Princeton he was an assistant of Rev. N. C. Burt, D. D., in the Seventh Church, Cincinnati, Ohio. On October 2d, 1866, he was ordained and installed pastor of the Church of Springdale, twelve miles from Cincinnati, which relation still continues. In this, his first and only pastorate, his labors have been signally blessed to the growth of the church in numbers, and its development in beneficence and general activity. In addition to his work at Springdale, he has for more than twelve years, supplied, every Sabbath afternoon, the Church of Sharonville, four miles distant. Mr. James has written occasionally for the religious press, and published a sermon preached on the eighteenth anniversary of Springdale Church. He is very faithful in attending the meetings of Presbytery and Synod, and is influential in these bodies. In 1875 he was Moderator of the Synod of Cincinnati. For thirteen years he has been a member of the Home Missions Committee of Presbytery, and for four years its chairman, in which position he has labored very earnestly and efficiently. His ability and usefulness as a minister, his fidelity and wisdom as a presbyter, his soundness in the faith, and his firm Christian character, have given him a high rank among the trusted and honored members of the Presbytery.

Jamieson, Jesse M., D. D., son of Mr. John Jamieson, was born near Newville, Cumberland county, Pa., June 27th, 1809. His parents were members of the Associate Reformed (now United Presbyterian) Church. He entered Jefferson College, Pa., in 1830, and left it in 1831. He united with the Presbyterian Church in 1832, then under the ministry of Rev. Matthew Brown, D. D. For a year he taught in an Academy in Maryland, and studied Theology with its Principal, Dr. Alexander Campbell. In 1835, at the request of the Rev. Dr. Brown and Dr. E. P. Swift, the Secretary of the Western Foreign Missionary Society, he went to India to take charge of the High School at Lodianna, which had been transferred to our Mission by the late Sir Claude Wade, of the East India Company's service. The Presbytery of Lodianna was organized December 21st, 1836, at which time Mr. Jamieson was taken under its care as a candidate for the ministry. He was ordained by the same Presbytery, in October, 1837.

Mr. Jamieson spent twenty-two years in India, and was stationed at Saranmpur, Sabathu, and Ambala, successively. Other arrangements having been made for the High School at Lodianna, and being fond of languages, he gave a good deal of time to the study of Sanscrit, Persian, and Thibetan, besides the spoken languages, and prepared the first Christian tract in the Thibetan language. He returned to America in 1857, having left two wives and three children in India graves. Since that time he has not found the way open to return to the work of his choice. For years after his return he was engaged in teaching the languages and mathematics in the "Marengo Collegiate Institute," Ill., and in Carroll College, Wis. Since then he has been engaged as a supply in weak churches in the neighborhood of Monmouth, Ill., where he has resided twenty years. He has also translated the 10th section of the "Bhagaroot Ghita" (a history of the Hindu god Krishna). Dr. Jamieson is an exemplary and earnest Christian, a faithful preacher, a fine scholar, and held in high esteem by all who know him.

Jamison, Hon. Samuel Shryock, was born in Martinsburg, Va., in September, 1797. Two years afterward his parents removed to Greensburg, Pa., and in 1801, to what is now known as Conemaugh township, Indiana county. Here he grew up to man's estate, and became a member of the Presbyterian Church. Being one of the pioneer settlers of Indiana county, he was closely identified with its history and progress during the long period of nearly three-quarters of a century; and no event of importance took place within its limits with which he was not perfectly familiar, whilst in most he took an active part. In 1818 he removed to Indiana, where, in partnership with the Hon. Joseph Thompson, he carried on the business of wheelwright and chair-making. In this avocation he continued until 1826, when he removed to Saltsburg, having obtained a contract from General Lacoek for the construction of a section of the Pennsylvania Canal. This work occupied his time and attention until 1829, when he received the appointment of Supervisor of the Western extension of the canal, extending from below Saltsburg—"Tarr' Locks,"—to Pittsburg, about half the entire length of the canal west of the mountains. He subsequently engaged in farming; then in the construction of two sections of the Northwestern, now known as the Western Pennsylvania Railroad, in the vicinity of Saltsburg. Having removed to Council Bluffs, Iowa, after a short time he returned to the place of his former residence, in Pennsylvania.

In 1836 Mr. Jamison was chosen Brigade Inspector for the military district comprising Armstrong, Clarion, Jefferson and Indiana counties. In 1843 he was a member of the convention called for the purpose of nominating three candidates for canal commissioners. In 1853 he was elected to the Senate of Pennsylvania. During his Senatorial career he was noted for his magnanimity and liberal spirit. "For sound discrimination, clear judgment, rigid integrity, and conscientious discharge of all official and personal duties," says Governor Curtin, "Mr. Jamison had no superiors and few equals in the Senate, which, during his service, was remarkable for the number of members distinguished for their experience and ability." After a life of probity and usefulness, Major Jamison died the death of a Christian. He enjoyed an unusual degree of public esteem, and left an unsullied record. He was the father of B. K. Jamison, the well-known banker of Philadelphia, who is also a useful member of the Walnut Street Presbyterian Church.

Janeway, Jacob J., D. D., was born in New York, November 20th, 1774. He graduated at Columbia College, in 1794, and studied theology with the celebrated Dutch divine, Dr. Livingston. He was ordained colleague of Dr. Green, in the Second Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, in 1799. For thirteen years they worked together with unbroken harmony. When Dr. Green was made President of the College of New Jersey, Dr. Skinner was chosen colleague to Dr. Janeway. In 1816, Dr. Skinner, with fifty of the members, parted, to build up a new enterprise, the Arch Street Church. In 1818, Dr. Janeway was elected Moderator of the General Assembly. In 1828 he accepted a Professorship in the new Theological Seminary at Allegheny, Pa., but relinquished it in a year, in consequence of property difficulties. In 1830 he was installed over the First Dutch Reformed Church, in New Brunswick, N. J., which position he held only two years, on account of ill health. In 1833 he was appointed Vice-President of Rutgers College. This post he resigned on reuniting with the Presbyterian Church. From this time forward he
